It was clear to Nisos, if not to Zeuks, who had at last under the shock of the arrival of the skipper of the "Teras", shaken off his shameless tendency to respond to any increase in dramatic danger by an increase in undramatic drowsiness, that the four sailors on the deck below had stopped using their oars and that the "Teras" was now doing nothing but obeying the helmsmanship of Eumolpos as she followed the urge of those four men's final strokes.

"Odysseus told me" — and Nisos cried out his master's name with a voice to be heard in competition with the two sounds that just then were most dominant; in the first place with the whistling of the wind in the complicated rigging beneath the mast, rigging which, though doubtless less involved than Pontos' and Proros' recent "pessenizing" with soldiers made of splinters and slivers and shavings of wood, would have been enough to puzzle any landsman; and in the second place with the stentorian breathing of the poor blanketed Enorches.

Nisos must instinctively have said "Odysseus" instead of "the King" because, with this incredible moonlight flooding the rocks and beaches along whose edge they were moving and with that extraordinary rock wearing a human shape and those two phantom goddesses moaning forth into the moonlight their contrarious explanations of the present world-madness, it must have struck him that what was now happening was so dramatic that it lent itself better to the romantic name of the lover of Circe and Calypso than to the clanging monosyllable "King" whose only virtue was that it was the symbol of absolute law and order.

"Odysseus told me to say that both you yourself, friend Zeuks, and you also, Arsinöe my dear, will be welcome as soon as you can reach it, at the Passengers’ Dining-Table in the King’s cabin, and he told me to accompany you both as soon as — —”

“What’s the matter, baby-boy?” interrupted Zeuks, looking as if he were a human skin on the point of bursting and losing its human shape in one great bubble of laughter: “Have you got a flea in — —”

“I pray it’s not a poisonous fly!” cried Arsinöe, with unmistakable sympathy in her tone. “You may laugh my Lord Zeuks,” the girl went on, coming hurriedly to Nisos’ side and raising both hands to the spot just above his collar-bone where he was now scratching himself with positively vicious intensity, “yes, you may laugh, but there may easily have been a whole swarm of poisonous insects carried from our last ‘port of call’ which was of course your — or I suppose I must now say ‘our’ — island harbour.”

But to the girl’s astonishment, and indeed to the astonishment of both Zeuks and Akron, Nisos thrust away her sympathetic hand, though its delicate fingers were trembling with real concern. But Arsinöe was saved from feeling hurt at his rejection of her help by her amazement at what he proceeded to do when she withdrew her hand. Both Zeuks and Akron were as astonished as she was and all the three of them drew near to watch his antics.

Even Enorches, clutching his outer blanket with his left hand round his throat and his inner blanket with his right hand round his waist, woke up suddenly from his trance and stared with unglazed absorbed concentrated attention at what Nisos was doing. Nisos had clearly got possession now of whatever creature it was that had caused him to scratch himself to such a tune; and he now held it in his clenched fist close to one of his ears. The only sound that issued from his imprisoning fingers was an irregular buzzing; and Arsinöe smiled at both Zeuks and Akron, who were now openly smiling at each other, while the Priest of Orpheus began muttering the most formidable liturgical prayer he knew by heart that the most mystical swamp in the realm of Aidoneus should receive his purified ghost.

“You were indeed brave to come all this way from your club-tent, Master Myos,” murmured our young friend; “though I hope your dear companion, the Brown Moth, won’t be too miserable in your absence.”

“Look at Enorches!” was the Fly’s reply to this; and the moment our friend obeyed him he knew perfectly well that the Moth was anything but miserable; for it was indeed obvious from the beatific smile of paradisal bliss that now radiated from the Priest’s curiously emphatic nose, mouth, eye-sockets, eyebrows, and ears, that the lovely little winged shadow that now kept hovering under and above and round and beneath the oddly-shaped chin of the oracle of Nothingness was nothing less than the Brown Moth herself playing at burning to death on the altar of truth.

That neither the worship of Eros nor of Dionysos nor even of Silence herself, oldest of all divinities in the world and the one most likely to outlive them all, could wholly satisfy the Priest’s voracious mystery-maw, Nisos at that moment felt certain. The Orphic Priest could praise Nothingness; but the ecstasy he worshipped was a real, actual, concrete experience, which, if not given him by drink or by lechery, could be given him by the devotion of a disciple.

“She knows you are here, does she?”

“Of course. And when she’s finished playing at ‘wings in the candle’ to pluck that poor devil out of his black blot of clotted ink, she’ll come fluttering round us; and then together— ‘off we’ll fly to drink with Helen before we die!’”

“With Helen?”

“I mean in a metaphysical sense, by sipping her Nepenthe.”

“Ah, my friend! Don’t you know why that is?”

“I can’t say I do.”

“That’s because” — and the Fly began to grow as academic as he always did with the Moth— “that’s because it was Athene herself who taught you the syntax of it.”

“You mean the peculiar way you always begin and always end with the adverb?”

“I mean the way we say: ‘Beautifully fluttered round him the moth symbolically-speaking.’”

“But do go on, Master Fly, with what you were telling me you had just over-heard from the talk of the Sixth Pillar with the Club of Herakles.”

“The Sixth Pillar told the Club that Princess Nausikaa had been chosen Queen of her Native Land and that those two Immortal Horses, that the Priest over there tried to maim, are even now on their way through the air to take her back to that country where her palace still possesses that famous garden which is the most beautiful garden that has ever been seen in the whole history of the world.”

At this startling piece of news Nisos jumped to his feet, removed his hand from his ear, opened his fingers, and let the Fly go free with a flourish of his wrist. The Fly was no sooner free than it was instantly joined by the Moth, and the speed with which the two of them flew off the top deck, down the ladder to the oarsmen’s deck, down the next ladder to the cabin-deck, and thence straight into the interior of the great weapon that was their nomadic home, was incredible.

We human beings in our crowded life are more aware of the starting-points and arriving-points of insects than of the rapidity of their movements from point to point.

"Come along, Zeuks, for heaven's sake come along! And you too my lord Enorches! Fate will find a Community for you — don't you doubt it — where you can preach, if not practise, your nihilistic ideas, whether under the love-charms of Eros or under the Thyrsi of Dionysos!"

Our friend's voice was pitched so high, and he flung into it such a resounding intonation, that not only did Akron cast a sweeping glance from one end to the other of all the Horizon that was visible from their present position, but, to the evident surprise of Zeuks, Enorches actually did scramble clumsily to his feet, and even began automatically kicking at the skirt of his longest blanket as if to make sure that his sandals were firmly fastened.

Nisos then snatched instinctively at Arsinöe's arm; and followed closely by Zeuks, with Enorches lurching and shuffling after them, he turned his back upon the dragon-neck of the ship's figure-head and, avoiding the eyes of Pontos and Proros, for with a certain part of his mind he felt as if he were running away, he headed for that already familiar ladder leading down to the oarsmen's deck.

At the foot of this first ladder he paused for no more time than was just needed to get a glimpse of the face of Euros, a face that at that second looked vexed, irritated, touchy, anxious, full of the most sensitive perturbations, as he bent above his. motionless oar, ready to give it the pull of a master oarsman at the faintest hint from the upper deck.

Arrived at that crowded, ticklish, furtively confused and terribly littered centre of all the gossip and eavesdropping that went on in the passenger's quarter, Nisos, who was followed closely by Zeuks and by Arsinöe, who once again had a tight hold of each other's hands, but who himself, since he had no. hand to share with anyone, nor much thought for anything either, save to steer the wavering steps of the Priest of the Mysteries, had a moment's breathing-space. Now that this weird and disturbing individual was safely under at least temporary control Nisos couldn't help noticing the insatiable and unpleasantly greedy manner in which the man snuffed up and inhaled with, undisguised relish all the odours and all the smells and all the fragrances and all the airy essences and all the fetid stinks that challenged both the nostrils and the stomachs of any newcomers who dared to plunge from the upper deck into the stygian reek of these bowels of the "Teras".

And Nisos couldn't resist saying to himself: "Would this extraordinary creature advise us to lose ourselves in the madness of love or the madness of drink, and thus get to the Original nothingness, before the earth, before the sky, before the sea, before the sun, before the gods created man, before man created the Gods, if he hadn't forgotten the oracle that my mother used to tell me was what, by his obedience to it, made Odysseus the wisest of all men — Meeden Agan, 'nothing in excess'?"

"Why in the name of Aidoneus," the lad's thoughts ran on, as he watched his blanketed priest snuffing up with such a frenzy of maniacal sensuality the whirligig-reek of kitchen-fumes mixed with the contaminated sweat of the youthful disposers of excrement, "why in the name of Aidoneus was mother always quoting that Meeden Agan, 'Nothing in Excess', motto? It had nothing to do with the House of Naubolides, and was always on the lips of Odysseus. I can't understand it! Well, well! 'Nothing in Excess' will have now to be my motto, even when it comes to plunging into the revelry of this weird feast."

But it is easier to formulate a philosophy, even if we are destined to be a prophet in later life, than to apply it to a definite and particular occasion; and Nisos was puzzled by the sharpness of the pang of jealousy of which he became aware when Zeuks put his arm round the waist of Arsinöe.

The daughter of Hector and the son of Arcadian Pan, however, seemed wholly and entirely oblivious of the feelings they were exciting in their guide as they pushed on in front of him.

Nisos, indeed, had all he could do, apart entirely from his feelings, in steering the blanketed Priest of Orpheus through this packed and perspiring crowd. The most difficult place to pass, with Enorches as your self-absorbed ghost-walker, was the spot where a couple of elongated planks had been laid down to cover a slippery slope that led to the kitchens and pantries and sculleries as well as to the sleeping-quarters of the Lybian and Syrian ship-boys.

Nisos was struck at this particular point at once by the perfect opportunity which such a spot offered for the accumulation of filth, and by the noteworthy fact, which certainly spoke well for the crew, that those planks were so immaculately clean. As both white and black serving-boys, in spite of their trained politeness and of their evident terror of the blankets of Enorches, were pushed and jostled against him by their companions, Nisos decided that the sweat of the lads of the Greek islands and mainland had a completely different odour from the sweat of the lads from the more eastern Asiatic shores and harbours.

But he had no time to pause to philosophize now upon differences of human sweat for Zeuks had already got himself and Arsinöe into that unusual cabin crowded with people and it had fallen to the lot of Nisos to project the staring Enorches, blankets and all, into the presence of Odysseus and Nausikaa who were on their feet in that extempore dining-hall talking gravely together.

The old king and his ballad-princess of so long ago were, however, spared the discomfort of having to be polite to such a person as Enorches by the appearance on the scene, this time for just the sort of occasion Nisos had always prayed would never arise, of the super-official, super-courtly, super-distinguished, super-pontifical Herald; who at once, as a born authority in regard to all ceremonies that require magisterial handling, and as a practised expert in all those concatenations that need super-natural tact, greeted Zeuks and Arsinöe with a glance and a couple of words, and took the Priest of Orpheus under his impeccable wing.

As for Nisos, who was quite alone now, he found himself once more following Zeuks and Arsinöe with his eyes. Neither Odysseus nor Nausikaa seemed to notice him, although the king may have done so without revealing it. But the feeling that caused him to stand and gaze at the back of Zeuks' satyrish knuckles as they presented themselves to his view, with the implication that the palm of the man's hand was enjoying the curve of the girl's hip, was accentuated now by an uprush of self-revelation that nearly knocked him over.

The truth of the matter now must be, he now boldly dared to tell himself, that it was this Trojan woman Arsinöe, and not either his friend Tis's little sister, Eione, nor the prophet's prophetic daughter, Pontopereia, whom he desired for his wife.

"Yes," Nisos told himself, "though she must be years and years older than I am, she's the one I want! She understands me better than anybody in the world except Tis; and I like her better than anyone in the world. I like her better than father or mother or Agelaos."

Odysseus and Nausikaa, who now seemed completely absorbed in each other, kept moving a little nearer to him, though without taking any notice of him; and this went on till he was leaning with his back against several pieces of suspended armour and a couple of tunics woven in Ithaca but dyed in Tyre: it went on, in fact, till he began to feel, not so much hungry, as extremely sleepy.

What was indeed like a demonic teasing of him by fate than anything else was the fact that although he could just make out from where he leant, or rather crouched, behind the king and Nausikaa, the figure of Okyrhöe seated calmly, and with a face like a mask, at one of the long tables, with an empty place next to her, devouring with an absorbed and concentrated attention a somewhat over-ripe Sicilian melon, he could only just see, between the embroidered sleeve of the protective Herald and the bare neck of the protected Enorches the delicate waist and the left breast, the latter only half-covered with "linon" that specially lovely Achaian linen so dear to the ladies of all lands, of the girl with whom he now knew he was really in love as he had never been in love before.

This certainty reached his mind in close connection with those clutching knuckles of the lecherous son of Pan which he now could detect beneath that white linen and whiter breast; but it obtained its domination over him and over his destiny in connection with a secret resolve he now made that was totally different from any purpose or any vow or any dedication he had ever made before.

And with this new intention, with this new gathering together of the diverse forces of his soul into what he decided must be, from now on, one intense, strongly compressed will, a will most malleable, a will most adaptable, a will that lends itself, a will that adjusts itself, a will that conceals itself, a will that multiplies itself, a will that seeks its irrepressible level, a will like water, a will like air, our young friend made a convulsive clutch at the foot of the Heraklean club upon which Odysseus had begun to lean so heavily in his absorbed talk with Nausikaa that there was a real danger of its suddenly sliding along the floor and letting him down.

But no sooner had Nisos clutched it than the familiar tinkling voice of the scientific Fly was in his ears. “Oh how much easier it would be, this ancient language of yours,” he thought, “if only there weren’t all these accurst adverbs! It’s the adverbs that spoil it. Why can’t you sting without stinging violently or buzz without buzzing gently? Why can’t you kiss without kissing tenderly? Why can’t you even think without thinking stupidly or cleverly?”

Although he didn’t relinquish his hold upon the club of Herakles, Nisos worked himself up into such irritation over the mania for adverbs in the language of insects, that in a whisper that contained something of sheer unkindness he called the attention of the Fly to the emergence from the club’s “lifecrack”, which was just above his fingers, of the priest-enamoured Moth.

But those adoring brown wings had barely fluttered twice up and down the sweltering space between the wet hairs of the man’s blanket and the wet hairs of the man’s chest, before, in her shrinking desire to comfort the Interpreter of the Mysteries without driving her companion to any regrettably rash act she had not only darted back to their lodging but had implored the Fly to translate for her what the news was that the club was hearing from the omniscient Sixth Pillar.

“Haven’t you yet caught across that moon-lit ocean of yours, my adventurous friend,” were the startling words that were now communicated to the moth by the fly and over-heard by Nisos, “the heavy breathing of Pegasos upon the wind and the quick gasps of his long-maned companion? And I presume Odysseus is already aware that his friend Nausikaa is now the Virgin Queen of her native-land, and that not only her parents’ palace and garden await her return, but the whole country passionately wants her back?”

Nisos clutched the foot of the club of Herakles so fiercely that the force of his grip squeezed the club’s attention out of his ears and reduced his Nemean senses to the same sort of deaf, dumb, and numb condition with which they had expected, washed up upon the shore of Ithaca, the reviving right hand of a new possessor.

And it was then that, more vividly than ever aware of those knuckles of Zeuks concealing from him so much of the bosom of Arsinöe, our young friend decided that he must learn from this queer rival of his, this fantastic child of Arcadian Pan, whose whole personality resembled an unburst bubble of purposeless laughter, the trick the fellow had of repeating some logos, some slogan of conduct, some motto of behaviour, by which a person’s divided will-power could be unified and concentrated.

And Nisos then and there decided that the word he wanted was the word spoudazo. “Yes, yes,” he muttered in his secret heart— “that’s the word, that’s the incantation I want! I want the feeling of being able to pull myself together till I’m like an arrow-head of intense will-power! Yes! yes! Spoudazo is my word, but I must add to it the word terpsis, the sensation of enjoyment, and I must throw into-these words my whole self and with my whole self, I here and now must will intensely that Arsinöe the Trojan shall belong to me!”

Nisos had no sooner decided upon selecting spoudazo, “I absolutely will” as the logos that should henceforth represent the motive-power of his life, than Odysseus and Nausikaa having decided upon something that was clearly very important as the result of their prolonged and absorbed discussion, swung clear round and came out of the extempore dining-hall into that wretchedly littered ante-chamber where those carefully scrubbed planks led down to the ship's lowest hold.

Our friend followed the aged King of Ithaca and the middle-aged Queen of the Phaiakians till they paused at the threshold of the cabin that Nausikaa shared with Okyrhöe. The ever-watchful old warrior was aware in a flash that they were being followed, and turned indignantly upon Nisos. But Nisos, knowing the wanderer's almost supernatural self-control, flung himself on his mercy without a second's hesitation.

"You ought O my King," he cried, "to know at once what I've learnt by means of the weapon you now hold in your hand! For as you now are holding it, mighty one, this is news you will never share with the Sixth Pillar in the Corridor at Ithaca! If I don't repeat every word of it, O great Master, may I pass at once to the kingdom of Aidoneus!"

It was with an unclouded forehead and even with the beginning of a friendly smile that the Wanderer bade him speak; and hurriedly and breathlessly the lad told the two of them the whole story.

To the young man's astonishment it was Nausikaa who spoke first. "You had better tell him," she said, addressing Odysseus, "what you have told me."

"I have been telling the Queen," said Odysseus at once, "what no one in the world knows except your mother; namely, my dear child, that I, and not Krateros Naubolides, am your father."

Our friend stood for a moment just as if one of those golden antennae, for that is what those elongated tassels that hung from the Helmet of Proteus were really like, had got twisted round his neck. Then his whole face puckered up, in the manner of a small boy who has been slapped and told to go to bed and the biggest tears that Nausikaa had ever seen, though two even bigger ones formed, though they did not fall, in her own eyes, rolled down his cheeks.

Odysseus looked quietly from one to the other of them, while with the wrist of the hand that held the club, that club which sometimes was called Dokeesis, “Seeming”, and sometimes “Expectation” he touched Nisos gently on the head. Then he said, while his bow-sprit beard turned with a queer jerk into the direction of the bed in Nausikaa’s cabin: “Well, my son, what our new Queen and your old Dad have to do now is to plant between us the seed of a new brother for you since you’ve lost Agelaos! And he’ll have to look sharp,” Odysseus added, as he led the Queen towards her own bed, “if our friend Leipephile is to conceive a new King of Ithaca before you and I come home from Atlantis!”

The old man — and our young friend, for all his emotional agitation, had the wit to notice this, took good care to prop up “Expectation” against the edge of their bed, before returning to the threshold to draw the curtains of their chamber — said to Nisos with an extremely humorous expression on his face: “For the sake of Aphrodite’s son, and by him I do not mean the good Aeneas — stay on guard here, my boy, and make sure that that terrible woman from Thebes doesn’t break in upon us! O yes! and don’t fail to remind me, before those Immortal Horses do carry them off, to see to it that that poor devil of an Enorches has a couple more blankets to keep him warm! He hurt both those creatures, you must remember, and flying horses, like ordinary horses, have long memories.”

CHAPTER XII

IT WAS AT the upper portion of Pegasos's wounded shoulder that the hypnotized stare of Nisos was fixed. With his own back to the mast Nisos had accepted for a moment the serious responsibility of two important ropes while Proros as the natural result of the unusual amount of wine he had drunk went to the side of the vessel to relieve himself.

But after handing back the ropes Nisos still stared at the shoulder of the flying horse; for not only was he amazed to see that the outraged wing had grown fresh and strong but there was something else going on that astonished him even more. For while Nausikaa took her place in the centre of that god-like back, and while, behind her, the meticulous Herald discoursed earnestly and authoritatively to Okyrhöe, evidently explaining to her many matters of which she was completely ignorant with regard to the political situation among the Phaiakians to whose land she was now to be transported, to his bewilderment Nisos actually beheld, stretching out of the blankets with which the priest's nakedness was covered, a bare arm with extended fingers clutching a piece of solidified ointment wherewith he was furtively rubbing and moistening the roots of the newly-grown feathers of that resuscitated wing.

"Is this insane fellow," Nisos thought, "actually trying to wither up this new growth of feathers as he destroyed the original ones?"

But when, turning his gaze upon the Flying Horse's god-like head, he caught the creature's calm, alert, self-composed and liquid eye, he recognized the true state of the case; namely that the crazy priest was desperately trying to redeem the harm he had done by doctoring these miraculous feathers so as to make them resemble those of a supernatural albatross.

When once he was satisfied that the Priest was not playing any wicked game with Pegasos, Nisos gave himself up to the pure fascination of just watching the winged horse, as the creature patiently stood on that top deck of the “Teras”. His length was such that four of him would have reached from figure-head to stern and his width was such that four of him would have reached from the starboard rail to the larboard rail. The rippling flow of the muscles under his skin was apparent with every breath he drew; and as Nisos watched him with increasing wonder and told himself that there weren’t many boys in the world or men either who would ever live to see such a sight, the divine creature’s grace became yet more astounding as the animal twisted his neck round to see Zeuks lift, first Eione, whose thighs he clearly enjoyed caressing as he assisted her, and then Pontopereia whom he hoisted up bodily by her waist, and who, taking no more notice of him than if he’d been a Mill-wheel or a Wind-mill, fixed her beautiful and intellectual dark eyes upon Nisos and breathed the words, unmistakably audible, though wafted to him on the prematurely engendered twin-sigh of a final farewell: “You are my boy and I love you!”

Nisos was standing now so close to Odysseus that he could feel the quivering outer edge of the great wave of intense erotic vibration that was passing between the old king of Ithaca and the new Queen of Phaiakia.

That Odysseus’ emotion was unusually strong could be seen by the manner in which he squeezed the head of “Expectation” alias “Dokeesis”. Herakles himself could have hardly clasped his fingers round that wooden skull with a fiercer clutch. The consequence of this natural action while the lithe and limber, the glossy and sinewy, the delicate and perfectly equiposed body of the most athletic creature in the Cosmos rested on the deck of the “Teras”, was to produce such a vertiginous shock in the interior of the Heraklean Club that the Fly was forced like so many other great scientists to forget himself in his profession, and at once began interpreting, to the Moth and to all the world, in his high-pitched adverbial tongue, the information which the familiar voice of the Sixth Pillar in the old Corridor was conveying to the club.

“The son of the Midwife’s sister here, she who formerly served the famous ‘Nymph in Antro’ until she was made big with child by that King of the Latins who is building in Italy a New Troy upon Seven Hills, has been weaned from his mother’s breasts and can now be fed by hand. There have been rumours in the Palace that the marriage of the Maiden Leipephile to Agelaos the son of Krateros Naubolides will shortly take place. It is also reported that the other divine horse, the beautifully-maned one who has so often accompanied Pegasos when not using his wings or crossing the sea, has on several occasions been heard exchanging human speech with the Herdsman Tis. This strange event which seems to be unquestionably true has had the effect of greatly increasing the already high esteem with which Herdsman Tis is regarded, not only by Krateros Naubolides and his son Agelaos, but also by Nosodea the mother of both Leipephile and Spartika the Priestess of Athene’s Temple.”

Here the Fly’s lively rendering of the conversation between the Sixth Pillar and the Club of Herakles was broken up by the Fly himself. As a scientific translator of the measured monotone in which the Sixth Pillar reported to the Heraklean Club the elemental gossip that reached it through earth and air and fire and water the Fly, for all his extravagant “adverbialism”, was intelligible and sensible.

It was, in the manner of most great scientists, only when he enlarged on his purely personal grievances that his emotions tended to erupt in spasms of disconcerting spleen. “The bitch! The bitch! the bitch! the bitch!” he now buzzed in our friend’s ears.

“Excuse me, O thou newly-proclaimed son of abysmally-enduring Odysseus, but I must incontinently go to emphatically warn that adulterously-and-slavishly-behaving whore that I’ve got my eye on her!”

It was indeed clear to Nisos that what the Fly feared was that Pegasos might suddenly spread his tremendous wings and create such a rush of wind that the Moth would be perforce carried off through the air to the land of Phaiakia and that he would never see her again. And as the pair of them, for like other fluttering priest-worshippers the Moth was susceptible to firm handling, returned to the weapon in the old hero’s grasp, it struck the boy’s mind as a topic upon which it was really incumbent upon him to ponder carefully in view of his future as prophet, namely as to what part the material size of a living Being ought to play in diminishing or increasing that Being’s moral responsibility. To put it plainly, should the conscience of an insect be as tender and as quickly touched by remorse as the conscience of a whale?

A rasping stab in the vitals not so much of his conscience as of his intelligence hit him at that moment; and to the end of his days he always associated it with two things whose logical connection was merely that they belonged to the same animal. Something in the mast or the rigging interfered with the fall of the moonlight upon that glossy-dark supernatural form, whose fibres and muscles and tendons and curving sinews seemed to ripple in their relaxed quiescence not unlike the way the surface of the ocean itself was at that moment faintly stirring, but whatever it was that caused it, some kind of phantom-foam-drop appeared on the left front hoof of Pegasos gleaming with a light which seemed, in spite of it having descended from the full moon, to be an inner light, the light of a mind rather than of any external luminary.

And what became for Nisos a life-long memory, what became for him yet another symbol of that spoudazo-terpsis, "my whole will to enjoy what happens", which was now his war-cry, was the strange fact that this inward gleam in the left front hoof of the flying horse corresponded with, and answered to, an inner light in the fathomless depth of the liquid eye which Pegasos turned upon his passengers as he twisted his flexible neck round to see whether everyone was comfortably and securely mounted.

But no metaphysical war-cries and no mystical symbols can keep certain painful and jarring jolts and jerks from destroying our peace; and the splinter that now pierced our young friend's ideal chain of reasoning was a teasing and academic kind of question following closely on the childish one he had just asked himself about the conscience of a fly compared with that of a whale.

And the point was this. How far were the gods, by nature, by tradition, by custom, by international law, and finally by the necessity of the case, exempt from the moral law that all human beings of every tribe in the world feel an instinctive imperative, wherever it comes from, to obey?

When for instance Zeus swallowed the great prophetess Metis for fear of a fatal rival, was he breaking the moral law? The result, our teachers say, was the birth of Athene from his head. But does that redeem his murder of Metis? Athene was not Metis. To be the daughter of a mother born out of the head of the person who swallowed her does not make you your mother. It makes you a woman with every reason to avenge your mother on the person who swallowed her.

Themis the Goddess of Order may have been forced to yield to the embraces of Zeus, but it was she who named her daughter Dike, "Just Retribution” and all his thunderings and lightnings cannot save the All-Father from the penalty of his crimes.

“By Aidoneus, no! When the time comes for me to be a Prophet the great test of my truth and the truth of what I prophesy can be only one thing, whether I do or do not make it clear that not one of the gods — no! not even the Son of Kronos himself — can escape from the Law of Retribution. Shall I really be what I so long to be when I return from this voyage? O Atropos, thou great little goddess of Fate, give me — —” His thoughts, and, we are compelled to add, his prayer to Destiny too, were broken off short by seeing Zeuks rush to the stern of the ship and disappear down the ladder. “He is after Arsinöe! He is after my girl!”

Every muscle in Nisos’ tall slender frame grew stiff and tense. “I forgot her! I forgot her! I forgot her! And he had forgotten her. Hypnotized by the fathomless moon-stone of that unnatural eye in the hoof of the Flying Horse, and quivering with excitement, as indeed was Pegasos himself, in anticipation of the spreading of those tremendous wings and of the immortal creature’s leap upwards into the air, Nisos had not only forgotten his deliberate association of his newly formulated life-logos, spoudazo-terpsis, with Arsinöe rather than with Eione or Pontopereia; but he had completely lost the image — though it now came back with a rush and filled his whole consciousness — of the Trojan maid herself.

“God! What a ‘kakos’, what a cad I am!” But it was no use dancing a remorse dance, or calling upon Dionysos or Eros. What he had to do, if he had anything left in him but downcast aidos or pure “shame”, was to go after this incorrigible Zeuks and snatch Arsinöe away from him. But how could he, though he was the son of Odysseus and not of Krateros Naubolides, contend with the son of an immortal god, and that god none other than Arcadian Pan, whose passion for girls and obsession by girls amounted to an absolute mania?

“But you never know,” he told himself.

“For not only is ‘all fair in love and war’, but in all earthly struggles, whether between races, or persons, or things, it is Chance, sometimes at the beginning, sometimes in the middle, sometimes at the end, who changes the wind, and gathers the rain, and loses or saves the day.

“What a curious nature mine is!” Nisos said to himself, instinctively making use of all the analytical intelligence he had, and he had a good deal more than most young men, to put an end to the smarting sting of self-reproach. “Here I am shivering with intense interest to see Pegasos mount up from the deck of the ‘Teras’ and yet I feel if I am to keep any self-respect at all I ought to invent some excuse, any confounded excuse, such as a desire to use a bucket down below, or to get a weapon from the pile of them in the big cabin, or to ask one of those Libyans to lend me his pocket-knife, and, muttering this same invented excuse, I ought to throw an easy self-contained glance at Odysseus, and slip off past Akron.

“By the Gods, this is what I will do!” For some reason he thought at this moment of his dead pet sea-hawk whom he would never behold again; and he also thought — it must have been the idea of his own death that brought such things into his mind — of the old dead Dryad about whom nobody any more seemed to give the least thought. Then he moved towards Akron. But what in heaven’s name was the man doing?

The captain of the “Teras” was indeed acting in a drastic manner. He was slowly and deliberately divesting himself of his clothes, and with the help of Proros and Pontos he was tying round his waist a long rope. Nisos paused for a moment as the East Wind and the Moonlight isolated their intrepid skipper and held him in their crystal embrace, and then to the young man's spell-bound gaze seemed to plunge with him into the water from a bow-sprit now as bare of ornament as the beard of Odysseus.

On their naked captain now boldly swimming, with the rope behind him passing, as he swam, through the hands of both Proros and Pontos, Nisos saw Odysseus fix a well-pleased and proudly satisfied look, a look that said: "Well done, faithful one!" But the old man was evidently so certain now of the result that he soon turned his gaze back to Pegasos, and to his silent dialogue with Nausikaa, who was now resting as securely on the divine horse's back as she would soon be doing on her expectant throne in the land of her fathers. Nisos however kept his eyes steadily on that moon-lit swimmer, kept them there indeed till the "Teras", quickly enough when the man had once climbed out of the water, was strongly and firmly moored to that human-shaped rock on the island of Wone, about fifteen yards inland, and about the same distance from those primeval Beings, who in their "Arima" of a forgotten Past could remember the days before Zeus and his thunderbolts, or the Titans and their mountains piled on mountains, had begun to disturb the world.

"I think, my Lord the King," Nisos now began, edging himself forward between Pontos and Proros, "that I'll just run down, if I may, and tell Zeuks that our ship is now safely moored."

Odysseus however was too absorbed in his final farewell to Nausikaa to hear his youthful adherent's courteous mutterings; and indeed it was not till Akron was back on the ship and had begun to dress and even to swallow a glass of wine that the casual words: "Just as you like, my son," came from the old man's lips.

As he went off Nisos told himself rather crossly and maliciously that at that moment the man's beard looked as if it were the horn of a sea-unicorn, an appendage which, in the case of this singular marine beast, protrudes not from the creature's forehead but from beneath its jaws. The absent-minded permission to be, as children say, "excused", was however, as can be surmised, enough to send our friend hurrying down two ladders and past four oarsmen. "Suppose," he said to himself, "Zeuks has taken her into Nausikaa's cabin and is even now enjoying her in that sumptuous bed."

Nisos knew so little about the actual details of sex-adjustment between boys and girls that he was apt to wander off into completely fanciful paths when he thought of such a thing as the ravishing of Arsinöe by Zeuks. "I shall simply," he told himself, "hit him with all the strength I have, and if I can't crack his skull I ought to be able to stun him. But perhaps that might excite Arsinöe's sympathy. God! I don't know!"

It happened however, that at the moment when Arsinöe came flying towards him with anything but a desperate cry, with, in fact, a welcoming and laughing salute, he had just bent down to lift up the corner of one of those well-scrubbed planks leading down to the hold; for he had seen a wounded rat with the lower part of its body a mass of crushed flesh and blood feebly moving its front legs down there and making a faint and piteous appeal to an indifferent universe.

"Nisos! My dear, my dear! What is it? O the poor little thing!" And once having embraced the situation she not only allowed Zeuks to overtake her and with some trepidation to salute his rival but she gripped that rival's arm, and, stooping down beside him, snatched up a piece of broken pottery that some sailor had dropped a minute ago, and in a few well-directed strokes sent the soul of the rat to the kingdom of Aidoneus.

Was it the royal blood of the House of Priam in her veins, pulsing through the cells of her brain, that gave Arsinöe on this occasion so much more spontaneous grace of gesture and so much more swiftness of mental apprehension than was possessed by either the Son of Arcadian Pan or the son of Odysseus, or was it a new feeling in her own heart? Anyway, the rat having been disposed of, there passed between Arsinöe and Nisos, almost as if the dead creature's blood had brought it about, a strangely swift understanding. This understanding was so deep and complete that our friend Zeuks, while he grew aware of it, found himself, in a manner which if it had been less complete he could never have attained, able to disregard it.

"Excuse me, you two," he ejaculated casually and carelessly, "if you don't mind, I'll rush up now and see what's been happening. You can follow as leisurely as you like."

The daughter of Hector smiled at the son of Odysseus; for since a couple of Libyan lads had just scrambled hurriedly past them on the way up, and three elderly sailors had shuffled uneasily past them on the way down, it was clear that however strong their instinct might be to snatch a moment of quiescence at this crisis in their lives, this particular cross-road corner, dominated by the mutilated rat and the piece of broken pottery that had ended its misery, was not a good place to stand aside in out of the mid-current of events.

Arsinöe felt a sensitive woman's natural reluctance to confuse the background of one man's love-making with the background of another man's love-making, so she hesitated about letting Nisos lead her back into the cabin of Eione and Pontopereia, while the one where Nausikaa had recently given herself to the old king struck the Trojan imagination of Hector's daughter as already dedicated to the heir of the Latin ruler whose New Troy was even then rising upon its Seven Hills.

Thus it was that driven by her own sensitivity to the particular background of any sexual emotion she automatically steered the ardent Nisos towards the ladder leading up to the seats of the oarsmen; and it was upon the oarsmen's deck, as far as they could withdraw themselves from the great motionless oars of the four rowers, that they threw their arms round each other.

Never in his life had Nisos felt as he did now after they had unclasped their arms and had sunk back against the side of the vessel. He held her by her two hands and with their knees touching he stared at her with vibrant intensity but as if from a tremendous distance. What he was really beginning to approach at that moment was simply and solely the everlasting mystery of the feminine.

And what struck him above everything else in this connection was the fact of the unfathomable and impassable gulf between the whole being of a man and the whole being of a woman. Her bodily life and its particular quality, the physical, chemical, elemental nature of her flesh and blood, was as different from his as was the substance of a fallen star or a meteorite from the stalk of a burdock. “The extraordinary thing about it,” he told himself, “is that this femininity exists in exactly the same things, like hair, and finger-knuckles, and veins, where veins are apparent, and the bones of wrists, and the rounded bones of knee-caps and the curving bones of chin and of jaw, and the more remarkable curves of shoulders, yes! in exactly the same things that in a corresponding manner exist in our male bodies as when I look at Zeuks or Akron or at my own reflection! And yet there is this startling, upsetting, disturbing difference between us!

“And all this is quite apart from the fatal, everlasting, tragic difference in bodily shape, which has to do with a girl’s breasts and hips and all her softer and more undulating curves.” So Nisos thought; and the more he gazed at her in this curious, special way the more did this mystery of her femininity grow upon him and envelope him. “What is it? What is it? What is it?” The spirit within him called aloud. But as he gave himself up to her he ceased to look at her. What he was now looking at were not the round knee-caps against which his own hard bare knees were pressed, but what seemed in that dim light to be a small ivory box or bottle — he couldn't be quite sure which it was, but he leaned to the view that it was an ivory box — out of which Euros kept shaking certain small, pearly shells upon a square wooden tray and examining them with extreme care as they lay side by side, before he gathered them up and shovelled them back into their glittering container.

Arsinöe herself was in the vague, dreamy, passive, resigned mood which had been her only happy mood for many a long year. She hadn't made friends with Zeuks in the way Eione had done with Arcadian Pan. But to be the son of a god is a very different thing from being a god. Besides, the great love-affair of Arsinöe's life had been her devotion to her father Hector, a devotion that couldn't have been tenderer or more ardent if Hector had responded to it but all he did was to take her away from her nameless mother and place her under the care of his wife Andromache.

On this deck of the oarsmen they could only embrace with their eyes a very narrow space of sky; so that neither of them had the least idea whether Pegasos had or had not spread his wings. The Trojan girl had really come to like Nisos quite a good deal and to feel a solid trust in him; but if some woman-friend had asked her point-blank: "What do you feel for this kid?" she would have probably revealed the truth that she felt a strong protective instinct for him and a desire to look after him. She would in all probability have made her woman-friend laugh, if she had not started a regular giggling-fit between them, by confessing that there had been moments of late, since she had known him better, when she had got the same sort of pleasure from his company as she used to get when she played with a special boy-doll of hers she was accustomed to call Ottatos.

Whether characteristic or not of the difference between the sexes in every human tribe beneath the sun, this interlude, or siesta, or metaphysical sticking-place in the dramatic story of the “Teras” or “Ship of Marvels”, was a noteworthy experience for Nisos whatever it may have been for Arsinöe.

It struck him very forcibly that the extraordinary good luck — and he prayed it really was, from whatever far distance flung, the impact of the wisdom of that wisest of all old little maids his ancient patroness “Atropos” that had brought it about — of his having been thrown into contact with this Trojan captive was the greatest event in his whole life.

And it was so because, since his own entire intention was to be a prophet when he became a mature man, the last thing he wanted for his companion through life was an energetic, assiduous, industrious, conscientious, formidable, inexhaustibly active and indefatigably competent. What Nisos wanted or some would prefer to say needed, was someone whose whole nature had the unusual power of being able to devote itself to the one perfectly simple and mysteriously wise act of drifting. Such an one, whether a man or woman, is able to act in a heart-whole and independent way only once in their life; but this act is the infinitely complicated one of stripping themselves stark naked, diving into the deep salt sea and there drifting wherever the tide carries them.

Compared with the people who put purpose after purpose before them and continue struggling energetically until they attain each of these purposes, these once-acting, once-stripping themselves, once-diving into the deep-sea Drifters seem allowed by Atropos the privilege of being porous to more than one universe and being aware of more than one Space and of more than one Time.

Yes! The winds of a million systems of things blow across them and one infinity calls to another infinity through them. And the singular thing is that among male children only those who are lucky enough to be born under the special inspiration of that funny little goddess, the old maid Atropos, whose abysmal intelligence has not been killed either by child-bearing or by playing the bitch, know that for life to be life and for the universe to be the universe it is essential that there shall be two embodiments of womankind. Each of these embodiments must have that everlasting mystery in her skin, in her flesh, in her hair, in her bones, in her milk, in her milt, in her mensuration as well as in her mind. But the one must be actively competent and divinely creative, the other incompetent and divinely passive. Nisos felt no longing for a mate who was protective of offspring and eternally producing offspring and keeping the human race alive upon this earth. It was the second type of female, the type protective of dreams and fancies and wishes and longings and illusions and imaginations, and ideals, and rebellions, and destructions, and insurrections, and redemptions, and recoveries, and re-births, and by means of all these things eternally changing the movements and explorations of the energy of life from one generation to another, towards which he felt drawn.

"What is it," he asked himself, at that crucial moment, "that this Trojan girl has got in her that neither Tis's little sister nor the daughter of Teiresias possess, but which I must have if I'm to be happy in my choice?"

It was at that very pulse-beat of Time that the young man became suddenly aware that Arsinöe was watching him with concentrated attention. Previous to this moment she had preserved the same friendly passivity that had always been her mood with Zeuks and had lasted throughout his recent amorous handling of her. But something, whether a flicker of romantic seriousness passing across the face of Nisos, or some thought or feeling of her own that may very well have reached her from the psychic work-shop of Atropos had suddenly drawn the girl nearer to the young man.

Nor was he oblivious of this change in her. But the curious thing was that while each of her successive moods, favourable to him or unfavourable to him, were of startling and piercing importance to herself while they lasted, to him, as he watched them come and go, they seemed, each of them in its entirety and intensity, so much a part of her that they endeared her to him in absolute remoteness from their tone, whether for him or against him, in relation to himself.

What particularly struck him at that moment was an odd relief that she was neither as pretty as his friend Tis's little sister, Eione, nor as beautiful as Teiresias' daughter, Pontopereia. "Your preciousness to me, my dear," he told her in his heart, "is that you are not particularly graceful like Eione or particularly intellectual like Pontopereia, but just simply a sweet-natured extremely feminine woman whom fate has handed over to me for my very own and who has come to entirely belong to me and to no other man in the whole world. It's because you're completely and entirely mine," so his improper, indecent, and outrageous thoughts ran on, "that you're so entrancingly lovely. What I worship, what I have always worshipped, ever since as a little boy I had a laurel stick called 'Sacred', which, though it hadn't any vital crack dividing its breast and supplying moths and flies and gnats and midges with a refuge from wind and rain, had one end resembling an idol's head and another end resembling a dragon's tail, is some object, possessed of an individuality that separates it from everything else in the world, and yet which is absolutely and entirely my very own, not to be shared in any way at all with anyone else. You are mine, aren't you, you tender, soft, mysterious subtle, enduring, unique creature? Gods in Heaven! if you weren't, I'd be so alone in this mad, aching, bruising, biting, scratching, stinging cosmos that I wouldn't care what happened to me! It's having found you, and having got you as both my idol and as my secret private personal toy that makes you what from now on you'll always — —"

"Come on, you two! Come on, for the sake of your poor old Zeuks, if not at the command of cloud-compelling Zeus! Come on, or Odysseus will be jumping into the sea with nothing but that ridiculous 'prumneesia' on his silly old pate!"

They both leapt to their feet, followed him at a run to the ladder, scrambled up helter-skelter, Arsinöe clinging to Nisos, while Zeuks, his left hand on the small of the man's back and his right on the woman's waist, pushed them violently from the rear.

Yes! Odysseus was standing alone at the base of the figure-head gripping "Expectation", otherwise "Dokeesis", firmly by the middle, and disentangling from the extraordinary object on his head what looked like a couple of dangling, elongated, devil-fish tentacles. Of these tentacles he was earnestly and gravely testing the strength, giving them a series of sharp tugs and using for this purpose both the hand that held the club and the one which was free and unencumbered.

Close to the mast stood Akron, watching over the curved spines and quiveringly extended arms of Pontos and Proros who were holding the swaying and dripping rope by which the "Teras" was moored to the rock that in shape resembled the Titan Atlas, and, as he watched those quivering arms and that massive rope, repeatedly turning his head away from the rock and towards Eumolpos at the helm.

Zeuks led the agitated and excited lovers straight up to Odysseus who swung round at once and regarded them from above his beard with a quiet and approving look, a look that said: "You're doing very well, my children. Go on as you've begun and all will be well."

It was only when Nisos realised the direction in which both the eyes and the pointed beard of the old man were now turned that a cold shudder of terror ran through him amounting to something like sheer panic though it didn't quite reach that point.

Odysseus was calmly regarding the water, his body stone-still, while both from the hand that held the club and from the other hand trailed those two weird streamers. What these streamers really resembled were the long-drawn-out single hairs of a certain prehistoric creature that swam the salt seas aeons of centuries ago and lived by devouring monstrous cuttle-fish which floated in chasms of water that descended to the centre of the earth.

Contemplating the greenish-black depths, into which Odysseus kept dangling these streamers from his fantastic helmet and testing their strength, Nisos began to feel more real nervous dismay than he had ever felt in his life before.

"By Aidoneus if this isn't worse," he said to himself, "than when I was in that prison of Enorches!" And then as he stared at that black-green swirling water, into which some deadly intimation told him Odysseus would soon force him to plunge, it suddenly came to him how the image of that mark on the base of the Sixth Pillar— "the Son of Hephaistos" — had acted like an incantation or a magic spell to free him from that cruel Priest's prison. And wasn't Hephaistos the god of Fire?

Well then, wasn't this mysterious Son of Hephaistos, or rather the Pillar raised up by him, the very saviour dedicated to come to the aid of a person in peril from Water? Thus, just as he had suddenly seen those two Letters on the wall of his prison, so he now saw them in the midst of that swirling green-black water.

And it was at that second that Odysseus swung round and shouted to Akron: "Keep her off the rocks till we come back!" and then in the same tone addressing Zeuks, just as if the daughter of Hector had been, like the “Teras”, another “Prodigy” of a Ship, “Guard my son’s Trojan as carefully as if she were Helen herself till we return!” Then turning his back upon everything but the miles of water that covered Atlantis: “Now you, my son, watch me carefully and do exactly what you see me do.”

Thus speaking the old king disentangled the long single hair, that was his Ariadne’s clue, from his Helmet of Proteus and placed the end of it between his teeth. Nisos, after one last hurried glance round, in which he saw the moonlit tips of Zeuks’ knuckles at Arsinöe’s waist but also noted that the knuckles of both her hands were pressed violently against her closed eyes, thrust the end of his “clue” into his mouth and shut his teeth upon it.

It was at that indrawn beat of the tense heart of their ship “Teras” that Arsinöe snatched her hands from her eyes, fumbled with the clothes of her companion, drew forth Zeuks’ habitual defence, his short double-edged sword-dagger, and thrust it into Nisos’ hand, thus it was not weaponless that our young friend, imitating to a nicety every movement of the old man, followed him over the ship’s side, and plunging feet-first into the water, disappeared from view.

What did not disappear, however, and it can be imagined the queer feeling the sight of these things gave to Arsinöe, were the two elongated single hairs, so vividly suggestive, whether or not such was their real origin, of some aboriginal prehistoric feminine monster, of that grotesque Helmet of Proteus, These objects remained on the surface of the water; and it was the weirdest thing Arsinöe had ever seen in her life to observe these thin streaks of moon-lit silveriness, bobbing up and down and round and round each other, and every now and then shooting off a certain distance from each other, where, although separated, they would recommence their sport of bobbing up and down and round and round, as if the other one were there, when in reality it was completely outside that particular radius of the game.

Zeuks was also watching this ocean dance of a couple of moonlit filaments constituting themselves a curious sort of comic-cosmic choroio; but his attention was so taken up with the delight he got from pressing Arsinöe's body against his own that this dithyrambic crescendo-diminuendo upon the water became merely an outward projection of the deliciousness of the dalliance in which he was indulging.

To Arsinöe on the other hand, though she could no more help staring at it than she could prevent her senses responding to her companion's caresses, it was as if the everlasting elements themselves were mocking her and making sport of her; but when Zeuks' ecstatic embrace subsided and she had once more to deal with the less wrought-up occurrences of the more normal succession of things she forced herself to recall what she had felt when in that "Arima" of Ithaca day after day, with the carving-tool tight between her fingers, she had carved the indomitable features of the defender of Troy out of the heart of an island ash-tree.

While the son of Arcadian Pan and the daughter of Hector of Troy watched the dance of those nameless things that were like the antennae of some primordial insect-monster of the ocean, our friend Nisos found he needed every gasp of breath, every drop of semen, every throb of blood, every microcosm of will, every spurt of energy, every burst of blind desperation he could call up if he were to remain "cheerful", as his island school-teachers had always taught him must be at the root of the philosophy of life of every pious son of an Achaian father, while side by side with Odysseus he sank through the water to the roofs and streets and temples of the capital-city of Atlantis.

They landed on a vast expanse of grey pavement and what was really an enormous space of perfectly smooth and carefully fitted flagstones; and while Odysseus was slowly turning round on his heels and with very little shuffling or stretching or stumbling was making a hurried but obviously a pretty careful survey of the panorama around them, the first thing that came into the head of Nisos to do was to snatch at his own silvery and swaying life-line. When once he had clutched this gleaming object at about five yards distance from the Helmet of Proteus, he glanced quickly at Odysseus for permission, and proceeded to give the glittering thin thing a bold twist round the cavity in the bosom of the Club of Herakles as the weapon reposed horizontally in the hand of Odysseus.

Noting his son’s action and divining that it had something to do with the curious “life-crack” or naturally-engendered slit in the bosom of “Dokeesis” alias “Expectation”, the old hero raised the weapon into a more perpendicular position and gave it the sort of brandishing shake that Herakles himself must have given it before between them they killed the Nemean lion.

Held quietly and firmly now at a slanting angle to the bottom of the ocean, and tangled in a twist of one of the two parallel life-lines that reached from the Helmet of Proteus to the surface of the sea, it was possible for our two world-voyaging insects to appear at the mouth of their unusually-shaped caravan and even plunge into verbal relations with their almost equally bewildered fellow-travellers.

“My friend the Moth keeps imploring me to tell her,” murmured the Fly, “just where in the circumambient trail of our cosmogonic excursion she may know she has arrived. I tell her that this is the only ship upon the sea that fulfils the longing of real adventures all over the world who long to exchange earth for air, air for fire, fire for water, in their natural, heaven-blest longing for new life.

“My friend the moth suffers unfortunately from one of those troublesome manias that so often afflict lovely and sensitive females. She maintains that the Orphic Priest, who confessed just now, when he saw Eurybia and Echidna on the island of Wone, that the gods he really worshipped were not Eros and Dionysos but Death and Nothingness, had been driven mad by the way we all treated him and by the hatred we all felt for him.

“She actually went so far as to say that if she could have spent a whole night when he was asleep caressing with her silky wings the frontal bone of his skull she could have restored him to sanity! I think myself that it is the pressure of all this dreadful volume of water upon a creature as delicate as she is that has disturbed her own brain.”

At this point Odysseus intervened, but quite carelessly and lightly. “If you don’t mind,” he said, “for this confounded weight of waters, in spite of our Helmet, makes me feel a trifle dizzy, I’ll rest here for a moment.” Saying this he seated himself upon a stone bench on a long, low wall; but he continued to keep the club in the same position and took care to hold it so that its “life-crack”, out of which the two insects were peering, might point towards Nisos.

“Please, O please, thou son of Odysseus,” cried the agitated moth, quickly recovering, under the powerful protection of the Helmet of Proteus, the spontaneous passion of her feelings, “don’t let him traduce by his terrible cleverness a person as holy, a person as chaste, a person as devoted, a person as spiritual as this great Priest of Orpheus! Where is he now, I ask you? Carried away by brute force on the back of a titanic animal who hates him even more than any of you do! Is that the way to treat the greatest Priest of the Highest Mysteries that the history of our world has known?

“If he were here now, instead of having to crouch as we are doing on the lowest bench in the lowest bottom of the world, we would be marching proudly across these bridges and in and out of these vast temples and forth and back down these sumptuous terraces and across these colossal squares and up and down these palatial flights of gently curving and softly undulating stairways, or we might even have found a chariot to ride in, for that would be the proper fashion for a man as old and famous as our sovereign the King of Ithaca!

“Please, O please, thou Son of Odysseus, call on your father to use his power to lift us out of this humiliation!”

“Is it not clear,” protested the fly, while the moth at his side quickly recovered her equanimity, “that the poor darling has suffered a serious shock? Think of her assuming that an aged hero who has lived, loved, and fought with the gods and whose capture of Troy, as the Pillar in the Corridor has been telling me, is included in the poetical recitations of all the master-reciters in Hellas, is less poetical when resting by the wayside as an ordinary tired old man, than if under a gorgeous canopy he were riding on the back of an elephant followed by a procession of camels as the emperor of a host of jewelled Barbarians!

“It can only be, as you can see at once, my noble Lord Nisos, that our beautiful friend is suffering from a shock caused by the pressure of this appalling mass of water; and it would be very kind, as well as most appropriate, if, in order to turn her attention to other things, you would tell your King that the Sixth Pillar has just informed me that the fire-breathing Monster, Typhon, half-Dragon and half-Giant, and the arch-enemy of the Olympians, whom Zeus buried under a mountain in Italy, but who had been loose for several months, has now been decoyed by the Being who lives down here, and whose image is the Teras’ figure-head, into serving Him or

Her or It, after the manner in which an obedient Beast serves its master. In fact, O most noble, O most loyal, O most sagacious grandson of Laertes, if you will forgive my turning for a moment from the philosophical aspects of life to those of more immediate concern" — and Nisos noticed that the head of the fly grew suddenly larger and blacker than usual and that both its orbicular eyes were gazing into the distance— "I believe the Monster I have just referred to, not the figure-head Being, if you understand, but the half-ophidian and half-human fire-breather, has smelt human blood down here and is hastening in our direction."

The hand with which Nisos had hurriedly touched his master's elbow, pointed now at a convulsive cloud of smoke and fire that he could see bending its course towards them over a sort of under-water aqueduct, and then, drawing from a slit in his own shirt, in a manner worthy of Zeuks himself, that dagger-sword with two edges that had been pressed into his hand as he went over the side, he gave a little straightening jerk to the club in the old man's hand as if indicating to it that battling with a Monster rather than philosophizing with a Fly must now be the order of the day.

It now became obvious once more to our friend what a perfect fellow-voyager and fellow-adventurer his new father was. Apparently Odysseus had so shrewdly and so quickly taken in the immediate topography of their position and the general nature of this astonishing metropolis of a drowned continent that he had no sooner caught sight of the Fire-breathing Typhon advancing towards them, swaying and heaving and writhing like a serpent with the lower half of its body, but steering itself with human arms and keeping a straight course along a sort of aqueduct, which perhaps still, though it only had the thirst of titans and monsters to quench, carried fresh streams in spite of all this intolerable weight of salt water: then with "Dokeesis" otherwise "Expectation" or the Nemean club in his right hand, and his son’s arm gripped tight above the elbow in his left, he hurried off in a straight line towards the advancing monster but upon such a different level of ground that to reach them Typhon would have had to risk a plunge of about a thousand feet, a leap which for all his dragon scales and serpent tail and the fearful strength of his gigantic arms was evidently beyond his power.

What struck Nisos most about Odysseus as they advanced side by side towards this writhing and twisting cloud of fire and smoke, till it was almost exactly above their heads, was the man’s absolutely amazing gift for adapting himself to a staggering and overwhelming situation with complete calm and balance of mind.

“As for myself,” Nisos thought, “I believe I might just manage to carry things off with a rush and be brave enough to scare my enemy with brandishings of my dagger as I flew at his throat; but what I couldn’t do would be to get rid of my secret dread, my stalking and skulking terror, the horror I’d feel in my jumpy nerves and the heart-beating throbs of my jittering pulses.

“Why, the old man behaves as if this terrifying dead city at the bottom of the sea were the friendly haunts of his family dryad. He seems able to note things and examine things and analyse things with as much calm and as much lively interest as if he were observing the beasts and birds and shrubs and trees and plants and rocks and stones of a new tract of totally unknown country that we had invaded and occupied.”

“I don’t like the idea,” said Odysseus at last, lowering his head after having kept it thrown back and tilted upwards with his bowsprit beard pointing to the world they had left, “of that creature up there dropping his kopros on our heads.”

Nisos in his turn lifted his head; and there did indeed seem to him a very potent probability that from the under-belly of Typhon or, worse still, from beneath his serpentine tail, extremely unpleasant excrement might descend upon them! From that unwieldy body gusts of the foulest-smelling wind, collected for long in those over-replenished bowels, were already beginning to explode in startling and menacing bursts of spluttering thunder; and it certainly wasn't a pleasant prospect to imagine themselves being chased from one end of the ocean to the other by the droppings of this fire-breathing fugitive from the wrath of Zeus.

"I don't know, my son," the old man continued, "whether you can make out the width of that fresh-water aqueduct under his coils as he comes on; but from what I can see of the situation it strikes me that this final rebellious child of our old Earth has got himself on a road that's too narrow for him to turn till he arrives at the end of it. It's too high a jump even for him, and I really believe, now he's once on that aqueduct, that there's nothing he can do but go on to the end of the thing! We shall, no doubt, my dear boy, have many other vexations before we've got to the end of our aqueduct; but I think we're in no immediate danger from that outrageous Man-Dragon up there."

Forward therefore with free steps the father and son moved. They had to walk independently of each other because each held his weapon in his right hand, and when by any chance they moved too close, the hilt of the son's sword-dagger kept grazing the knuckles of the father's left hand.

What Odysseus was thinking as they went forward in this way Nisos would have given a lot to know; but he had by this time discovered that one of the fundamental characteristics of this greatest of all leaders was his power of keeping his wandering and philosophical thoughts wholly and completely distinct from his practical thoughts, that is to say from his tactics, stratagems, decisions, and plannings for future action.

For himself, as father and son advanced in this manner, both cautiously and impulsively, along the bottom of the deepest of earth's seas, Nisos was too absorbed and spell-bound by the external overpoweringness of what he saw to have any spirit left for mental reaction to it save awe and wonder. He decided that it must have been on the ground-floor so to say of the ocean-bed that they had found themselves after their dive.

But what a place it was, far more impressive than any city he had ever seen before, or ever was likely to see! The stones it was built of were all the same colour; but whether this was due to the action of the water or to the particular kind of rock or of marble that the builders had used he wasn't enough of a traveller to know. But all the visible masonry, including the roads and the pavements, was certainly of one and the same tint, and this tint was of a grey shade, but quite unlike any other grey shade he could ever remember having seen.

What struck him most about this whole drowned city as it rose up before him now was, strangely enough, its suitability, its fittingness, its adaptability for being a drowned city. It lent itself to its doom. It was in fact the most perfect realization of a drowned city that could have entered, or the idea of which could have entered, any great poet's imagination.

What especially struck Nisos about it was its unity with itself, the fact, namely, that it rose in so many levels, with its stair-ways and bridges and squares and platforms and tiers and terraces, as if conceived and created to support the pedestals and pillars of the metropolis of the universe with temples and theatres and dance-halls and council-chambers and academies and ecclesias and arenas and hippodromes and senate-halls, towering up, one above another, towards the surface of the water that covered them, making in their colossal entirety one single isolated palace-house, where reigned and ruled in undisturbed supremacy the mysterious Being who had revolted against Heaven, defied the Human Race, and adapted its own unfathomable consciousness to a secret submarine life, with no companion but the Man-Dragon, Typhon.

It was the extraordinary way in which this city beneath the waters satisfied the whole deep-breathing desire in the ultimate chemical elements of existence that they should have nothing within them to the end of their days save what in silence uttereth speech and whose speech is the speech of air, water, fire, and earth, an elemental language which in its essence is the music of enjoyment, that gave the thing its real secret.

It was queer and quaint to notice, as the two of them progressed onwards in what they both divined would probably turn out to be intricate curves returning by degrees to the region of the city from which they had set forth, how the various fish and sea-creatures they were constantly encountering showed not the faintest alarm at their appearance and even came so close that they sometimes brushed against their necks and arms and faces with their fins and tails. One star-fish for instance struck Nisos so violently in the mouth that it made his lip bleed, and it gave him a very queer shock when this sudden taste of blood mixed with salt-water brought back to his memory an occasion when as a child he had picked up a jelly-fish on the sea-coast, and then, falling on his face as he tried to bite it, had bloodied his mouth.

A much more obscure memory may have been released when he saw the extremely elastic and singularly delicate skin of one queer-looking sea-creature, skin that resembled the caul with which new-born babes are sometimes covered, rent and torn by the stab of a small sword-fish. But it was when he noticed one luckless fish whose eye was gone that he suddenly remembered how when he was questioning Eione as to the way the Helmet of Proteus, the thing that at this moment he and his father were using to such good effect, had come into her hands, she told him that Arcadian Pan had stolen it from the great Hunter Orion, whose consequent lack of it had resulted in his being blinded.

"The blinding of Orion! How very odd that I should never have given that piece of news a second thought!"

By one of those queer coincidences that it is always almost impossible to regard as just coincidences he had no sooner thought of the injury that Tis's little sister had unwittingly done to the great Hunter Orion than his father suddenly turned to him and said with a smile: "I was just wondering why it is, my son, that only once in my life I've composed a line of poetry, while from my memory I can repeat so many lines."

"What was the line you once composed?" enquired Nisos. "It would interest me so much if you'd repeat it to me now! Do, please, please, my father, let me hear that line of poetry you composed. Had it to do with what at that moment came into my head? I mean the blinding of Orion?"

Odysseus swung slowly round. "It's curious," he said, "that you should have spoken of Orion; for the line I composed, and I really do consider it a proper, authentic, natural line, though the only poetic part of it is the fact that it is rhythmical and runs smoothly, is about Orion. Well, I can't really say it's about him. But at any rate it refers to him, and the syllables of the line run musically together! In fact it's because they run so musically that I can repeat the line now. It's the simple sound of it that works the trick. In fact it's the sort of thing a child could invent without having to give it any particular significance.

"Yes, a child, if it tried to make up a story in poetry would be delighted if a line like this suddenly came into its head. It would probably even try to compose a second line, such as in its rhythm and smooth flow could follow the first.

"It was when I was in the Garden of Alkinöos to which Nausikaa guided me and when I was telling her father and mother, indeed when I was telling them all, about the ghosts of the Heroes I saw in Erebos, that this line suddenly came into my head.

"I had been explaining to them how I beheld the holy and upright Minos, that great son of Zeus, acting as Judge among the Ghosts in Hades when suddenly I thought: 'I must tell them how I saw the great Orion'; and it was only then, when, without premeditation, I uttered the words 'Ton de met Orionay pelorion eisenoeesa', that I realised I had uttered a line of real poetry. And yet all I'd said was just quite simply that 'after him' — by which I meant of course after Minos— 'I beheld the gigantic Orion'. But I must have instinctively realized that the words I was using had suddenly, like a boat from a muddy ditch into a flowing stream, emerged out of prose and into poetry; for I knew the poetic rhythm in what I added to this, namely:

'Chersin echone ropalon panchalkion aien aages.'

'In his hands holding his club, all-bronzed and ever unbroken.'"

Nisos spontaneously brandished his double-edged dagger as Odysseus, moving on with a firmer stride, mounted a short flight of broad stone steps and began to cross a marble square of immense size in the middle of which must have been a grove of enormous trees. It was painful to observe the lost and condemned trunks of this grove, not merely blackened by the salt water but curst with a peculiar shade of blackness to which an exquisitely faint blue tinge had been in some way added.

As they followed the marble roadway between these weird tree-trunks that were like ghosts gathered in a desolate flock by some invisible enchanter, Odysseus turned to his son. “I can’t tell how it is, my boy, but I have an instinct that it’s not for nothing that you and I were brought at the same moment into contact with the name ‘Orion’.”

Nisos stood so still that he might himself have been one of those ghastly tree-trunks with their weird metallic glitter in that pale light.

“Do you mean, my father — —” began the young man. But his words, whatever they were going to be, dissolved in that circumambient greyness; for as he met his father’s glance he knew without any exchange of words what the older man was thinking. In fact their separate thought-streams at that critical moment in their lives whirled together in a silent circular eddy. “You think, my Lord,” the younger man whispered, “that we’re in the line of the great Hunter’s arrows where we now stand; and that we might be hit and turned into ghosts ourselves at any second?”

Odysseus lowered his club till it rested on the pavement of the road they were following and they both gazed with instinctive apprehension at a group of colossal Sea-Weeds that rose, tough, wiry, weltering, succulent and elastic into the water, and seemed to be treating the water itself as if it were a thick undulating mass of weirdly smelling rubber that bent into curves and grooves and hollows as they pressed against it, and into it too, as you might say, without causing it to split or crack or bleed or sweat or melt; causing it to yield where it was pressed against, but always finding it impossible to prevent it returning, like a squeezed bubble, or like a vast impressionable bladder, the moment the pressure was relaxed.

“Have you realized, my Lord,” whispered Nisos; and it showed the nature of the intimate crisis that was intensifying itself about them, like an elemental process, parallel to, but not the same as, the process of freezing, that the young man without consciousness of what he did reverted to his mood of utterance before he knew his parentage, "have you realized that we're on the edge of — —"

His voice died away as he looked down; and there came no responding reply from the old man, as he too looked down. And well might the two of them — mere mental human animals of fibres and nerves as they were! — look down and look long, at what lay before them. They were indeed confronted by what might have struck them as a vast reserve of creation-material out of which all the multitudinous formations of earth-life could be replenished, reproduced, refilled with pith and sap and blood-juice.

They were indeed standing on the brink of a vast precipitous chasm that apparently descended to the centre of the earth but which the water of the ocean had now wholly filled. Huge rubber-like sea-growths protruded so thickly out of this indescribable gulf that it was clearly a horrible possibility that impulsive wayfarers might mistake the tops of these elastic weeds of the great salt deep for just a rougher portion of the paving-ground of the road they were following; but the idea that at any moment they might catch, carried to them by this weird element that could scarcely be called water, the twang of an arrow's flight from the bow of the great Hunter Orion, subdued to a minor degree of tension their reaction to this precipice beneath their feet.

Once more Nisos was, as they used to say in his island-school, bowled over by his new parent's calm. For the old man turned his back upon this cosmic chasm in the floor of the world just as he might have done if it had only been a muddy ditch near their old Dryad's decayed oak-tree.

"Well, sonny," he said, "we must go back a little way, but it won't have to be far. We'll find a way of getting our direction again if I'm not mistaken when we're at that arch." He was not mistaken. They soon found, exactly at the point he'd mentioned, sweeping upwards from that same arch, a tremendous flight of steps, a staircase, in fact, that soared up and up and up with such a stupendous urge that, in the process of their mounting it and ascending its grandly sweeping curves, neither of them, neither father nor son, could help feeling a curious exultant pride in belonging to the same type, if not to the same race, of human animals, who were responsible — quite apart from the Being who had tyrannized over them — for the building of this amazing city.

They had only to pause for a moment with their elbows on an ebony balustrade to realize what a sublime achievement this Metropolis of Atlantis was. The wonder was not only in the fact that its stairways and bridges and great squares and vast marketplaces were supported by the same colossal pillars, as the towering temples, which themselves, in their turn, were overtopped by yet more bridges, bridges above which still mightier and higher platforms had been erected, platforms which had been made the floors for still loftier towers. It was also in the fact that the whole mass of them, yes! the whole volume and weight of all these amazing constructions, were connected with one another, forming, so to speak, one vast musical composition in marble and stone. And if this drowned super-city was indeed by far the most remarkable creation that the world contained, how was it that the human race could calmly look on while some Titan built and some Olympian drowned its sublime structure? How was it that no desperate prayers to Atropos, who was the oldest and wisest even if she was the smallest and the most easily exhausted of the three Fates who govern the affairs of men and of nations, were not uplifted by the prophets of the people? But it now seemed to both the father and the son as they contemplated this spectacle, leaning upon that ebony balustrade with its summit disappearing in the salt water above them and the foundation disappearing in the salt water beneath them, that they really could hear the terrifying twang of the bow-string of Orion.

But Odysseus wasn't one to remain paralysed and confounded even though in the presence of a menace from Orion on one side and from Typhon on the other. "If that's the Hunter," he remarked quietly, "that is, without question," and he jerked his beard in the opposite direction, "the breathing of the Monster. So I suppose we'd better leave this point of vantage and swing round again, whether eastward or westward, or northward or southward; for I have now absolutely lost all sense of direction, and I expect you have too, my son! But I know we were just now following that damned Dragon, so, if I'm right to assume from the noise I can hear that the brute's coming back this way we've got to return to our first direction, sonny, which was certainly directly opposite our present one."

They turned their backs therefore to the still faint but extremely unpleasant sounds of which they both were now fully aware, and made their way, the father with Herakles' club and the son with Zeuks' double-edged dagger, back once more in the direction from which they had just been hastening.

"Was it an omen, my father, both of us thinking of Orion at the same time?" enquired Nisos rather timidly, for he was not sure, as nobody who knew Odysseus ever could be really sure, what his precise reaction would be to any question that had a mystical or religious over-tone.

In one sense this famous hero's character was abnormally simple, as simple, you might almost say, as that of an animal, in another sense it was unpredictable, yes! not so much complicated, or subtle, as wholly unpredictable. Even here it might have been argued that there was something animal-like, although to anyone who has a long experience of any particular species of animal the absolutely incalculable never occurs.

But it was precisely this, the absolute incalculable, that did occur with Odysseus; and it was upon this peculiarity that the popular idea of his wiliness and cunning rested. Human cunning, like human honesty, is one of the hardest of all qualities to catch, isolate, hold, and clearly define, especially so when we agitate our measuring scales by the introduction of our moral emotions. Odysseus' unpredictableness resembled in fact both the unpredictableness of the sort of super-animal we call "good", like Pegasos, and the unpredictableness of the sort of super-animal we call "bad", like Typhon.

But now to his son's question about Orion the old man's reply was both very gentle and very definite. "I have noticed," he said, "that the intimation of a great friend's approach or of a great enemy's approach reaches us through the intervening space much more quickly and much more unmistakably when the personage arriving finds us entirely alone and with nothing around us and about us except the elemental, the mineral, the vegetable forms of existence. Get away, you little idiots!" and he brushed aside with his left hand a shoal of tiny fish who had evidently mistaken his projecting beard for a growth of the sort of seaweed that might be expected to harbour the particular kind of small creatures that were to these scaly little mouths and distended gills a veritable heaven of feasting. "Of course in this case, my dear child," Odysseus went on, "you and I, since we have the same friends and enemies, can well, for the argument's sake, count as one person. To both of us, therefore, the presence of Orion down here at the bottom of the sea, exploring the metropolis of Atlantis, just as we are doing ourselves, is without question a menace to you and me. That he is, no doubt, much more of a menace to our enemy Typhon makes no difference to us. It is known that Orion was blinded for ravishing his mother and only restored to sight by the power of the Dawn. It is known that he has an insane passion for killing anything and everything with bow and arrow and that on one occasion he set out to destroy in this manner the whole human race. Whether he is here as a friend or as an enemy of the Being who rules this place and whose mysterious countenance our ship carries as her figure-head is completely unknown to us.

"Whether this mysterious Being to whose machinations, directed against the Son of Kronos, Atlantis owes her drowning, has the power to dominate Orion I have not the remotest idea. I can only assure you that when I saw Orion in Hades after my vision of Minos judging the Dead I felt very hostile to him. Ghost himself, he was killing for the second time, and for an everlasting Second Death, every creature he could discover, in a blind ecstasy of universal murder.

"Thus, my dear boy, when I hear you ask me whether the fact that the image or the eidolon or the actual living form of Orion coming into our two minds at the same moment when he is stalking through these deserted buildings in one of his insane murdering fits, is an omen, I can only answer, emphatically and definitely, no!

"No! It is no more an omen than when Polyphemos killed my companions and tried to kill me. It is a struggle, a battle, a contest, my little son. It is a fight! And everything in life is a fight, Nisos my friend, everything! That the idea of this savage Hunter, this madman, who some say raped his own mother, and whose very name means 'to pour out semen', and who others say had neither father nor mother, but was born of the semen of Zeus and Poseidon deliberately thrust into the hide of some slaughtered beast, and left to ferment there for the necessary nine or ten months, came into our minds at the same moment only shows how the eidola of dangerous men, who are threatening us, can pass through air and water and earth and fire till they fling themselves upon us like horrible projected shadows, warning us that very shortly the men themselves in their own flesh and blood will be upon us!

"Omens? It is the fight for life, the fight in life, the fight of life, and, by all the gods! the fight with life! But what we must set ourselves to do now is to discover the palace, the dwelling, the temple, the throne, the hiding-place of the Being who rules this place."

He gathered up his own trailing cord of the Helmet of Proteus more effectively round his head and watched his son do the same for himself and also for the club of Herakles; and once more they went on with their exploratory journey. But their quest was soon at its end. Without warning, without the faintest hint of premonition, they were suddenly standing on a platform of green marble, marble that through all this water had itself the look of water and of water in motion too; while in front of them, but to their surprise not on the tremendous and awe-inspiring throne they were expecting and looking for, but on a heap of long-dead, long-decayed, long-rotted, long-dissolved, long-degenerated, filthily-stinking, foully-crumbling, horribly-putrifying mass of sea-weeds in accumulated decomposition, reclined, or rather sprawled, the god-titan, or goddess-titan, for this horrific and terrifying rebel against all Deities was completely bi-sexual and androgynous, who was by reason of his, or of her, or of its defiance of Zeus and of Poseidon and of Aidoneus, those three Olympian Rulers of Sky and Sea and Hades, responsible for the drowning of Atlantis.

This mysterious Being, whose physical appearance struck Nisos as more shocking and also more feminine than human words could convey, fixed her eyes upon the young man as he stared in stupefied horror and made with outstretched and inwardly curved fingers a series of gestures, of a dangerously magnetic nature, compelling him to approach her. This summoning gesture he felt unable to resist, and first with one of his feet and then with the other — and as each foot advanced he felt himself forced to move his arms, in a fumbling and groping manner, mechanically forward — he slowly and steadily, while he trembled from head to foot at what he was doing, advanced towards this indescribable creature’s embrace.

And then, evidently as much to the surprise of this terrifying Being as to that of its intended victim, Odysseus calmly stepped forward and stood between them with his broad back towards his son and his face towards the Being crouching on that pile of rotting seaweed.

Nisos experienced an extremely odd sensation as he allowed his right hand grasping his two-edged weapon to sink down by his side and contemplated the broad back in front of him. It was to him a completely new sensation and one which made him feel a little foolish. He liked to be the active one, the most active one, in any group or in any company. He had been brought up to feel it his duty to serve, guard, protect, and defend his parents; and also to serve, guard, protect, and defend his King; and furthermore to help, aid, sustain and champion the very old.

And here he was standing weakly, feebly, passively, stupidly, behind the back of a person who was both his Father and his King and at the same was a very old man. Used to analysing his feelings he found it more than a little difficult to decide whether it was better to submit and obey on this occasion, when so old a man who was both his father and his king placed himself between him and the present danger and did so too without uttering a single word, did so in fact purely by the silent and practical and significant action of facing this appalling Being himself and turning his back upon the child of his loins, or whether he ought, with one desperate leap and a wild rush, to fling the old man aside, raise high his own arm, and plunge Zeuks’ deadly double-edged dagger again and again into what he could only pray would prove to be the heart of this living Mystery of Horror.

Why he thought of her, what put her into his head, what power concealed in the depths of his own nature called upon her for help, Nisos could no more tell than he could tell whether she would have been, in any case and entirely independent of both Odysseus and himself, exploring, as many another powerful Deity might well want to do, the deserted Metropolis of a drowned world, but she who now came suddenly into our friend's head was none other than Atropos herself, the oldest and the smallest, but far the most powerful, of the three Goddesses of Fate.

"O Atropos, O Atropos!" Nisos prayed in his heart. "Great Goddess of Fate! Thou who once didst let me struggle with Gorgons and Furies on thy behalf, help Odysseus and help me against this Horror!"

He had no sooner uttered this prayer than he was aware of a curious hush in the humming and murmuring waters around them. He shuffled sideways just a little; in fact just enough to be able to choose to see or to choose not to see, according to his wish, the magnetic eyes of the Being reclining on that foul heap of stinking seaweed. From this position he could see that the Being in front of him had got its eyes fixed steadily upon the face of Odysseus and was still making with its semi-human, semi-vulture-like finger-claws a monotonous, repetitive, ritualistic pantomime of silent motions, which clearly gesticulated what in words would have been: "Come to me! Come to me! Come to me! You and I, when once we are one, will conquer the universe!"

The Creature's "Come to me!" was repeated over and over and while this appalling sorcery of repetition went on Nisos' glance wandered to a half-revealed object that lay amid that rotting dark-brown seaweed. What it was, when once he caught sight of it, was evident enough, though the seaweed in which it was entangled covered many portions of it. It was the skeleton of a man or woman. Nisos didn't know enough about anatomy to know to which of the sexes it had belonged, and the light that shone from the couple of swaying cords that emanated from the Helmet of Proteus was not strong enough to reveal with certainty whether the owner of the flesh that had once covered that skeleton was a tall or a short person; but those white bones entwined with dusky seaweed made him, as the Helmet's flickering light fell upon them, wonder why he had never asked the all-knowing old hero how it was that considering the thousands of people who must have been drowned in that sunken city he hadn't seen until this moment a single dead man or woman. Anyone would certainly have supposed that if the thunder-loving Son of Kronos had caused the sinking of a crowded city like this as a punishment for impiety the whole place would be full of dead people caught and drowned without warning in the midst of their daily business and profane pleasures.

If only he had the power of reading the thoughts that were passing to and fro within the living skull of Odysseus under that fantastic Helmet! What could the old hero be doing with his mind and his will to counter this gesticulated spell by which the Ruler of Atlantis was seeking to enthral him?

It was hard enough for Nisos to take his eyes away from those twining and twisting fingers, but he was too scared as well as too prudent to risk more than a series of snatching, switching, twitching glances at the appalling beauty and over-mastering power of the face above those flickering hands and that androgynous breast.

What on earth would the old hero decide to do? It was certainly a weird state of things for a person as inexperienced as he himself was to have to face. But here was his father facing it in deadly silence; and he told himself that if he intended to be a prophet when he grew older he must force himself to face what was happening now. He must in fact force himself to see himself cowering behind his father who held the Heraklean Club but who could do nothing in the presence of this Being but simply stand his ground, while round about them both, wandering up and down these towering bridges and triumphant bastions and tessellated battlements roamed the titanic Dragon-Monster Typhon who had shaken a whole Sicilian mountain from off his shoulders and who breathed such fire from his belly that no mortal man could face him, and yet, huger than he, and armed with a club not of wood, but of bronze, here also was the greatest of all the Hunters of the world, enormous Orion, threatening not only Typhon but all that lived and moved upon the earth and all that lived and moved beneath the waters! And here was he, Nisos, cowering behind the back of his father. But he must, he must without shirking his own shame, force himself to visualize this living group of heterogeneous Beings, human and divine and demonic and bestial, isolated there in drowned Atlantis, but as compared with the infinite extension of the sky, and the infinite extension of time, of no more importance or significance than if it had been a group of toads and tadpoles and newts and stickle-backs and dragonfly-grubs in the minute estuary of a small pond.

His half-conscious pride in being clever enough to think thus of himself and of the rest of them lifted his spirits considerably and once again, and this time with more faith and hope than before, he prayed to Atropos, the oldest and smallest, but by far the most powerful, of the Three Fates.

And lo! such was the regard which this aged directress of mortal lives had for our young friend, and whether he knew it or not this personal link with the old lady was the best omen and the deepest intimation that could possibly have reached him that one day he really might prove to be a prophet to the people of Hellas, — lo! there suddenly swam past them, following a straight line between Odysseus and the god-demon of the drowned City, a large and peculiarly handsome Dolphin, upon whose back, and clinging to him with a certain nervous intensity, was Atropos herself!

She gave our friend as she passed, and she looked at nobody else and took no notice of anybody else, a look he would live to remember all his days, and probably would recall on the day of his death. It was then that Odysseus swung round at last, turning his back upon the god-demon, as if the ripples made by the passing of that Dolphin had broken, independently of any effort he had to make for himself, the whole of the spell which was now in the process of being thrown over him by the twining and twisting of those appalling fingers.

But when, in the radiation of each of the Helmet's hollow cords that gave to the calm old hero and his agitated son all their light and all their air, Nisos looked at his father's face he was surprised to see upon it an expression quite different from the expression he expected; for what he saw was not satisfaction over something that had just happened but expectation of something that was just going to happen.

And this became yet more evident when the old man held up before his son, in the full light and air of both those hollow cords that sprang from the crazy-looking object upon his head and went wavering upwards till they reached ocean's surface, his wooden Heraklean club.

"Expectation's acting true to his name, eh, sonny?" murmured the old man, speaking as quietly as if in place of a glowering horror there was nobody present but Tis and his faithful cow.

Nisos looked at the life-crack in the great weapon's bosom. Yes! There, as of old, was the big head and staring black eyes of the scientific fly; and there were the wavering antennae of the mystical moth!

To the son's astonishment the old hero begged him to enquire from the fly if the Sixth Pillar at home could still hold converse with "Expectation", and, in case it could, had it any news for them at the bottom of the deep sea? Nisos, though in his nervousness he felt as if the weaving fingers and the appallingly dominant eyes of the Being behind his father were keeping up a threat that nothing could dispel, gathered about him, as if it were the aegis of Athene herself, that look of Atropos and implored the fly to tell him the news.

Drawn back in a second were the quivering antennae of the moth, evidently under her friend's pressure, while with all his usual adverbial emphasis, the fly announced that the essential drift of the Sixth Pillar's news was that all the dimensions and all the elements of nature were at that moment waiting in an hushed and awestruck suspense the result of an ocean-deep contest between the immortal hunter Orion and the creator and survivor of Atlantis.

"The fly," Nisos continued, translating the insect language as carefully as he could, for like all very ancient classic tongues this insect one, which was far older than any of those used either among the defenders or the destroyers of Ilium, was full of subtle shades of meaning, "the fly tells me that the Pillar is at this moment warning its friend the wooden club that the club carried by Orion is made of something heavier than wood. It is in fact made of bronze. And the fly is now telling me all that the Pillar says about it to the club. I beg you, my father, to listen for a second to the voice of the fly, so that you can see, but if anybody in the world knows that already, it's you, what a grand teacher our goddess was when she put into my head, on the day the the Harpies attacked that stone with their nails, the trick of understanding this insect-tongue.

“Anyway, from what the fly says I gather that the Pillar has been assuring the Club that in the hands of wisdom wood can beat bronze, and that — —”

But Odysseus interrupted him at this point with a violent movement, a movement that flung them both down upon the ground. Then in a hoarse whisper the old hero bade Nisos help him, covering both of them with as much seaweed as they could gather up and strew over themselves, as they lay where they were with the club between them.

“Is it Typhon or Orion?” whispered the son. “Both of them!” groaned the father. And then with a sound that was half a curse and half a chuckle: “But its worse for this Atlantis-Bitch than for us!”

Vain and useless as he well knew such trifling things as double-edged daggers were in the presence of such Beings as he now peered at from under his heap of seaweed and across the heap that hid his begetter, Nisos couldn’t help clutching his only weapon, such as it was, and he couldn’t help feeling relieved when he saw by the light from the two Protean cords that swayed above their heaps of seaweed that his father had a tight grip upon their only real weapon, the club that in its day had drunk of the blood of the Nemean Lion, the club that sometimes bore the name of “Dokeesis”, “Seeming”, and sometimes the still simpler name of “Expectation”.

“Both of them!” Odysseus had gasped, with that queer sound that might have been a groan and might have been a chuckle; and as Nisos, feeling a human superiority to the fly, as the fly in his turn had felt a metaphysical superiority to the moth, peered out from under one heap of seaweed and across another, he did indeed behold “both of them”. And they were a really overwhelming sight. Typhon, the largest living creature ever born on land or in sea or air or fire, Typhon of whom even his mother the Earth was afraid, Typhon who had come so near to defeating Zeus that Zeus was only saved by a trick that was not a trick of his own, now approached from the South, breathing fire upon the spot where the Creator of Atlantis sprawled on her seaweed throne and where the son as well as the grandson of Laertes crouched at her feet as if within two seaweed graves.

The fortunate thing for our seaweed-hidden humanity just then was the fact that this colossal Monster with the arms, head, breast, hips and belly of a man, had, in place of the legs of man or beast, the terrific, curving, twisting, writhing, scale-covered tail of a dragon. Typhon’s hands were garnished with the most vulpine and vulturine claws that were ever seen before, or during, or after the Great Flood that drowned Atlantis; while the gleam of the flame and the reek of the smoke that poured at all times from his throat in place of air kept making this ocean-deep water, through which he was now moving, steam and bubble round his too-human mouth, in a fashion that was as fascinatingly weird as it was, in some other queer way, disturbingly shocking.

But if the physical appearance of Typhon not only terrified but attracted Nisos after some mad and inexplicable fashion, the appearance of Orion, the greatest Hunter there has ever been, or ever will be, caused him to shiver under his rank-stinking shroud of slippery-slimy sea-refuse with a much more definite tug-of-war sensation between two conflicting emotions than he felt about the fugitive from beneath Etna.

It was indeed a certain concentrated, absolutely absorbed, gravely exultant enjoyment, held back as if by a leash just this side of ecstasy, which he read in the almost touchingly boyish features of the great Hunter that tore his sympathy into two halves of almost equally intense repercussion. O how he wanted to see that vast bow the Giant carried in his left hand bent for a shot and strung with one of those deadly arrows he wore in his belt! O how he longed to see that huge bronze club he swung in his right hand brought crashing down on the fire-breathing, water-bubbling visage of this Monster, who awaited his approach without a trace of perturbation!

So completely capable did Typhon evidently feel himself to be of clawing to death, or crushing to death, or squeezing to death, or burning to death with his fiery breath, or biting the head off any pursuer who dared approach him that Nisos was scarcely surprised to see him presently curl his gigantic tail in a vast circle round his ophidian loins and, deliberately clutching with outstretched human fingers handfuls of shells and pebbles and seaweed and sand, squat down in relaxed ease with his back against one of the colossal ammonites of which there are many in that deep bosom of the ocean.

What struck our young watcher, in spite of his boyish sympathy with every variety of hunter, as a really sublime spectacle of indifference in the hunted as to the final issue of the hunt, was the placid position in which the fire-breathing refugee from his living grave beneath Etna awaited the terrific Orion.

And like a mountain of submarine marble that has been washed smooth by the waves till it resembles a block of rainbow-gleaming ice, the great Hunter was now exposed to the petrified stare of our young friend under his counterpane of striking sea-weed. The tremendous figure in the foreground was engaged, it was plain to see, in adjusting an arrow to the string.

Through the wavering atmospheric lustre that emanated from the fantastic object on his father’s head the whole spectacle struck the prostrate lad with a strange sense of some vast world-history reaching some long-prognosticated moment, where life in its mysterious essence, human, sub-human, super-human, cosmic, and astronomic, had arrived at some pivotal point where the whole business, inscrutable, unspeakable, absolutely real, but beyond both mind and matter, gathers itself together to become something for which naturally enough there is as yet no name.

Then he saw Orion draw the arrow back on its quivering bow-string against his naked breast and let it fly. It flew with a reverberating directness straight towards the reclining Typhon and past the very feet of the recumbent Creator of Atlantis. It passed clean through one of the outstretched hands of the Man-Dragon, nailing it to the ground; and Orion perceiving this and glorying in it had the same look upon his face as when with his arrows he drove the Pleiades into the sky, and again when he came at last upon the sun-god Helios newly-risen over the edge of the world and was cured of his blindness.

But the latest and greatest of the primeval children of our Mother the Earth was not overcome by this shock. He didn't roar, nor did he howl; he didn't shriek, nor did he bellow: he didn't curse nor wail, nor yell, nor rumble, nor weep, nor moan. He only lifted as high as he could his right shoulder, for it was his left hand that had been hit, swung his right arm downward across his bent torso, seized the arrow and struggled to pull it out. The arrow, however, after piercing his hand, had gone deep into a very obstinate piece of rock, and pull as he might with that powerful arm and that powerful shoulder he couldn't pull it out.

While he struggled with it Nisos could see the vast figure of Orion approaching with long strides and brandishing his bronze club. At that particular sight the young man's mind moved very fast. He recalled what his father, lying now by his side, had told him, and how the words he used had of their own accord, so he declared, taken upon them the rhythm of poetry. In fact simultaneously with the approach of that tall terrifying figure, Nisos seemed to catch again the very syllables of what the old warrior had muttered at that moment.

What astonished the young man most in himself at that crucial second was that in spite of all tradition, convention, propriety, decency, law, order, education, custom, and harmonious necessity, he found that his sympathy was with the hunted and not the hunter, with the ugly and not the beautiful, with the Monster, and not the destroyer of Monsters, and he suddenly felt in himself a mad, wicked, rebellious, reckless impulse to jump up from the side of Odysseus, clutch the double-edged dagger that had belonged to the son of Arcadian Pan, leap on the shoulder of this god-defying Man-Dragon, and spur him on with a mocking and resounding challenge to withstand Orion to the death!

Odysseus must have become aware, by some psychic vibration passing from one light-giving Proteus-cord to the other, of this rebellious impulse in the life-blood of the child of his loins, for he suddenly handed to him his club, leapt to his feet with astonishing agility, crossed the few yards between them and Typhon in a couple of strides, and kneeling on one knee, and using both hands, pulled out the arrow! Nisos who was instantly at his side gave him back the club and helped him to his feet. But they now found themselves, while they watched Orion’s steady approach, standing so close to the Creator of Atlantis that this incalculable Entity was able to try its dangerous magic upon them both just as it pleased; one deadly-white phosphorescent tentacle of a finger being laid on the shoulder of Odysseus and the other on the shoulder of Nisos.

All three of them for a brief space, while every pulse-beat of time brought Orion nearer, were in any case reduced to helpless inactivity by the choking cloud of fire and smoke with which Typhon covered his retreat. But a retreat, and a very shrewd and very rapid retreat this enemy of Zeus was able to make under cover of his own fiery breath, so that when Orion, brandishing his club of bronze, arrived on the scene he had not the remotest idea whether his fugitive had fled east or west or north or south.

Nor did it appear to him that either of the two men he found awaiting him were in a condition capable of replying intelligently to any question he might ask as to the direction of the flight of the Enemy of Heaven. They were both, at least so it seemed to the simple mind of the great Hunter, so confused, so dazed, so numbed, so completely metagrabolized by the leprous white, death-worm-white, sarcophagus-toad-white dead-sea-eel-white fingers that rested upon them that he might equally well make enquiries of a heap of ordure dropped by the fugitive.

So he addressed himself to the Being who had reduced them to this condition.

“Tell me, you creator of drowned cities, you hypnotizer of men, whither has that monster whose belly-flame no water can quench and whose bladder-smoke no ocean can quell, shogged off on his wriggling tail?”

Neither the father with his unbelievable past nor the son with his doubtful future appeared able to utter a word. But the mental vibration between them was so aided by the cords of the Protean Helmet that Odysseus indicated to Nisos in a whisper below a whisper that the club of Herakles had begun to make curious little jerks, abrupt stirrings, and quiverings quite independent of the hand that held it. “Feel him, will you, son?” whispered the old hero, “and tell me what you think!”

Nisos laid his left hand on the club’s head, just above its life-crack where the hollow cord, clinging closely to it, still protected the sheltering insects from the pressure of the water. “If it wants to act on its own, my king and my father,” the young man whispered, “I would risk it and let it do so!”

And the club, whom some called “Expectation”, and others called “Dokeesis”, said to itself: “That bronze affair which Orion is whirling about over our heads may be all right for breaking stones. It is far too unwieldy, mechanical, automatic, and impervious to all suggestion, to crack the skull of a dangerous magician. If I can only make Odysseus give me my complete freedom I’ll show him and this lad too how to deal with wicked and horrible Beings! I came near it at the cave of the Naiads; but this Living Horror lying on that dead seaweed is worse than the oldest natural-born monster. But I, Dokeesis, can deal with it! Only let me go, and you shall see!”

And then, as his own hand on the club’s head and his father’s hand round the club’s waist relaxed a little, Nisos heard the fly say to the moth: “It’s hard for a thinking person like myself to go on studying life while these gods and men and monsters make such a stir; but I’m at least lucky to have someone like you, not quite indifferent to philosophic conclusions. Before the Pillar stopped talking to the club just now, it revealed the real cause of all this hullabaloo. It said it had learnt from earth and water and air and fire that the death of every deity in the world was at hand. It said that the world, what it always calls ‘the Pillared Firmament’, would outlast every creator that was supposed to have made it. This boy Nisos thinks that our ancient classical language is too adverbial. Adverbial! How else, I should like to know, could any language express how perfectly, beautifully, intelligently, clearly, and completely the club, in whose bosom you and I are at peace, understands our old and subtle tongue? Anyway the Pillar has now revealed that as a result of a spontaneous and natural revolt all over the world against god-worship, all the gods that exist, from Zeus downwards, and all the goddesses that exist from Hera downwards, including Athene herself and Eros and Dionysos and of course including Aidoneus the god of the dead, and Poseidon the god of the sea, are fated to perish. They are not fated to perish rapidly. Some indeed, Athene and Hermes for example, will perish slowly.

"But perish they all will. And the fatal sickness that must ere long bring them to their end is caused by this growing refusal to worship them. If mortal beings depend on the sun and the rain, immortal beings depend on our worship of them. If we stop worshipping them, the juice, the sap, the pith, the oil, the ichor, the very blood of their life vanishes; and like plants without sun and air, and plants without earth and water, they simply wither away."

The fly now became silent; but Nisos heard the moth answering him in her most vehement manner. "I don't see the use of dead things like sand and rocks and air and water and fire going on when living things like gods and men and insects have vanished away. That would mean that nothing would be left; for if no one knew they were there, there'd be nobody there and everything would be nothing."

"Your voice, beautiful one," said the fly, "sounds as if you'd rather like everything to be nothing."

"I would! I would! I would!" cried the moth; "for then the greatest Priest who has ever lived would be right, and the Pillar and the Club and all the rest of you would be wrong!"

Nisos decided in his own mind that it must have been the abnormal excitement of the club itself that had communicated this tension to its inmates. "Shall I," he said to himself, "take my hand off its head, and see what happens? My Father's hardly holding it at all! Suppose I did take my hand off its head would it move of itself? Would it go for this horror?"

Nisos had never in his life been aware of so many cross-currents of thoughts and intentions, of revelations and counter-revelations, of insurrections and counter-insurrections. He was conscious of feelings that whirled one way and of feelings that whirled exactly the opposite way, through his consciousness. It was like being torn in half. With one part of his soul he longed to lift his hand from the club and see the club plunge itself with all the power that killed Nemean Lion into the face of this Mystery enthroned on this dead seaweed!

With the other part of his soul he felt that to see the terrible beauty of this majestic face mauled, crushed, churned up, smashed up, beaten up, pounded up, hammered up, reduced to an indistinguishable paste of pestilential mud and blood would be to assist at the most savage crime that his wickedest imagination had ever pictured. But there was an “I am I” within him that was deeper than his divided soul; and with this he felt that the only conceivable alternative to letting the club obliterate this Ruler of Atlantis was to let the Horror have its way, to give up himself to it with absolute submission, to give up his father Odysseus to it, to give up his friend Zeuks, the son of Arcadian Pan, to it, and, worst of all, to give up to it his girl Arsinöe, the daughter of Hector of Troy. No, no, no, no! He couldn’t let this Being, whatever the mystery of its creative power, whatever the ineffable beauty of its face, whatever its justification as the archenemy of Olympos, triumph over all he loved, unresisted!

He felt too agitated, as the quivering of “Expectation” alias “Dokeesis” under the pressure of his hand indicated that at the withdrawal of his hand the club would act on its own and leap at that unspeakably lovely face bending towards them, to have the calm of mind to do what Odysseus was doing at this moment, namely keeping his eye fixed, not on the Creator-Survivor of Atlantis, but on the great Hunter Orion, who, towering above them, was now examining with the utmost nicety each arrow in his quiver, and as he did so kept turning north, south, east, west, and snuffing at the air for the direction of Typhon’s flight.

But he was absolutely amazed when he heard his father, who like himself was now on his feet, addressing Orion in a calm, quiet, but extremely authoritative voice.

“We have met without meeting, O mighty Orion, and I must request you to kneel down here for a moment at my side. I must ask you to do so in the name of your island of Chios. I must ask you to do so in the name of Merope. I must ask you to do so for the sake of the hide of that sacrificed bull, filled with the mingled semen of Zeus, Poseidon, and Hermes, and buried in the earth for ten months, out of which you were born.”

If the tone of Odysseus and the substance of his words were an astonishment to Nisos it was a still greater wonder to the boy when the towering giant submissively obeyed and knelt down by their side apparently quite indifferent to the fact that while he, a demi-god, was on his knees, they, a pair of mortal men, were on their feet.

Nisos now became painfully conscious of what might have been called the psychic helplessness of the four of them, Odysseus, Orion, the Nemean Club, and himself, arranged in a convenient row, as if they were Hesperidean Apples, to be devoured, one after another, by that Being reclining on the dead seaweed. Nor, it appeared, were any of the four of them very surprised by what they heard, though the tone of the Being’s voice when it first came forth might well have pulverized, or, at any rate, petrified, any one of them, caught by it alone.

It was not only the most scraping and jarring voice that Nisos had ever heard. It was the most mechanical, automatic, and metallic voice. It was a voice like the triumphant screaming of steel when in contact with tin. It was a voice like the voice of every instrument in the Smithy of Hephaistos if they had revolted and taken over for themselves the whole resounding and echoing place. It was not the voice of a god, or a man, or a beast, or a bird, or a reptile, or an insect. It was the voice of a vast reverberating arsenal full of every kind of instrument for every kind of creation and every kind of destruction.

"From now on, to the end of your lives," the voice from the Entity reclining on the dead seaweed grimly grated like a wheel, or grievously groaned like a plough-share, "you three migrants to my kingdom, of which, as you know, having once come you are forever the loyal subjects, will go about the world proclaiming my kingdom's laws. These laws will, in their own time and in due course, become the law of the whole earth, the law of every country and race and tribe and nation and people. This law will be absolutely and entirely scientific. As it is born of science, so it will grow, century by century and aeon by aeon, more purely scientific. Its one and sole purpose will be science for the sake of science. It will care nothing about such trifling, frivolous, unimportant matters as faith, hope and charity. It will care nothing about the happiness of people, or the comfort of people, or the education of people, still less, if that be possible, about the virtue or the righteousness or the compassion or the pity or the sympathy of people.

"It will use people — that is to say men, women, and children as it uses animals. It will practise upon them and experiment with them, not for their sake, but always purely and solely, as it ought to be, for the only Purpose, the only Religion, the only Object, the only Ideal, the only Patriotism, the only Cause, Reason or Consideration worth anything in the world — to understand everything that exists in every aspect of its existence.

"For the sake of Science we must create. For the sake of Science we must destroy. For the sake of Science we must go so deeply into the secret of the power of one human mind over another, and of all human minds over the substance of earth, the substance of air, the substance of water, and, above all, the substance of fire, so that in the final event the whole earth will be as completely under control as my ship of state the ‘Teras’. As completely, do I say? O much, much more! For though it will be worked and handled by human beings, just as the ‘Teras’ is worked by Akron and Teknon, and Pontos and Proros, and Klyton and Halios and Euros, they will be scientific human beings, that is to say every man, woman, and child, in the whole world will be dominated absolutely and entirely by me, or by someone appointed by me; and, in this new ‘Teras’ of mine, I shall sail to the furthest limit of the Cosmos carrying my war-cry of ‘Science or Death!’ to the end of Space and Time.”

“Shut your eyes, darling!” murmured the fly to the moth, “for our ‘cosmos’, or whatever you call our old club, is going to hit this Science-Horror pretty heavily, furiously, bloodily, murderously on the head!”

Nisos was so close to the “life-crack” within the club’s bosom that in the dead silence following the voice from that terribly beautiful countenance he couldn’t help catching, as the adverb-loaded buzz of the fly ceased, the moth’s contribution to the crisis, which, as can be imagined, was contained in two monosyllabic sighs— “priest”— “death”. But such was his sympathy with the club’s emotion that the boy now deliberately removed his hand. “Like son, like father,” might have been a proverb among flies, for Odysseus also completely relaxed his hold upon the club. Whether the savour of “poisonous brass and metal sick” from the brazen club held by the kneeling Orion, who with his height thus reduced by half was still taller by a head than the father and son who were on their feet, had anything to do with the violence of its wooden rival neither Odysseus or Nisos ever knew; and the bronze and the wooden weapon never met again. But, after a desperate, whirling circle, the self-brandished pine-tree-stump from that

Nemean wood crashed down head-foremost full into the forehead of the mysterious Being on that seaweed heap, breaking its skull to bits.

And, not content with this, the self-moved slayer of the Nemean Lion, just as if a ghost or "eidolon" of Herakles himself, wrenched forth from the dead past of that hero's madness, had been wielding him, continued to strike at that indescribably beautiful and majestic face, till there was nothing left but a revolting mixture of blood, flesh, bones, seaweed and sand, streaked with filthily bedaubed tufts of hair.

The whole business was over and the gigantic Orion with his club of bronze was already striding off, without a word to Odysseus, in a south-westerly direction whence he must have caught, on some far-carried stir of the waters, a trailing cloud-wisp of Typhon's breath, when a couple of Dolphins, a great deal larger than the one that had carried Atropos, but evidently, Nisos quickly told himself, sent to their aid by that timely-interfering Mistress of Particular Destinies, stopped with a slant-sliding pause of their triumphant witchery of movement close by their very side.

On the backs of these elegant sea-horses it was not long before it was possible for them to see, on rising to the ocean's surface pretty well in the identical place where they dived down, the familiar single mast and complicated rigging of the "Teras", not to speak of those tall, weird, eternally arguing goddesses "of an infant world", Eurybia and Echidna, who still stood, disputing with each other as to what was happening on earth at this crucial time, disputing with each other in their new "Arima", near to the Atlas-shaped rock to which the "Teras" was moored.

"Look! O my father! Look, for the sake of Aidoneus and Persephoneia, look! It is gone!" Gasping and spitting out the water from his throat and stomach, Nisos, keeping himself afloat with both legs and one arm, for their Dolphin-steeds were soon a mile away, shouted this news to Odysseus, to whom the watchful Akron had already thrown a rope.

Turning his steady gaze as well as his bowsprit-beard towards his son, the old adventurer, who with Akron's help was only using his left hand to climb on deck while under his left arm the club of Herakles was squeezed against his ribs, signed to Nisos, who was treading water in an unruffled sunlit sea, to detach from his shoulder, as he himself with his right hand was now detaching from his head the Helmet of Proteus.

The sight that had made the youth utter that cry was nothing less than the complete disappearance of the figure-head of the "Teras" so long renowned in all the harbours of all the Islands. "There's something here," the boy told himself, as he watched the Helmet of Proteus with its elaborate apparatus of hollow cords, sink out of sight, "that deserves more thought than I can give it till I'm warm and dry."

But as in his turn he was helped by Akron to reach the "Teras'" top deck he couldn't help wondering why it had been necessary to sacrifice this elaborately worked-out method of remaining for an indefinite time beneath the ocean.

"That awful Being," he said to himself, "had certainly no sympathy with anybody or anything. We were all the same to it! It would cut to bits, it would burn to cinders, a hero, a lion, a dolphin, a bird, a frog, a worm, a maggot, a flea. And all this to understand life!

"It didn't enjoy anything, or like anything, or admire anything, or pity anything. And yet it wanted to explore everything and understand everything. What a perfectly appalling way of understanding things! All it could understand of anything was how that 'anything' reacted to torture and compulsion. Well, well: I have learnt from the bottom of the ocean even more than from the ancient and adverbial language of flies. I now know what I shall be a prophet of when I am a man. I'll be a prophet for the putting of Science in its place! And what is its place? Its place is the servant, not the master, of life, the friendly 'doulos', or obedient slave of living things, not their pitiless 'basileus', or 'royal despot'."

That day, with all the following days for several months, turned out to be one of the happiest epochs in the whole life of Nisos, the son of Odysseus. He grew more devoted to Arsinöe, the daughter of Hector, than he had ever imagined that it was possible for him to be to any girl. In a physical sense, in a romantic sense, in a psychic sense she appealed to him; and on her side all she had endured in her captivity had left her with so much subtle knowledge of the pathetic simplicity of masculine self-esteem that not the most teasing obstacles, the most stupid jealousies, the most ridiculous suspicions, the most childish egotisms, could spoil for her what she saw of honesty, loyalty, and simplicity in her boy-lover's nature.

He also came to understand Odysseus as he had never dared to hope was possible; but it was not so much the mental enlightenment he got of the great Adventurer's character as the simply boyish delight in the endless stories the old man would tell out of his inexhaustible memory, as they sat together under that single mast and outstretched sail in the most fortunate wind that ever wafted a vessel towards an unknown, but O! so passionately imagined, shore!

What was most fascinating of all perhaps to the boy was the way the old man would correct and qualify, and sometimes event indignantly contradict, the ballad ditties that had already been scattered abroad throughout Hellas about so many of his exploits. Of these ballad-tales Odysseus hesitated not to explain to his son that the ones about the Trojan War itself were far grander as poetry than the more modern and more domestic ones, full, though these latter were, of the realism of daily life, and more concerned with his own private and particular experiences.

Certainly if their luck-blest sailing from East to West was a specially dedicated time for Nisos, it was an even rarer period of exquisite human happiness for Arsinöe. She had by this time come to profoundly understand, not in a scientific manner, but in a much subtler, wiser, and entirely feminine manner, all four of the chieftains on board, for no sea-faring chronicler ought to omit Akron; while our friend Zeuks, like his father, Arcadian Pan, had the power of enjoying a young woman without spoiling her chances with other men: and finally, since she was the only girl on the "Teras", the ship itself, devoid of a figure-head, was her only rival.

As for Zeuks, he had for the whole of this happy voyage from East to West exactly what his peculiar turn of mind liked best in the world, that is to say, for Arsinöe would never express herself with him, an old man, a middle-aged man, and a very young man, all well-educated, with whom he could discuss his favourite problems forever, problems that were at once erotic and metaphysical and that lent themselves to a humorous elaboration which any woman's mind spoilt. For the feminine intelligence, brought on the scene, swept in its direct realism so fast over both his logical hieroglyphs on the sands of time and the pantomime-stage overlooking them, that it spoilt the whole humour of his game.

And so when Arsinöe was helping Odysseus take his bath, or was learning something about navigation from Akron, Zeuks would argue with Nisos about that life-logos idea which was summed up in those two significant words "spoudazo terpsis", which Nisos loved to translate, in the adverbial language of the fly, "I powerfully throw my whole will into enjoying myself under all conditions," while in his own secret mind Zeuks would struggle to find, though he never could find it, some pregnant aphorism that would say to the whole regiment of all the thinkers and all the prophets that have ever been: “to laugh at everything is the prerogative of man, and we must acquire the art of doing it quickly before everything laughs at us.”

By good luck, or rather by the profoundly wise premonition of Nausikaa, the “Teras” had sailed with provisions enough to last the whole crew for half a year, so that even Akron, cautious as he was, felt no fear that they would reach the end of their resources before they reached the coast of some island or country or continent. And even supposing the ocean stretched on and on as far as the Isles of the Blest where those favoured by the gods lived forever in perpetual happiness, what could happen to the “Teras” before she reached those isles need not trouble them now. Akron indeed went so far as to confess to Eumolpos the helmsman that when he experienced a certain shudder of apprehension at the idea of having to encounter such world-famous favourites of the immortals, he overcame the uneasiness of his respectful awe by the idea that these Blessed Ones might get some kind of a human thrill at being greeted with news from home.

But months passed by and the “Teras” reached no Isles of the Blest or any other Isles. Days followed days, weeks followed weeks, and they met nothing but the same monotony of unending waters. At last there came a day when there arose such an angry controversy among the crew, who had never bargained for a voyage as long as this, that Odysseus himself had to help Akron in restoring order. It was a quite natural nautical dispute about this everlasting fair wind. There certainly was something queer in a wind that never stopped filling their one great sail. Too well they all got to know that old familiar expanse of sail-cloth as it bulged out, so full of that never ceasing wind! There was even a dark stain upon it, in the shape of a man’s hand, made by the blood of a seagull.

But it really was wonderful how quickly the aged adventurer restored order. And he didn't do it just by his bawdy jests; though there were plenty of those. He did it by holding their fascinated attention while he regaled them with one enthralling episode after another drawn from the actual stream of memorable things. It had been about this wind that their dispute had arisen; and, as so often happens in these contests, in each of the opposing arsenals of argumentative weapons, more were drawn from temperament than from experience.

In the matter of his own adventures Odysseus had come to realize as he grew older, and in doing so he had been greatly assisted by his old Dryad's intimacy with the Naiads of the Cave, that there were already a number of tavern-and-harbour ditties, school-boy catches, ballad-minstrel songs, and even longer and more scrupulously measured verses, that made very free use of him and of his adventures, just as they did of those of Agamemnon and Achilles and Hector and Ajax; and he now quickly understood, as he caught the drift of this present dispute, that it had to do with an entirely false and rather ridiculous tale that had been rumoured abroad about an ox-hide bag, in which Aiolos, the King of the floating island of Aeolia, bound up the four winds of heaven; and about this bag being given to Odysseus to carry with him on his ship, and about Odysseus's ship-mates, imagining it contained gold and silver, untying the knot and letting the winds go free, and finally about the frantic fury into which the foolish Aiolos flew when their ship was blown back to his fantastic brass-bound floating island!

Odysseus explained to both sides in this airy dispute that the winds had nothing to do with any such preposterous potentate as King Aiolos of Aeolia, this portly despot with his over-fed six sons married to his pampered six daughters, none of whom did anything but eat and drink all day long.

He explained to them that the mother of the winds was Eos the Goddess of the Dawn, who had married Astraios the son of that very Eurybia they had left on the island of Wone disputing with Echidna; and he warned them that unless they wanted the Hunter Orion on their track they had better cut out this silliness about ox-hide bags.

"I can't interfere," he told them, "with what the minstrels and tavern-singers make up about me. But inspired poetry is one thing and a versified fairy-tale, however entertainingly told, is another thing."

"Land! Land! Land! Land!"

By divine good luck — though Nisos had his own secret thought that his old helper Atropos had something to do with it — it happened to be at the exact hour of Noon with the Sun high above them and the water calm when the whole lot of them crowded on deck to welcome this most heavenly of all sights to those in the air or on the water, the simple sight of the solid earth. It was not a mountainous coast they beheld nor a particularly rocky one. It was just a coast, just a shore, just land at last.

Akron wisely decided not to let his helmsman steer them straight in at the first approach. "I prefer to wait," he told them — and Odysseus bowed to his opinion— "till we find a really good landing."

It is a curious thing but "what happens" as we say, often takes the course of events out of the hands of any particular power, even out of the hands of Tyche the Goddess of Chance herself, and yet doesn't yield it up to Fate or Destiny or the Will of Heaven. The event is not so much stranger than fiction as more appallingly natural than the natural, and to our amazement redeems all sorrows in the sweetness of its silent finality.

Probably no one will ever be really able to explain what there was in common between three extremely vital Entities on board the "Teras" that caused them all three to die of pure delight at their approach to land.

None of the three was entirely human, and it is possible that this was the reason; for it often happens that when plants and insects and half-gods die, ordinary human beings go on living. Ordinary human beings must have a certain mixture of fat and gristle in them that has the power, just because it is — well! what it is, of completely absorbing certain deadly vibrations.

“It’s the end of me!” Zeuks murmured, as Nisos, fancying that the son of the great god Pan was merely drunk, bent rather irritably over him. He wanted to go to Arsinöe who was standing where the Figure-Head had once been, and was talking to Akron and Odysseus; but his conscience had compelled him not to desert his friend the Fly, who was stretched out on its back upon one of the wings of the Moth, who had beaten herself to death in an ecstasy of happiness against the wooden edge of the “life-crack” in the bosom of the club of Herakles.

“And of me also!” faintly whispered the Fly feebly moving one long thin leg backwards and forwards along the surface of both his translucent wings.

Nisos was tempted to cry out for Arsinöe. “It’s funny,” he thought, “that all death calls for women; and yet all life depends on women!”

“Is the Pillar saying anything to the Club about our landing?” he asked the dying Fly, feeling instinctively that it would like to die talking.

But the Moth being dead and its own end near the Fly was disinclined to report on the world-events. “I have been thinking,” he whispered, “about our burial; and it is of this I wish to speak.”

“I take it,” said Nisos, “you mean yours and the Moth’s?”

“I do,” whispered the Fly.

“Have you decided upon the exact spot?”

“I have.”

“Do I know it?”

“You do.”

“You don’t mean the Sea?”

“No! No! No! No!”

“Where do you mean?”

“Put your ear close.”

Nisos obeyed, though it meant his pressing rather awkwardly against the motionless Zeuks. “You don’t mean you want me to finish you off first?”

“Of course,” groaned the Fly. “Don’t you understand that I’m done for and want to — to — be in one blob with her?”

“Blot did you say?”

“Call it what you like. I said blob.”

“Where is it you want me to bury you both?”

“I want to be swallowed. I want to go into a god’s stomach.”

At this point Zeuks lifted his head with a chuckle. “I am no god of flies,” he said, “but I can follow this little beggar’s buzzing. Squeeze the two of them into a pellet and I’ll swallow it right now!”

Nisos gravely and reverently obeyed. With his finger and thumb he killed the Fly; and then of its body and of the body and the surviving wing of the Moth he made one blot or blob and held it towards Zeuks.

“Kiss it!” murmured the great-grandson of ever-youthful Maia.

Nisos kissed it and placed it between the lips of Zeuks who swallowed it with a pleased smile.

“Kiss me!”

Nisos again obeyed and kissed the grandson of Hermes with so much feeling that a tear fell on a cheek that looked as if it might at any moment be split from one side to the other by a burst of profane amusement. When this world-deep bubble of irrepressible jocularity had subsided, Zeuks, who was far too weak to do anything but just murmur the words, told Nisos that it was curious to think that at this moment all over the world there were entities dying in their loneliness, who were without a friend to help them and who had moreover an awareness of their loneliness that was so definite and clear that it was painful to think about it. “When you consider,” Zeuks murmured, but Nisos could see, below the tragic pity of his words, a bubble of such defiant, mischievous merriment bursting through the whole body of the man that it seemed to arise out of the heart of life itself, “when you consider all the men and women and all the beasts, fishes, birds, reptiles and insects, isn’t it awful to think of creatures dying in the panic terror of loneliness? Did you know, my friend” — Zeuks’ speech by this time was so low that Nisos had to bend down to catch it— “that there are vibrations from one organism to another throughout the entire universe? Well! There are! And do you know what I’m going to do now? And please don’t disturb me in it! I give you my word I’ll die the moment I’ve done it. I’m going to tell every dying one in this whole crazy and confounded world that they’ve got me, Zeuks, the son of Pan, that is to say of the rebel who is everywhere, on their side against Zeus, and that the best way of fooling him and the whole lot of them is to die laughing, yes! laughing at this big, bloody, beggarly joke of a world! Stand back now, my dear!”

Nisos simply and silently obeyed the fellow; but the burst of stored-up ribaldry with which Zeuks died was so explosive that there was no corpse left to bury or burn. Out of world-dust he’d come, and into world-dust he dissolved, and the tiny blob of insect lovers he’d swallowed, melted with him into thin air.

Long afterwards Nisos and Arsinöe would spend hours asking each other about their memory of that landing. “What exactly did you feel,” that luckiest of middle-aged Prophets would cry, “when Odysseus stopped us from lifting a finger against the Red-Skins crowding round us? Do you remember how he looked when he came back to us, after talking with them in some words they understood that he'd picked up, Heaven knows where, to tell us that we'd landed on a place called Manhattan, whose Ruler was a very very old Queen called Nokomis, whose only child had already sailed away to a Kingdom they called Ponemah, which was the land of the Wind they called Keewaydin? And, O my Love, my Life, you know as I know what we both felt when he cried aloud to us all, he, Odysseus, the son of Laertes, among all those Red-Skins: 'Now that our wind from the East has dropped at last, and the only wind that we feel is the North West wind Keewaydin, shall we hoist our sail again? Never, never, never, never! Come my friends, all of you, white, black, yellow, and red, let us pour out all our wine upon her and then burn her! Yes, let us burn our ship!'"

I. THE STONE CIRCLE

IT DID NOT take Lil-Umbra long with her fifteen-year-old legs and her slender figure to scamper down the quarter-of-a-mile avenue of over-arching elms that led due eastward from the Fortress of Roque, where she lived, to the ancient circle of Druidic stones that had come to be known as "Castrum Sanctum". Once only did she pause: and that was because something about the manner in which all the smaller twigs at the end of one of the branches clutched at each other and then let each other go arrested her attention. It made her think of a young man called Raymond de Laon: but she could not have explained to anyone, just why it did.

The avenue sloped down all the way from the Fortress of Roque to the camp, but before it reached the latter, which was a grassy enclosure littered with broken stones, the smoothness of its gradual descent was checked and impeded, or, if you were bold enough to take them in a flying leap, accelerated, by a couple of rather high and very massive marble steps.

Lil-Umbra had already made up her mind, after seeing each of her brothers come down with a disturbing if not a disastrous collapse, that such wild jumps were beyond what was expected even from a maid "of true Abyssum spirit", as she had once heard herself described by her father to her mother. So she turned half round as she clambered down each of these two steps, touching with the tips of the fingers of one hand the slippery marble and giving a little tap on the ground with the toe of the foot that first came down, to make sure she wouldn't slip or slide. Once safely on the level grass of the Castrum Sanctum she ran with a quick bounding step to three tall perpendicular stones which stood side by side in the centre of the enclosure.

During the whole of that January there had scarcely been one night of thaw, and as this was the dawn of the twenty-ninth and in a couple of days it would be the first of February, the day which was her father's birthday, she had a particular reason of her own for approaching at this early hour those three upright stones.

It was Lil-Umbra's special desire to see the sun rise that morning while the waning moon was still visible in the sky, but she never would have dared to dodge both Nurse Rampant and the Nurse's assistant, old Mother Guggery, not to speak of Lady Val, her own devoted mother, if she hadn't made an appointment to meet a person, not only respected by them all, but one who was intimately lodged in Sir Mort Abyssum's trust and confidence.

This was none other than a gigantic Tartar whose life Sir Mort had saved when they both were surrounded in a half-crusading, half-plundering skirmish in Dalmatia, by an overpowering group of reckless Arab spearmen; and who in desperate gratitude had become his devoted slave for life.

Both the man's parents had been now for a long time dead. Giants of his size were very rare among Mongolian Tartars but, all the same, Peleg inherited his gigantic stature and strength from his Tartar mother, while his name Peleg showed that his father was a Jew, and indeed the original Peleg, too many thousands of years ago to be numbered in centuries, was none other than the grandson of Salah who was the grandson of Shem who was the son of Noah.

But it was certainly no thought of Noah or any other Hebrew patriarch that drew from Lil-Umbra her cry of excited delight the moment she saw Peleg crouching behind one tall Druidic stone in that broken circle. She scampered up to him at once and when she found he was asleep she had no compunction about snatching at his sleeve and jerking it up and down to waken him.

Had the rounded rim of the suddenly-risen Sun not become at that moment a living presence in the very place where, only a pulse-beat before, there had been nothing but the deepening of a wide golden glow diffused over the whole horizon, it is likely enough that Peleg might have received a bewildering shock from Lil-Umbra's leap into the enchanted pool of his dreams.

She certainly plunged in with a splash and the way she shook the giant's sleeve was enough to have jerked any ordinary mystery-loving Mongolian out of the happiest phantasmagoria of delectable dreams.

But the sight of that red rim, all the redder from the patches of snow on the slope of the ridge and the nakedness of the tree-trunks between which it appeared, conveyed to the man in a flash the whole situation. The first move he made was to alter with scrupulous care the position of the colossal iron mace which was his habitual companion and which was surmounted by a round ball as big as any ordinary man's head entirely covered by iron spikes. This weapon, which had been lying across his knees as he slept, with his back to the tallest stone of that forlorn remnant of a Druidic Circle, he now laid carefully on the frozen grass at his side and welcomed his master's daughter with a grave smile.

That little lady, delighted at having so successfully thrust her slight warmly-clad boreal body between the ancestral pillars of the mystic avenue to her friend's oriental dream-dome, didn't restrain herself in the least, now that he was awake, from pelting him with a shower of questions, confessions, declarations, and suggestions.

But it was not long before the gigantic Oriental and the young European were equally under the spell of that magnetic red orb which did not take many minutes to be half-way over the ridge that formed the eastern horizon of the Manor of Roque.

The Manor had only been in Sir Mort’s hands for a little over twenty years; but that had been quite long enough for himself and Lady Val, and their sons Tilton and John who were approaching twenty and their daughter Lil-Umbra, who would be sixteen in a month, to have grown intimately familiar with the fitful moods of the seasons in this part of Wessex, and with the particular enchantments worked upon this landscape by the Sun and the Moon in their variable seasons.

All five of them, the parents equally with their children, had established between themselves and both these heavenly bodies those private, individual, and even secretive personal relations that most human beings on this earth, whether old or young, though with very different degrees of intensity, instinctively reach.

“Well, here I am, Peleg!” gasped the young girl. “And O! how red the Sun is! It’s almost frighteningly red, isn’t it — rather like the Sun in that window in the Priory chapel — you know the window I mean? — that they say is a picture of the Last Day, when both Sun and Moon are to be soaked in blood. What things they do tell us, Peleg! I don’t believe a word of it; do you? I bet you don’t, any more than I do! It’s getting too much what these priests and monks tell us! Has John talked to you about what they’ve done to his master Friar Bacon, the learnedest man in the kingdom? Shut him up, they have, because he won’t believe their lies; and when he wants books and things — things he has to have if he’s to work at his inventions — they do their best to stop him from getting them!

“Do you know what came into my head the other day, Peleg? And it was because of that that I wanted you to show me the Moon this morning — no! wait a second — —” and the girl laid her hand on the back of the tightening and stiffening fingers by which the man was preparing to heave himself up from the ground— "It came into my head that perhaps even my father didn't really believe in all the things they try to make us swallow — and I can tell you myself of one person who doesn't, and that's Raymond de Laon of Cone Castle over there" — and she waved her hand, the one that wasn't being used to prevent his getting up, in a direction to the left of the now blazing Sun— "Raymond doesn't even believe that Pontius Pilate wrote 'King of the Jews' upon the Cross — and think, Peleg, how exciting it would be if I were more like Father in my secret thoughts than like Mother or Nurse or old Guggery or Prior Bog. What do you yourself think about all these things?"

The giant Tartar evidently thought that if he could get to his feet and convey this eager sceptic to a small eminence, only about three hundred yards away, the sight of the waning Moon, which he had himself just seen from that particular vantage-ground, would turn her mind away — at least on this particular occasion — from Pontius Pilate and the Crucifixion. He therefore proceeded to heave himself to his feet, murmuring as he took Lil-Umbra's hand tenderly but firmly in his own, "'Twere to see the Moon it was that you came, little lady, weren't it? To see the Moon from where your old Peleg do know every look of her, and every look of the belly and horns of her, aye! do know to a sliver which way her horns do point when she be rocking and floating like a ship without a mast and without a sail, a ship that's got lost in a sea of air, a ship that can do naught but watch that air change into an ocean of black darkness."

Muttering this musical monody to the Moon as if the Moon could hear every word of it, though neither Lil-Umbra nor himself could yet catch the faintest sign of her, Peleg led his companion down declivity after declivity filled with dead bracken-stalks and flowerless gorse-bushes, and across a few small rivulets that the girl could easily jump, and through one extremely unpleasant strip of boggy marshland, across which she allowed him to carry her, till they reached at last the place he had in his mind, which was a stone seat, made not by man but by nature, and a seat so prophetical that it might well have been the throne of a great paleolithic astrologer.

Upon this throne of stone they both sank down; and there was a deep silence between them. While this silence was lasting on and on, and while both these two beings, this middle-aged giant whose Jewish blood had endowed him with a more intellectual brain than people realized, and whose Mongolian instincts had from the start provided that brain with a reservoir of thick, rich, massive, sensuous impressions, and this high-strung, wrought-up, magnetically vibrant little daughter of Sir Mort and Lady Valentia, were giving themselves up, in the same absolute abandonment, to the spell thrown out by this faint, incredibly fragile waning moon, there had arrived at the Fortress of the Manor of Roque an unexpected company of visitors.

Now it happened that by some inexpliceble telepathic power the gigantic Mongol became aware of this unexpected intrusion; and it was a deeply trobling question to him whether to communicate to Lil-Umbra or not this sudden interruption. It was in psychic matters of this sort that Sir Mort completely underrated Peleg. It had always been the physical tremendousness of the Tartar's strength he needed.

He had never concerned himself very much with what went on in the man's private thoughts. One curious thing just then about the feelings of Peleg and Lil-Umbra as they yielded together so utterly to the sorcery of the Moon, while the giant wondered if it would be wise or not to speak of his new knowledge, was the way they were dominated by an irresistible inhibition against turning round to look at the Sun!

They both felt in some obscure half-conscious way that it would be dangerous and unlucky to turn towards that now fully risen luminary whose warmth they could distinctly feel at the back of their necks. Naturally the warmer the air grew and the more light there was in the sky the paler became the moon at which they were staring.

And the more the presence of the young girl at his side wrought this magic effect upon Peleg's attitude to the cosmos in general and to the landscape in particular, so the more divine did the Moon appear to him.

After a quick glance sideways at his companion as if to make sure of her sympathy but also secretly to ascertain if she were sharing his weird feeling that unexpected things were happening at the Fortress, he began to address the Moon in words more intimate and personal than Lil-Umbra had ever heard before used either to the Sun or to the Moon.

"O great Goddess," he prayed, "grant us, we beseech thee, an influence, a virtue, a secret, a touch, a mystery, from the heart of that which continueth, forever! In a few years I shall be an old man. In a few years this maiden will be a proud and beautiful woman and very likely the mother of children. Out of the heart of the Unknown thou hast come upon us, O great Goddess, and into the heart of the Unknown thou wilt soon pass from us. Heal us, therefore, O Goddess, of the hurts and wounds in our souls that ache and bleed today because of the false doctrines about gods and men that have been inflicted upon us, false doctrines about all things in heaven and earth!

"Have they not taken on themselves, these priests of pain, these ministers of blood, to invent signs and tokens and symbols and sacraments out of privation and deprivation, out of suppression and frustration, out of denial and negation? Have they not thus defied the revelations made by thy blessed mystery, and turned to nothing the secret of thy holy rapture, of thy sacred madness, of thy entranced, thy transporting ecstasy? Make them give us back the pulse of our life, great Goddess, give us back the beat of our heart, give us back the dance of our blood!"

Lil-Umbra remained silent for a couple of minutes with her face uplifted and her head turned sideways towards the colossal profile of the Tartar giant. There were several rooks and a few crows above their heads, sometimes flapping their great wings in disturbed agitation, and sometimes sailing with rhythmic risings and fallings, up and down between sky and earth.

"If I look at the Sun now," cried Lil-Umbra eagerly, "it won't make the Moon angry, will it, Peleg? I can feel it on my neck and I do so want to look straight at it!"

The giant smiled gravely. "Of course, my dear child! Let's both of us have a good stare at the old Life-Sustainer!"

When they had both turned their heads an inch towards the east, Peleg said quietly: "You'd never believe, would you, that the Life-Lord could shake off all that bloodiness so quickly and be as he is now, nothing but blazing gold."

It was at this point — perhaps under the influence of the advancing Sun, perhaps under the influence of the receding Moon — that Lil-Umbra felt an overpowering necessity to pour out from her own deepest soul a torrent of youthful revolt against the whole routine of maternal restraint and the whole authority of her old Nurse Rampant and of the still older Mother Guggery, Nurse Rampant's assistant. What especially she felt impelled to rebel against was the dullness and routine of so much oatmeal and barley-bread and rye-bread and so much vegetable-pottage in place of the rich meats and the intoxicating wines enjoyed by grown-up people; and the sudden inspiration seized her to do this under cover of the rumoured wickedness of Baron Maldung and Lady Lilt and their daughter Lilith, of the Castle known as Lost Towers, which rose out of a swampy expanse of flat treeless country, due north of both the Fortress and the Forest of Roque.

"May I ask you something, Peleg, something that's been on my mind, for a long time?"

"Of course, little lady, of course! I like to hear a child's secrets; and when that child is the daughter of my master —— Go on, my dear, go on for Heaven's sake!"

And then Lil-Umbra did indeed go on. In fact she let herself go with a desperate rush of words. "Why does God allow such wicked people as that family in Lost Towers" — and she made a little gesture with her head and one of her shoulders towards the north— "to be blasphemous about such an important thing as the food we're given to eat? Mother Guggery swore to me that Sir Maldung and Lady Lilt taught their daughter Lilith that all animals were holy angels, and that all fruits and nuts and raisins, and all plants and grasses, and every kind of grain, and all trees and shrubs and bushes and hedges, and all ferns and mosses and lichens and seaweeds, were devils incarnate. I begged Mother Guggery to tell me more: and do you know what she said! She said that Lady Lilt had a special reverence for animals' mouths, and also for the two other holes that all animals, just like us human beings, have at the other end of them.

"Mother Guggery said that Lady Lilt would run screaming up and down all the stairs and through all the passages and anterooms and corridors of the entire Castle of Lost Towers whenever she saw one of Sir Maldung's dogs with its tongue hanging out. 'Someone has hurt that angel of a dog!' she would cry. And Guggery says that whenever Sir Maldung feels bad from eating too much oatmeal or barley-meal or bread-pudding, and begs her to let him kill a rabbit for a change, she refuses to go to bed with him until he has walked to the furthest northern border of the forest, where there's a marshy swamp with rushes growing so thick that they hide every sign of the water.

"When once he's there, Mother Guggery says, he has to make a vow to animals and birds and fishes and reptiles and worms and insects that he will eat nothing but what's made out of the bodies of these vegetation-demons; yes! nothing but what's made of wheat, made of barley, made of oats; yes! made of every root that exists which isn't poisonous! That's what Mother Guggery told me.

"Lady Lilt swore, that she wouldn't sleep with him till he'd uttered his vow at the forest's end that he wouldn't eat anything except this devilish vegetation.

"No! She wouldn't let him touch her till he'd sworn his faithful oath to eat nothing but grain and fruit and seeds and leaves and buds and stalks and peelings and parings and roots and bulbs and everything of that kind in the world that isn't poisonous, and that he'll bite them up and crunch them up and munch them up, and roll them round in his mouth and chew, chew, chew them, and reduce them to messy mush, till he has taught them, yes! taught them utterly and thoroughly, to be what they are and what in their effrontery they think they are, and what in their devilish violence they actually suppose they were created to be, that is to say these shrinking, stinking, crawling, sprawling, climbing, binding, twining, sprouting and outing, knotting and rotting, sliding and hiding, shivering and quivering, tangling and strangling, burrowing and billowing, racing and facing, threading and spreading and doing all this in the pure unspoilt, original paradise of the blessed inanimates and the holy elements, where men and beasts and birds and fish and reptiles and worms and insects lived happily on the sacred flesh of one another between rocks and water, and between earth and sky before this loathsome multitude — such were the words Mother Guggery told me the Lady used — of vegetation-devils with their horrible juices ensorcerized saps, skins without flesh, pulps without bones, that originally came out of some infernal crack in the floor of the ocean!

“Lady Lilt said she wouldn’t sleep with him again till he’d sworn his oath by the edge of that marsh at the forest’s end that he would teach these vegetable monstrosities to be what they were by grinding them between his teeth, squeezing them between his tongue and his palate, sucking and squashing them between his healthy natural animal jaws, wringing their insides out, draining their inmost juices to the last distillation — so Mother Guggery told me the Lady said — till all their demonic greenery-sap and all the devilish sappy greenery of their entire selves had been completely dissolved and disposed of in the good sound moving bodies of creatures with hungry bellies and with legs and arms and scales and fur and feathers and with the life-breathing bodies of wholesome earth-worms and the motions and melodies of exquisite insects!

There was something in the exhausted gasp with which the girl ended this torrent of fantastic rodomontade that made the giant at her side seriously troubled as to what he ought to do. The climax of her elaborate litany as to what Guggery said and the Lady did really seemed to have brought Lil-Umbra to the verge of a complete collapse. Her dainty little head was now resting against Peleg’s side like a wood-anemone against the trunk of a solitary sycamore.

“O my dear child!” groaned the huge Mongol: “I tell you it scares me like Hell to hear you talk in that way! It gives me the feeling that some evil influence has come over you. Dear God! but I wish to Heaven you had never asked that old bitch Guggery to talk about it at all! On my life it seemed to me as I listened to you just now that you'd got the exact intonation of Lady Lilt! I hate her; and I think she hates me. She's one of those strange ladies who are up to anything in the way of dangerous magic games! Think of her considering all the grain we eat, whether wheat, barley, oats, or rye, as horrible demons! It's pure craziness, child!"

With an almost indignant jerk he pulled her to her feet. Then, as they both stood with their backs to the paleolithic throne, they had the golden blaze of the now fully risen sun irradiating both the man's enormity and the girl's delicacy.

"I like looking at the waning Moon," murmured Lil-Umbra, "a lot better than facing the rising Sun! But, Peleg, when I said I wanted you to show me both of them together, I thought I should see them side by side. Aren't they ever side by side, for us to compare them with each other, one so timid, so escaping, so slipping away, and the other so bursting and bubbling with blazing gold?"

The Mongolian giant looked down at her with a very queer look, a look that she recognized and in every fibre of her being wholly accepted, but which she could not have interpreted to anyone in human words, whether such words were written or spoken.

"O most dear and most simple of little ladies!" the giant burst out. "Don't you see that the whole idea of this mad world is to be found in opposites! Everything, I tell you, my dear little lady, is a Double Opposite."

They both were forced to turn their eyes away from the full blaze of the Sun; but though Peleg turned his head as well as his eyes, so that he saw — but at that moment he saw it without seeing it — a small feathery wisp of white cloud resting against one of the horns of the waning Moon, Lil-

Umbra kept her head unmoved while with lowered eyes she stared at her own clasped hands.

“I don’t understand,” she said now, though with some hesitation, for she hated to appear stupid in this man’s sight, “how a thing can be a Double Opposite.”

The Tartar giant did see the Moon now, towards which his head was turned, and he saw it with his intelligence as well as with his senses; and not only so, for he felt as if with his outstretched fingers he could touch the inside edge of that fading boat-shaped rim while his head and neck, for both were bare, felt a distinctly pleasurable sensation from the warmth of the Sun’s increasing radiance.

“I’ll soon show you how it is, little lady of my master,” he said gravely. “Take ourselves. Take me for example. The first of my two Opposites is in myself, that is to say, my greedy-grasping body on one side and my obedient, faithful and well-behaved soul on the other side. But the second of my two Opposites is my whole self, body and soul together, as opposed to entire Creation or the total universe of which I am a living part.”

Lil-Umbra’s head, with its light soft, silky hair bound up so tightly with broad bands of blue satin that the compact shape of the small skull beneath them, such as any imaginable head-dress would have totally disfigured, was emphasized rather than nullified, lifted itself with an abrupt jerk.

“Oh! of course I see! I see entirely! There’s a bad Lil-Umbra, ready to tease things and torment things, and pinch things and pull things to bits and to eat too many pears and sing and hum and drum when Mother is nervous or Father’s tired. And there’s a good Lil-Umbra feeling sorry for Mother and wanting to do everything I can to please Father. And there’s me in myself, both bad and good, both Opposites joined in one, who have, as my Opposite now, the entire universe! O I see, I see! I see the whole thing now!

I carry two Opposites about with me wherever I go; but I myself am a perpetual living Opposite to the entire world, so that I really am, just as you said just now everything was, a double pair of Opposites!

“And now do tell me this, Peleg. Raymond de Laon swore to me the other day, when I went with Mother to Cone Castle and both Sir William and the Baron were away, that he had made up his mind to think out a philosophy for himself, quite different from that of the Stoics or the Epicureans, quite different from that of any of the ancient Greek thinkers, and most different of all from any of our modern theologians.

“Now, Peleg, tell me and tell me seriously, for this is very important to me, and may have an effect upon my whole life: Is Raymond educated enough, is he clever enough, does he in fact know enough, has he travelled enough, is he honest enough in questions like this, to have the right, without making an absolute fool of himself, to work out a philosophy of his own, a philosophy that could be proclaimed in one of their university theses and even be posted up, like they do, on the doors of great debating-halls to be criticized by the doctors of philosophy in Oxford and Paris?”

Peleg surveyed his youthful questioner with a very grave face. There were implications in all this that were not a little disturbing to him. Paleg wasn’t ignorant of the fact that this young Raymond de Laon was a relative of Baron Boncor of Cone Castle and that the Baron had begged him to remain with him for a while to initiate his simple-minded and honest young son into the ways of the world.

The old and ailing and mentally-shaken King Henry had been persuaded by an influential group at court to try to bind to the royal cause this powerful West Country family by knighting for some superficial and conventional reason the young William Boncor, who was, in Peleg’s opinion, though a thoroughly good and nice young fellow, as wholly devoid of any particularly original or outstanding quality as he was devoid of any dangerous vice.

Thus Peleg began to feel a certain nervous apprehension; for the possibility of his master’s little daughter falling in love with a clever young popinjay of the new generation was a shock to him. So it was in a tone that was new to her that he now spoke.

“I had not realized,” he began, “that you and young Raymond de Laon were such friends. I knew you saw a great deal of Lord and Lady Boncor of Cone, but I never guessed you or your brothers had seen much of this young relative from abroad. Your father I know has great respect for them all at Cone: but that you and young de Laon were friends I never dreamed.”

He stopped and surveyed his companion with a steady stare. “If I could only be sure,” he said slowly, “that this young man has had the right teachers, I would be happier about it. Tell me, little lady,” he went on. “Has your young friend actually had lessons from Friar Bacon at the Priory? They say that by taking a hare or two, or a badger, or even half-a-dozen wild geese, to Prior Bog’s kitchen, people can get themselves smuggled into the Friar’s cell. But I reckon they have to be pretty learned people even if it’s only in Greek Grammar.

“I heard someone in those kitchens say that you had to know quite a lot of the ‘Sentences’ of Peter Lombard, or at least be acquainted with the Commentary on them by Albertus Magnus before you’d have a chance, even if you had a hare in one pocket and a rabbit in another, of getting a lesson from the great man.”

Lil-Umbra gave vent to an exultant laugh, a laugh that rang out, rich and clear and resonant, towards the point in space whence the Moon was now retreating into the recesses of interminable remoteness; while the Hebraic Tartar, puzzled at her amusement, stared helplessly into the dazzling portion of the sky where the air like a huge celestial sponge had soaked up the burning rays of the Father of Life and Light and was diffusing them over the land and water of the whole Western world.

“But, Peleg,” Lil-Umbra cried, “don’t forget that John has been taught by Friar Bacon since he was no older than I am. It’s a terrific secret, of course, and everybody, including John himself, always speaks of his studies in Oxford at Regent’s House, and of course he would again work at Oxford if Friar Bacon were back as he was before Bonaventura became General of the Order and had the Friar removed from Oxford and shut up, first in Paris, and then at Bumset under Bog. They say in Loam village that the reason my father keeps it so secret is that Bonaventura would be angry as Hell if he knew.

“But of course Bumset Priory is in the village of Loam, which has always belonged to our Manor; so it wouldn’t be easy for Prior Bog to keep John out even if he wanted to, and you know what old Bog is, ready to serve as they say every master who comes along if he brings enough French wine. Father hasn’t told a soul about John’s going there so often. Sometimes I think even Mother doesn’t know! If she does, she’s a better keeper of things dark than anyone in the whole world!

“But I think she does know. I can’t imagine Father not telling her when he must know that John tells Tilton and me everything about it.”

Lil-Umbra could see that her bold divulging of this long and intimate association between her brother John and the notorious Friar Bacon was no small shock to her companion. The Tartar jerked back his head from the Sun-ray and gave it a rather strained twist sideways, a twist that enabled him to follow, as the girl had been doing, the retreat into space of that silvery Moon, but, instead of keeping his gaze there, he now suddenly lowered his head and turned his whole attention upon the murderous spikes of that iron mace he held on his lap, hugging it almost affectionately between his thighs, while with both his hands he abstractedly toyed with those appalling spikes, pressing his thumb against their vicious points in careful and calculated succession.

What he was feeling in his mind was a black void of desperate loneliness. He had been of late congratulating himself on having a really deep and unique pact, unspoken and inarticulate, but none the less massively consolidated, with his master Sir Mort, but this revelation from the man’s daughter of a secret as important as this — and a secret connected with Sir Mort’s own son — gave the gigantic Mongol the feeling that he was not even yet a really intimate member of this family and that he had better take what comfort he could as he used to do as an orphan in Dalmatia by imagining himself alone in space like the star Aldebaran.

But the wheel of his fate selected that moment to touch one of those mysterious “opposites” concerning which he had just been talking. And it was brought about, by one of those secret chains of events that are often so confounding when they emerge out of the underground mole-runs of cause and effect into the twilight of consciousness, that some small token, either the sight at such a moment of an intensely glittering gleam where a particular Sun-ray truck a special spot on the spiky ball he was holding, or the reappearance of a tiny wisp of white cloud, totally forgotten until he recalled it now, that he had seen only a minute or two ago in contact with the retreating Moon, roused in the depths of the tragic loneliness into which he had been plunged a darting flame of a possible redemption of everything.

This came like the leap of a shining fish out of a black pool, and the form it took was the form of a girl not much older than Lil-Umbra herself. But though of like age with the young creature now leaning so trustingly against him, the redemptive vision that rushed into his mind was that of a strangely appealing Jewish maid. Before the bloody day on which Sir Mort had earned his everlasting adhesion Peleg had met in this maid the ideal love of his whole life. She was certainly beautiful; but it was in a strange, very rare degree, and with a beauty that seemed perpetually re-created by some mysterious sorcery in herself. Her name was Ghosta, and on first setting eyes on her Peleg had experienced a thrill of unutterable pride at having in his own veins the blood of Israel.

Yes, this youthful virgin of his own race became from the moment he saw her the supreme light of his life. But it had been in vain that he had rushed round the battlefield and the camp trying desperately to find her again. They had met: they had looked into each other’s eyes: they had loved: and then the girl had vanished. And when all was over, and he had become for life the free slave of the House of Roque, it was as if she had been carried off on a cloud.

Like himself she must, he supposed, have been willingly or unwillingly carried off by some Anglo-Norman crusader to a castle in the north of Africa or on the borders of Palestine or in Gascony or Sicily or Piedmont or somewhere in England or Ireland or Scotland or Wales or peradventure on the shores of the Bosphorus.

But there now shot into the heart of the smouldering crater of his desperation a weird and unaccountable hope, based on something as slight as that wisp of cloud on the Moon or that dazzling Sun-gleam on the ball of spikes, but something from whose fluttering motion, like a will-of-the-wisp crossing a death-swamp, there arose a suggestion of salvation.

The mysterious Friar Bacon, now a prisoner of Prior Bog of Bumset, possessed a queer servant who was never known by any other name than that of “Miles”, an appellation which, being interpreted, might be said to mean an extremely private, reserved, original, exceptional, but also an extremely professional soldier: and it had recently happened that, while Peleg was delivering a message to Prior Bog of Bumset, this same Miles had made a casual allusion which for Peleg had been like the sudden appearance, above a scoriac plain and under a dull, grey, monotonous, and devitalized sky, of a miraculous waterspout.

For a second he felt as if he were himself being changed, like Lot’s wife, into a pillar of salt; but at the next moment both these mirages of sensation — himself as the pillar of salt, and the wild, mad, hope-against-hope chance that Miles was referring to Ghosta — melted into each other and floated away into space like a triumphantly burst bubble.

What Miles had alluded to in passing, without attributing any especial interest to it, was the fact that one of the Priory servants who helped Master Tuck the chief cook had declared that the said Master Tuck had recently purchased at the price of ten silver Jewish shekels a Jewish woman who had been brought over among the followers of some crusader from Mesopotamia.

Of course there was only one chance in ten thousand that this Jewish woman was his lost Ghosta; but at least it was not impossible. O if she were! If she only were! Such a chance, if it really came true, would reduce to a grain of black dust every despair he’d ever felt!

“Did you groan then, Peleg?” Lil-Umbra suddenly enquired, “or did you crush down in your heart a shout of joy? I’m sure you made a very important noise. I make important noises myself sometimes when I just have to do something but don’t want anybody else to know!”

“Little lady — —” he began; but stopped abruptly.

“Yes, Peleg: were you going to tell me just then your very, very greatest secret?”

“What makes you say that, little lady?”

"Because I heard you make a noise in the bottom of your heart like Father makes when Mother asks him what's the matter with him! I know perfectly well what's the matter with him. He's got something on his mind that he wants to take out of the place where it hurts and carry away to some great desert-plain or mountain-side where he can turn it over and over and over in his mind and nobody be a bit the wiser!"

"He'll be the wiser himself, won't he, little lady?"

"Oh yes! But nobody else will know! That's the great thing; nobody else to know what we've got down at the very bottom of us! But tell me this, Peleg. Why do you keep twisting your head round towards the Moon? And then start staring so straight into the blaze of the Sun? And then hang your head low down and fix your eyes on a root or a stone or a molehill or on one of those funny clumps of grey lichen? — and then, after that, as if you wanted to end up with something more exciting than anything on earth, why do you lift your chin up and stop looking at anything but the sky, just the sky alone, as if you expected some angel to come flying down towards you?"

The Tartar giant lowered his head and gazed earnestly at the young girl.

"I'll tell you exactly, little lady, why I look at things as you say, and in such a definite order, beginning with the Sun and ending with the universal air. As I look at each of these things in turn I make the motion of my mind that I make when Sir Mort, your Dad, is worshipping and I am with him in church, or on the march, or at a sacred shrine, or at some gathering of the crusaders. All of us in the whole world, little lady, worship in our own way and as we worship do something to the Thing we're worshipping; and we do this according to our different natures. Having an animal nature what I imagine myself doing to all the Deities I worship is eating them."

Lil-Umbra gave a cry of delight and clapped her hands. “Of course,” went on Peleg, “I don’t ask you to believe that I really and truly eat the Moon or the Sun or the Earth or the Air. I only mean that I ‘make the motino’ of eating each of these things, and then afterwards imagine that I’m getting the comfortable and delicious feeling of having eaten them! In short, to tell you the real truth, little lady, I pretend to myself I’m eating these things, and play at eating them as little boys play at cutting off heads and arms and legs in imaginary tournaments!

“I admit, dear heart, when it comes to the Air it’s not easy to pretend to myself that I’m eating it. But a person can pretend almost anything: and that’s all I ask, the right to pretend I’m eating air.”

“O Peleg! Peleg!” cried Lil-Umbra, in a frenzy of delight. “I’ll do exactly what you do when I’m sick to death of Religion. Oh yes, I will! And I’ll ask John to ask Friar Bacon what his opinion is of this method of worshipping. But shall I tell you a great secret, Peleg? From what I’ve seen Father do when I’ve been watching him and he doesn’t know anyone is watching him, I believe he has a funny way of worshipping, just as you have. But Roger Bacon thinks the best way to worship is to invent things! John says Roger Bacon is now inventing a Brazen Head, that one day when he’s finished with it will utter oracles very, very helpful to us and to our country. That’s an exciting way to worship, isn’t it? To invent a talking Brazen Head!”

As she spoke the girl smiled radiantly at the giant; but the mention of John brought back upon Peleg all the old cloud of deadly gloom. The thought that no one had told him anything about John having become a personal pupil of Friar Bacon, and that every single one of them, including Sir Mort, Lady Val, the elder boy Tilton, John himself, and even this little Lil-Umbra, had deliberately concealed from him this important piece of news — which wasn’t only family news but was also political, ecclesiastical, and international news — was a crushing blow.

What it meant was — so he told himself — that he was not the feudal retainer of the house of Abyssum that he had begun to assume he was, but just a hired man who had to fight for them, eat for them, and sleep for them, and whose sustenance was his wage. So once again his terribly imaginative desperation returned; and he felt as if this secretiveness towards him of the family he served was enough in itself to cast him into outer darkness and to turn him into one of those lost souls he was always hearing about from the pious Christians around him who loved to remind each other of the possibility for their enemies of what they called “the Second Death”. That very expression “the Second Death” came back with appalling vividness at this moment; and Peleg felt as if he were clinging desperately to one of the horns of that waning Moon that was now vanishing in space, while an unspeakably horrible monster of colossal size resembling an enormous cuttlefish dragged and dragged at him to pull him down to that same bottomless chasm in the floor of the ocean out of which, according to the blasphemous notion of the Baron Maldung and Lady Lilt, the whole vegetable world and all the grain upon which we live emerged at the beginning like one multiform devil with green sap for blood.

The wretchedness of Peleg’s mind at that moment and the ghastly mood into which he had fallen was revealed at this point by a positively heart-rending sigh from the very depths of his being, the sort of sigh that a prisoner who has betrayed his best friend in the hope of saving his own life might have been heard uttering when he suddenly became aware that he has been fooled by his enemies and that his betrayal of his best friend will not save his own life.

“Peleg, Peleg,” whispered the little maid at his side, “your heart is crying! Tell your Lil-Umbra what is the matter! Have you suddenly thought that the Pope might decide to start a crusade to cut off all Mongolian mothers from the face of the earth?”

The giant gasped, choked, turned his head, and spat. “Not quite as bad as that, dear child,” he murmured. Then he rose slowly to his feet, and taking one of her hands in one of his, as a great wafture of ocean-foam from a broken wave might enclose a little shell, that has been lying on the sand, “I’ll tell it all to you another time,” he murmured, “but just now we must go back; for Sir Mort’s sure to be wanting me, and Lady Val will be wondering what’s happened to you.”

Lil-Umbra followed obediently; but she couldn’t help noticing that the long shadows as she now ascended the avenue gave the trees a completely different look from what they had when she descended; nor was she unaware that those mysterious movements at the top of the branches, that had put such strange thoughts into her head before the sun rose, had now completely passed away, and that the smallest twig against the sky was now as motionless as the largest branch close to the earth.

II. THE FORTRESS OF ROQUE

THE DOOR-KEEPER OF the Fortress of Roque was an extremely simple-minded, middle-aged man called Cortex, whose childless wife, Bundy, ten years older than her husband, but with a considerably quicker brain, helped him at his unpredictable, incalculable job. The Fortress's entrance consisted of double doors of colossal thickness that were only closed at night. For these hours of darkness they were fastened by a couple of huge iron bars, strong enough to have barricaded the Skaian Gate of Ilium itself.

These doors opened directly into an entrance-hall that could have sheltered half a hundred men-at-arms if they had been able to pile up their armour in a secluded court-yard that was available on the inner side of this vast reception room.

While Peleg and Lil-Umbra were watching the Sun advance and the Moon retreat from their nature-made throne of stone, an interesting messenger was being interviewed at the great gate of the Fortress of Roque. This was a devil-may-care soldier of fortune called Spardo, who was a bastard son of Ottocar, King of Bohemia, and who was never tired of boasting of his regal begetting.

In order to extend his own predatory explorations, which already had carried him to Byzantium and to most of the ports on the northern shores of Africa, this plausible rogue had recently constituted himself a sort of supernumerary guide, amateur factotum, and diplomatic outrider to a European group of courtly travellers, a few of whom were bound for Oxford, but the rest were wealthy pilgrims, anxious to visit the more famous shrines in all parts of these islands.

Along with the others, however, were a certain number who at the moment were following with fanatical devotion wherever he went, as the same sort of crowd undoubtedly used to follow St. Francis and probably used to follow Jesus, the saintly "general", as he was appointed to be, of the Order of Franciscan Friars, known to all Europe as Saint Bonaventura. This was the Order that Roger Bacon had rather incautiously joined when his family had completely ruined itself in its service of the King against the Barons; and it was anything but fortunate for him when Bonaventura was made the Head of the Order.

It had been no other than St. Francis himself who had given to Jean de Fidanza the name of Bonaventura, by which he was known throughout the whole world; and it was Saint Francis who had started him upon his career of notorious sanctity.

As for this Spardo, he was a tall slender person of about thirty, with a carefully trimmed red beard and large roving blue eyes. He was now holding by the bridle an odd-looking grey horse, which at first sight might have given the impression that it had two heads.

This surprising effect was due to some organic deformity in the poor creature's neck, a deformity which excited the curiosity not only of human beings but also of other animals. As this tall, slender, comical-looking Spardo advanced towards the great gates of Roque leading this equally slender grey horse by its bridle, the man's gaze seemed to be focussed on the horse's deformity, which the horse seemed to be deliberately covering with a strange self-induced film, and to be doing this with so obstinate a determination that the simple-minded Master Cortex, as he watched the two of them approaching, received the queer impression that the lean beast was desperately struggling to answer the man's gaze through the deformity at which the man was staring, just as if that repellent excrescence possessed something corresponding to an eye.

"I have come," began Spardo, addressing the bewildered gatekeeper, "to enquire whether a special group of noblemen and ladies, who feel a natural reluctance to add themselves to the crowd who are taking advantage of the hospitality of Prior Bog, especially as they will be more than ready before they depart to offer as their quota to the doubtless already rich Treasury of the Fortress such pieces of gold and shekels of silver as may fittingly commemorate the occasion, might perhaps be welcomed by this noble and ancient Fortress of Roque and allowed to rest here for a few hours?"

At this point the man stopped to take breath; and both he and the deformed animal he was leading turned their heads a little, as if to catch upon the air some faint premonition of approaching riders.

"I can see at once, master," Spardo went on, "that you've got a long experience of life in these high circles and in these difficult times, so that you must forgive me if I don't stop to explain what might bewilder any ordinary person. But this particular group of travellers, you understand, are on a journey to Oxford and London; and it would be a most blessed relief and comfort to them if your renowned Sir Mort Abyssum and your noble and beautiful Lady Valentia would allow them to rest here for a short space and be refreshed by the famous hospitality of this princely House."

The door-keeper, though anything but a quick-witted individual, was one of those mortals whose sympathy with animals is strong and instinctive, although totally inarticulate. There was therefore a wordless exchange of ideas going forward at this moment between Master Cortex and the grey horse on the absorbing topic, of intense interest to them both, of this mysterious deformity in the creature's neck.

So occupied indeed were both the door-keeper and the horse in the exchange of wordless communications about this weird growth in the latter's neck that the former soon ceased to listen to what Spardo was saying to him. It must have been after more than five minutes of this concentrated examination of the phenomenal shape which this strange growth on the horse's neck was gradually assuming, that the door-keeper suddenly leapt to his feet and began shouting: "Bundy! Bundy! Bundy! come quick! Here's a horse that's going to have two heads! For God's sake come quick, Bundy, and look! It's going to have a man's head as well as its own! Quick! Quick! Bundy! come quick!"

The fellow's appeal didn't go unanswered. He had kept it up after leaving the horse altogether and throwing all his strength into pushing the great double gate of Roque wide open enough to admit half a dozen horses, when his wise old spouse emerged from her retreat and shuffling up to the animal's side began at once stroking it tenderly. "Kyre! Kyre! Kyre!" she chanted in a curious kind of gloating ecstasy, as she rubbed the knuckles of one hand up and down over the crown of the creature's forehead, above its large, blurred, weary, and far-away-staring eyes, while with the ringers of her other hand she gently stroked its thick mane.

Her repetition of the word "Kyre" had an odd effect on the man Spardo. He had been educated in a monastery where they knew a little classical Greek as well as theological Greek; so that to hear this old lady repeat these two syllables which might mean "O Lord!" and also might mean "Hail!" and to see her obvious assumption that in either case the word would please the deformed creature, impressed to the depths of his being the man who was leading it, for he handed its bridle to the doorkeeper, came round by the animal's tail and bowed low before Bundy, who was a grey-haired old woman with an extremely long face not altogether unlike the face of a horse.

"Spardo is my name, mistress," he said, "and it's Spardo who now salutes you and does homage to you, and does so more deeply than you can possibly know. I don't suppose you've ever had the son of a king as your familiar friend; but you've got one now, and if I know anything of women you'll find me even better suited to your taste than the master here."

What the lady thus addressed felt in her secret mind, as she listened to this fantastic progeny of the King of Bohemia, it would be impossible for any male chronicler to describe — but it was clear that the rogue didn't displease her; for though she didn't blot out from her attention the massive jaw, the small eyes, and the narrow, sucked-in mouth of her mate — which latter feature resembled one of those straight lines which certain melodramatic chroniclers tend to throw in between a blow and a cry, or between a cry and a crash — she drew a little closer. Soon indeed she was touching the side of the horse with a fascinated interest in the extraordinary growth in its neck. As for Spardo, his movements were spectacular. He seemed as unable to keep still as a white butterfly in a vegetable garden.

What he was doing now was rolling his blue eyes so queerly in his head that while one of them seemed to be caressing with besotted unction the deformity in his horse, the other seemed to be lingering with no less maudlin tenderness on the elongated and almost equally equine countenance of the old lady.

Then quite suddenly, and with the organic outburst of that sort of irresistible impulse that creates a psychic stir in the whole surrounding atmosphere of any particular spot, he sank down on one knee in front of her, his thin red beard brushing the knee that was not on the ground like a bird's tail that goes on flicking a branch below the one on which it has settled.

While the woman's husband regarded him with blank astonishment, he began deliberately imitating the tone in which she made such a natural sing-song out of the syllables that may have been either "Kyre" or "Kaire".

"O noblest of wise women!" he cried, clutching at her petticoats so that she couldn't draw away from him, "you have no idea how near the truth you are when you chant that word. Haven't you noticed what that swelling in his neck really is?"

He now leapt to his feet and touched the horse's deformity with a solemn reverence as if it were something absolutely sacred. As for Mistress Bundy, she hurriedly let both her hands fall to her sides. Then she lifted them up a little, and proceeded to wipe them very very carefully with her apron. "It's the improperly-shaped beginning of a man's head, you cleverest of all ladies! That's what it's intended to be and that's what it will be. It will be a centaur, that's to say, a horse with a man's head!"

At the sound of the word "Centaur" the compressed mouth of the door-keeper went through a faint relaxation. In his boyhood he had attended Saint Aldhelm's School at Sherborne, and there he had heard of the centaur Cheiron and of the lessons in healing which this wise being gave the son of Aesculapius.

The word "Centaur" however meant nothing to Mistress Bundy; and there was therefore not the faintest element in her interest in this creature's neck of anything save the pure fascination of some grotesquely weird or fantastically shocking aspect of a deformity.

Both the woman and Spardo jumped back quickly enough however when the sound of trotting horses became audible. "They are coming!" Spardo cried. "Well! I'll ride and meet them and tell them — for I can see from your manner what you allow me to say — that they may expect, if they behave quietly and don’t crowd in with all their armour and if they leave their horses outside, a princely welcome!”

“O yes, yes, yes!” cried Bundy in great excitement: “Go! go! go! And Cortex will hasten now to tell Lady Val you are all coming! I am sure that both she and Sir Mort would blame us terribly if we let you pass this door and proceed on your way without stopping!”

The son of the King of Bohemia obeyed Mistress Bundy without a word. He swung himself upon the creature he had long ago nicknamed Cheiron and galloped off. There was no wind at that moment moving among the green spruce-firs and the brown larches and the few majestic deeply-indented, reddish-barked pines, which were the only trees close to this main entrance to the Fortress of Roque, an entrance which faced due south and which lacked, for some technical strategic reason when it was first constructed, any smoothly-sloping approach, like the avenue of elms leading eastward from the postern door.

But if there had been such a wind, and if we were permitted to endow it with anything resembling our own impressions about people and things, it would certainly have received a shock of surprise when it noted that before Master Cortex rushed down the passage leading to the interior of the Fortress, and before Mistress Bundy shuffled back to her chamber in the rampart beside the great gate, neither of them gave the other so much as a glance, far less made any attempt to exchange views on the direction towards which events were moving.

Meanwhile within a small ante-room to their bed-chamber Lady Valentia was impatiently awaiting her husband’s return from his accustomed early jaunt. Lady Val could see from where she sat both the elderly women, the upright, bony Nurse Rampant, with her formidable clear-cut Norman profile and her tall muscular figure, and Mother Guggery, the nurse’s help, with her short legs, well-rounded belly, and her grey curls, so fantastically trimmed with purple ribbons that her head resembled a bird's nest in an aviary full of irises. These two females were hard at work in the inner chamber, sweeping out the dust and making the bed, and while they worked they were keeping up a regular word-dance of enticing scandal which, by an infinitely crafty and long-practised skill, they exchanged in such a way as to reveal absolutely nothing to their mistress with which she wasn't already acquainted or in which either of them could specially preen herself as the revealer.

Thus it was easy enough for Lady Val to give herself up to a certain rather bitter vein of meditation, for which she only had the appropriate leisure when, as at this moment, she was waiting for Sir Mort before taking the lead in some exacting social function.

"It's no good," she told herself, "imagining at this late stage what my life might have been if I hadn't married Sir Mort and handed this place over to him with his weird Abyssum blood, for just as I never could understand his parents, so, though I love him from my heart as the father of my two boys and of our darling little Lil-Umbra, I do sometimes feel as if, being as I am the only living descendant and representative, in this ill-mannered and unruly island, of our old and civilized house of Dormequil, I might have done better had I given myself and our historic Manor of Roque to one of our cousins in Brabant, or even to one of our second cousins in Piedmont.

"But perhaps then I would have died childless; for with all the proud shrinking of what Mort calls my 'virginal qualms', if I'd given myself to a man of my own nervous sensitivity instead of to my old thick-skinned raper of Sabines, these dear children of mine might never have been born! But O I do wish that Mort had never let John go to that awful Regent's College, as they call it, in Oxford, where this man they call the Doctor Mirabilis got hold of him. The boy’s head has been completely turned by this cunning Friar with his devilish sorceries! Thank God that Tilton has a firm head on his dear broad shoulders! He has always been the only really well-balanced, sensible one of our family, and I can only pray he’ll more and more take the lead.

“It doesn’t seem quite right for a young man as well-born and well-educated as Tilton to work like a mason with his own hands at that little shrine to Our Lady he’s building out there: but it shows what a good, firm, steady, reliable mind the dear boy has that he is anxious to serve God in a really practical way, rather than indulge in all these crazy and immoral ideas about inventing ships to fly to the Moon and boats to dive to the bottom of the sea and Heads of Brass to utter oracles. O my little John, my little John, if I, your mother, can’t get this nonsense out of your head I can only hope that when you’re a man you’ll find a woman who’ll be able to do what your mother can’t!”

At this point Lady Valentia was seized with such a spasm of frustration and with such a sense of all the weariness and disillusionment that exist in this human world, that she bowed her head over the arm of her chair, and closing her eyes uttered a piteous prayer to her guardian angel that she might go to sleep like those people in fairy-tales and not wake up till her husband was dead and John was a man and Lil-Umbra was happily married.

It was at this moment that Master Cortex, breathing heavily and gasping a little, not only by reason of the speed at which he’d come, but also from apprehension as to the effect of his news, was ushered into that little ante-chamber.

Nurse Rampant and Mother Guggery jostled each other to be the first intermediary between this Euripidean messenger of fate and the lady of the manor; and Mother Guggery being the nearer at the start won the race. With a word and a wave she dismissed the scullery-boy who had ushered Cortex into the lady's presence, and she would have dismissed Cortex too if she could have got his news out of him before doing so; but Lady Val's instinctive tact and instantaneously available domestic wisdom anticipated any such move.

"What is it, Tex?" she enquired; and her choice of the diminutive syllable which Sir Mort always used for his doorkeeper so delighted the professional pride of Mistress Bundy's stolid mate that he couldn't resist giving to both Nurse Rampant and Mother Guggery a grimly sardonic glance, not even including them in one general look but giving them each a separate rebuff, as if he said to the one, "You see it's 'Tex' between your mistress and me," and to the other, "You see how well she knows the way they treat door-keepers in King's houses!"

"Did this man you're speaking of," enquired Lady Val, "I mean the one on the horse with two heads, mention how many were coming? Did he know if the saintly Bonaventura was among them?"

Having completely disposed of the two old wives, who were now so riddled with curiosity that nothing but direct dismissal by their mistress would have got rid of them, Cortex answered Lady Val's questions with the utmost honesty.

"The man didn't say how many they were, my lady, nor did he say whether Saint Bonaventura was coming with them. But he certainly said they would be at the great gate in a few minutes; so, as I knew you and Sir Mort, my lady, would wish them to have a taste of cook's good oat-cakes on this morn of morns, I told him that their men would have to take their horses round to the stables themselves, and that if his noble lords were wearing heavy armour it had better be left in the gate-room, as we hadn't ——"

"Did the man tell you that Saint Bonaventura was coming with them?" interrupted Lady Val with some degree of impatience.

The Nurse and Mother Guggery looked significantly at each other as Cortex began to explain at length just when and how, in his recent conversation, the name Bonaventura had been introduced:

"Well, Tex," Lady Val announced at last, "you'd better bring them all in here, into our reception-passage. Yes! All the lot of them! It won't do to discriminate; 'In for a shepherd's crook, in for a royal sceptre!' as the proverb says. But I wish Peleg and Lil-Umbra would come back! I can't think where Lady Lil has made him carry her. Well! you'd better go back and wait for them at the gate. I must go to the kitchen at once and find out what we've got and what cook will be able to do with what we've got" — she broke off with a little cry and a gesture that might have been of exasperation or might have been of intense relief; and while Cortex with a rather dissatisfied countenance stalked out of the chamber, Lady Val turned to Nurse Rampant.

"I think," she said, "that was the postern-gate. If it was, it must mean that Peleg and Lil-Umbra have come in. I expect you had better take the child to her room at once, Nurse. For I know her Father would want her to look her very best if what Cortex said is true and this company really comes straight from France. Cortex isn't one to exaggerate, and I know there's been talk of this saintly Bonaventura becoming a Cardinal, perhaps even Pope, if his glory goes on mounting up at its present rate."

Seldom have three women separated more hurriedly and with expressions more definitely divided between lively excitement, irritable anxiety, and gloating interest than these three did now. But not much time elapsed before Nurse Rampant and Lady Valentia were in sight of each other again, although surrounded now, each of them, by a closely jostling crowd of extravagantly attired lords and ladies.

III. THE HOUSE OF ABYSSUM

THE RECEPTION OF guests in this central portion of the Fortress of Roque always took place in a wide and spacious but low-roofed passage, half cloister, half gothic corridor, between the kitchen and the dining-hall. Of these it was the kitchen that was far the more richly decorated, and in its roof, walls, and general aspect, far the more flamboyant, and grotesquely intricate in its ornamentation. The dining-hall was of much simpler and much older construction. In fact it must have reverted to an age only a little later than the withdrawal from Britain of the Roman Legions.

Entering it you felt you were entering what might have been a giant cave in a fairy-tale; and when you were within it, it was as if it had been through primeval forests that you had to thread your way, crossing some Roman road, and losing yourself in mouldering and broken-up vestiges of shadowy romance. It was the spacious cloistered passage between these two impressive constructions, the eastward-looking prehistoric dining-hall, and the westward-looking, intimately gothic and mediaeval kitchen, that was, upon this particular February morning, in the year of grace twelve hundred and seventy-two, when the little daughter of the house accompanied by the Mongolian giant Peleg came in through the postern-gate, more crowded than it had been since the day when the Norman bride of Llewelyn the Great was entertained here by Lady Val's family.

The crowd by which Lil-Umbra and Peleg were now confronted was indeed a brilliant one and yet it was also an extremely confused and motley one. If there were plenty of lords and ladies, there were also plenty of menials and dependents; some of these latter being almost strangers to the place, such as the blue-eyed, wispy-bearded rider of the deformed horse called Cheiron, others, like the Sygerius family, who had been Bailiffs of Roque for two or three generations, being wholly local people.

It was immediately apparent to Lil-Umbra and Peleg, even before Lady Val had been able to make her way through the crowd to reach them, that the chief topic of excited talk among all these people had to do with the coming of the famous Bonaventura, and with the relation between him and the equally famous — though some would say the abominably infamous — Friar Bacon.

The names Bacon and Bonaventura kept rising and falling like a musical refrain from all parts of the crowd. The impression Lil-Umbra first got was that at any moment the philosopher in disgrace and his saintly punisher might suddenly emerge from somewhere behind the scenes and burst into a dramatic dialogue. Then she suddenly became aware that there really was a violent argument between two excitable competitors for public attention approaching them through the crowd, but that this was a dispute between her own brothers.

She could hear her mother's voice indignantly intervening as the two young men pushed their way through the astonished guests with the evident intention of going out through the door by which she and Peleg had come in.

"I know exactly what's happened," she told herself. "Tilton's had his breakfast early, in the kitchen, as he often does, and he's going out to work at his Lady Chapel." And then, as she noticed that both brothers had caught sight of her, "I pray they're not going to drag me into their dispute! If they try to I shall just say that we'd better leave theology to people who're too old for anything else!"

But though both her brothers, and her mother too, had seen her, as she stood there by Peleg's side, it was clearly not easy for them to disentangle themselves from the press of people. Lil-Umbra moved a little closer to her gigantic companion. On this particular morning, when she had seen the advancing Sun and the receding Moon exchanging some mysterious zodiacal password as they separated to pursue their different paths through space and time, it seemed to her as if some special wave of fate had swept this giant, with his Jewish father and his Tartar mother, into her life as a colossal raft, to which, if she could only cling tightly enough, all would end well.

A sharp-cutting phrase used by her brother John, as he and Tilton shook off the interference of their mother, reached her now like a high-pitched fog-bell in a storm-rocked harbour-mouth; but more agitating to her than John's wild talk was a startling vision she suddenly had of Nurse Rampant hovering behind Lady Val. Her reply to this presence in the background was to twist her ringers desperately and tightly round a fold in the Tartar's cloak; and the hard little knot made by this bird-like clutch upon the pliant silk of the man's mantle became, as Lil-Umbra kept striking her other clenched hand upon it, a sort of musical instrument of inspired resistance to constituted authority.

Nor did this quaint combination of gigantic passivity with girlish revolt prove unsuccessful; for Nurse Rampant, who knew both the character of the mother and the character of the daughter better than anyone else in the world, saw so clearly the way things were drifting that she decided to leave Lady Valentia to deal with her three children and their unsocial behaviour as best she could, and turning her back upon them all hurried off to her own quarters.

"If I'm to dress the child," she said to herself, "to please this crowd, they'll have to send her up to me. I'm not going to wait any longer in this crazy hurly-burly!"

Things were indeed getting out of control. Both her brothers were now appealing to Lil-Umbra. Tilton was already finishing what was evidently a sentence he had begun before she had begun to listen to him. "Our learned rulers," Tilton was saying, "are surely appointed by the Church, John, to direct our campaign against Satan, just as much as our secular captains are appointed by the State to organize our campaign against Saracens and Arabians and Turks and all other enemies."

"But what I say," broke in the shrill, high-pitched, rather rasping voice of John, "is that when we come to philosophy, and science, and mechanical invention, we touch a totally different aspect of life from that with which religion is concerned. If you take philosophy for instance," and here John's voice rose to such a penetrating pitch that all sorts of resplendently dressed ladies looked significantly at each other and drew nearer to listen, thinking perhaps that here was one of those dangerous heretics that the great Saint who accompanied them was on his way to suppress, "for instance, in regard to the difference between Mind and Matter, what, I ask you," cried John, beginning to gesticulate like a practised teacher of philosophy, "are we to decide about the Aristotelian view of the Higher Reality compared with Plato's system of Ideas? Or what are we to think about the nature of these immaculate 'Ideas'? Are they perhaps to be considered as Godlike Entities in Themselves, or merely as subjective symbols of — —"

"Stop this nonsense, John!" The interruption came from Lady Val. It may easily be believed that Lady Val's indignant outcry had an instantaneous effect upon the already excited, jostling crowd that surrounded them. Everyone heard her words and everyone turned round to look at her; and those who were already absorbed in watching Tilton and John turned from them to their little sister, as if they felt sure that the only female among these precocious youngsters would have some opinion on "the Ideas of Plato" different from any that had ever been promulgated to a puzzled world.

The young girl began to feel as if from every little group of people round them there emanated a violent explosion of human emotion expressed in terms of intensely coloured and passionately gleaming inanimate objects. She had heard that the great "General" of the Franciscan order of preaching Friars — this Bonaventura they were all talking about — was furiously fond of preaching to vast crowds; and she seemed to see him now, as she clung to Peleg's cloak in a sort of exhausted trance, as a great wavering pillar of light broken up into glittering facets in all manner of metallic mirrors across which were moving a wild array of gesticulating reflections.

On every side she felt aware of glimpses of blue and crimson ribbons, hastily caught flashes of waving feathers, shoulders scintillating with the polished links of special chain-armour that the wearers had been reluctant to remove, jewelled clasps at the folds of carefully adjusted robes, and silver-bordered gleaming knots of satin and silk fabrics holding together the slippery waftures of waving mantles, while here and there she actually noticed, among the ornaments worn by some of the foreign ladies who had appeared, convoluted sea-shells most curiously and fantastically tinctured with weird and unearthly colours totally alien to the sea-shore from which they had been gathered.

John neither hung his head nor answered back under Lady Val's words. He just clutched his elder brother Tilton by the belt and went on sermonizing him in a murmur too low for their mother to hear. Lil-Umbra glanced up quickly at the countenance of her tall friend Peleg; and she saw that in spite of his height the Mongolian could follow John's words and even approved of them.

Meanwhile she noticed that Lady Val had been suddenly captured by one of the grandest of the Bonaventurian female intruders, who wore a travelling-robe of black velvet over-scrawled by amazing hieroglyphics in purple and white of the most fantastic monsters to ward off all danger of bad luck; and by scrutinising this robe while its wearer's volubility absorbed her mother's attention, she derived a certain curious satisfaction which proved to herself though her brother would not have believed it that she had a real taste of her own for beautiful shapes and rare colours and artful designs.

John was now giving Tilton a long and extremely complicated discourse on the importance of never allowing his pious opinions about unusual yet perfectly natural events, such as falling stars, whirlpools, cloud-bursts, earthquakes, tidal waves, and the like, to interfere with his daily observation of the ways and characteristics of the persons with whom he had to live, or to let these same theological opinions terrify him with apprehensions about the future of the world.

"Where Science and Philosophy are concerned," John was now assuring his brother, "it is as bad for the authorities to interfere as it is for the brutal ignorance of the common herd! What I hold is — —"

"How John does love to say 'I hold',' 'thought his little sister, "but I expect he's right or Peleg wouldn't look so pleased and mother wouldn't look as if she didn't even notice the exquisitely designed robe that lady's got on!"

"I hold," went on John, "that no vulgar prejudice and no high-placed authority has the right to meddle in any of these things."

"You are unfair, John," cried Tilton indignantly. "Isn't he, Mother? Do speak, Mother —— Pardon me, Lady" — this was addressed to the wearer of the pictured robe, but Tilton went steadily on addressing his mother— "Do tell him, Mother, please do, how unfair he is! Do make him see! What I say is really quite plain and simple. When there's a possibility of wicked and vicious undermining with clever human reason of the long-ago revealed doctrines of the Church, doctrines that God himself — —"

"O do for heaven's sake shut up, Tilton!" interrupted John. "Aren't you ashamed to put all this conventional rigmarole, all this hollow superficial humbug, into the head of Lil-Umbra? You agree with me, don't you, Peleg? Since you've lived in this country you have seen, haven't you, the cruel harm done to original scholarship and original thinking by the blind and obstinate tyranny of self-interest? You, as a Mongol, Peleg, must have seen among Asiatics of every sort this same terrible wrong being done to enlightened and uninhibited human thought by the tyranny of custom, tradition, habit, and common usage, blindly supported by the stupid self-interest of the particular persons who happen to be in power and who use their power to suppress the least stirring of new thought. You do agree with me, don't you, Peleg?"

The gigantic Tartar looked so embarrassed and uncomfortable under the impact of this direct personal appeal that Lil-Umbra was unable to contain her feelings. "I'm not backing up Tilton against you, John," she cried in a clear but not shrill voice; and then, as she noticed a slight movement of Lady Val's stately figure in her direction, she dropped her hold upon Peleg's mantle, straightened her figure, held her head high, and surveyed her excited brothers with an almost judicial impartiality.

The press of people pushing and hustling as they jostled one another in the two streams of outgoers and incomers within those great carved doors between kitchen and dining-hall, seemed, at least to the mind of the super-sensitized young John, actually to be pausing at that moment in the swirl of their movement to listen to the words of the young girl who was holding her head so high. “No, I’m not taking the side of either of you,” she went on, “but I feel ever so strongly, John, that this mental argument you’re using now doesn’t altogether — I know there’s a great deal in it: don’t misunderstand me, I implore you! — but I also know that there are things to be remembered and thought of, that you, John, neither remember nor think of! There’s a great deal in what you say, John dear; more, I expect, than I realize myself: but there’s also a lot to be said on the other side — O! a terrible lot! — and this other side is so appallingly mixed up with our feelings that it’s oddly painful, John dear, yes! oddly and queerly painful, to bring it out fully enough to be able to defend it. It’s because they’re such hard things to say and so mixed up with all our deepest feelings, John, that it’s difficult for Tilton to express all that he has in his mind — whereas it’s easy for you to express all you have in your mind — because, don’t you see, dear John, the things you’re talking about are clear and definite? They are supposed to be much harder to understand than our emotions and feelings; but in reality they are — and I know I am right in this! — ever so much easier! For in real truth, John, my brother, the ideas we make up in our minds can be followed by our minds; the feelings we have in our hearts are put there by Nature and they begin and end in darkness and mystery. It’s not that I don’t know very well where it is that you have picked up your view of things, John, and I know it is a fount of true wisdom. But there are things that a saintly great man like this Bonaventura — and you must remember that Bonaventura was consecrated for his work by Saint Francis himself who must have thought highly of him and must have predicted for him a wonderful future. So we have to remember when we are — —”

“Be a good girl now,” broke in her mother, who by this time had escaped from the lady with the hieroglyphic gown, “and go upstairs to Nurse. Your dear Father may be back any minute; and he’ll want to see you at your best at breakfast because I have invited the whole lot of these good people to this meal with us. I have just now been talking to the Countess of Corbière-Cantorac of Caen and she tells me that the Blessed Bonaventura himself has sworn he will be here if his horses don’t fail him; though at the moment he’s visiting a leper’s hamlet near Ilchester. If your Father’s late, we’ll have to keep all these people entertained and amused as best we can. He wouldn’t like it for us to begin before he came.”

Any sagacious onlooker who had the intelligence to ponder on the undercurrents of this scene would have already decided that Lady Val, in spite of the competent appearance of worldly poise that she managed to display, was not far from some kind of nervous collapse. Nor would that onlooker have been mistaken. The poor woman actually was on the verge of such a breakdown.

“O why, why, why,” she kept asking herself in the depths of her soul, “did our ancient family of Dormaquil ever allow itself to be betrayed by a romantic idiot like me into handing over Roque to a crazy breed like these Abyssums?”

What particularly disturbed her at this moment was the awkward and unconventional isolation of her three children along with that Tartar-Jew, Peleg. They are simply, she told herself, showing off their clever theories to each other, and totally forgetting their duty to the immemorial hospitality and prestige of the Manor of Roque. They ought to be moving about among this crowd with the graciousness of a proper family; whereas Tilton, I can see, is longing to go straight out to his half-built shrine and Lil only wants to put John in his place and show herself as clever as he is!

She turned away from the three of them for a moment and hurriedly examined the faces of the crowd. She soon realized that there were, sprinkled among the visitors or pilgrims from the other side of the channel, several of the richest freemen of the Manor; and she even fancied she saw a couple of serfs in their Sunday clothes. She had already noticed among the Manor officials what looked to her like the whole Sygerius family, except the old grandfather who was no doubt, as he always was, polishing and sharpening and cleaning the weapons in the armoury. This old gentleman had been the Reeve or Bailiff of the Manor for a quarter of a century, and his name was Heber, while the name of his son and successor was Randolph. Old Heber's wife had died years ago, but the wife of Randolph, whose name was Madge, was full of youthful liveliness and daring, as was indeed the whole Sygerius family including both Toby, Randolph's eldest son, and Toby's wife, an extremely pretty girl whose name was Kate, but who from childhood had had the nickname of Crumb.

"That silly girl of mine," thought Lady Val, "must be got away from all these staring people! She must go to Nurse and change her clothes and do her hair and be ready to sit down at table when Sir Mort appears. O why, in God's name, doesn't he appear? He said he'd be back in half-an-hour. He said it was only to make sure about that dammed-up mill-pool that he went out like this. He always goes out for a breath of air before breakfast, but not for as long as this! I do so hate it when he disappears like this just when I want him most. O there's Madge and Crumb by themselves! Randolph must have taken Toby off to help with all the horses. I must go and find out if they're going to help me at this frightful breakfast. They ought to. They both ought to."

Lady Val was no sooner lost to sight among the crowd than her eldest child, Tilton, after watching her vanish in pursuit of the middle-aged Madge and of Madge's laughter-loving daughter-in-law, rose quickly and caught hold of John by his belt. Tilton was a loyal adherent of the New Testament, but in a practical, not an occult or mystical, sense.

He was a tall, muscular, athletic young man, with a candid, open face, straight fair hair, and large honest blue eyes. He had a free, high-spirited, frank integrity of manner that people found very appealing. He now caught his younger brother John round the shoulder and dragged him off towards that same small postern through which Peleg and Lil-Umbra had just come in.

As he thus possessed himself of his brother, he poured out a stream of words. "But you'll see for yourself! You'll see the expression I'm carving on Our Lady's face. You needn't worry about it being cold in my little chapel. I left a good brazier of red coals in there. Besides, the Sun will be shining through the window. Don't be scared. I won't keep you more than a second!"

Lil-Umbra couldn't resist turning her head towards them and she was rewarded for her interest; for Tilton was so eager to explain to his younger brother exactly the point he had reached in his architectural and sculptural undertaking that, with his hand on the door-bar, he went on eagerly with what he was saying.

"What I want particularly to show you, Johnny, my boy, is a smile I've carved on Our Lady's face. It's a smile; and yet it's more than a smile. It's a look of worship; and yet it's a look of What's being worshipped. I won't keep you more than a second; so don't speak till I've shown you! No! No! I don't want to hear another word about reason and science! Wait till you've seen the look I've put on Our Lady's face! Of course I couldn't with only a chisel and hammer show all she was feeling; and of course anyway it would be absurd, even if I were a saint like this Bonaventura who annoys you and your miracle-working Doctor so much, to pretend that I could tell what the Mother of God was thinking. But it's funny how far a person, if he feels anything of the sort at all, can go when he's got a hammer and chisel in his hands! But it's no good talking. You'll see what I mean when we — —"

At this point Tilton dislodged the door-bar and pushed the door open; and both boys, with a mutual gasp of pleasure at the bright sunshine and the smell of fir-trees, disappeared into the air. It may have been the shock of the open door — held ajar by Tilton till he finished his sentence — with its lively inrush of sun and air, or it may have been one of those apparently causeless stirrings of motivation that happen so inexplicably to us all, but the second her brothers were gone Lil-Umbra, with a quick glance at the crowd to make sure her mother was still engrossed with the Sygerian family, whispered to Peleg that, if there were any serious trouble over her disappearance, he'd better tell them that she could be found in the armoury, talking to old Heber Sygerius.

With this she left him, and forcing a path for herself through the thickest of the press, went off towards the open courtyard in the centre of the Fortress, where were the privy-retreats for both sexes, as well as storing-places for fuel and food and wine, and where there was even a miniature tournament-ground for knightly competition of every kind.

While Lil-Umbra, with a certain quickening of both heart and pulses, was making her way to the armoury, Nurse Rampant, always more anxious about her elder nurseling — that is to say Lady Val herself — than about that lady's daughter, had found it impossible to get absorbed in her needlework upstairs, and had hurriedly, though rather surreptitiously, made her way back to the scene of action. And this she had only done just in time: for Lady Val, having heard what she felt sure was the sound of her husband’s horn, had left Madge, and Madge’s daughter-in-law, Crumb, and had rushed to the postern-door.

The long-drawn, world-weary sigh of the solitary wind, as it passed over the roofs and entered the windows and doors of the Fortress of Roque, intensified the wild romantic prayer of Lil-Umbra that she might find by the armoury hearth, along with old Heber, no less a person than young Raymond de Laon himself. Because she had found him there once, she never entered the place without expecting to find him there again.

It was this same wind that brought what Lady Val felt sure was the sound of her husband’s horn. She had hardly realized that her eldest boy had only a second ago dragged his brother away to visit the little shrine he was building due west of the Fortress. Lady Val felt certain she had really heard the unmistakable series of defiant notes which her husband loved to play on the great hunting horn that he always carried in his belt whether he was hunting or not, whether he was armed for battle or not, whether he was on horseback or on foot.

The notes of Sir Mort’s horn were indeed unmistakable when heard; but had she, Lady Val asked herself, really heard them? She stood still listening. Not a sound came now from that sunlit forest. She made an impatient movement with her hands and shoulders and rushed boldly to the door. Once there she seized the massive brazen ring into which the iron rod, that made this entrance impregnable, fitted with what was to a particular vein in her nature an obliging and delectable exactitude, and jerked that iron bar to and fro sideways with a violence that required all the strength she possessed in her long slender arms, while she vaguely wondered what her two sons would feel if, instead of opening the door to listen to their father’s horn, she barred it against their re-entrance.

It had become now, and she herself knew that there was something unusual in her mood, an absolute necessity, or at any rate an angry and desperate one, to hear the sound of Sir Mort's horn; and although her neck was bare and although the wind that blew past her into that crowded entrance made her shiver, the craving she felt for that sound was stronger than her natural shrinking. Wider and wider she pushed the door open, and in an impulse of sheer frenzy she was on the point of rushing out, when a figure and a voice were upon her, and the powerful hands of the old nurse dragged her back into the hall and closed the door upon both the Sun and the wind.

"Did Lil-Umbra go to her room?" whispered Lady Val to the nurse as they moved back together towards the crowd. "Not to my knowledge," returned the other. "But I may have missed her on the way. It would be an easy thing to do."

Lady Val looked at that moment as if she would have liked to have struck the woman; but the wise old nurse, though she released the arm she was holding, showed no sign of having realized the amount of indignant passion which she had aroused. Indeed she knew the lady so well that every course and twist and tangent of the feelings that showed themselves at this dangerous moment were an old story to her.

An onlooker at the scene might even have caught a faint trace of affectionate amusement in the quick look she threw upon Lady Val's nervous fingers, which were now clasping and unclasping each other as if engaged in some convulsive dance.

"So be it, my dear," she said quietly. "I'll go and find our runaway, if you go back to your visitors."

Slowly, stride by stride, holding his long spear just below its shining point, which now gleamed in the Sun in the way certain objects seem to have a special power of gleaming, as if they are consciously holding and reflecting the rays they catch, Sir Mort returned from his stroll to the small pool which in former days had been a crowded fish-pond, but which now only contained a solitary pike and a solitary perch, who, having divided the place between them, and devoured everything, were now watching each other with eyes that were both hungry and apprehensive.

Sir Mort was a tall and slender, but a broad-shouldered man, of about sixty, whose most striking physical characteristic was the shape of his skull, which was very long and very narrow and was perched like the skull of a vulture on the top of a long neck. The length and narrowness of Sir Mort's head was emphasized by his deep hollow eye-sockets, out of which his eyes, dark-green in colour, glared forth with a very peculiar effect; for it was as if they had no connection with each other at all, but were, each of them, the solitary eye of a saurian creature whose eye was at the top of its scaly head.

He had obviously snatched at the warmest and smallest jerkin to hand as he went out and at the smallest and lightest iron headpiece, which was scarcely more indeed than a band of metal round his head, a band into which had been fastened a black-and-white feather.

As he approached his Manor-Fortress he soon recognized that both its material and psychic atmosphere were wholly different from what they had been when he set out an hour ago. There was now an intermittent hum of human voices, steps, cries, exclamations, agitations, conversations; and the cold east wind that was blowing across the forest, and rustling through the spruces and the still bare larches and pines, carried upon its breath and whirled up and down, and back and forth, and round and round, what might have been an invisible emanation from that startling and surprising conglomeration of human voices, human bodies, human gestures, human cries, along with sounds of all sorts rising from weapons of iron and brass and bronze and silver and gold.

“Is our land invaded from France?” was the first thought that rushed through that vulturine skull. But the next was a more rational one. “Fool that I am!” he muttered. “It’s that thrice-damnable son of a bitch they’ve made into a Saint who must be upon us with all his bloody followers! Poor darling care-driven Valentia! How agitated you must be! I pray John is still in the place and Tilton in not too architectural a mood! And I hope to the devil that our lusty old Jew Peleg has brought Lil-Umbra safe back! They can’t, surely, all this huge crowd, expect us to feed them?”

Instead of quickening his pace, as he made his way towards the postern door, the Lord of the Manor of Roque began to walk with unusual slowness, pressing the long handle of his spear heavily against the ground at each step.

“I’ve got to face the fact,” he told himself, “that whether I like it or don’t like it, and whether poor dear Valentia likes it or doesn’t like it, all this whole blasted crew will have to be fed this morning. I hope to God there’s enough in our kitchen to fill their damned bellies!”

The tall lean Master of Roque who, as the sole survivor, save for his own offspring, of the incorrigibly eccentric family of Abyssum, ceased now to take even the slowest steps towards his destination. In the downright language he would have used himself, he stopped dead. “My birthday come round again!” he thought, “and poor little Valentia, with all her values and valuations, will be fifty next August! Twenty years more, according to Holy Scripture, and we shall be an aged pair, and the place swarming with grandchildren! Well, well, well.”

He turned the glittering point of his spear earthward, and using both his powerful forearms, he forced it down so deeply into the earth that he soon was able to lean with the full weight of the pit of his stomach upon the large bronze knob that terminated the handle.

In this position, leaning on the handle of the spear that belonged to him and pressing its point into the ground that belonged to him, Sir Mort couldn’t resist indulging in a queer mental performance that he prayed to God he had been crafty enough to keep entirely to himself — namely an almost ritualistic trick of his, which from the days of his extremely weird childhood he had been led by the deepest thing in him to practise.

The deepest thing in Sir Mort was without doubt the intense egoism of his own soul, in other words his absolutely abnormal self-centredness. None of his offspring approached him in his awareness of his interior self or ego, or in his power of isolating it and of enjoying its isolation. Sir Mort imaged this soul of his in a curiously original and indeed a very erratic way. He saw it in the shape of a particular kind of spear, the kind whose spear-head grows wider and wider for several inches, then proceeds to narrow itself for the same number of inches before it reaches its sharp and piercing spear-point.

He saw it however as made, not of iron or bronze, but of flint. He saw it indeed as a spear with a flint arrow-head for its point, a point enlarged to about a dozen times the size of an ordinary arrow-head. This spiritual spear with a super arrow-head became to Sir Mort the ultimate hieroglyph of himself; and in all his private and secret thoughts, which were often extremely fantastic, he actually saw himself as this same flint-headed spear.

He had got into the habit of imagining his inmost self in the shape of this spear with its flint super arrow-head driving its way through the mossy surface of the earth, while he forced himself to think of it as possessed of every one of his five senses.

Unknown to another soul — for Lady Val was the last person in the world to draw out of him such a secret — Sir Mort, who would have been regarded by his wife and by his sons and by all his neighbours, especially by his pious friend, Prior Bog of Bumset, as simply insane, had they known of these practices, imagined himself seeing the roots and the earth-worms and the cracks in the stones and the variously coloured veins of the different geological strata upon which his soul impinged as it descended deeper and deeper into the hole it was making!

He also forced himself to touch, to smell, and to taste, all these animal, vegetable and mineral entities into whose dwelling he was descending; and finally, so that his spiritual pilgrimage should miss nothing, he imagined himself listening, as he headed downwards, to the intercourse, in some sort of earth-mould language, which these roots and cracks and crevices, these worms in their subterranean dwellings indulged in among themselves, so that he could compare their mental reactions to life with his own.

But this was only the first “move”, so to speak, in Sir Mort’s intercourse with the cosmic multiplicity. The next thing this crazy owner of Roque must needs do was to pull himself out of the hole into which he had descended with such persistence and proceed to shoot himself through the air! On this airborne quest he was careful to avoid every conceivable collision. He avoided the Moon and he avoided every planet. He avoided all the falling stars.

And then, when he had got clear of all impediments in his aerial flight, he set himself to enjoy the pure touch of nothingness, the ineffable taste of nothingness, the indescribable smell of nothingness, the god-like sight of the immeasurable recesses of nothingness, and finally, pervading his pilgrim-soul with the most exquisite pleasure of all, the unutterable symphonies of the music of nothingness.

And then he would force his spear-head soul to make a great dive out of the depths of the air into the depths of the sea, and it can well be believed how the touch, smell, taste, sight and sound of the swirling, the water-spouting, the whirlpooling, the towering and lowering, the roaring and soaring, the rumbling and grumbling, of the everlasting ocean, with both its eternal motion and its eternal identity, would satisfy to the full the insane void of his unending quest: and, finally and at last, into the hot fire of the Sun and the cold fire of the Moon; and from these into the incredible fires of all the living stars, until, out of earth, out of water, out of air, and out of fire, he wrested what his spear-head of a soul required for its imperishable nourishment. For the only thing in the world that Sir Mort feared was death — the thought of being non-est, of being as if he had never been.

He always felt, if only a shred of him remained — only a nail-paring, only a scab, only a tiny bone, only a handful of ashes — as long as this speck of the matter which had once belonged to his body remained, so that his unconquerable soul could hover over it, he would be still Sir Mort, he would not be dead yet.

He now raised himself up and pulled his spear out of the earth and stared in front of him into a great alder-bush from the heart of which, it suddenly had struck him, somebody was watching him. And then, in one quick beat of his pulse, he knew who it was. It was none other than his neighbour, Sir Maldung of Lost Towers. Not only was Sir Maldung watching him, but he held a drawn bow in his hand whose arrow was aimed straight at Sir Mort’s heart.

Sir Mort had never been calmer, stronger, quieter, more entirely collected, more absolutely poised in his mind than he was at that instant. He didn’t feel in the faintest degree afraid. It was a peculiarity of his that, as long as he had his wits about him, and saw clearly what his enemy was aiming at, not a flicker of apprehension crossed his mind.

"I shall know by his expression," he said to himself, "when he lets that arrow fly and I shall be perfectly able to dodge it before it touches me! I am myself a drawn bow and a pointed arrow! And when you are yourself both arrow and bow, it is fine sport to watch your enemy's face!"

And certainly Sir Maldung's face was something to watch at that moment. It was positively convulsed with the ultimate ecstasy of killing. His mouth was open and twisted awry; his eyes stared so intently that they seemed as if at any second they might flow or drip or sweat or soak into the alder-bush. His whole face was crumpled and wrung and knotted and sucked inwards.

And then in a second it relaxed like the bursting of a boil, and became, as far as any human expression was concerned, blurred and blotted out. Sir Mort dived to the ground; and the arrow skimmed over his back and quivered into the trunk of a fir-tree.

Sir Mort straightened his body and uttered a queer little laugh. But it did not occur to him to pursue the figure that was now in full flight. "Silly old devil!" he muttered; and strolled, as slowly as he had been doing before, towards the postern entrance of the Fortress of Roque.

IV. LIL-UMBRA

"I'll go," thought Lil-Umbra, "as if Mother had sent me with an important message. I will not speak to a soul: and when anyone speaks to me I'll pretend not to hear, or to be so occupied in delivering my message that though they see I can't help hearing I need not take any notice of what people say. It was, after all, not only once but twice that I found Raymond de Laon there! Of course the first time he was there he couldn't have had the faintest idea that I should be likely to come in. But that second time he didn't seem surprised to see me. He seemed glad: very glad in fact, but he didn't seem at all surprised.

"O! I do wonder what he feels about me! It's so teasing never to know! That's the worst of it with a grown-up boy. If it were John now, it would all be so easy! But of course he would have let it out to everybody and I'd have had all I could do to make him keep his mouth shut! I suppose I'll never know with Raymond till he suddenly bursts out with it. He looks at me all the time: and that day we were alone at Cone Castle, when Baron Boncor had taken Will with him to London and I was turning the pages with him of one after another of those old books he is always finding in some secret recess in one of those lovely turrets of Cone Castle, I noticed how for some reason or other the hand I wasn't using, to turn a page or to point at a picture, was held in his hand.

"But, O dear! I am afraid I'm just being silly! Plenty of girls much handsomer, cleverer, and more important than me, must have been attracted to him and tried to win his favour. And there's that time he had — and he told me himself how much he enjoyed it! — when he was studying philosophy in Paris. He must have been a guest at all sorts of grand houses, and met lots of wonderful women! O why aren't girls like me allowed to attend the lectures of these great Doctors? It is all so unfair! People don't realize how lucky young men are in these clever modern days to be allowed to hear really important thinkers explaining the nature of — —"

It was at this point that Lil-Umbra had to extricate herself from an extremely formidable group of crusaders from the south of Anjou who looked at her in the way — so she told herself — that such comrades-in-arms must have looked at every unravished maid they encountered in their holy campaign. "O why can't we find out the real true nature," so Lil-Umbra's thoughts ran on, and they were rendered more rebellious still by contact with these consecrated warriors, "of such mysteries as God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, and, let's hope, put an end once for all to all the stuff the priests" — and here her thoughts were again intensified in their revolt by yet another body of guests, for she was now squeezing herself between a sculptured procession of angels in Purbeck marble and a group of excited persons who, although freemen of the Manor of Roque, were nevertheless, as far as their habits of thought went, on no higher level than the humblest serfs— "all the stuff the priests keep putting into our heads."

It was soon after she had safely squeezed her way along this succession of marble angels, which must have been a strip of masonry left intact during the Fortress's renovation a century earlier, that Lil-Umbra came upon a narrow window, especially adapted for defence by arrow-shooting, out of which, though she had to stand on tip-toe to do so, she couldn't resist taking a peep into the surrounding forest. The Fortress was such an erratic and rambling erection, and it had been added to during so many experiments in castellated building throughout the years, that to Lil-Umbra's surprise she found herself peering into a portion of the forest almost directly opposite the small unfinished shrine to Our Lady of the Holy Ass, now being so devotedly built by the two hands of Tilton alone, though Lil-Umbra had not failed to guess that it had been under the influence of some impious brain, possibly young John's, that Tilton had given his work that grotesque name: but at this moment it wasn't of an ass or of a horse that she was thinking, as she pressed her chin upon her eight white knuckles in order to peer out of the arrow-slit in the ancient wall.

She was indeed experiencing a moment of heart-wrung disturbance such as any ordinary onlooker would have felt to be beyond all proportion to its cause, when she saw the figure of a young girl, of about her own height and slenderness, but dressed with a most subtle and most deliberate aim, in that unusually warm February sunshine, of making herself exquisitely provocative to masculine senses, lying sideways on a mantle which she had spread out on a mossy bank bordering on the well-trodden path that led — and didn't Lil-Umbra know that path by heart! — from the postern-gate to the unfinished shrine of Our Lady of the Holy Ass.

It may easily be imagined that it was not only about the quick return to breakfast of her two brothers along that familiar forest-track that Lil-Umbra was now troubled. What if Raymond de Laon had taken into his head — O he too too easily might! — to pay a visit to the shrine Tilton was raising to Our Lady?

It was sufficiently unusual for the eldest son of the lord of a Manor as large as Roque, which everybody knew was more thickly populated than any other in the West Country, to design and plan such a shrine with his own brain and to build it and to carve it with his own hands, to have already started queer rumours in that part of England, without the half-naked daughter of the adjoining castle waylaying him between his new shrine and his parents' dwelling!

For as the agitated, and indeed the now thoroughly upset, Lil-Umbra hurried on towards the armoury, she could not keep her mind from pondering on every aspect of the fact that she had herself seen Lilith, the only child of the wicked Baron Maldung and his half-mad lady of Lost Towers, stretched on the bank by the path as if tomorrow were the first of August rather than the first of February!

O it was impossible for the infatuated Lil-Umbra not to play with the tormenting idea that there already might exist God only knew what depraved understanding between Raymond de Laon and this terribly licentious girl. "I must certainly ask him outright," she decided, "the very next time we're alone whether he is on speaking terms with this shameless girl! But till I have a chance of asking him that, I certainly mustn't let him hold my hand again. O! I just can't bear to think about it — Lilith Maldung waiting for him half-undressed outside our very gate!"

But like most of us when we are still under twenty, Lil-Umbra hadn't acquired the difficult art of putting painful possibilities out of her mind and the vision of Lilith by the wayside continued to obsess her thoughts with one horrible imagination after another. She felt ready to welcome any excuse that offered itself for not going straight into the armoury to talk to the ex-bailiff. She decided that it might be a timely occasion in the interest of her own physical comfort to visit the women's corner of the retiring-yard, and this with slow and leisurely steps she proceeded to do, rinding the spot less frequented than might have been expected under existing circumstances.

When, however, returning from this retreat with that vision of Lilith still biting like a rat at her tenderest nerve — for she still felt a curious desire to put off any possible encounter with Raymond de Laon till this image from Lost Towers had faded a little — she took the more roundabout of the alternative ways to the armoury, she found herself again following a passage along the outside wall of the Fortress, a passage which was once more in full view of her brother Tilton's cheerful shrine.

And so once more, urged by the insatiable demon of curiosity, she found herself standing on tiptoe at a similar arrow-slit-window and staring out as desperately as before into the dazzling afternoon sunshine. What she now saw caused her to gasp with the same kind of choking in her gullet that a female blackbird might suffer who suddenly perceives in her lonely nest a solitary cuckoo's egg.

Another girl was now rapidly approaching that provocative figure lying stretched out on the grassy bank by the edge of the path, and Lil-Umbra was as startled by the strangeness of the new girl's look and her queer attire as by her astonishing beauty.

"She must be a Spanish maiden," Lil-Umbra told herself, "or a Jewish girl straight from Palestine! Who on earth brought her here and what does she want with us?"

This time it happened that Lil-Umbra's arrow-slit was so close to the alluring figure down there beneath her on the grass that she felt a faint uneasiness lest one or other of the two girls should look up and see her. "They wouldn't see much," she told herself, "in this blazing Sun and against all this grey stone; but they might see enough of my forehead and hair to realize that they're being watched!"

Lil-Umbra lowered her insteps by a fraction of an inch, thus bringing down her ivory-white forehead to a position only just above the support of that row of equally white knuckles; and it was from this position that she saw the new-comer pause by the side of the half-naked girl on the grass, evidently wishing to ask her a question.

"What question is she going to ask?" Lil-Umbra said to herself. "She may be in attendance upon one of these noblewomen from France, or she may have come from the Priory."

And then she suddenly became aware that by some chance-sent miracle the wind, which in that glowing sunshine had been blowing from the east, suddenly shifted to the north, with the result that she could hear with perfect clearness every word the two were speaking.

"I was only asking you," she heard the stranger say, "where would be the best entrance into this Fortress-Castle for a serving-girl like me? I have only just come to this part of the world and I am working at present in the Priory kitchen, but they told me that the best thing to do if I wanted to meet anyone of my own race round here was to get an entrance 'by hook or by crook', as we used to say in the crusaders' camp, into the Fortress of Roque."

"The best thing for you to do, my good girl," replied Lilith of Lost Towers, without moving to change her position or to wrap her garments more closely round her, "is to go right back to the Priory the way you came! Everybody round here knows perfectly well that Prior Bog is no man to cater for the tribal pretensions of a ship-wrecked, tossed-up slave-girl such as you! Get back to the Priory the way you came, my woman. That's the road for you to take!"

Then it was that our young watcher through the arrow-slit saw an unexpected sight. For the new-comer deliberately moved forward and stood quite calmly by the side of the girl lying on that grassy bank. Luckily for our observer, the stranger stood now looking directly westward towards Tilton's shrine, and with her back not only to the Priory from which she had come, but also to the old Druidic stone-circle from which our friend that very morning had watched the Sun rise. And so it was possible for Lil-Umbra to see her profile clearly outlined against the trunk of a naked larch.

And there was such power as well as beauty in the profile she saw that she felt no surprise when the girl on the ground hurriedly got up and began re-assuming in haste every garment she had removed, and finally, apparently entirely under the psychic compulsion and the silent authority of the wanderer, began wrapping about her the ancestral cloak she had spread so carefully on the grass.

And now this mysterious foreign woman was answering the Lost Towers girl in language quite as formidable as her own but much more dignified and compelling.

“I am unknown to you,” Lil-Umbra heard her say, “while you are not unknown to me; but we are both face to face with all those frightful difficulties, and appalling choices among so many completely different courses of action such as afflict all women. Listen to me, then, Lilith of Lost Towers; and I will tell you what you had better do if you want to avoid a dreadful quarrel with your mother and father, a quarrel that might bring down your whole house in ruins.”

“What are you talking about, your poor slave from Byzantium? You say we’re both women. Don’t you see that the only important thing in our life as women is how to satisfy our love in the one direction and our hate in the other?”

The stranger made two or three short steps backward as Lilith said this and then made the same number forward again; and this rhythm she repeated as she went on speaking, while the tiptoe watcher, with her white chin pressed against her white knuckles, actually found her toes tapping the stone slab beneath her feet as if she were watching, or by some mysterious compulsion actually joining, some weird ritualistic performance.

And Lil-Umbra was unable to resist the curious feeling that the woman, who thus kept advancing and retiring in a sort of thaumaturgic sorcerer's dance, was actually drawing into her body as she did so the rays of this burning Sun and turning them into a protection against their chemical opposite, that is to say against some cold, dark, wet, hostile element from which emanated the very chill of death.

And all the while she was walking thus rhythmically backwards and forwards, she was chanting to Lilith of the Lost Towers what sounded as if it were the undying echo of some prehistoric war-challenge, the challenge of one long-extinct race to another extinct race, a challenge that had survived as an indestructible cry out of the heart of the earth itself, and issued forth from the earth in the form of dust and dew and spray and mist and vapour.

"The white skin and sweet flesh of a young girl like you," she chanted, "if they be offered up as a living sacrifice to the powers of destruction, will recoil not only on those who offer them up, but on her to whom they belong!"

Lil-Umbra was more astonished than she would have considered it possible for her ever to have been in the house of her birth by what happened then. For Lilith of the Lost Towers seemed suddenly seized by a great panic. She clutched nervously and frantically at a few objects of attire that she had as yet, while putting on her clothes, neglected to re-assume, and holding these against her navel, she swung round, and with head down and her eyes on nothing but the path she was following, she bolted into the forest with the blind rush of a small animal desperate to escape.

V. HEBER SYGERIUS

WITH NOTHING OF Lilith's desperation but with hardly less haste, Lil-Umbra now left her observation-post at that memorable arrow-slit and hurried by the nearest passage to the armoury. She was so agitated by what she had just heard and seen that the chance she might encounter Raymond de Laon had grown a bit blurred, more like the heavenly end to a complicated fairy-tale than something that might occur in a few minutes.

The armoury of the Fortress of Roque was, as anyone would have anticipated, considering the reputation for reckless violence of the ancestors of Lady Val, and considering the peculiar character of its new master, Sir Mort, as capacious and crowded a chamber as any in the place. At the very time when Lady Val, still making her heroic effort to recover from her fit of weakness and to be worthy of her grandmother when that lady entertained the rather difficult bride of Llewelyn the Great, was listening with especially gracious interest to the chatter of the new bailiff's wife and her lively daughter-in-law "the Crumb", her own errant daughter with very different emotions but with something of Lady Val's spirit was approaching the huge and glowing hearth of what might have been called the altar-fire of that vast collection of weapons, in a mood of chastened wistfulness.

It had been several weeks ago when she found Raymond de Laon here quite alone, and not only alone, but with the door ajar and praying that she might pass by! On this occasion she shut the door very carefully behind her as she went in; and once inside the room, the look with which she surveyed its present occupant was a very tender and subtle one. The personage towards whom this look of hers was directed was a very old man, and an old man who was, as it appeared, luxuriating, in a quaint and peculiar manner, in his own old age.

He was like a certain broken and dilapidated stone pillar, Lil-Umbra thought, that had arrested her attention this very morning as she sat talking to Peleg on that massive stone seat which so closely resembled a giant's throne; but not only did that hunched-up pillar come into her head when she saw this old man, but his pose by the fire as she approached him made her think of a desiccated willow-stump, of which she had caught a glimpse while among the stones in the stone-circle where they had watched the sunrise.

Heber Sygerius was a short bony man with very broad shoulders. He had no hair at all on his face, which he shaved much more carefully than most elderly men, and he was almost entirely bald. His skull was large and on both sides of it were two very curious discolourations of a tint almost as impossible to describe as it would have been to describe the colour of the grey and brown mist which that very afternoon, when their late breakfast-lunch was over, would swallow up the Sun.

Full of golden light that Sun had been when Lil-Umbra had watched its first rising. Full of its light had the forest-path been she had just watched; but after this long meal their kitchen had to provide its glory would be gone. But this old man was assuredly enjoying himself before that blazing fire, into which at intervals he kept flinging a small piece of wood from a heap at his side.

What surrounded this old figure with a special aura of attraction for Lil-Umbra was that it had been to meet this man, who had only recently handed over his reeveship of the Manor of Roque to his middle-aged son, that Raymond de Laon — at least that was what he had said — had been here the last time she had come.

As we have already noted, the two latrines of Roque Fortress had finally come to be placed side by side adjacent to the interior courtyard. It is simply use-and-wont and the gradual adjustments of custom that create what historians of human decency might well be justified in calling the "epochal fashion" in excremental convenience. There were several antiquated hieroglyphs, that might well have reverted to the days of Constantine, scrawled over a low arch leading from that inner court to the left of this armoury; and another set of syllables of the same debased and deteriorated Latinity carved on a block of stone over that similar small arch under which Lil-Umbra had recently passed.

On this latter, among other syllables, was engraved the abbreviation "Fem"; and on the former the syllable "Mas". It was indeed of his own meditated retreat to the masculine one of these two retiring places that the old Heber Sygerius had been thinking before Lil-Umbra appeared, for although he was aware that neither his bladder nor his bowels needed immediate easement, he had already arrived at that stage in the progress of old age when men, and in some cases women too, grow over-conscious, though sometimes with only too good reason, of their urinal and excremental evacuations. But fortunately he was at this moment in no hurry to obey the particular bodily call of which he felt a vague premonition, so that when he became aware of the light step of the girlish intruder, he was quite ready to turn upon her his peculiarly magnetic smile full of a more than natural kindliness.

It was this curious magnetism in the old ex-bailiff that had warded off many an insurrection of the over-wrought serfs of the Manor of Roque, and had even been effective, a smile in this case being equal to the authority of the most aristocratic of stewards, in persuading various rich free-men not to take away their thrice-precious coins of the realm from the confines of this populous Manor to squander them on a last desperate crusade that would probably only land them in some French or Italian or German prison.

What was going on in the excited consciousness of Lil-Umbra as she entered the armoury and confronted the extraordinarily shaped hairless skull of this kindly-crafty grandfather-curator of the Manor of Roque? Whatever it was, it was obviously only partially revealed in the quick, gasping sigh she gave as she yielded to his welcoming gesture and sat herself down on a four-legged stool to the left of those burning logs.

When once the two of them were seated quietly together, the exchange of feelings between this girl in her teens and this old man of eighty resolved itself quickly enough into pure gratitude, each to each, for the unembarrassed silence which that good moment permitted to both of them.

The thoughts that in a little while began to filter through the old man’s hairless skull were curiously characteristic of the dominant temper of his mind throughout his whole life. Raymond de Laon used to say of Heber Sygerius that he had always served the Manor of Roque rather than the Manor’s Lord or Lady at any special epoch. He certainly had always been, from every point of view, the ideal administrator of an exquisitely adjustable miniature kingdom, nourished from its roots up by the fruits of the earth and the beasts of the field, and dominated by a traditional routine never broken save to humour the caprices of the elements.

But old Heber’s way of managing the manor was over now for good and ill. His wife was long dead, and his son and his son’s wife were administrators of a totally different type. In all the spontaneous and instinctive motions of his mind Heber was still, as he had been all his days, at once profoundly kind and profoundly cunning.

There was not a serf on the manor who didn’t feel towards him, in all the minutest details of their communal life, as if he really were a wise and understanding, though somewhat inscrutable and secretive, elderly relative. Like many another indulgent grand-dad, he was cruelly missed by all who suffered under less considerate successors.

What none of his own family had ever realized in the least, and what even Raymond de Laon and young Sir William Boncor among the aristocracy of that district had never properly understood, was the disturbing effect upon Heber's peculiar nature of what he had picked up and imbibed of the teachings of Friar Bacon. The Friar's ideas had not reached him directly from the philosopher's own mouth; but indirectly and, as may well be imagined, in a distorted form from various persons, male and female, employed in all sorts of capacities, within and without both Bumset Priory and Fenawl Convent, whose pastures, enclosures, fallows, and forest-tracks, together with their well-appointed tithe-barns and their movable sheep-folds, offered extensive if not specifically trained employment.

The sequestration of Friar Bacon under conditions of semi-condemnation and semi-imprisonment so close to Roque Manor had naturally a disturbing, exciting, and agitating effect upon others beside Heber; but of all who were affected by the Friar's presence in that neighbourhood the old ex-bailiff was undoubtedly the one who gave himself up to pondering on the subject with the most serious and the most simple concentration.

Such was the power of the imprisoned Friar's mind that the first difficulty the old man had encountered, and he had pondered on this for a pathetically long while, was whether these exciting new ideas belonged to the realm of religion, or of science, or of philosophy. By his using his shrewd native commonsense he decided in favour of philosophy. He felt that it was certainly easier to include both religion and science under philosophy than it would be to squeeze philosophy into the murderous arsenals of the fanatics of religion on one hand or of science on the other.

As the grandfather of this little manorial realm, to which both the Priory and the Convent might well have looked with daughter-like piety, for they were, in a real historic sense, its offspring, Heber Sygerius never let himself forget what his son and successor was only too apt to do — that the thrice-precious manorial threshing-floor and grind-stone, upon which the lives of the whole little community depended, were actually within the purlieus of the Priory; and that therefore when the serfs, who came to thresh and to grind the corn, which, when, once ground, was the bread of their life and the whole basis of their mortal existence, talked as they were bound to do with the servants of the Priory and the Convent, there was no escape from the contagion of the Friar's dangerous ideas.

For revolutionary indeed these ideas were! In fact some of them led directly to the sort of peasant-revolts against the owners of manors which were beginning to be frequent on the continent of Europe. Some of them led to the serfs of Roque Manor for instance asking themselves point-blank whether, if the Lord of the Manor could make them pay for threshing on his threshing-floor and grinding with his grind-stone, he might suddenly exact payment — in fact wasn't this what he was doing? — for the privilege of living on the earth at all? Then there were all those innumerable magic sayings of the Friar in his role of race-sorcerer or tribal soothsayer; most especially those sayings connected with the most notorious of all his achievements, his construction of a Brazen Head that uttered oracles on behalf of Britain against the world.

The armoury of Roque Manor was indeed what might literally have been called, as Lil-Umbra had always called it, a magic room, for this was by no means the first time that a most strangely procreative and pregnant set of thoughts had been engendered here. But none had ever been born in this place stranger or more vibrant with eventful consequence than the thought-child now created by this casual and accidental contact between a precocious young girl and an unbelievably shrewd-witted old man.

There was something about this occasion, when Lil-Umbra's mind was dallying with the hope that at any second Raymond de Laon might appear, and when old Heber's mind was full of a difficult adjustment between the four points of the compass and the geography of the Manor, that gave to the warmth of that particular fire the power of so affecting the sympathetic silence in which they both were enveloped that there actually did come into existence by a sort of spontaneous generation a thought-child of the most significant kind, an offspring for which they were alone responsible.

Indeed they both felt in a weird and rather frightening manner that between the two of them, on this special day of this special month of the year of grace twelve hundred and seventy-two, an extremely formidable thought-child had been born, a thought-child, or rather a fate-child, for whose growth in power and for whose increase in stature a moment was as a day and a day was as a year; so that before a few months were over something would happen that would make their coming together on this particular morning a fearful and memorable milestone, not merely in the history of Roque Manor but in the history of the planet Earth.

As with so many other fatal events that have become inaugural turning-points in the story of our race, the chief actors in this divine or devilish drama only felt in the dimmest, faintest, indirectest, obliquest, shadowiest manner the generative importance of their encounter. In so far as they did apprehend it they attributed it — and indeed where else could they have looked for a cause? — to the effect of the warmth of a burning fire upon an absolute silence. The old man would no doubt have defended himself from any charge of spiritual rape by emphasizing the extreme fragility, not to mention the quivering evasiveness, of a girl-child's maidenhood; while Lil-Umbra would unquestionably have sworn that her whole being was entirely dominated by one sense alone, namely by the sense of hearing. Indeed she might well have argued that all the while the spirit of Fire in this magic armoury of Roque was satisfying its desire upon the spirit of Silence, she herself was completely absorbed in listening for any sound outside the door that could possibly mean the approach of the youth who filled her thoughts.

As for old Heber Sygerius, with this sylph-like figure crouching at his side, he really had begun to permit to his natural impulses certain liberties of imagination, such as would never have been allowed to lift their heads above the ground in the mind of her Mongol friend with his Hebraic conscience. "How strange it is," the old man was pondering now to himself, "that the traditional separation between my lord's daughter and my lord's bailiff should totally stop, not only the faintest attempt on my part to meddle with this exquisite little creature, but also should prevent my explaining to her any of my private ideas about life in general, ideas that I worked out in my own head years and years before Friar Bacon was forced to leave Oxford and come among us as a half-condemned and half-imprisoned heretic.

"O! how I'd love to tell this sweet child everything I've worked out for myself about the wisest, cunningest, craftiest ways of enjoying life and holding our own against our enemies! And yet I'm not allowed by our absurd conventions to utter a single word to her as a man of the same race and the same village, face to face, an old man to a young woman, a wise grand-dad to a hasty child! O how I'd like to describe to you, you darling little creature, exactly what can be picked up of subtle wisdom from these half-burnt logs that are warming us both at this second!"

Lil-Umbra’s eyes were now fixed upon the door of the room, through which there undoubtedly did come at this moment a stir and a murmur as of a noisy and rather excited crowd. Glancing from her profile to the fire the old man couldn’t help noticing a perfect little blue flame that was leaping up and down on the segment of a log that still carried minute patches of greyish lichen upon its crumbling bark.

Then he looked back again at her exquisite profile. How could he, he asked himself, describe to her the very curious elation which he had felt a second ago through all his senses, an elation that gave him now a delicious aftermath of satisfaction, like a wave drawing back over a bank of pebbles? O how he longed to describe to this lovely young girl just what he had felt, and to ask her if she herself a minute ago, when that blue flame was flickering up and down between those logs, had felt anything in the least resembling it! Why was she staring so at the door at this moment? Expecting to be called by her nurse?

And then it struck the old man that, quite apart from the difficulties of sex, it was a shame that he couldn’t talk to this intelligent and sympathetic young woman about the life-philosophy he had worked out for himself. Since he had handed over the reeveship to his sturdy son, he had had a grand opportunity to work out the whole logical basis of a real life-philosophy that was entirely original and entirely his own.

And what he felt now was that he could make this girl understand things that neither of her brothers, nor Raymond de Laon nor young Sir William Boncor, would be able to apprehend, discoursed he to them never so wisely!

O! why couldn't he now boldly tell this clever little lady that there was such a thing as a subtle trick of so manipulating our nerves and our senses by our mind and our will that we could render ourselves completely independent of the fate that had made us a man, or a woman, or young, or old, or well-born or self-born, or strong, or weak, or naturally courageous, or naturally full of fear?

Why couldn't he tell her about this discovery of his and about its connection with a power he had recently begun to develop in himself, old as he was, the power of getting into touch with something that was almost like consciousness in things that are considered completely inanimate.

It was at this moment that he gave a violent start and looked at Lil-Umbra in such a way that it came near to seriously scaring her.

"Didn't you feel something then, little lady," he cried, "something you never felt before in your whole life, no! not till a minute or two ago? I felt it; and though I've lived more than ten times as long as you, I've never felt anything like it! It was as if our thoughts, your beautiful young thoughts and my ugly old thoughts, had, for a second, yes! for half the beat of the pulse of a second, become one. No doubt it had to do with our sitting in silence by these dancing flames — and then we saw something, something that was standing between us, standing between you on your stool and me in this chair, something that was like that statue of Our Lady in Prior Bog's private refectory — the one that's so dark — dark as a gipsy, dark as a Jewess!"

Not a syllable of all this had been missed by Lil-Umbra, and it had its effect. The thoughts in that preposterously bare skull and in that delicate girlish head had in some mysterious unique manner become one, and "Something," as old Heber had put it, had entered the room, had stayed in the room, and had stood or sat or crouched or planted itself between them.

And the thing that had done this was, as the young girl knew quite as fully and distinctly as the old man, nothing less than an image, or what the ancient Greeks called an “Eidolon”, of that dark and terribly beautiful woman, whom she had recently seen encountering Lilith of Lost Towers!

What the old man hadn’t sufficiently remembered during this whole interview was that they were waiting for the appearance of Lil-Umbra’s father, under whose authority they would both go to take their places at the first meal of the day. He himself had already swallowed a substantial bowl of barley-meal washed down by a good draught of ale, whereas Lil-Umbra, though she had got up so early and been with Peleg to the Stone Circle, had not tasted a thing. Her nervous agitation at this moment was certainly accentuated by this fasting.

It may even have had something to do with the nervous leap to her feet and the irrepressible cry, almost a little scream, with which she now greeted the opening of the door and the sudden appearance of the very person she was hoping for, namely young Raymond de Laon, accompanied by none other than her recent companion, the Tartar-Jew Peleg.

Polite and friendly, if extremely airy and casual, were the greetings with which young Raymond de Laon saluted the ex-bailiff as he carried off the girl, who herself was so excited that she even forgot to turn her head to nod to the old man till her curls were hidden by young De Laon’s broad shoulders. Peleg however closed the door quietly behind them and came straight up to Heber’s side.

“Has Sir Mort come back?” the old man enquired. Peleg nodded.

“And is this confounded Bonaventura, this ‘General’, if that’s what they call him, of the Friars come too?”

“He’s here now anyway,” answered Peleg, “but you never know with these clerical almighties! He’ll probably stroll round the kitchen first to see what sort of feast there's going to be! Some say he's one for fasting. But I doubt if he can practise that little game when he's travelling! He won't want to get so light that his horse will shake him off like a dead leaf."

Heber smiled his most endearing smile at the tall Mongol.

"Lend me a hand, my boy, will you, to help me up? And, maybe, you'll give me your arm to the dung-house next door, and then help me down to the hall?"

The Jewish Mongol obeyed and gravely helped him to his feet, and while he did so the eyes of both of them were drawn to the fire by a curious dance which a couple of lively blue flames took upon themselves to perform, for the special benefit, it might almost seem, of these two men.

We say "it might almost seem", but as a matter of fact it was a completely different set of impressions that the middle-aged man and the old man derived from that dance. If there really were any sub-human and sub-conscious psychic impulse behind the motion of those two blue flames as they raced up and down that thin strip of pine-wood between a large spruce-log and a small larch-log, both logs having their own particular reaction of this performance, and if this psychic impulse had been interpreted by some new technical machine invented by Friar Bacon, it would at any rate have been made clear that such an impulse was a sub-sexual as well as a sub-human one.

"If Sir Mort," thought Peleg, "supposes that my gratitude is such a slavish thing that I'm going to take passively whatever happens, he really will have to give more attention to my character as a person. I'm ready to serve him in every possible way, but I'm a born fighter and to be nothing but a guiding-dog to a drooling old fellow like this, and nothing but a schoolmaster-nurse to a little Lady First-Love like that pretty child, is not enough. Besides — O hell's damnation take it all!"

This last outcry was due to the fact that the giant suddenly realized for the first time that he'd forgotten to leave his iron mace in its usual hiding-place and had carried it along with him. Its awkward presence in his hand at this moment set him upon imagining a terrific attack upon the fortress by a band of formidable enemies, among whom he now felt himself wildly rushing, in full fighting ecstasy for the House of Abyssum, swinging his club with its iron spikes and converting a crowd of living men into a ghastly heaving mass of bones and hair and flesh and swirling blood.

Whether an invisible spirit, reading the thoughts of Peleg at this moment, would have been shocked at the pictorial images the mind of the giant conjured up, would doubtless depend on the nature of the spirit; but these enemies twisting and jerking, scriggling and wriggling, as Peleg certainly saw them groaning and moaning, weltering and sweltering, howling and mowling, in a blood-red palpitating swirl of bodies and bones and hair and teeth and eyes and entrails, over which, with his free thumb testing the spikes of his weapon, he could stride in triumph while what had been living and beautiful bodies fouled his legs with filth, would certainly have disturbed some spirits.

What old Heber saw as that dance of blue flame kept repeating itself in his mind as the Mongol led him away, was nothing less than Friar Bacon's manufactured Brazen Head, enormous in size, hideous beyond all human imagination, and uttering words in a completely unknown tongue, but a tongue that was felt by all who heard it to be a multitudinous voice out of the Infinite.

By the time however that Peleg had got the old man out of the dung-house and back into the passage leading towards the dining-hall, the weird vision or revelation, which proximity to the excited heart of little Lil-Umbra had conjured into the ex-bailiff's hairless skull, had given place to something completely different. But the thing to which it had given place was still quite sufficiently interesting to the old man to compel him to stand still himself and to make the unfortunate Peleg who guided him not only stand still also, but stare along with him at the dusky smoke-begrimed wall of the passage down which they were shuffling.

"Look, look, my good friend, look, I beseech you! Do you see these hieroglyphs on the wall? Shall I tell you what they mean? I know you pass these by, as most people do on their way to the dung-yard, like queer meaningless senseless marks, figures of some sort, mathematical figures, not human ones of course. But what they really are is an oracular announcement, yes! an announcement to the whole world that the idea of there being only three Gods, as the niggardly theologians teach, is a grievous error. There are Four Gods! That is what the great ancient thinker, Pythagoras, taught to his Greek colony in Italy; and that is what I, Heber Sygerius, am now teaching you, Peleg, the Jewish Mongol! Yes! there are Four Gods. But the strange thing that I now understand as I stare at those marks — No! Please, Peleg! Please wait here a minute longer! — is that we have to go to some especial and quite different spot to worship each of these Four Gods!"

Peleg gave vent to a hopeless sigh. "Has the old dotard," he thought, "forgotten that our breakfast is waiting for us?"

Peleg looked desperately up and down the passage that led to the sleeping-rooms of Sir Mort and his lady and the sleeping-rooms of their two sons. He looked at the floor. He looked at the withered knuckles of the old man clutching his arm with the intensity of an aged hawk.

"What in Hell's name can I do?" he asked himself. "Sir Mort will curse me like the devil. He is sure to see us coming in at the bottom of the table. Besides, this old fool's son Randolph will be keeping a place for him, you bet your life, near to the top! Not that he won’t be as pleased as Pilate for me to get cursed for not dragging the old fool along more quickly! But, O Jehovah, hear me just this one single time in my life! Let me meet the whole blasted Sygerius family except this poor old doddipole for whom I’ve got some sort of crazy fondness, and I’ll scatter their brains with my iron club on that pretty patch of green grass they’re all so proud of, outside their damned front door!”

His vows of vengeance were interrupted by yet more astonishing behaviour on the part of the old man. He was now turning round in violent jerks and stamping on the ground at each spot, as he faced what he considered the four quarters of the compass.

“North!” he muttered in a hoarse and even frightened voice. “That’s the forest of course and Lost Towers. All the worst devils in the whole world come from the north!”

He jerked himself to the right. “East!” he cried in an exultant tone. “That’s where the miraculous Doctor Bacon is constructing the Brazen Head! That’s where the Fourth God will speak one day!” Again he jerked himself round. “South!” he cried. “And that’s Boncor Castle and all those noble and righteous people!”

And then with a final hop and skip and a fierce clutch from Peleg to keep him from falling: “South!” he shouted, “where our Tilton is erecting with spade and hammer and chisel and nails a shrine of his own to Our Blessed Lady!”

“That must be the end,” groaned Peleg to himself.

But the old man went on, still keeping them both rooted to that place in front of the wretched blotches on that dark and filthy wall. “Do you know how I discovered that there are Four Gods, Peleg, my friend? I discovered it by the help of another discovery: in fact by finding out that there is a faint dim vague obscure consciousness in everything made by the hands of men! I have found that out for myself, Peleg, my boy! And do you know what else I've found out, my good friend?"

"If this goes on much longer," thought the desperate Mongol, "I'll pick you up, Master Heber, carry you into the dining-hall and lay you down at Sir Mort's feet!"

"I've found out," went on the old man, "that on any piece of earth where old rituals have been going on for six or seven or eight centuries, the actual essence of the substance of the earth begins to stir in its sleep, craving it doesn't know what! Friar Bacon teaches this — did you know that? And he calls this craving by a very curious metaphysical name. He calls it Privation — yes, the 'Privation of Matter'."

Peleg groaned. "O he calls it 'Privation', does he?" he murmured hoarsely; and then getting desperate he made a reckless plunge. "I am sorry to hurry you, Master Heber," he began, speaking heavily and with as much effort as if he were forcing the handles of a wooden plough through frozen mind, "but we must hasten to the hall! Tonight after supper it will be most gracious of you if you'll explain to us about the thoughts of sticks and stones and the 'Privation' they suffer when the Blessed Trinity mismanages matters and how the Fourth God eases things up."

His voice was low, but Heber caught quickly enough the new tone in it and yielded without a struggle. But move his feet as fast as he could, it was physically impossible for him to quicken to a run, and while he had breath to walk he had breath to talk.

"Of course," he said, "we needn't believe all those tales about Lost Towers. But there must be something in them. They say that when the bishop laid his hand in blessing on the head of the daughter of that house, drops of such foul-smelling blood followed his ringers when he took them away that everybody else had to leave the church or the chapel or wherever it was, so perfectly appalling was the smell! And of course you've heard how poor old King Henry, who is sick to death while the Lord Edward is crusading nobody knows where, knighted young Will Boncor of Cone the other day in Westminster? The reason for that of course was to keep young Raymond de Laon from going back to France. Young men of his age aren't happy without a comrade. They have to go about in pairs or they just die of tedium."

"Tedium, do you call it," cried the Jewish Tartar. "I call it by a different name! But let that go!… The point is he's come back, and Cone Castle is stronger than it's ever been in the memory of man! But so also, Master Heber, is the Barony of Lost Towers! Very, very, very strong that also has become! And I tell you, Master Heber, I wouldn't like to make my way against that castle, with its forest and its swamp, and its bottomless black moat where the waters go straight down to Gehenna!"

It was at that moment that a flickering torch became suddenly visible, carried round a sharp corner of the passage they were following, and the long, narrow, cadaverous countenance of Sir Mort Abyssum, Lord of the Manor of Roque, made its appearance.

"What in the name of all the angels and of all the devils has been happening to you two?" cried the apparition, as it advanced towards them entirely alone and holding in one hand the torch, now quite useless for there were plenty of lights in the passage now, and in the other a naked sword.

There sometimes arise moments in the lives of men upon earth when there is no human power or human art or human skill, whether of painter or sculptor or musician or poet or tale-teller, that could possibly do what Aristotle called "imitate nature", or what Goethe called "realize the intention of nature", or what Shakespeare and Rubens did without thinking of what they were doing.

On these occasions certain human figures make their appearance where and when there is no onlooker, no observer, no audience, no witness that is possessed of the faintest or remotest understanding of what is being presented to its attention. Its own nature has rendered this awareness as oblivious as fire to water, even when it is about to be put out by it, and as earth to air even when it is about to be dissolved into it. The human figures who thus appear and make not the smallest, faintest, weakest, slightest impression might be described as appearing in a complete void. There is for them, when they appear, a total absence of every conceivable recording and of every possible reflection or memorial.

It was in such a void that the long, narrow, hollow-eyed, hollow-cheeked, ghastly-white visage of the Lord of the Manor of Roque manifested itself on this occasion. But all the same had there been any truth — and perhaps there was some truth — in the discovery by the ex-bailiff of Roque of the semi-consciousness of certain inanimate elements, these walls of the passage between the dung-yard and the dining-hall of that place would have recorded the appearance of a human figure and a human face that seemed to be crying out to the whole universe, from the deepest pit of Hell to the highest peak of Heaven, a protest against life having been created, or having created itself, or having been brought about by chance, after the accursed manner we all know so well.

VI. ROGER BACON

A FEW DAYS after the departure of those disturbing visitors to the Fortress heralded by Spardo and his deformed horse, Roger Bacon in his attic prison in the Priory of Bumset was at work on his Opus Tertium. He was seated on a high-backed chair with a well-stuffed black cushion under his buttocks and all his writing materials conveniently before him. These included some specially adaptable pages of parchment cut carefully into folio size and studiously covered with straight lines to guide the writer's pen, save where at certain premeditated places on the page these lines came to an end in order to admit of the insertion of large illuminated capital letters in every shade of colour and designed with every sort of fanciful decoration.

The famous Friar, a beardless, clean-shaved man, gave the impression at first sight of a sedentary person of high rank who might easily have been himself the Prior of Bumset, or rather perhaps, for his air and manners were not entirely ecclesiastical, some highly placed secular lawyer from old King Henry's court in London. Although beardless, Roger was the reverse of bald, and a second glance at his appearance might even have given a stranger the impression, not in this case altogether erroneous, of a man endowed with a certain fastidious self-respect in regard to the appearance and the cleanliness of his own hair and skin.

Roger Bacon always looked a good deal younger than he really was; and very likely it was this dainty youthfulness, both in his look and in his manner, that excited no small part of the almost morbid severity with which he had been treated for some time by the ecclesiastical authorities; that is to say by all except one. This one was Guido Fulcode, who had only taken orders after the death of his wife and who, as a skilful lawyer, had been the lay adviser of Louis IX of France long before, as a cardinal, he became Papal Legate in England in 1263 and was elected Pope in 1265 under the name of Clement IV.

It was only three years ago that this wise ruler of the western world's religion had himself received its last rites; but before he died both Raymond de Laon, and even Raymond's friend, the then extremely youthful John of the Fortress of Roque, had played their part as devoted adherents of Bacon and sometimes even as intermediaries between him and this briefly reigning Pope.

But this interlude of hope and harmony was now over forever; and the incorrigible Friar was left to fight for himself. From the present Pope, Gregory X, a friend of the saintly Bonaventura, he could hope for nothing. The authorities who hated him had in fact got him where they wanted. His revolt had been suppressed; and the influence of his revolutionary metaphysic, allowing such dangerous scope both to experience and to experiment, would now, so his enemies hoped and prayed, die away as quickly as the same sort of curiosity such as the study of astrology, and the same sort of scholarship such as the study of Greek and Hebrew, died away after the death of that over-clever Grosseteste, Bishop of Lincoln, nearly twenty years ago.

The Friar now pushed back his table an inch or two with both hands and jerked back his chair a little. It had suddenly occurred to him that this was certainly the day, and probably the hour too, for the return of his faithful servant whom everybody called "Miles", or just simply "Master Soldier", from an important errand. He had sent him to meet someone on board a ship arriving at the London docks who had been a pupil of the great student of magnetism, Master Peter Peregrinus of Maricourt in Picardy, for he was very anxious to learn if Master Peter had ever, among his many experiments, invented anything in the least resembling a mechanical Head capable of uttering oracles. Roger knew that the pupils of this Petrus Peregrinus were generally as reticent as to what they had learnt from him, as the man himself, save to a very few, was reticent about what he taught; but the Friar hoped the astute Miles would have been able to get from this particular voyager the information he so greatly desired.

Smoothing out a couple of little wrinkly excrescences from the manuscript before him, Roger Bacon now leant back in his chair and contemplated the curtained alcove near his bed where stood his now almost finished Brazen Head, the boldest as well as the most intricate of all his world-changing inventions.

“What it now needs,” he told himself, “is something — something I mean in my own peculiar way of thinking — to play the part for it that the priests assure us is played for us in Baptism. And, I know very well the kind of Baptism that my Head wants. O I know so well!”

And lifting one of his hands from the manuscript before him he rubbed the back of his knuckles against his forehead. “What it wants is the inspiration of Virginity. The best Baptism of all for it would be from an old maid, for old maids — O and don’t I know it! — are the ones who have the Secret. For who in Iscalis taught me the rudiments of Latin, and more than the rudiments of the Lingua Franca, but great-aunt Katharina? And who but Aunt Katharina collected for me what scraps of learning came blowing across the roofs of Iscalis and whirling like drifting leaves through its market-place? One day when they elect a Pope again as interested in learning as Fulcode was, I must write a treatise on all the prophetesses and oracular teachers in human history from the beginning of the world, who have been old maids. I begin to think there is something in the loss of virginity, especially when followed by pregnancy, that destroys the power in a woman to become a medium for that ‘Secretum Secretorum’, that ‘Secret of Secrets’, through which the ultimate Mystery of Life is revealed.”

At this point in his exciting thoughts Friar Bacon rose from his seat at the table and began walking up and down that small room. Any intelligent onlooker peering in upon him through some crack in that chamber’s wall would have noted that the excitement within him was not worrying him or troubling him or making him anxious or distressed. It was filling him with elation.

At last he stopped before the black curtain that concealed this thing of brass which he had created out of nothing. “O Head of all my Labour,” he cried in his heart with a sudden desperate outburst of long-suppressed feeling. “O child of the essence as well as of the being of my deepest soul! O thou only son of both the energies of my soul! If only I could baptize thee with the living spirit of a true Virgin, whether she were an old maid or a young maid, I would be content!”

Suddenly there arose a most extraordinary sound from behind the black curtain which covered that alcove near the head of his bed. “It’s beginning! It’s beginning!” cried the especial self within the Friar that he was so anxious to establish once for all as a soul much more complicated than any of his contemporaries could imagine. And it certainly would have seemed, to any invisible reader of human thoughts, that mingled with this exultation there was a throb of something very like pure unmitigated terror.

“Have I, plain man as I am,” the Friar evidently couldn’t help thinking, “just by my obstinate perseverance in dissecting, as they say Democritus did, every nerve and sinew and fibre in the skulls of the dead, actually played the part, without knowing it, of God? Have I actually created a rational soul, above and beyond those others that are engendered out of the substance of Matter? Have I flung this new soul into the machinery of my entirely artificial and purely material Head of Brass, so that it has come to life? Have I created an angelic superhuman creature, to be my living oracle for the rest of my days?"

He listened intently for any recurrence of the strange sound he had heard. Was this newly-created Being, he asked himself, going through a period parallel to human babyhood? Was it even now uttering unintelligible and inarticulate babblings?

Yes! By God and Christ! There was that sound again! "I must take a look at it!" And although he caught himself in an actual shiver of fear, he rushed to the alcove and pulled the curtain aside! The Brazen Image regarded him with a cold, callous, indifferent, non-human stare. It was a figure constructed to be about the height of a man, but it looked larger than human owing to the fact that it was without legs or arms. It was in fact what in ancient Greek cities used to be called a "Herm" — that is to say, a four-square milestone or miniature obelisk, like the formal pedestal of a classic bust, the bust of an emperor if it were Roman, and of a philosopher if it were Greek.

In the case of this angelic or demonic creation of his, the Brazen Head itself, whose massive base was of marble, rose from this short column as a head might rise from a square neck on narrow shoulders and, as their eyes met, the Head's creator fancied he heard his creation mutter these queer Latin-sounding words: "Birginis, Sirginis, Fligrinis, Virginis."

Roger Bacon behaved now as if he were indeed so excited by the result of his creative power that he felt an emotion filling him at one and the same moment with joy and fear. Hurriedly he pulled back the black curtain over the Brazen Head. And it was then that any crafty spy peering in at him — not from the window where the sweet-scented twilight hovered over the tops of the forest-trees and through which a lovely air was blowing, but through a crack in one of the other three walls — would have heard him give an exultant little cry: “By Christ, I’d forgotten! Didn’t a voice wake me in the night with the word ‘ghosta’?”

And then such a spy would have seen him rush with the excitement of a boy in his teens to a small square of wood set among the bare boards of that attic-chamber and marked with the letter “A”. This piece of wood the excited Friar extracted neatly from its fixed position, using his nails to achieve this result, and bending down above the orifice, stared at a vellum-covered volume that lay hidden there, on the outside of which was written in bold purple letters the words Fons Vitae Avicebron, “You are my master and teacher.” He thought as he stared at these words, “You, you, you, more than anyone else in the world!”

And as he bent and stared at that title Fons Vitae and at that name Avicebron, he made one of the greatest efforts he had ever made in his life to visualize, as if they really could be apprehended by our ordinary senses, that plurality of separate souls within us, of which he had finally decided that what we generally call, and feel too often enough, to be our normal human soul, actually is composed.

Intensely he struggled, as he stared at the name of his admired Jewish thinker, actually to visualize the primal elements in these souls of ours that he had come to the conclusion arise automatically within the body by the potentiality of matter itself and have no connection with the rational soul which is created directly, immediately, and instantaneously, by God Himself, and created ready and prepared to be joined with the body, as soon as the infant, already possessed of the primal elements of its soul, is born into this world.

At this moment as he stared at that square hole in the floor, at the title Fons Vitae, only just visible in the growing twilight, and at the name Avicebron, whose darkened letters he had to supply from his own head, he saw the first evolution of the primal soul within the womb as a wave of incurving, ingathering, insatiable water, desperately craving nourishment and rushing furiously through the solidest as well as through the softest substances, and possessed of the swallowing mouth of a hungry fish. And he saw the second evolution of this same primal soul as a wave of quivering vapour, rushing also through everything, but endowing the matter out of which it springs, the matter that is from the start able to engender it, with all the reactions of our human senses.

And at that intense moment he actually saw the rational soul which he had admitted must be directly created by God, saw it as a flame of something more than ordinary fire, saw it indeed as a flame created in the shape of a man-god, a flame that could wholly possess the body and yet according to its own will and pleasure could reach out from the body to which it has been joined and inspire other bodies.

"O, if I could only decide," the Friar cried in his excited heart, "what to think about the embryo of an infant, within a pregnant mother, before it is born into this world at all and before it is given its God-created rational soul! O I must think and think how you, our Jewish Master of all Masters, would have dealt with this problem of the embryo had you been called upon to consider it!"

With this question in his mind Roger Bacon bent down and replaced the square piece of wood and rose to his full height. "A Jewish Maid," he thought triumphantly, "after a Jewish Sage! That's the way I'll give new life to the Brazen one! Yes! you've been yourself a ghost for years, Avicebron, and it was your teaching about the pluralism of the soul that set me thinking first — just why I have no notion: it is all a mystery — of creating our Brazen one, even as God creates the rational soul within us! And now that I've looked at your book I know that it was you who put it into my mind in the night to cry out the name Ghosta!"

Friar Bacon now went back happily and quietly to his chair and table and to that piece of foolscap parchment half-covered with his quite legible but by no means very elegant handwriting. But he soon had to put down his pen again, for he was interrupted by the familiar sound, not of any Master Miles returning from London, but of the heavy steps of lay-brother Tuck, ascending the narrow turret-stairs to his low-roofed chamber, bringing him his supper.

It was a beautifully tranquil and by no means a very cold twilight that had by this time diffused itself over all the western provinces of our Island, and pleasant pine-wood scents mingled with the nutty waftures from the well-spiced apple-pasty that Brother Tuck, the moment he entered, carefully set down in the middle of the empty square space on the table from which Roger Bacon had hurriedly cleared all his papers.

In the depths of his pluralistic soul the Friar was now repeating over and over to himself the name "Ghosta", but he said, "Sit down, Brother," in the particular tone of a person who murmurs almost mechanically, "And now we come back to real life."

And when Brother Tuck had jerked into position a chair of the same shape as the one occupied by the Friar and containing a cushion of identically the same colour and size, the latter added the words: "And you might, if you don't mind, get the bottle and glasses"; a suggestion that was taken with the quickest alacrity. From a small shelf in an open recess near the door was extracted a beautifully heavy and almost opaque cut-glass container half-full of the reddest Burgundian wine from which, when it stood between them on the table, the Brother filled both their glasses.

Then followed, but with the same matter-of-fact, mechanical inevitability, a very curious gesture, traditional in Bumset Priory — a gesture that Raymond de Laon was wont to declare he had heard from none other than the Papal Legate to this country who subsequently became Clement IV, was prehistoric and pre-Christian, and went back to the days of Homer and Hesiod, when, before touching any wine, you had to sprinkle drops of it on the ground and on the air. What in fact both the men did now was to dip their longest finger into their glass and lightly flip a few drops of the wine they were about to drink towards each other.

"Here's news for you, my friend and God's friend," Brother Tuck began. "The Mother Superior next door, you know, has now got a really extraordinary Jewish girl to help the old nun who cooks for them. That poor old bitch — if you'll excuse me, sir — has never had time enough to cook properly; to cook, I mean, things that she herself enjoys. She spends half her time carrying dishes around to sick nuns. But now, with this new girl there, things are going, Prior Bog assures me, so marvellously well that Sister Mandrake, the nun who cooks for them, is happy again, and poor old Serga Kathalorum has found time to look round her a bit and enjoy life a little — found time to feel that being a Mother Superior isn't quite the worst fate that could have befallen a god-fearing elderly respectable lady. Pardon me, Master Friar, but has any new devil entered your mind, like that one that made you say, 'Time is Past' over and over, just as if it were 'et cum Spiritum tuum'?"

Brother Tuck emptied his glass, holding it to his lips in order that its last drops — drops that were no doubt called "the dregs" in countries where certain accumulations of strongly-smelling residue could always be drained from the bottom of wine-glasses — and then, having allowed his uplifted eye-balls — and while he did this his expression resembled that of a frog, with its chin on a lily-leaf, searching the empyrean for thunder — to scour the discoloured interior of the glass he was holding, he repeated “cum Spiritum tuum” in a dying fall of unction that resolved itself, ere it passed wholly away, into a diffused question.

VII. THE INVOCATION

Brother Tuck was still gazing with an uneasy relaxed interrogatory stare into the abstracted eyes before him, and across the empty glass and the full glass, when to his startled and rather shocked surprise he saw the Friar rise slowly to his feet.

“Please answer me, Brother Tuck, my old friend,” said the risen man gravely. “No! Stay as you are. Don’t get up. Here, drink my glass. I can have another later. But it’s necessary for me to ask you rather an important question. What’s this new girl’s name? I mean this one you’re talking about, who is such a help to Serga Kathalorum at the Convent, and to the old nun — Sister Mandrake they call her, don’t they? — who does their cooking?

“No, don’t get up, old friend. Stay where you are. It’s for the person who is asking the questions to stand. But it’s important to me and important purely for myself. Yes, you must understand that, Brother Tuck. You mustn’t think I am asking you for any reason except a special peculiar, and quite definite one of my own. But to me this matter is of extreme importance; for it has to do with the particular thing I’m working on just now, namely — though I don’t want to bother you, old friend, with these peculiarly difficult matters — the question as to how far at any definite point in the passing of time — you can see roughly, old friend, can’t you, what I’m talking about? — our natural human apparatus for looking ahead can be used for purposes of prediction and how far it must hopelessly collapse; and why I asked you about this person, Tuck, my friend, was because — —”

At this moment not only did a sudden gust of wind from the north cause the wooden framework of the small window to shake, but an agitated yellowhammer, with wings and feathers ruffled and with nerves and brain confused and befuddled to such a degree by an airy panic emanating from a whirling flock of frightened starlings, that everything in the world except that little, low-roofed philosophic chamber seemed all beak and claws, burst into the room, and aware of Brother Tuck's square shoulders stooping over two glasses and Friar Bacon's bottle-neck shoulders erect over nothing, flung itself in a wild panic against the three walls in front of it, and fell dead on the floor before reverting to the fourth.

Both men went to pick up the bird, and there was something almost like a boyish scuffle between them as to which should reach it first. In the event, attained in two seconds, it was Friar Bacon who got the motionless creature into his hands and smoothed down its feathers and let its head fall limp across his thumb.

"Well! tell me now, Tuck, old friend; has this new girl at the convent got a name that suggests death or anything to do with death?" As he spoke the Friar lifted the bird's head from the back of his thumb just about an eighth of an inch and then let it sink down again. "Anything to do with Death, old friend, that's the question. And when you've answered I'll tell you exactly why I put this question to you. But sit down again, and I'll sit down too. It's queer, isn't it, how much more tiring it is to stand than to walk?"

Both the men were silent, looking at each other across the table, the Friar mechanically caressing the dead bird on his lap and the Lay-Brother mechanically running his finger round the edge of the wine-glass that was nearest to him. If only one among Friar Bacon's unrealized inventions had been present then that had the power, the moment you touched a particular knob, of uttering in a strong firm voice the thoughts of each person in turn, towards whose cranium, whether hairy or bald, the spear-point of its machinery had been directed, what a moment this would have been for a perfect proof as to how the most unorthodox, improper, shameless, outrageous thoughts flit through the heads of upright, honest, and thoroughly good men busy with entirely blameless activities!

For Brother Tuck wondered how soon Prior Bog would detect something amiss if he, Tuck of Abbotsbury, fried his own excrement for the Priory supper; and Roger of Ilchester wondered whether it would be possible for a female yellow-hammer to lay eggs if she were impregnated by a dead mate who had been galvanized into momentary sexual excitement by a thunderstorm.

“Please tell me, Tuck,” enquired Bacon earnestly, “whether any idea, even the very remotest idea of Death entered the mind of the baptizer when he was baptizing this new girl at work in the convent?”

It was then that it happened to Lay-Brother Tuck, that calm, well-balanced, and practical person upon whose competence all Bumset Priory depended, to leap up from that perilous round table and from a mouth as wide open as a water-rat’s hole in a river-bank to utter an astounded “O! O! O! O!” For it was one thing to give poor Prior Bog the only pleasure he got from life in the form of at least one more delicious meal before the sun went down again in the phantom waves of the sea of time, but it was quite a different thing to find that a weird Friar, doing penance among them for heaven alone could say what mysterious sins, could actually know by some magic power what other people had to find out by long years of seeing and hearing and feeling.

“You don’t mean to say that you knew her name was Ghosta before I told you!”

Roger Bacon rose from his seat using self-conscious deliberation, where the other used thoughtless haste.

"Certainly I knew the sort of name she had. I can't swear I ever actually uttered the word 'Ghosta' to myself; but now that you've uttered it it seems curiously natural to me, almost as if I'd known it all my life."

There was now between the two men on their feet almost as significant a silence as there had been when they were seated. Of this the Friar was fully and completely aware. It is indeed quite possible that in the whole of the west country from Poole to Penzance there was then no living man who was more self-conscious than Roger Bacon. He had been born so, and from his earliest boyhood he had deliberately developed this birthright.

It had been from the start his daily habit to tell himself exciting stories; and the essence of these stories, their burden and the secret of their enchantment, was the fact that young Roger was always imagining himself, or better say discovering himself, to be surrounded by a motley multiplicity of objects, belonging to the four levels of existence, namely of human beings, of sub-human beings, of vegetable beings, and of mineral substances.

And as Roger Bacon grew older and began his studies at the Universities of Oxford and Paris, this intense consciousness of the various existences, whether animate, or inanimate, that surrounded him at any given moment, including his own self-consciousness, came to be the supreme interest of his whole life. His temperament and general nervous sensibility were such that he could not help feeling a special and quite personal "rapport" with each one of these various existences: and for good and ill each of them affected him profoundly.

Thus at this moment our morbidly self-conscious Friar was aware of a curious contest in his soul, between a desire to lie down in delicious relaxation and deep peace within the pale light-green eyes of the honest Tuck and a desire to go on gazing at the dead yellowhammer, until, through its body, he was able to pursue its soul till he found it re-incarnated in a tiny snow-white hair-like fungus, wherein it would have to await the mating-moment of a new pair of yellowhammers.

This latter desire of the insatiable scholar having thus been gratified, he was suddenly seized with a pang of remorse for not having already thrown the bird's little feathered corpse out of the window so that the first-born of the innumerable little worms that were bound to be engendered out of the putrefying corpse beneath those tender feathers might not perish in being thus separated from the elements.

"I'll run down with it presently," he thought, "and put it somewhere, where — —" And then he remembered what in following in his mind that small corpse's corruption he'd entirely forgotten — that he was, save for certain appointed hours each day, a prisoner in this chamber.

"Do you know, my friend, from what race or from what country," Friar Bacon now enquired of Tuck, "this Ghosta-girl comes?"

It was always a great comfort to brother Tuck to be asked any direct and simple question by the Priory's illustrious captive and he brightened up enormously at this.

"Yes, indeed I do," he hurriedly replied. "Ghosta's a Jewess from Mesopotamia or Dalmatia or somewhere not very far from the Red Sea; in fact I daresay quite near to the River Jordan."

He spoke with profound satisfaction. And indeed it was wonderful to him that he, Brother Tuck, chief cook to Prior Bog of Bumset, could teach their learned captive something of which he was entirely ignorant.

Roger Bacon let his massive head sink heavily down, letting it fall in front of him till his chin seemed to rest upon the centre of his chest, midway between his breast-bones. While he did this, he closed his eyes, and fell into a momentary trance of deep thinking. But no wrinkle, no frown, no furrow, appeared on the broad expanse of his forehead, nor were his arched eyebrows drawn together.

Tuck watched him with absorbed reverence; for the cook felt exactly as he felt sometimes when a thin film of exquisitely delicate yellow-brown, which faintly resembled pure gold, yet wasn't really like pure gold, began to appear on the surface of what he was cooking.

Then Roger raised his head with a jerk, while Tuck noticed, and not for the first time either, that when the Friar was excited by some daring or original idea, it was not so much that his eyes shone as that an intense inner flame, like a magic candle burning in his very midriff, suddenly revealed itself through his eyes.

"Listen, my friend," Roger Bacon exclaimed, bending forward a little, and while with the exterior portion of his eyes he stared through the body of his interlocutor, and, as it seemed, through the wall of his cell, and even across the swaying tops of the forest-trees, he was unable to stop the gleaming flame of his new idea from magnetizing the amazed Tuck.

"Listen," he repeated. And then, in a perfectly calm and easy tone, while he re-possessed himself once more of the corpse of the yellowhammer. "What I want you to do, my faithful one, is to bring this Jewish maid up here to me so that I can ask her a few important questions. No! You needn't look so scared. You'll be here all the time she's here! I haven't the faintest wish to enjoy her, far less ravish her. All I want is to talk to her. But I want to be absolutely frank and open with you, old friend, and there is, I confess, one other thing I want with her — no! don't look like that! It's nothing whatever to do with sex. It's only that being a virgin — for I know from my own experience that the Jews are very particular about the virginity of their maids — she'll have it in her to give the final touch to the Brazen Head over there!"

Thus speaking, he pointed with the hand that held the feathered body towards a large alcove at the foot of his small bed — an alcove which at that moment was covered by a heavy velvet curtain hanging from a cord. Intimately well-known to every living soul in both the Priory and Convent of Bumset was that alcove in the cell of their inventive prisoner; for, of all the magical creations of this extraordinary person, his Brazen Head with the power of speech — and indeed, so it seemed to some among them, with the power of thought too — was the most astounding.

"O! of course, Doctor of all Doctors," murmured Brother Tuck with low-breathed obeisance, "anything I can do or this Hebrew Virgin can do to help with your Head of Brass must be done; since the Head, as we all know, is what alone can save our country and our king from destruction."

"Nothing," thought Roger Bacon, "that I have ever done in the interest of my life's work was more effective with the populace than when I told Fulcode, before he was Cardinal or Legate, that I was trying to make an Ark of the Tabernacle for the Nameless One of Israel that should protect us from our enemies as the Jewish Ark protected the Chosen People from the Philistines. Fulcode scattered that story about the Brazen Head being Britain's peculiar and special magical Protector. It is Fulcode's spreading of that tale that has protected my work from Bonaventura's hatred more than anything else! Well! while it protects my inventions it does protect my king and my country. The Legate could have soon found out, if he made any enquiries, how completely my family ruined itself by helping the King against the Barons. Anyone who knows anything at all knows how much more liberty there has been under poor old Henry than there's ever been under the Barons and their accurst house of De Montford!"

“Listen to me, Tuck, my dear friend,” he said aloud. “The practical question for us now is how to get this girl through the entrance-hall and all those passages and up the stairs to this room. And what I’ve thought of is this. You know how often great fish are found stranded on Weymouth sands and on Chesil Beach? Well then! Why shouldn’t I have developed a mania for trying to bring to life dolphins and porpoises and other large fish by various secret methods of my own? And why shouldn’t you explain all this to the girl and persuade her to let you carry her — wrapped up of course so that nothing of her is visible — through those front passages and up these stairs? If you did it after the evening meal, there wouldn’t be many people about, and those you did meet would be sufficiently dazed with meat and drink as not to be very observant or very astute in explanation of what they did see! Do you think you could manage to do this tomorrow night, Tuck? It would be a good night for it, because, if it’s not cloudy, this new Moon will be having a steady influence by then.”

The artful cook of Bumset Priory nodded knowingly, made a hurried sign of the cross upon the air in the direction of the small window, and had already turned to go, when Bacon exclaimed:

“O please take this, will you, Tuck, and bury it somewhere? Bury it just underground, not more than an inch or two deep — you can make a hole with a stick, or anything you find under your hand: it needn’t be deep down — but I want it to be quickly and properly eaten by worms, not flown away with by carrion-crows, or lugged off down a rat-hole! See what I mean, Tuck, my old friend? And bring — —”

It was at this moment before the cook departed, and in the dead silence between them created by a simple instruction on one side and unquestioning obedience on the other, that a faint tap upon the door of the cell became audible. Being quite close to it, the departing Tuck opened it immediately, but the figure standing on the threshold surprised him so much that he hurriedly drew back to let it enter, and then, with what was clearly a strong feeling that the more closely confined to the chief participants concerned this encounter was, the better for all it would be, he cautiously and very secretively closed the door behind the intruding figure and returned into the room.

The new-comer was obviously, and both men saw it at once, of the female sex, although she was well muffled in a black mantle. But the slope of the shoulders and what was visible of the ankles and feet would have betrayed her, even if, though her hair was hidden, the delicate whiteness of her face and the size of her dark liquid eyes had not revealed a most magnetic femininity.

Roger Bacon walked straight up to her and taking off her cloak handed it to the somewhat disturbed Tuck, who kept muttering, half audibly and half inaudibly, what the Friar, and probably the girl too, recognized as the opening words of a familiar Latin collect; but who now, dragging a chair from beneath the table and carrying it to the wall near the foot of the bed, sat down with an air of patient submission to inexplicable proceedings and covered his knees with the girl's cloak.

"I came my lord Doctor, because I had one of my presentiments that you would be glad to talk to me. As Brother Tuck may have told you, I've come to help in the Convent; but being — as perhaps you can see from my appearance — of foreign extraction, in fact of Palestinian Hebrew blood, I am at present without friends. But I've heard that there's an armour-bearer, or whatever the name for that office may be in your country, in the Fortress of Roque, whom I once met in the East and whom I would most dearly love to meet again. He is easy to describe to you, my lord Doctor, as he resembles Goliath of Gath or Samson of Israel, being in fact what all over the world is called a giant. His lord and master here, they tell me, finds him — —”

At this point Friar Bacon firmly, though very gently, interrupted her and led her to his bed, upon which, almost within arm’s length of where Brother Tuck’s chair stood against the wall, he made her seat herself.

“What did you mean just now,” the scholar enquired, standing over her with a certain judicial authority, although still very gently and kindly, “by your presentiment? Oh yes! And may I ask you at once whether I am right in calling you Ghosta? I don’t at all want, my dear daughter, to be rudely inquisitive, but would it be ill-mannered of me to ask you whether your parents gave you this unusual name?”

The girl gave him a confiding, responsive, and grateful smile. “It’s rather a long story,” she began, “and I don’t like, O most admirable Doctor, keeping you standing while I tell it.”

“O it’s good for me,” said the Friar quickly. “I’ve been sitting all day — so please go on.”

The girl took him at his word, and glancing quickly round, as if to make sure she was only keeping the learned Friar, and not the Priory cook too, in a standing position, she permitted herself to indulge in quite a long biographical narrative.

“I expect it’s Jewish ancestry,” she began, “that really explains these queer presentiments. I call them that; but I’ve been told in the Convent that I ought to give them a different name. But never mind the name! You will know, O most admirable Doctor, much better, I expect, than I do, what these things are. But you see my grandfather was a Rabbi. Both my parents” — here the girl arranged herself more comfortably on the Friar’s bed, evidently reassured a great deal by the way he was standing at ease and listening with what looked like most attentive interest— “were murdered in a crusading massacre soon after I was born. It was my great-aunt Rebecca who took care of me. She gave me my name to bear witness to her conversion to the Christian Faith; for she always believed that it was a special intervention by the Holy Ghost that led to her acceptance of Christ as her God. Great-aunt Rebecca's belief in this has struck many people as both presumptuous and blasphemous. But knowing Aunt Rebecca so well, and having lost in her when she died the only person in the world I've ever understood, or indeed have wanted to understand, until I met the man they now swear to me is armour-bearer at the Fortress, it's impossible for me to feel that her name for me was blasphemous. As for these 'presentiments', as I call them, though there's a nun where I work who swears to me that 'intimations' would be a better word, I put them down, myself, entirely to my Jewishness. Aunt Rebecca taught me to read Hebrew, and my favourite reading all my life has always been the Books of Moses; and Moses was always being told what to do directly out of the mouth of the Nameless One who was the God of Israel, known only by the Four Mystic Letters 'Y.H.W.H..'

"And it's no doubt from reading the Books of Moses so much that there come moments — not in sleep you must understand, but in reveries or trances or wanderings of thought, when I seem to hear the voice of the God of Israel speaking to me and telling me to do something. And three times lately this voice has come to me and said: 'Go to the cell of the Admirable Doctor and talk to him' ——

"But, O most admirable lord Doctor, I see that Brother Tuck here whom" — and she turned her lustrous eyes to the still uneasy cook sitting awkwardly against the wall with her cloak across his knees— "whom I already know quite well by sight, has brought you your supper," and she made a gesture with one of her hands towards the great apple-pasty on the table, "so I oughtn't to stay any longer."

At this point she gave a quaintly reckless little laugh. “But the truth is, O most admirable Doctor, I keep hearing — it’s very faint, you know, but I’ve learnt from experience to catch it — the far-off voice of the Nameless One of Israel telling me that there’s some way in which I can help you with something that’s very much on your mind. Of course you may feel from your worship of a Trinity, where Jesus Christ is the centre if not the circumference, that this Voice of the Nameless One, speaking to me in the same Voice wherein it spoke to Miriam the sister of Moses, means little, or as far as a Christian is concerned, nothing at all; but my voice tells me you don’t and cannot treat it so lightly. O my Lord, O most admirable Doctor, I do beg and beseech you to tell me — —” Here the girl leapt up from the Friar’s bed and stood erect before him with her back to the disturbed and agitated cook— “to tell me what it is that the Voice keeps commanding me to do for you!”

Very calmly and quietly Friar Bacon took the situation into his own hands. He showed himself as skilful at the stage-management of human puppets as he did at the invention of automatic and mechanical ones. He was indeed soon standing with his left hand on the sleeve of brother Tuck and his right on the elbow of Ghosta.

He had already induced the former to hide the corpse of the yellowhammer in his tunic-pocket, and the latter to take the mantle the man had been holding and place it on the bed; and now they were, all three, in unencumbered freedom of action confronting the mysterious black curtain behind which was the Brazen Head.

Releasing Ghosta’s arm, but retaining his hold on Tuck’s sleeve, the Friar now drew aside this curtain from the most renowned shrine not only in Britain but, save for the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, in the whole world, and as he did so he was aware of a shivering motion in the muscles and nerves of both his companions, as if they were being compelled to make an involuntary prostration before the revealed mystery.

But he did not give them time for the smallest unrehearsed gesture. “What I want you to do,” he said to Tuck, “is to prop up the Head and to steady it and prevent it from falling while I lift our maid upon its shoulder,” and to Ghosta he said, “I want you to arrange your garments as if you were intending to make water, so that it is from contact with your nakedness that the Head looks forth upon the world.”

It was in an incredibly short space of time, after giving the man and the woman these precise instructions, that Friar Bacon got both of them, and got the Brazen Head as well, into the position he desired; and the expression on the countenance of that Brazen Head, as its powerfully moulded eyes and ears and nose and mouth looked forth from between Ghosta’s thighs and from under her naked belly, was like the expression in a marble head of the god Hermes, attributed to Praxiteles, that a nameless crusade had recently brought to the King’s house in London.

“Will you both, if you don’t mind,” the Friar murmured, “since the ancients knew, long before the Mother of God was revealed to us, the divine power of virginity, follow me in repeating the sounds of an ancient invocation, the exact meaning of which has been lost to the world for two thousand years?”

And so slowly and clearly did Roger Bacon utter these evidently latinized syllables that neither Ghosta in her extravagant position, nor Tuck using all his strength and all his intelligence to keep the Image and its Burden upright, had any difficulty in repeating them after him: Birginis, Sirginis, Fliginis, Virginis; and these simple sounds had hardly died away, and the curious white light which the cunning art of the inventor had caused to play over the countenance of the Bronze Head had scarcely faded, when the Friar lifted Ghosta down upon her feet and handed her her mantle. Then he removed from the foot of his bed a cloak of his own and wrapped it round Brother Tuck. “Better take her to the Convent yourself,” he said gravely. “Two cloaked figures won’t excite the same interest as one alone. I shall pray for you both very particularly this night. You have helped me greatly.”

VIII. THE MAN OF GOD

"It was indeed a special act of Providence," replied the General of the Franciscan Order of Friars from his seat on the back of the deformed animal known to its owner as Cheiron, "that we met at those cross-roads. I should have had to spend the night under these pines if we hadn't; because to tell you the truth, my good Master Spardo, nothing would have made me stop hunting for this Castle of Lost Towers except falling dead in my tracks or being killed by a wolf."

The satisfaction of the General of the Grey Friars in the absoluteness of his God-Intoxication was so deep that the ground beneath Cheiron's hooves seemed to rise to meet it. Unseen by the borrower of the deformed beast, Spardo wiped a blob of bird's dropping from the back of one of his hands upon the fringe of the ecclesiastical garment dangling at the animal's side.

"How did it happen, if your reverent generalship will not take offence at the question, that you, whom we all call the Seraphic Doctor, should be wandering about alone without a single servant?"

This not altogether unexpected question helped the bubbling spring of Bonaventura's self-love to overflow again.

"I've got the best of all possible ones now, haven't I?" he replied to Spardo, with an ingratiating smile. "Didn't you tell me just now that you were unemployed?"

"Hitherto," replied the bastard son of the King of Bohemia, "it has been my destiny to serve laymen: lordly laymen, it is true, and persons not devoid of coins of silver and coins of gold, but people tell me that great churchmen like thyself, O most Seraphic Doctor, are very particular and very exacting about the way your food is prepared and your off-scourings disposed of and your garments kept clean. I can see at this actual moment, O most saintly of doctors, several very filthy stains on your beautiful grey mantle, due no doubt — no! I'm not being rude to you, my lord doctor; I'm just indicating the absolute necessity that men like yourself who are so spiritual and so sensitive, and who so feel very, very, very far from the stupid unenlightened masses of men, and just as far from their stupid unenlightened authorities — —"

"Silence, man! Who has taught you to talk like that? Are we not all equal before God? Are we not all equally stupid and ignorant in the presence of his holy spirit? Are we not all equally selfish and greedy and lascivious and treacherous and deceitful under the blinding fire of his eternal righteousness and the terrible thunder of his fearful truth?"

The deformed Cheiron was so agitated by this threatening voice so close to his ears that he came to a stop and began trembling from head to tail.

"To whom have you been listening?" repeated the grey-robed rider on Cheiron's back. "You, fresh from our religious France and our more than religious Italy, you, a wanderer across Christian Europe from the idolatries of the East, where, I ask you, have you picked up this devilish talk about ignorant masses and stupid authorities? Have you been listening to this Satanic sorcerer who has dared to assume the dress of a Friar just because he has lost his money, this thrice-accurst Roger Bacon? Or are all the misbegotten islanders in this Godforsaken Britain of yours so savage that if anyone wants to win their favour they've got to talk to them in this unholy way? But do you really think, O most generous of all possible wanderers through haunted forests, that you can go on guiding me to Lost Towers? You seem to me, Master Spardo, a rather tired and worn-out man yourself. I can't help seeing that you drag your feet very heavily, and even kick the tree-stumps and the earth-mounds and the fallen logs as you go along; and I noticed just now that your eyes kept shutting of their own accord, as if at any moment you might fall asleep as you walked.”

“We shan’t be much longer now, reverend lord,” replied Spardo, “and once there I may find a place where I can sleep in their kitchen and my horse may be able to sleep in their stable, while you, being entertained by Baron Maldung and Lady Lilt, will come to your own conclusion about their daughter Lilith, of whom rumour round here says things I won’t repeat to a sacred gentleman like yourself.”

After that brief summary of the situation, the three of them moved on, with the saintly Bonaventura in the saddle, with Cheiron on his faithfully plodding four legs, and with Spardo’s weary head and half-closed eyes drooping and nodding more and more heavily.

Spardo’s thoughts, in spite of what he had just said, were by no means in any kitchen. They were in a much grander place. He was imagining himself luxuriating on heaps of soft cushions and sipping the particular kind of French wine, of a yellowish tint, which from his Bohemian childhood he had always loved best of all the wines in the world.

As for Bonaventura, he was thinking very hard, as he rode on, about his own future destiny. “If I continue,” he was saying to himself, “as effectively as I have done hitherto, in dominating my lower nature by my higher nature; if, in fact, I do attain in the eyes of the world the reputation of being a real saint, will this reputation interfere with my chance, for there can be no doubt I have a very good chance, of being elected Pope?

“Of course it does satisfy me to a mighty large extent to dominate my lower nature like I do, and to feel that in me, and to feel that others feel that in me, the Will of God triumphs over the Will of Satan. But with a character like mine it isn’t enough to dominate Satan in myself; I feel an imperative need to dominate Satan in others too. Yes! and not only in individuals. I feel a need to dominate Satan in groups, classes, societies, tribes, races, countries, nations, hemispheres, worlds! But my real life is my inward life. And I and God alone know the majestic secrets of my inner life.

"The wonderful thing about me, and the thing wherein I differ most from ordinary people, is that I don't want to dominate the world by action. I want to dominate it by just being what I am; by just being myself. And in this I resemble Jesus Christ. I and God alone know what a destiny-changing moment it was in the history of Christendom when Saint Francis sought me out, among all the rest, and gave me that gift of Healing which he gave to nobody else.

"But what I and God alone know is a yet deeper secret even than that; a secret that I would not have let God know if I hadn't decided he would have found it out for himself; the way my mother before I was born felt me give a leap in her womb every time God was mentioned. She even — and this deep secret nobody in the world knows but I and God — she even prayed to God all night long, while my father by her side was snoring like a Lombardy hog, that just one tiny little infinitesimal drop of God's holy ethereal spiritual and invisible seed might mingle with the substance of their earthly terrestrial and mundane seeds, when she and my father became one in my begetting.

"Yes! I and God, alone in all the world, heard that prayer of my mother; and I and God, alone in all the world, know how lovely the face of my mother was — how it was transformed, transfigured, illuminated, entranced, and beside itself with mystical love, when she made that prayer. For I was in you, then, God, wasn't I, and not in my mother's womb? O how can I thank you enough, God, for separating me from, and selecting me out of, and putting me above, the myriads of ordinary souls whereof the world is so full! But I must think, think, think, whether it would be better for me, from now on, to go forward increasing my spirituality as a saint, or to develop that other side of sanctity which is quite as deeply natural to me and implanted in me — the sort of wisdom that Solomon had when he decided between those two women with the living baby and the dead baby. That is the sort of wisdom we need in our Pope, and if I were Pope, I would have the greatest opportunity anyone could have in the whole world to make people obey the will of God as opposed to the will of Satan.

"Perhaps," so Bonaventura's thoughts ran on, "the inspiration of mine about converting to God and His Church this whole outpost of Devilry they call Lost Towers does really and truly combine both the spirituality and the wisdom of a true saint. But suppose this devil of a Baron Maldung puts me to death?"

He gave a little gasp like a frog in a cave at the striking of flint and steel. "Well, in that case I wonder how far my — —" But Bonaventura's thoughts of spiritual advancement and of everlasting felicity were now interrupted by the sound of a horn quite close to them; and he quickly turned to his companion, who was evidently, although still plodding along by Cheiron's side, so nearly asleep that he could hear nothing.

"What's that over there? Did you hear that? For God's sake, listen, man! It's just the other side of those trees!"

Spardo slowly turned his head causing his long, slender, wispy beard to brush away several flies from Cheiron's deformity. "Yes, by Holy Jesus I do hear it," he groaned, "and what's more, O most seraphic of doctors, I can tell you whose horn it is! It's the horn of Bailiff Sygerius and I expect he's calling for one of his own rascally boys! The fellow hasn't been bailiff for more than six months. His dad, old Heber Sygerius, has only just given up the job, and I rather — —"

Spardo was interrupted by an inrush upon them of several persons. A broad-shouldered, obstinate-looking, middle-aged man, who obviously was the bailiff in question, pushed forward through some closely growing pine-tree trunks, and advanced into the open, making, as he did so, several rough and brutal jerks to get rid of the hold upon his sleeve of an old and extremely agitated serf, who in his turn was clutching the hand of a little girl, who, with big frightened eyes, surveyed the two men and the deformed horse as if they had been beings from another world.

The bailiff made the appropriate gesture of respect to the man on the horse, who was obviously, although in the garb of a Franciscan Friar, some sort of high-ranking ecclesiastic from abroad.

"Pardon me for disturbing you like this, reverend Father, but I must settle the affair of this troublesome fellow before I can pay my proper respects to you."

The serf's voice had a piercingly pitiful tone of appeal which arrested Spardo's critical attention at once. "You're taking our whole life, master bailiff," the old man was saying, "when you take away our horse. My daughter has a good job in the Convent's washhouse and her children are good children; but if you take away our horse, considering my son's dead, you take the bread out of all our mouths."

It would have been clear to any less self-absorbed listeners than the two men upon whom this group of people flung itself, that in the familiar pleading tone of her grand-dad's voice there was something that spread a reassuring atmosphere round the child who was holding his hand. Tragic enough though the old man's words were, there were so many use-and-wont associations aroused in her by his special tone that her eyes ceased to be so big and scared.

It even began to be exciting to her to watch this weird horse's neck, with what really looked like a human head growing out of it, while the man with the feathery beard, like the moulting tail of Granny's jackdaw, seemed to be making funny faces at her, as if he wanted her to play a game with him.

It was early afternoon by now, and the rays of the February sun were shimmering between the pine branches at an angle about midway between earth and sky.

"I tell you, master bailiff, if you take our horse it will be just simply a death-sentence to us all!"

"Pardon me, holy sir," said the bailiff, looking straight into the twitching, high-coloured face of Bonaventura, whose excited eyes, always very prominent, were now literally bulging from his head; "pardon me till I've dealt with this fellow!"

Meanwhile the little girl, whose hand her grandfather was still tightly clutching, couldn't keep the idea out of her mind that the interest of this hooded rider in what was going on was so intense that it might at any moment project those inflated eyes of his out of his head like a pair of globular puff-balls.

She was even beginning to imagine the simultaneous pop with which those two voracious peerers would strike the tree beside her and the amount of effervescent juice that would pour down the tree's trunk at their bursting, when she heard the bailiff protest to the owner of those same orbs that he would give him his full attention as soon as he had got rid of these tiresome people.

"Full attention" was the very last thing any one of the group of human bipeds flung together beneath these pines could hope for. But at least the ragged little girl, whose name was Bet, and who had been endowed by Nature with several extra drops of imagination, derived an agreeably alarming impression from the bulging eyes of the saintly General of the Franciscan Order of Friars.

But there was nothing but distress in the shock she received when she saw her grand-dad throw himself down on his knees before ‘Master Sygerius and actually embrace his straddling pair of sturdy legs, while with head thrown back he gazed up imploringly at all that could possibly be seen from that position of the man’s physiognomy, which could only have been the reddish-brown beard protruding from the obstinately square jaw.

“If you take our horse away, master,” cried the old man, “it just means starvation! While my son was alive, he could plough as fast as any man on the manor. And plough he did, and sow and reap too, with the best in the land. But if after his death our only horse is to be what’s called your Heriot, considering I’m too old and feeble to plough or to sow or to reap or to carry in the harvest, it’s just murder you’re committing! Yes, what you’re doing, bailiff, is sheer murder! I tell you, here and now, it’s squeezing the orange dry!”

The bailiff, evidently no less conscious of the staring eyes of the hooded man on Cheiron’s back than was the ragged little Bet, stepped away so hurriedly that the old supplicant, losing his balance, fell forward with both his hands outstretched upon the red-brown earth. The spot where the old man fell was a spot strewn with several generations of pine-needles, but it was quite bare of moss and quite bare also of that particular sort of forest-grass, soft as the hair of a Dryad, which grew luxuriantly in those parts, especially in the district between the Fortress and Lost Towers.

Little Bet had so far only spent seven years upon earth but she had already noticed that, when her elders quarrelled among themselves and began to argue, something always seemed to be drawn into the contention that came from far away. Yes! she had often noticed that some unexpected bird or beast or reptile appeared at such times, or an unusual storm of wind, or a torrent of water, or even a falling star. And it now came about that as Bet's grand-dad, whose name was Dod Pole, scrambled to his feet, with the palms of his hands and the undersides of his fingers pricking viciously from the pine-needles, and commenced in unabashed indignation to express his feelings, a tiny little bird, on the look-out for the crumbs that it had come to associate with these meetings of vociferous bipeds, was so absorbed in its own private quest that it remained oblivious to the nearby hovering of a hungry hawk, who, instinctively aware that no arrows were to be feared from that preoccupied party, descended like a feathered plummet and made its fellow-citizen of the air its helpless prey.

"O you bailiffs and reeves and forest-wardens," shouted old Dod Pole, his voice growing harsher and huskier as he went on and his grip on little Bet's hand hurting the child's fingers more and more, "you are all the same in your fat-headed stupidity! You think the land belongs to the Barons whose castles on it we have built, or to the Church, whose barley and wheat and fruit and vegetables we have grown. O you wooden-headed coxcombs! I tell you a day will come when we shall have a King after our own hearts, a King as wise as Solomon, and as strong as Coeur-de-Lion, and as well-supported as Caesar, and with as many magic weapons as King Arthur, who will raise us up and thrust you down! Who gave your precious Barons the right to make us thresh our corn on their threshing-floors and grind it with their grind-stones? Are your Barons so many Gods? Did they create the land that we cultivate? Did they create the wheat and the barley that we sow and reap and gather in barns?

"Just because you call taking our horse a Heriot — a mighty grand lawyers' word the word Heriot, ain't it? — you think all is settled! You wait a bit, my good master bailiff, you wait a bit, my noble lord, Sir Mort! A day will come when it will be to a really great and true King chosen by us, yes! by us, who are now serfs and slaves, that you and your barons will have to come for the making of all the laws in the land! And I'll tell you this, too, Master Sygerius — —"

The obstinate bailiff, at whom this revolutionary outburst was aimed, still stood his ground sullenly, silently, tenaciously and with an ugly purpose in his grim countenance. But the aged Dod Pole still went on. Indeed as he recklessly and desperately flung out these thoughts, he felt in his soul as if over all the countries in the world millions of serfs and slaves like himself were uttering the same thoughts, and he couldn't but believe that the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, if not the God of Jesus, was their inspiration and would avenge them upon their enemies.

But the Bastard of the King of Bohemia, whose mother had called him Spardo and whose only affection and pride in the whole universe was his concern for the deformed horse Cheiron, had at that moment — perhaps because along with his other faculties his conscience had gone to sleep — a different sort of inspiration, one that only Hermes himself, the God of thieves, could have put into his head.

He had already observed that Bonaventura possessed a deep pocket in his Friar's garb, at the bottom of which he was carrying a leather bag full of thick golden pieces. He had found this out by spying on the saintly man when the latter retired from his seat on Gheiron to relieve his bowels; and he derived no little satisfaction at this moment from discovering that the richly-filled leather bag in the flapping skirt of Cheiron's rider had somehow or other, by good chance, worked itself along the animal's side till it was close to his own caressing, stroking, toying, soothing, and encouraging left hand.

The more violent old Dod became in what he was saying, the more closely was Bonaventura absorbed in watching him; so that to a born pilferer of unguarded treasures like this offspring of the loins of a King, who had just refused a more dangerous crown than the one he wore, it was not a very difficult achievement to transfer to his own person, in fact to an interior pocket next his own skin, two of these massive golden coins stamped with this same Germanic crown that the crafty King of Bohemia had refused to assume.

"Amen, Amen, Amen, old man!" Spardo now shouted, dancing into the arena between the feverish aura of the serf's oration and the bailiff's contemptuous silence. "In the country where I come from there are shrines to the Mother of God where every farthing offered by visitors, yes! and every penny given by pilgrims, and every shekel flung down by travellers, is gathered into a special treasury for the benefit of such as labour with their hands! Pardon me, Master Sygerius, if as an ambassador from abroad, in fact from three kingdoms and a dozen Free Cities, I exchange a few words with this ancient man of resounding speech. I think there are things that I can say to him that will be of value to him and to me and to us all!"

Old Dod now permitted his voice to die away in the midst of a sentence and looked enquiringly at little Bet. The owner of Cheiron had the wit to interpret this quick glance correctly. "Like all orators," he thought, "the old fellow is hopelessly dependent on women for every practical move he makes, and as the only female here is that ragged little girl, he daren't move a step without appealing to her!"

It was at this point that Spardo, who understood small girls better than he understood either religion or revolution, exchanged a smile and a wink with little Bet that arranged it all.

“The man wants a word with you, grand-dad,” she whispered to Dod Pole; and the three of them retreated beneath the pine-trunks. Once out of sight of the Friar-General and the Manor bailiff, Cheiron’s owner produced one of his great gold pieces and explained its worth in relation to the coinage of Britain to old Dod.

“Won’t that be enough and to spare, my friend,” he said, “to keep you and your family till next winter?”

Again he caught old Dod Pole glancing at little Bet. And again it was clear to him that the child’s vigorous series of emphatic nods settled the matter. “Well then,” he commanded in the nearest approach to an official dismissal he could assume, “off with you! And put that piece of gold” — and here he came close to the old man and felt his sides and hips with his two hands— “in *there*l” he added, when he had discovered a secure little receptacle in Dod Pole’s innermost garment, already containing a few coins; and without a glance at their retreating figures he rejoined Cheiron and the horse’s two companions.

“I’ve been explaining to his Reverence,” announced Spardo to the bailiff, “that, when he reaches Lost Towers, he’d better take no notice of what Baron Maldung may have to say, and concentrate his attention upon any definite information he can get out of Lady Lilt. I don’t know, I’m sure, master bailiff, if you share my view that in all these affairs it’s wisest to go straight to the woman, if there is a woman in the case.”

The bailiff of Roque looked from the General of the Franciscan Friars to the horse with the growing appearance of two heads.

“You’d better,” he said, “hurry your beast on, if you’re going to see anything of any of the three of them tonight! It gets dark at Lost Towers, I understand, before the proper time! At least that’s what they say, and I’m ready to believe anything of that awful place! For myself I’ll never be caught going near it. But they do tell me your Reverence has the reputation of being a great Saint, and my missus do say every time I put head to pillow — ‘Randy,’ she do say — that’s short for Randolph you understand— ‘hast thee said thee’s prayers straight and proper to the Blessed Saint Aldhelm?’

“And when I do say to she: ‘Bain’t Prior Bog of Bumset as good a church-lord as any old Saint?’ she’s answer to I is allus the same: ‘Bog be Bog and Bumset be Bumset,’ she do say,’ but when thee do pray to They Above, ’tis a very different style of Holy Man thee dost need for thee’s pass to Salvation!’

“But that bain’t all my missus do say when head and pillow do come together. ‘Why do us pray,’ her says, ‘when Night be come and Dark do cover all? Because the Devil be six times nearer to we at such times! Beware of Darkness, Randy,’ she do say. ‘Call on Saint Aldhelm to keep ‘ee calm and cosy in the lap of the Blessed Virgin, else thee may go wandering down one of they girt dark roads that go anywhere and lead nowhere for ever and ever and ever and ever!’ So my advice to your Reverence, and to thee too, Master Spardo, is to hurry on as fast as may be, lest Sun be gone when Lost Towers be come!”

And with that, and a swift look upwards, as if at any moment some vast Devil’s bird might carry off the sun in its beak and darken the earth with its wings, Randolph Sygerius, the new bailiff, marched off, walking like a soldier who needs all the strength of will he possesses to accept the fact that in Roque Manor day is followed by night.

The deformed Cheiron however hadn’t gone on for more than twenty minutes, with Bonaventura silent on his back and Spardo silent at his side, when they came to a track that crossed the one they were following, and there, just as if he had been purposely awaiting them, astride of his tall war-horse till he had grown as sleepy as the plodding Spardo, was none other than the Baron — not the Baron of Lost Towers, but of Castle Cone, that cheerful stronghold on the southern side of Roque Fortress, inhabited by the Boncor family.

Baron Boncor was a big strong man, with a thick fair beard and as placid and friendly a cast of countenance as any pair of agitated travellers could wish to meet. Human nature is such, however, that when we have "worked ourselves up", as we say, to expect one thing, and find instead of it not only something quite different, but something that is the direct opposite of what we've expected, even if what we've found is pleasing to us beyond hope, our immediate reaction — such is our pride in the way we've mentally prepared ourselves to meet this encounter — is a curious shock of disappointment. We might just as well have never bothered to prepare for battle at all!

But Baron Boncor had in him as much commonsense as good nature. He greeted this queer-looking trinity of unusual explorers with an instinctive courtesy that set them at their ease at once.

"Welcome to our dark forests, your Eminence!" he began. "Though I fear after your sunlit Italy you'll have to be careful to keep your cloak about you. And you too, Master Spardo, for through my wife's friendship with her good neighbour Lady Val, I've heard all about you and your strange steed here! Cheiron you call him, don't you? They talk a lot about him in the Fortress stables when I take my old Basileus there for a rub down. Give Cheiron a kiss, Basileus! No, no, a real proper kiss! That's the boy! I warrant he's not so much younger than you are; and who can tell? You may, if you kiss each other often enough, turn into a real Centaur as he seems to be turning. But if you do — —"

He was interrupted by the appearance of the most amazing human figure that any of them, man or beast, had ever seen in his life before. This personage came dancing into their midst, and not one of them could take his eyes off him for a second when once he appeared. He inhaled and sucked in and tried to drain up the essence of every living soul upon that spot, whether such a soul belonged to a man or an animal or a bird or a reptile or a toad or a worm or an insect. None of the three human beings present at that cross-track in the forest had a flicker of doubt as to who this intruder was, who thus came dancing into the midst of them.

It was Baron Maldung himself, the Lord of Lost Towers! Well, they had come to seek him. They had come to visit him. And here he was! Beneath his tunic and his breeches Baron Maldung was clothed in only two garments; but these two garments literally covered him from head to foot — that is to say, from half-way down his neck to the soles of both his feet. The under-garment was of thick, warm, white sheep's wool; while the garment that covered it was of thin delicate coal-black satin.

Every movement the Baron made was like a step in a dance that he knew by heart: and as he fluttered from one to another of these five beings, two super-intelligent horses, and three rather unusual men, the lightly-blowing wind as it opened his tunic revealed the fact that this black satin covering he wore above his sheep's-wool under-garment was an attempt, almost a pathetic attempt, on the part of this demonic man to round off his ungainly limbs into a sort of grace, at any rate into a grace that sheep's wool alone could not give.

"O you must come, you must, you must, you must, all of you, now at once, now that you are here!" he murmured, as he and his shadow — for the sun seemed to be playing a private game with the two of them — danced their special man-and-his-shadow dance. And the wind too had a share in it; for the thin straight dusky hair of the Baron of Lost Towers was lifted up and down on his head as if by the puffs of a petulant rival of that obsequious shadow.

Probably owing to some instinctive gust of fellow-feeling for a being as much devoid of man's moral sense as he was devoid of man's self-righteous attitude towards his exploitation of animals, both horses now made an emphatic movement to follow him.

"Well, Basileus," muttered Baron Boncor, "it evidently looks as if we men must obey the oracles of creatures who probably know the will of heaven better than we do! So come along my Christian friends! Let two legs follow four legs and all our eyes see what happens!"

It cannot be said that Bonaventura looked at Spardo or that Spardo nodded a reply to Bonaventura's look. It might rather be said that the man on the back of Cheiron and the man at the side of Cheiron followed Baron Maldung as unquestioningly as if they were members of the Household of Lost Towers.

As for Baron Boncor of Cone, he brought up the rear upon Basileus with an expression on his good-natured bearded face which seemed to say: "Well! as long as I've got your crazy backs in front of me, I'm ready for anything! From behind I can see how things go. Chance often gives a chance to those who don't mind bringing up the rear; and, if it doesn't in this case, so be it."

It was rather a startling surprise to both Spardo and Bonaventura when they found themselves completely clear of the forest, and saw in front of them, a vast reedy swamp that extended to the horizon in every direction, save the one from which they had come to the really terrifying bulk of Lost Towers.

Lost Towers looked at first sight like a ruin built entirely of black marble; but on nearer approach it showed itself to be anything but a ruin; for the vast blocks of black stone of which it was built had something Egyptian and pyramidal in their size, and although divided and broken up into many small domes and minarets and watch-towers, the general effect made a tremendous awe-inspiring impression upon everyone who had never seen it before. There was something staggering — in truth you might say almost shocking — about its antiquity. It looked as if it had been built of materials brought on barges through a network of canals from the sea-coast, a coast which had been reached by ship from Atlantis itself in pre-historic times. A very queer effect was produced upon a traveller's nerves the moment he set eyes upon it, a disturbing, troubling, and bewildering effect. The first sight of it must have always touched some long-buried race-nerve in us all that goes back to antediluvian times.

It was certainly as queer a cortège as had ever reached that weird mass of domes and towers in all its incredibly long history, this little group that now approached its portentous entrance. By reason of its own Baron being the leader of this queer band, they were received in a manner bordering upon a religious ceremony.

Lady Lilt herself came out to meet them, dressed so extravagantly that Baron Boncor assured his grey horse that the lady must have been waiting for their arrival in a wardrobe-chamber looking out their way. The retainers who assembled on the small square of cut grass in front of the high, narrow, strangely painted gates, gates that never, by night or day, seemed entirely shut or entirely open, must have amounted to a dozen men and a dozen women, all dressed so much alike and all so mingled together that it was hard to distinguish men-servants from maid-servants as they surrounded the visitors.

But the apparel they all wore was so remarkable in its colour that only a very discerning eye would have been likely to detect that the materials, whereof these richly-coloured garments were made, were a sorry draggled-tailed patch-work of odds and ends, stitched together anyhow, a motley agglomeration of woven stuffs that had only two purposes; the first, to cover — you couldn't say to warm — human bodies, and, the second, to receive the particular red-brown dye which had been the prerogative of a special family from somewhere in the far north, who, for several generations, had lived in Lost Towers, to prepare, to make, to mix, to adapt to every kind of weather, and to apply to every sort of fabric. This colour had exactly, precisely, and to the last nicety, the shade of the ground at the roots of the forest pines, and also of the narrow foot-wide paths that horsemen, and very often their dogs too, had to follow, as they made their way through the woods.

Baron Maldung himself resembled a middle-aged acrobat with a profile so startlingly like that of certain busts of the Emperor Nero that visitors to Lost Towers who had pilgrimaged to Rome wondered sometimes, especially when they observed the dictatorial manner of the Baron and the something like obsequiousness with which everyone treated him, whether he might not really be, as the man himself always maintained he was, descended from ancestors who had not come from the North at all, but from Rome itself.

There was a tall black poplar on one side of this stretch of grass, now crowded with retainers in the Lost Towers red-brown attire; and though there were few leaf-buds on it at this early season the great tree had a happy and vital look, as if its sap was already stirring. Not far from this benevolent forest-giant there grew a small thorn, and it happened that Bonaventura, whose hold on Chieron's reins was entirely negligible, now that he had so much to see and so much more to think about, allowed the horse to press so closely against this leafless bush that a perceptible tuft of the creature's skin with a patch of his fur was torn away by the bush's powerful thorns.

In a flash Baron Maldung observed this misadventure and quick as lightning leapt upon the offending thorn-bush and began hacking at it with a short sharp little war-axe which he unhooked from his belt. Lady Lilt, who had been tenderly stroking the deformity on the neck of Chieron, a deformity that to the eyes of Spardo seemed growing larger and more like a human head with every touch the lady gave it, now sprang to the side of her lord, and first with one bare arm and then with the other, though both arms were soon bleeding as the thorn-bush defended itself, held up the thing's branches towards the slashing fury of Maldung's war-axe.

The small bush was soon level with the ground; but the insanity of life-hatred in Maldung seemed to increase moment by moment with each advance in the demolition of those crumpled, twisted, wrinkled, broken little twigs, and, as can be imagined, each little drop of perspiration from the white arms that were acting like assistant executioners added to the man's frenzy.

And it was at this moment, just when the now quite horizontal stream of afternoon sunlight had turned that small square of green grass into a radiant dance-lawn, that Spardo noticed that on the very edge of the reedy swamp there grew an immensely old oak-tree by the side of a small mound, and that upon this mound a very white full-grown lamb was bleating piteously. But all eyes, including Spardo's, were now concentrated upon the exquisitely lovely and magnetically provocative daughter of the house, who now came forth to play her part in her parents' battle with this sub-demonic vegetation.

Her part just now seemed to be the pretence that she had rushed forth from the hands of her tirewomen, in such haste to join the fight against these appalling monsters who had invaded this innocent world of noble animals, that she had been too hurried to remember to put all her clothes on. Her haste was, however, as even Spardo could see, attended by an exquisite delicacy of choice as to just where the effect of not being fully dressed would be maddeningly tantalizing, and indeed, not only seductive, but what you might call ravishing.

And they all could see that to the human nerves of the good Baron Boncor such provocation was unendurable. In fact all that that good-natured warrior found gall enough to do under such exceptional tension was to take a dignified and simple farewell of Bonaventura and to give Spardo a definite invitation.

"Don't you forget, Master Spardo, that you'll always be welcome at Gone Castle, whenever your wanderings bring you our way!"

And then, not without some difficulty — for Basileus was showing signs in a manner not quite seemly in so warlike a steed, of being unduly attracted to Cheiron's deformity — Baron Boncor turned his horse clear round and urged him into a rather shy and not wholly polite retreat.

But to retreat from Lost Towers, when once you had discovered it, was more difficult than the discovery. Lady Lilt lifted one long white arm to direct her husband's attention to this retirement of their chief antagonist; and with her other arm she groped for the bow and quiver hanging over the shoulder of Baron Maldung. This small bow, with its arrow already notched against its extended string she thrust into Maldung's hands. "Shoot! Shoot! Shoot!" she hissed. And when the Baron of Lost Towers released the string and the feathered shaft pierced the flesh of Boncor's right shoulder and remained there quivering, the blood that dripped in big drops upon the mane of Basileus was a much brighter red than the red-brown of the Lost Towers retinue.

But, though the blood was bright enough, the hand which held the bridle-reins was reduced to helpless impotence. But Basileus leaped forward and at a gallop now; nor was there any sign before they disappeared of the Baron falling from the horse’s back. It was then and only then, that Lady Lilt turned to lead their visitors past the still half-naked Lilith into the interior of Lost Towers.

IX. LOST TOWERS

The crowd of attendants, in their rich red-brown attire, seemed suddenly stricken with a weird sort of lethargy, and indeed displayed a tendency to drift and drift and drift without any purpose. But no aimless drifting disturbed the imperious though comical figure of Maldung, now busy at a job which absolutely absorbed him. This was nothing less, as Bonaventura quickly had an opportunity of realizing, than directing the covering with suitable colour of the carved mantles in the entrance-hall of Lost Towers of certain imperial Roman heads. These had been selected by the despotic Maldung — at least as far as Bonaventura was able to realize — purely for the sake of the devilish obsessions which possessed them.

But past this avenue of diabolical physiognomies the now thoroughly agitated General of the Franciscan Friars felt he had to go, if the obsequious salutation of Baron Maldung and the engaging gestures of Lady Lilt implied that at any rate tonight, whatever happened in the future, and he did begin to feel a little doubtful about converting these people, he was at least sure of a savoury supper and a comfortable bed.

It had been a comfort to him that the murderous arrow which he had seen lodged in the shoulder of Boncor hadn't brought that worthy man down: and what he must do now was to make it clear that his stately strides towards the portal of Lost Towers were not accelerated by the sight of the provocative figure of the daughter of the house, just perceptible beyond the wicked and desperately unhappy visage of Tiberius Caesar, sated with his sadistic orgies, with his sub-human obsessions, with his super-human atrocities, and looking now as if scooped out, gouged out, thunder-blasted out, after years of petrifaction from the substance of an internal rock.

Lilith was still playing her perpetual game; and it was revealed to Lady Lilt, and not wholly concealed even from our friend Spardo, that the present object of the girl’s felonious wiles was none other than the saintly personage, armoured in the chastity of grey cloth, wrapped in the chastity of grey vapourings, fortified in the chastity of grey theocracy, cramped in the chastity of grey idealism, who was now approaching the entrance to Lost Towers between the door-post on the left and the profile of Tiberius Caesar on the right.

More momentous to Lady Lilt than the galvanic though invisible cord, that was stretched so taut between the flitting and wavering adumbrations of her daughter’s milk-white thighs and the furtive attention of Bonaventura, was a parallel psychic cord that she now caught sight of, and by no means for the first time, between those same exposed whitenesses and the eyes of the girl’s father.

Aye, but O! what Spardo would have given, possibly even the remaining golden coin he had robbed him of, to know exactly what this Man in grey, this special pet of St. Francis, was thinking just then! Would the fellow have the gall to do what everybody else was far too scared to think of doing? Would he be brave enough actually to enter Lost Towers?

He himself felt glad enough to give Cheiron’s bridle a gentle twist and to turn the head of the half-human animal due south — that is to say, in the direction taken by that rider upon Basileus who now rode with an arrow in his shoulder. Nobody was interested enough, either in Spardo or his deformed steed, to follow their retreat; but had anyone done so, they would have been absolutely astonished at the speed with which Cheiron could move at such a crisis.

Meanwhile every step taken by Bonaventura towards the entrance to Lost Towers was attended by an intense and meticulous process of thought. In a certain sense the man was undoubtedly acting with real courage, and might without exaggeration have been called a very brave man. But his exorbitant notion of his own importance in the eyes of the God he worshipped, his puffed up conceit as to the eternal importance of the particular kind of sanctity he cultivated, tainted this honourable courage with a less worthy tinge. "If," he now said to himself, "I obstinately refuse to look at that girl, I shall make them think I am afraid of being tempted. What I must do is to make them understand that I and God — —"

However bulging the man's eyes may have been and however assiduously he kept feeling in his pocket to make certain his imperial gold pieces were still safe, it must be allowed that there was an element of childlike simplicity in this page-boy of omnipotence oddly mingled with his inordinate conceit.

Some might say that men think in words and women in images; but if in the case of Bonaventura we were to enter the slippery topic of the syntax of psychic expression and begin to quarrel with his way of saying "I and God", it is only fair to remember that in speaking of his earthly parent he always said "I and my Father" instead of "My Father and I".

"What," so the man's thoughts ran on, as he gravely advanced beneath an unusually high arch and proceeded to leave the marble Tiberius and his sadistic stare behind, "I must make them understand is that I enjoy resisting temptation too much to run away, though it is true that in the Paternoster I pray God not to lead me into it. But I must make them understand that I have so yielded myself to God that His will is now my will and my will entirely His will. It would not be for people's good for me to let them know how much I enjoy gazing at the lovely little white breasts and delicious little white limbs of young girls; for vulgar, crude, rough, brutal, stupid, ordinary men wouldn't be able to get the pleasure I get from this. It is all in my love for God and in God's love for me. We love each other so much that I feel sure God allowed me to be with him — for this past-and-present intimacy is what you get when your love for God makes you feel one with Him — when He took the rib from Adam and out of it made Eve. When anyone loves God as I do He gives you wonderful privileges. For the sake of my great love for Him, God put back Time for me and allowed me to watch those embraces of Adam and Eve that created the human race, and the pleasure I get now from looking at this young girl is part of the pleasure which God, in return for my great love, allowed me to enjoy when He let me watch Adam embracing Eve."

Bonaventura had actually been clever enough as a boy to fool Saint Francis himself in this matter; for Saint Francis had regarded it as a perpetual miracle of grace the way in which his young friend resisted temptation, when all the while his young friend was enjoying the process of temptation itself more than he could possibly have enjoyed any fruition of desire.

Bonaventura was indeed thinking at this very moment that he might derive great satisfaction from a few weeks' residence in Lost Towers, as long as he could pretend he was resisting the most maddening temptation of his life, whereas in reality he was resisting nothing. He went on trailing his grey mantle, in this crafty pretence, through corridor after corridor, followed by the growling and grimacing, the gurgling and grinning, the gallivanting and gobemouching Baron Maldung, and in reality deliciously enlivened, not at all, as they were all believing, tormented, teased, and tantalized to the last exquisite point of provocation, by lovely little Lilith.

Farther and farther, on and on, he was led, trailing his grey garment, while the fingers of his left hand never loosened their firm clutch on the leather bag under his robe. Up stairway after stairway he had to go, down passage after passage, till the guest-chamber, where he was to sleep when supper was over, was reached at last. He had been in many feudal castles and o a few royal palaces all over Europe. He had been in several Moorish and Byzantine and Coptic sanctuaries all through Mesopotamia. But he had never been before in such a luxurious room as this. It was clear at once to him, as he turned his devouringly prominent eyes on the bed that was to receiveU him, and on the hot and cold and lukewarm water that was to bathe him, and on the incredible varieties of ointments and balmy balsams that were to anoint him, and on all these conveniently exposed and yet daintily barred coals of fire that were to warm him, and above all on the three lovely and alluring young sylphs, all delicately wearing the transparent fabrics and red-brown dyes and exotic hieroglyphs of Lost Towers, who were so anxious to serve him that if “he and God” decided to devote a few weeks to the purification, regeneration, sanctification, of all the dwellers in, and of all the dependents upon, these Lost Towers, there would be nothing in such delay to trouble the bodily well-being or vex the spiritual peace of God’s chosen servant.

But what was this? Suddenly, without warning, all his attendants vanished, and there was revealed to him a different aspect of life in this place. Borne upon winds that blew wildly through all its walls and over all its roofs, from forests that seemed to be beyond any forests of this world, and from swamps beyond any swamps of which he had ever heard, there came into that chamber the weird lamentable cry, ghastly and desperate, that had passed through every human building raised by the hand of man upon that particular spot since Britain was first divided from France by the salt sea: the cry of the wind that since the beginning of Time had made Lost Towers what it was.

Washed, anointed, oiled, combed and curled, catered for and courted by lovely attendants, and his purpose crowned by a miraculous concatenation of convenient conditions, Bonaventura's instinctive reaction, when he heard this unusual wailing in the rafters of the roof above him and this long-drawn melancholy moaning in the corridors and landings and stair-ways and cellars beneath him, was simply to feel peevishly annoyed with the God he worshipped. He didn't feel towards him as one heroic conspirator feels to another who has been propitiated and wheedled and fooled into betraying their cause.

What he felt was a simple irritation. God, he told himself, ought to have known better than allow the Powers of Darkness to make a saint, possessed of a piety like his piety, shiver. For shiver he did. The ministering angels who had been hovering round him must have known at the first faint stirring of these ancient black tapestries what was going to happen; for they all vanished before it happened.

There are those who might feel that, left alone with these alarming sounds, our saint's vexation with his deity was not uncalled for. All around him was black tapestry representing terrifying battles between unicorns and river-horses, the former more red than brown, and the latter more brown than red, but both of them woven against that background of black in such a way as to annihilate completely in that portion of the building all those emanations from free space, and all those blessed airs of boundless liberation, that are projected upon any atmosphere by the colours blue and green, quite apart from the objects that we are accustomed to see wearing these colours, such as blue sky and green grass. Reddish brown, and brownish red, and both of these in a peculiar and special mingling, such as Bonaventura had never seen in his life before, were diffused, not only from the tapestry in this weird place, but from rafters and ceilings and panels and doors, until a sort of atmospheric soul of that appalling colour, something that might indeed be called the mystic eidolon of that fearful and awful colour, permeated every square inch of the invisible air within these ill-fated walls.

Though of course in a sense you could only see it, in reality you were compelled to taste it, to swallow it, to touch it, to feel it, to absorb it, till it filled your whole body, as air fills a bubble.

Yes, those attendant sylphs must have known perfectly well what was coming, for at the first quivering ripple in the tapestry of his chamber, they were off. And then it seemed to Bonaventura that this devil in the wind had begun to cause, not only ructions in the wood-work of the room — for there were groanings and creakings everywhere — but yawning chasms in the floor of life; for gobbets of red-brownishness and globules of brown-reddishness seemed being belched forth from a pre-historic cleft in the original matter of creation itself, as if this protoplasm of all existing things were relieving itself of some obnoxious suppuration due to a primal injury.

Everybody he met in this part of Wessex, as he pursued his obstinate enquiries with regard to what he loved to call the devil-worship of Friar Bacon, had told him about this particular wind that had been felt at this particular spot since the world began; but he had never anticipated that he himself would feel it as powerfully as this. He felt disturbed, not frightened, he hastened to assure himself, but agitated. He found it impossible to walk up and down with his accustomed dignified stride. He gave way to a series of jerky impulsive movements.

Probably he would not have yielded to these nervous debouchings to north and west, to south and east, and then round the world again, if he had not been alone; for it is queer with us mortals how some of us have completely different codes of behaviour for moments in solitude and moments when others, even if it be only one other, are there.

Bonaventura's relations with God were peculiar to himself; for they were absolutely in the mind, or in the soul, that is to say, in his thoughts. He always took it for granted that God, being a Spirit, took no interest in, and had no effect upon, the movements of his body; unless points of conscience entered, which of course changed everything.

Poor Bonaventura! He hurried headlong down the passage outside his door till it ended in a door that was sealed up, as if it led to a mausoleum of the bones of lost angels. Back again he hurried, till he reached the top of the stairs that led down to the lower floors of the building; at which point he suddenly felt the curious sensation, not amounting to a night-mare-panic but belonging to the same special kind of fantastic horror, that he used to feel when his pious mother told him in his childhood how the Witch of Endor called up the prophet from the grave.

He kept sitting down on his luxurious bed and then walking again down the passage. Had there been any luckless prisoner chained in the cell at the end of that passage, the rustle of that grey robe would have sounded like a new kind of wind from the limbo-cradle of Chaos.

Not for a moment did it enter the mind of Bonaventura that God had forsaken him. What he really felt, if the truth must be told, was that it was a shame and a disgrace that he, the recognized chief saint of all the saints on earth, should have, as his all-powerful and omnipotent deity, a deity who at an important crisis like this was not alive to the necessity of impressing these absurd and childish sons of Belial with the spiritual advantage they were bound to gain from associating with so famous a saint.

Yes, if the actual truth has to be told, it was with real irritation against his Creator that Bonaventura hitched up his grey robe, made the face he always made when he was undertaking something that required a real effort of courage — that is to say, sucked his lower lip into his mouth and tried hard to rumple and fold and curl his curiously malleable lips over his teeth, till these latter resembled broken shells pinched tight within the squeezed-up remnants of a mutilated jelly-fish, and boldly began to descend the narrow winding stone steps that led to the lower stories of the building.

The only balustrade to support a person descending these winding stairs was a ship's rope fastened to the wall by large bronze rings. Instead of the usual narrow arrow-slits all the way down in the massive outer wall of this descent, there was a foot-wide barred window on every landing, and through these windows came not only the full force of the wind but just now a most curious evening light, that struck the consciousness of this continental traveller as the very incarnation of the wailing of the wind.

It was a wet white light, and it was a white light that had a way of blurring and even of deforming and disfiguring the outlines of the objects it surrounded. Our visitor after a quick glance at the dark oaken doors, which on every landing — and he passed three in his descent — faced these windows, paused for a while on each landing to stare out between the rusty window-bars.

There was something about the white light, as it lifted every object the man looked at out of its own airy ocean and presented it to his vision, as if it were particularly anxious that he should fully take in how it was isolated in its individual identity from all the other objects, each of which, if he would only continue staring through those rusty bars, should in their proper sequence be presented to his attention.

It was from the window of the last of these small landings that he caught sight of what was obviously an enormous oak-tree, by the side of which was standing a large white lamb. Both the tree and the creature by its side were presented to the saintly traveller as if they had been mystical symbols, divided from all other visible objects in this white thick encircling sea of light.

The branches of the oak-tree were creaking in this unusual wind in a peculiarly personal manner, as if they were chanting the syllables of an immemorial incantation that the tree had learnt from the low mound on which it grew, and that the mound had learnt from some unknown angelic power that had been hovering round when that horrible devilish attack had been made upon the mass of formless matter out of which the world arose.

The oak-tree was now trying to persuade the troubled creature at its side to accept the creaking and husky chant of its branches as the true oracular response to such agitated bleating on this wild night. The pleasure which Bonaventura derived from contemplating this ancient tree, and hearing its liturgical chant to its troubled year-old companion, was considerably interfered with by the annoyance he felt at God’s behaviour.

Yes, there was something that scraped and scratched his nerves in the petulant irritation he felt with God for letting this wind disturb everything. It is true that something in him responded to the storm. The creaking branches of that incredibly aged oak, borne on this wild wind that seemed to be carrying some desperate message to every ghost in Britain, did certainly — let us be fair to the man — have its effect on his Italian sensibility. But all the romantic emotion Bonaventura derived from it was spoilt by something vexing, fretting, chafing, ruffling, that came with the thought that God wasn’t protecting his partner in sanctity with the whole-hearted consideration which that partner’s life-long devotion deserved.

And yet, in spite of what he regarded as justifiable annoyance with God, Bonaventura couldn't resist pressing his head against those rusty bars; and, like many other watchers from stone towers at that epoch — like young Lil-Umbra, for instance, as she watched, not many days ago, the encounter between Ghosta and Lilith — he was rewarded for his instinctive curiosity by a very unexpected event.

This was indeed nothing less than the appearance beside that oak-tree of none other than the bearded Baron Boncor of Cone, mounted on his war-horse, Basileus, and still writhing in pain from Maldung's arrow stuck fast in his shoulder.

Bonaventura was very rarely driven to action by more than one strong emotion at the same time; and it would have been extremely unlike him to do anything but remain absolutely passive, when the instinct to cry out a warning to the rulers of Lost Towers strove in his breast with an instinct to do something to get that arrow out of Boncor's shoulder. For to do Bonaventura justice, there was not a speck or grain of sadism in him — that is to say, of delight in cruelty purely for its own sake.

What he would really have liked to do, secretly, quietly, unheard of by the people of the place, was to slip out of the house, extract that arrow from the man's shoulder, and command him, in the name of the Pope, to gallop off.

What he now saw however reduced both instinctive impulses to nothing; and he just watched, in petrified fascination. For the bearded man suddenly leapt from the saddle and advanced between the trunk of the oak and the bleating young motherless sheep with the obvious intention of caressing it, if it allowed him to approach. But above the creaking of the oak's branches and the disconsolate moaning of the wind rose that lamb's cry, as it bounded off with its heavy tail swinging between its legs.

But at that very second the movement forward of the bearded Lord of Cone brought the arrow in his shoulder close to the mouth of his war-horse, who promptly, quietly, neatly and expeditiously seized it with his teeth, and plucking it forth with one quick backward jerk of his head, bit it in half and let it fall against the roots of the tree, from which position both its bloody point and its agitated feathers were whirled away on the wind towards the reeds of the swamp.

It was clear that the loss of blood following the arrow's extraction left the genial Lord of Cone too weak to remount his saviour, for even with his arm round the animal's neck when he tried to lead it away, he kept tottering so unsteadily that finally he evidently resolved to take very daring measures, for he lengthened the horse's bridle by tying to it the long leather strap he was in the habit of using to tether him, so that he could eat grass or anything else he fancied while he was left alone, and proceeded to fasten these elongated reins round his own waist. Then shouting to the animal a brief and clear command in a familiar phrase well known to them both — a phrase that suggested hastening straight home to stable and straw and a well-filled bin — he folded his cloak about him and rolled over on his stomach with both arms outspread and his head thrown back.

Over the soft forest-grass, that was a special kind of grass and as delicate and tenuous as a mermaid's hair, and over the brown floor of the pine-needles Basileus now dragged his master, and did this so effectively that it wasn't very long before Bonaventura's eyes could follow them no further. Then and only then and not till then, he left the window, and calmly descending the remaining flight of stairs, directed his steps to where the sounds and smells and wavering lights and shadows made the locality of the supper-chamber discoverable.

He was clearly expected, although nobody had suggested waiting for him. But he was no sooner within the dining-hall than agitation upon agitation shook him. Why hadn't these people sent somebody to fetch him, to accompany him into this dining-hall, to tell him where he was supposed to sit? They had waited on him, bathed him, anointed him, and then just left him to find his way alone to his seat at this important meal! That wasn't the way to treat a person who, in the depth of his noble, heroic, spiritual, intellectual, and absolutely unique nature, was struggling at this very moment with the Greatest Temptation possible to a Great Man — namely whether to decide at this turning-point in his life to aim at acquiring the appearance of possessing the sort of statesmanlike sagacity which a man must appear to have if he is to be elected Pope, or simply to go on, as he was doing at present, emphasizing the unusual perfection of his spiritual purity as a real saint.

Something about the vision of the horse Basileus, pulling the arrow from the shoulder of that fair-bearded man and dragging him as if he'd been a load of hay over both brown earth and green earth, remained vivid in Bonaventura's mind. He had the uncomfortable sensation that his own fate was being pulled along by a Power over which he himself had only partial control.

And yet he kept telling himself that this feeling could not possibly represent the truth. No one in the whole world, he kept telling himself, had as close and intimate a relation with God as he had. Of that he was absolutely certain. It was his life, his destiny, his whole being! It was what made Bonaventura to be Bonaventura; and all the world knew it!

Nobody who had ever lived understood God and the Will of God as thoroughly as he did I Nobody who had ever lived, except Jesus Christ — and of course you couldn't bring Him into such a calculation — talked to God as he did, and was talked to by God as he was. There could be no question; there could be no doubt about it. He and God understood each other in and out, up and down, body and soul, back and front!

As he moved slowly round that great square table with patient dignity and unflagging self-respect, he told himself that he and God must consider more carefully than they had done before, whether it would be better for the world if the cardinals in conclave decided, when the present Pope died, to elect him as his successor, or better for the world that they should nominate that one among them that he, Bonaventura, decided possessed the cleverest and the most practical brain.

"O God, my beloved companion," he prayed desperately, as his staring eyes caught sight of a red stain on the edge of the table where Lady Lilt was seated, "I implore you to give me the power tonight, so to impress this evil woman and this evil man and this evil daughter, that it is resounded all over Christendom from the Thames to the Danube that Saint Bonaventura has snatched Lost Towers out of the jaws of Hell!"

It was then that he noticed that there was a large empty throne near where Baron Maldung was sitting, made of the sort of wood and of the sort of woven fabric covering the wood that lent themselves best to receiving the red-brown dye, and that next to this throne Lilith was resting, her entrancing white thighs exposed in such a manner that a man seated in that chair would naturally and inevitably, as he poured out his wine, rest his free hand upon one of those perfect limbs and lightly slide his caressing fingers between it and its mate.

He also noticed that the young girl herself was looking intently at him as he advanced towards where she sat. The air must have been full of strangely contradictory currents of thought as the saintly man approached that empty throne; for the intensity of these airy battles caused a deep hush to fall upon that whole assembly of revellers.

It was at this point that Bonaventura commanded in a clear voice one of the attendants to tie a white napkin securely round his eyes, "Lest I should forget for a moment before you all," he said aloud, "the vows of purity I have made."

The motives that led him to this move were subtler than he could himself have explained; but to one among them, had his conscience prodded him, he would have shamelessly confessed — namely, a fear that it might be supposed he was so hungry and so greedy that the nakedness of Lilith was no temptation to him at all, in fact that he didn't give her presence a thought. He even went so far as to repeat these words about his vow of purity as he allowed himself, still in the same dead silence, and taking exaggerated precautions not to stumble over any obstacle in the way, to be helped to reach his throne, and to be aided in seating himself there in close proximity to Lilith.

When, however, his hand fell, as fate beyond all human control compelled it to fall, upon that soft bare thigh, a shock of unmitigated lust so overpowered him as to change every plan he had made. Lust quivered through him with a compulsion so convulsive as to drive him into unexpected action. With something like a savage bound he leapt to his feet.

"I must beg you all," he cried in a hoarse voice, a voice that was almost like an animal's growl, "to — to pardon me": and then in a second, while they all stared at him in amazement, he had recovered his self-possession.

"The truth is," he went on, addressing them all easily and quietly, as if in some senatorial or ecclesiastical assembly, "the truth is, it is a privilege that I have been allowed by the Most High, to have illuminations or revelations direct from Himself. Such an illumination I have just had, bidding me leave you tonight and bidding me to ask you for a few important favours so as to make my departure easier, and my reception — for that is where my revelation tells me I must spend this coming night — at the Fortress of Roque more friendly and gracious.

“What my revelation commands me to beg from you is simply this, that you put at my disposal a very quiet horse, preferably an old and good-tempered horse, such as I shall be able myself to ride, and, in addition to this, put me in the care of a small party of well-armed horsemen, who will hand me over in safety to the gatekeeper of Roque Fortress and then return to you at once without demanding anything for themselves, anything except” — here Bonaventura’s voice rose to something that resembled the clanging of a great cracked bell— “except what I am now going to make plain to you all.”

That the man was sincere in the emotion he displayed must at any rate have been plain to all. One undeniable manifestation of it was the fact that as he spoke he wept, and as he wept his mouth and cheeks assumed the only too familiar screwed-up grimace of a small child in a fit of crying, and there was something weirdly and grotesquely impressive about the ringing and yet broken words with which this emotional saint, who had the power of weeping without sobbing, began to make his point clear.

“As you know only too well, you people of Lost Towers, there is a conspiracy against you through this whole district, based on the absurd idea that you are — what of course we all are, for it is the unusual condition of the children of men — more evil than good.

“Now this is what I propose to do on your behalf, my dear friends, and it is extremely simple. I had thought that the conclave of cardinals intended — at least that is what I imagined my angel of revelation hinted to me — to elect me Pope; but I no longer think that this is their intention. What I believe now to be the purpose of God is that I am to watch very carefully the whole array of ecclesiastical leaders, and when I have decided which particular one would make the ablest Pope, that I should pray night and day for the welfare of that good and wise man; and then, when the present Pope dies, I can name as his successor the man I have been observing and praying for all these days.

"Yes, I can name him at the conclave of cardinals; and I think, without serious opposition, get him elected Pope. And this is what I can do for you, my friends of Lost Towers, in return for your kindness to me. When I and God — I mean of course when God and I — have appointed the next Pope, and he is firmly seated in the Chair of Saint Peter, he will naturally wish to reward his heavenly Helper who is God, as well as his earthly Helper who is I.

"It is then that I shall make it clear to the Holy Father how he can reward us both at the same time. I shall tell him how he may spend on behalf of Lost Towers a good round sum of Saint Peter's shekels. I shall tell him that Lost Towers has been for centuries like those cities in Palestine that God told Moses to build for the runaways from justice, who wanted to cling to the horns of the altars of the Levites and there to escape being slain by the avengers of blood. I shall tell him that he had better build an Aims-House for the aged of both sexes, in the immediate vicinity of Lost Towers, with six small independent houses for women, and a larger house of two stories for the Master of the establishment. I shall tell the Pope that the inmates had better be called 'Tower Canons' and 'Tower Canonesses', and that he had better pay the Master of the place a good large income yearly, so as to render him completely independent of all influence from outside. The name of the Holy Father, whether that name be Leo or Pius or Gregory or Martin or Nicholas or Clement or Urban, shall be, I shall assure him, inscribed over the gateway to the Master’s Lodge, where it shall remain forever and forever.

“And now there remains only one thing more I must ask of you all, namely, that none of you will conceal from the world, but rather will reveal to the world in all directions, that it is purely and simply by the sudden appearance among you of me and God — I mean of course of God and me — that you have all been so absolutely and entirely turned from the error of your ways as to call upon the Pope and God — I mean of course upon God and the Pope — to raise up in your midst such a monument of your conversion as this Lost Towers Aims-House for aged runaways from the justice of the kingdoms of subsequent generations. This having been built, your remotest descendants will fall upon their knees on this spot, and tap the very ground where Lost Towers stands, in reverence and worship for evermore!

“And do you ask me, my lovely Daughter of the house — and do you ask me, my gracious Lady of the house — and do you ask me, O great Baron of Lost Towers! — what your evermore loyal and devoted pair of friends, I and God, are going to do next, when you have escorted us to the Fortress of Roque and have left us with the Gate-Keeper of Roque and have returned in peace to your own place?

“Well, I will tell you in a moment what I and God intend to do next. But, before telling you, I must let you know that the instinct in me which orders every smallest move I make, and half-creates everything I hear, see, touch, feel, or even smell, compels me to insist once again, as I always do, and always must do, wherever I go upon the surface of this earth, that the whole secret of the ultimate mystery of life is contained in those precious, holy, sweet, delectable, celestial, angelic, cherubic, seraphic, ineffable four letters composing the word Love!

"Love is simply all there is! And it is more than that. It is all there was and all there will ever be! Love is like water and air and fire; and it goes flowing, floating, flaming, round the earth, penetrating the earth, proliferating the earth, perforating the earth, and one day swallowing up the earth!

"And yet you ask what I and God are going to do next, when you, my loving friends, have left me at Roque. I will tell you in simple language. We, that is to say the All-powerful whose essence is Love, and I his humble, his negligible, his self-obliterating, self-negating, self-annihilating servant, whose essence is obedience and who has made his will my will to a degree bewildering to the whole human race, have decided that the Devil has incarnated Himself in the personality of this notorious magician, Roger Bacon, who devotes his time, his money, his leisure, his learning, wholly, entirely, and absolutely to inventing and constructing a Head of Brass that shall think as a man, and speak as a man, and even utter opinions on how the country should be ruled, like a man.

"Well, my dear friends, you who are now announcing to the entire world that you yourselves, by the mediation of his less than nothing servant, who is your do-nothing, tittle-nothing, scrap-nothing, flip-nothing, pip-nothing of a beggarly Bonaventura, are about to accept the pardon and peace of a stately Aims-House from the Holy Father, may now learn that the great God of Love and I, his disciple in Love, are about to punish, punish, punish, punish this thrice-accurst Roger Bacon, till not only his Brazen Head but his own worse than brazen skull will split into atoms.

"Yes, my beloved friends, who have today begun telling the whole world how dearly I, who am His most loving lover since the time when John of Love his very self lay in His bosom, do verily and utterly love you and how I have shown it with regard to the Holy Father, I am going to tell you now how God through me and I through God will punish this abomination of desolation who calls himself Friar Bacon!"

Here he paused to observe the effect of his words upon his hearers, and it was clear to Lilith, who by this time had stolen round to the bottom of the table with a long black mantle wrapt hastily round her and was gazing intently at him with quivering lips and ghastly-white cheeks, that he was well-satisfied with the depth, the gulf, the abyss of silence into which his audience had been precipitated. "No," he proceeded, in a very curious voice, the sort of voice a vulture might use who was holding in its claws, before the hungry beaks of its young, a dying lamb, from whose body, at each gasp of its breath, that is to say from each place where a claw entered its flesh, there ran a stream of blood, "no! no!" he went on, "and I am sure you will all understand exactly what I mean. For a man like this, who knows enough Greek to read the heathen philosophers, and enough Hebrew to pervert and twist the words of Jehovah to Moses, there is only one punishment. What I and God, I mean what God and I, have decided to do with him is to keep him in prison on bread and water, and take all his books and all the paraphernalia he uses in his inventions away from him, and thus compel him to live the life of a real Grey Friar — in other words compel this archdevil to live the life of a saint! His work is an open insult to the Order to which I who speak to you belong. What made him join us then, do you ask? Purely and simply to support himself while he went on with his devilish inventions! His family were ruined. He was without the means of subsistence. And so he became a Franciscan Friar. He must have said to himself: 'I will go on with the inventions with which I shall eventually destroy both their worship and themselves,' — do you catch the devilry of his idea, beloved friends?— 'And meanwhile I shall live at their expense.'"

No sooner had Bonaventura finished speaking than Lady Lilt and Sir Maldung, as well as Lilith, whose long black mantle now trailed after her as she moved, made a circle round him, all three of them talking excitedly and at the same time.

It was not, however, as may easily be imagined, until after a prolonged and delicious supper at this same table — without the need for any blindfolding, and after a prolonged and undisturbed sleep in that luxurious bed on the top floor, without the need for any attendant sylphs, and without even knowing whether the wind was blowing or not — that the General of the Franciscan Friars, on just the sort of horse he had asked for, and with just the sort of escort he wanted, set out in the morning for the Fortress of Roque.

X. THE JEW FROM TARTARY

PELEG TOOK SWIFT decisive measures, precipitate measures they might be called, to ascertain that it really and truly was, without any doubt or question, his true love of that wild night when his life was saved by Sir Mort on those crusader-battled borders between East and West, and when he made that vow of devoted fidelity to him into which he threw at one drastic fling all his Jewish intensity and all his Mongolian strength of will. And though his feeling about her was so absolute that there were moments when it actually rendered him as limp as a bending reed, he was aware at the same time of a strange shyness at the thought of their facing each other.

It was with something of a double motive, therefore, partly in order to put off for a little while longer the actual moment of this overwhelming encounter, and partly to make sure he was doing nothing treacherous to his sworn lord and master, Sir Mort, that well before noon on a fine February day, Peleg set out, when all his domestic tasks were over, to make sure of meeting this eccentric head of the House of Abyssum.

It was the very morning of the unexpected arrival of Bonaventura at the great gates of the Fortress and the morning also of the instantaneous departure, the moment the gate-keeper appeared, of a band of curious riders in ramshackle armour and motley patches of red-brown cloth.

What Peleg did to make sure of catching Sir Mort as he came out of the Fortress — for he knew enough of Lady Valentia’s weakness for distinguished foreigners to be quite certain that her husband, whatever feeling he might have for or against the General of the Franciscan Friars, wouldn’t stay long as a partner to their talk — was to run at full speed across the piece of ground that separated the point at which the big gates were visible from the point at which the postern-entrance was visible, a distance which he could cover in time enough to catch Sir Mort departing from either of the two exits.

He took care to carry with him his mace with the iron spikes round its heavy circular head, for he had vivid memories of certain occasions when Sir Mort was all for carrying him off on a sudden foray and he had to insist on returning for his favourite weapon.

It was outside the postern that he finally caught his man, and the dialogue that followed was eminently characteristic of them both.

"That fellow with the staring eyes is after my John's friend, Friar Bacon. Holy Jesus, but he's the devil of a wizard-hunter! Do you know what he wants? But of course I'll do nothing of the kind; though Lady Val thinks I ought to! He wants me to swear to Bog of Bumset that the Pope has told him I must take a few muscular serfs with me and haul the Brazen Head down from Bacon's cell and lug the confounded thing here; so that here, if you please, here in our own grounds, here in this very strip of forest, the best piece of hunting-ground in the Manor, I can have this curst Brazen Head of his smashed to bits — to bits, mind you, and here, within a bow-shot, here, in less than a bow-shot, of this shrine Tilton's so keen on building; and very well he's building it too!

"If I'm a good fighter, Peleg, my Gim-crack Jew, Tilton's a good designer, a good builder, a good carver, and a good one, I shouldn't wonder too, at getting rid of smoke and soot. And here's this staring-eyed fellow, who thinks his grey mantle's as grand as Caesar's purple, wants us to hammer to bits in front of my boy's shrine a wizard-oracle, to whose funeral will come no doubt twenty devils far worse than any Brazen Head, who, when they see Tilton's shrine to the Mother of God, you can bet your big Tartar soul, they'll all come huddling into our house, and scenting out quick enough where my bed is, hug each other under it till midnight, and then —— No, by God! I'm not going to have any Brazen Head hammered to bits in front of my door!"

Peleg had wisely held his peace during this indignant outburst; but as it went on he discovered that, without having said to himself anything resembling, "Now, my good friend, it's your business to think out carefully where your interest lies in all this," he had perceived, in a flash, in a pulse-beat, in the whirl of a swallow's wings, just what he must say.

"O you are so right, dear my lord!" he murmured, leaning in such a manner upon the handle of his iron mace as not to tower above the man who had saved him and whom he served forever, "and I have just by good chance discovered something that will make it possible, I really do think, for me to be of more real use to you than alas! considering I owe everything to you, I can often be."

"Aye? What's that? What are you saying, big man? Have you caught this staring-eyed Pontifex-Cockolorum in flagrante delicto? Have you found him raping our Abbess?"

"May I speak quite freely, my lord?"

"Of course! Don't we always? I to thee and thou to me's the tune! So out with it, my Lion of Judah and Behemoth of Karakorum!"

"But, my dear lord, it goes back a long way and concerns my own private life very deeply. It is indeed, if you will allow me to say so, my dear lord, my chief secretum secretorum, and it is only because it was a thing of despair rather than of hope that I kept it to myself."

A peculiar tone in the giant's voice quieted Sir Mort's wrought-up nerves. He fumbled at the leather belt round his waist that kept his hunting horn in a convenient position.

"Tell me straight out, Peleg, old friend, what you're talking about."

"About a woman, my lord."

"Ah! Ah! And what a double-dyed fool I was not to think of that before! Here have you been, a proud, handsome, majestic, powerful man, and, just because you're such a giant and outside the category of common men, I let myself — fool that I was! — assume that you lacked the natural feelings of every man born into the world who isn't a sodomite! Well, old friend, tell me her name quick, and where she's to be found, and by God! I'll get her for you even if she lives in Karakorum!"

Peleg did not hesitate. "She is a girl I made friends with just before that bloody fight, where, save for you, my lord, I should now be under the earth. Her name is Ghosta. She is a Jewess from Mesopotamia and she is now working in the Abbess's kitchen here. Lay-Brother Tuck from Prior Bog's kitchen told me about her. He told Friar Bacon too about her and the Friar wished to see her, and she went to see him, unknown to her nuns and unknown to the Prior."

"So that's it!" chuckled Sir Mort with a friendly grimace. "Kitchen to kitchen, eh? And do you want to marry this ghost of a girl from Mesopotamia? If that's the idea, you old Jewish Goliath, you'll have to go to Lady Val. She's the one who arranges our matrimonial affairs. But I daresay I could — but what's the matter, Peleg? Do you feel ill? You're not going to faint are you? You look as if you'd seen something worse than a ghost-girl!"

"I — haven't — seen — her — yet," stammered the agitated giant.

Sir Mort looked at him intently. "You're bewitched, old friend. There's no doubt about it. I see you're feeling exactly the sort of thing that I felt myself when I fell in love with Lady Val a quarter of a century ago, when I'd only caught one glimpse of her at the Winchester tourney. Well, the best thing you can do, Peleg my lad, is to go straight away now and find your girl and have a good talk, a long talk with her, and discover what she wants to do! She may be so happy with those nuns and made such a pet of, that she won't want to consider moving to the Fortress kitchen, even if Lady Val had room for her here. On the other hand she may — Holy Jesus, take care! What is the matter with you? Are you ill, Peleg?"

The giant would indeed have fallen prone on his face if Sir Mort hadn't caught him in his arms. He hadn't lost consciousness however; and when his master propt him up in a sitting-posture with his broad back against the trunk of a pine, he still had the wit left to grope for his iron mace, and when he'd got it in his grasp, to prop it up between his knees, the round bronze ball of its handle, about the size of an apple, pressing against his chin.

Sir Mort laid a hand on his head. "What you want, my boy, is a sip of that strong water Nurse used to give Tilton when he got one of his fainting-fits. If I weren't afraid of those damned red devils from Lost Towers, who brought that Bonaventura here, lighting on you and slaughtering you or carrying you off, I'd leave you here and get a drop of that stuff from Nurse. Look up, big sonny! Let a man see your face. If you're bewitched to this tune, before you've even seen the wench, what'll you be when you meet her face to face?"

At this the giant did raise his head, and the two men stared gravely for a moment into each other's eyes. Then Sir Mort hesitated no longer. "By the wounds of Jesus, I'll risk it! Don't you dare to move! And if any of those red-jerkin'd villains come along, you just pretend to be dying till they get near and then give them what for with your iron mace! If you threaten one of the sods with it, the rest will bolt!"

And with a nod and a grim shadow of a smile, he took himself off; and Peleg was left alone, propt up against that pine. His feelings grew queerer and queerer as he waited. “Am I really bewitched?” he thought, “and is it possibly that she’s always been some kind of a demon and not a real girl at all? Well; I’ll be damned if I care if she is a demon. She’s my true love, demon or no demon. I’d sooner go down to Hell with her than to the highest Heaven with anybody else!

“But it’s all very well for me to think like that! The point is: what does she think? It’s no good for me to go on telling myself these crazy stories about her, while she, maybe, doesn’t give me a thought, or, if she does, has lost all wish to see me again! Besides I must remember that by this time she’s older, and no doubt wiser, and may not at all be in a mood to be carried away by the great love of a hulking monster like me. She’s probably decided that all this business of having children and taking care of children, and having a man and taking care of a man, is simply slavery; whereas if she retains her maidenhood and finds some work for herself that suits her and that doesn’t tax her strength beyond a certain point, she may go on being absolutely independent.

“Of course her danger in that direction would be the risk of becoming a nun with holy Jesus in the offing and the Holy Ghost — Ghost for Ghosta! — on the horizon. And this sort of life must in many ways, when you really come to think of it in detail, be no independence at all! O Ghosta, Ghosta, what are you, now at this very moment, thinking about? Does the faintest thought of your lover ever cross your mind?”

At this point Peleg’s cogitations were interrupted by the reappearance of Sir Mort accompanied by both his sons; nor did our Mongolian fail to notice that, as usually happened in their father’s company, the two lads were in a state of quiet fraternal expectation, ready for anything to happen, and interested in anything that did happen, but not engaged in an angry argument, as they had such a tendency to be when with their mother or their sister.

“You’re sure your mother said it was pure Neapolitan, that white wine, and not some crazy drink that Tuck of Bumset has concocted and that’s been smuggled into our kitchen from theirs?”

Sir Mort’s words were addressed to Tilton, who held in his hands with exemplary care a four-sided bottle of colourless liquid closed with a glass stopper of an emerald tint.

“O yes, Father,” Tilton replied, quietly enough, but with obvious eagerness to see what effect upon the gigantic patient this particular beverage would have, and excitedly ready to be the one called upon to administer this cure for over-excitement.

“Mother said she’d just given a glass of it to Nurse when Nurse was so upset by Lil-Umbra’s taking John’s side — wasn’t she, John? — that her hands shook till she dropped a plate on the stone floor and it broke into three pieces; and John said — didn’t you, John? — that one piece was Lil-Umbra and one was himself and one was me. Here it is! Shall I give it to Peleg?”

Sir Mort gravely nodded; and Peleg taking it from the boy’s hand, and removing the stopper, poured the whole contents of the bottle down his throat in three long gulps. The effect on the big man was instantaneous. He handed back the phial that had contained this saving grace to Tilton; and quite calmly and naturally squared his shoulders, grasped his great mace by the middle, and bending his head automatically towards his master, and deliberately and with great dignity towards the two lads, went off with long and rapid strides in the direction of the Priory and the Convent.

As he went, the strangest feelings swept through him, affecting his attitude to everything in the world. He felt perfectly calm, but prepared to fight to the death, for two inexhaustible causes, each of which he saw at that moment in close connection with a separate aspect of the scenery through which he was hurrying, the first with a long line of stately pines and the second with a distant hill-top upon which at that moment rested a large white cloud.

His first cause was to win Ghosta against all the world, and his second was, when once he had won her, to fight on behalf of her people, her tribe, her ideas, her religion — yes, on behalf of everything that belonged to her, of everything she loved and represented, of everything she had set her heart upon, whether to do or to enjoy.

There was even a third cause that came to him as he passed a dark avenue descending into a mossy gully; and this was to fight to the death against all the things and people and customs and ways and systems and institutions, which she loathed and hated! It was just when he was passing this sombre declivity, which the Sun himself, even at the high hour of noon, seemed to hesitate to enter, that he heard behind him the sound of running feet and the quick panting breath of the runner.

He stopped and swung round, tightening his hold on his mace. And there, behold, was young John! John never looked his age. He was over eighteen; but any stranger seeing him as he looked at that moment would have taken him for sixteen or seventeen. John's eyes were hazel in colour, and were large and full of spirit; in fact they gave the impression that his soul was much nearer the surface of his skin than is usual with young men; and as Peleg waited till the lad got his breath, he told himself that it was no wonder this learned Friar, whom everyone talked about, enjoyed teaching a boy like this.

"Father sent me," John said, "because he thought it might help if I were to go into the Convent and say that mother was very anxious to see her and had sent me to fetch her; and then, of course, after we three were out of their sight, I could come home alone. Father said it would seem quite all right for you to take her back later, and that mother would really be very glad to see her at the Fortress."

Peleg stared down at him for a second in silence. Then he said slowly, "Your Father is extremely wise in these things. And of course when my friend and I are once safe in the Fortress, we can find out whether Lady Val would really like to see her or not. Yes, come on Master John, and we'll see what happens!"

But as they threaded their way together between the trunks of the pines, that seemed to grow especially tall in this particular corner of the Manor, Peleg cursed the hour he had decided to take his master into his confidence. "It's always unsafe to get their help," he told himself. "They are so different from us. They do everything quicker, and yet, in a manner, more sideways, than we do things. But I expect I'm silly in not being overjoyed at this young master's help. And yet I don't know! How can I be glad to have anyone else, anybody at all, present when I first see Ghosta again? O but I've been a prize fool to let them into my secret! And yet on the other hand what would I have done with Ghosta if I hadn't had this help? Where, in the name of all the devils, would I have taken her? As it is now, Lady Val may give her a place in their Fortress kitchen? But will she want that to happen? Girls are queer cattle! They live their own life quite apart from us. Thai's what these damned Nordic crusaders never have, and never will, understand!"

Peleg was so moved by this psychic discovery that he broke his silence. "What is your opinion of girls, Master John?"

John's eyes became absolutely brilliant, like two lamps lit by a divine flame in the Holy Tabernacle of the Ark of the Covenant.

"O I adore them! I worship them! I embrace — in my mind of course, or in my imagination — every single one of them I meet! Off, off, off, off I slip their pretty clothes! And oh! so quickly I'm hugging them! But that's the worst of it, for it's the whole of the best of it, and the end of it! For I have an ecstasy at once, and all my soul rushes out, and all my seed is gone, in a minute, and I've no strength left to ravish them and take their divine maidenheads!

"That's my trouble, Peleg; and I don't see how I can get over it! I don't see how I'm ever to enjoy a woman properly, or ever to have a child, or ever to become a grandfather and a great-grandfather and a great-great-grandfather and a real proper ancestor! Tilton's quite different. I think — only it's a great secret, of course, between you and me — but I think Tilton's already got a girl who lives round here. She's a very, very slim girl, and she goes about with a little child, her niece I think it is, called Bet, who's a very nice kid.

"Bet and I made great friends when we were waiting for Tilton. Tilton doesn't like girls — he says they don't understand architecture. His girl's name is Oona and her Father or Grandfather is that rebellious serf, you know the one I mean? The one who got on so well with old Heber; but then Heber has the trick of propitiating everybody; whereas this Dod Pole — I expect you know him — is now in perpetual trouble with Randy."

Having finished his discourse John flung upwards a quick glance from his lustrous eyes to see whether the giant at his side had taken it all in, or had allowed his mind to wander; for with an intense interest in particular aspects of life, and a tendency to philosophise at some length on these aspects, young John frequently caught people's attention wandering from what he was saying; and this made him intermittently cautious, though he hated to have to stop and scrutinize his listener.

But just then he had to be content with a hurried nod, for they had arrived at the door of the Convent. “Father said for me to go straight in,” the lad now whispered to Peleg who was bending down to hear his instructions, “and not to come out with the girl — her name is Ghosta, isn’t it? — but to wait inside till you’ve gone off with her: but I expect I’ll be seeing you later, and maybe her too, so I’ll only say ‘good-luck’ and not ‘good night’, Peleg”; and with these last syllables vibrating round his youthful figure, he advanced boldly to the great loose chain which was hanging from an aperture in the top part of the massive black door, and this he pulled three times, and Peleg could distinctly catch the reverberation of its echoing resonance from inside the building.

The ringer hadn’t to wait. The door opened almost at once, making an aperture of about six inches, and after a brief parley with a dim, white-coifed figure, like a pale kernel in a cracked nut, the lad went inside and the door was closed. There was only one tree near this closed entrance and that was an ancient birch with a remarkably mottled trunk and only two branches, which branches, being very high up, were like the arms of a crucified queen who guarded the place by day and night and threatened every intruder.

Calmly and deliberately the huge Hebraic Mongol settled himself on the ground with his back against this solitary tree and awaited his fate. He had to wait a long time; but the curious thing was that while he waited now he felt himself to be entirely free from that sickening lethargy which had so loosened his knees and which required a whole bottle of Neapolitan white wine to remove from his midriff.

And then the closed doors opened, opened more quietly than when they had shut, and there she was! He automatically clutched his iron mace, as if the building behind her and the tree behind him had been a host of enemies, and with it in his hand he leapt up from the ground and bounded towards her.

When he reached that tall, stately, slender figure, in a black mantle with a black hood — who gazed straight into his face with eyes as dark and beautiful, and, to his feelings, just then, as terrifyingly prophetic, as must have been the eyes of Deborah, the wife of Heber the Kenite, or of Miriam, the sister of Moses — Peleg allowed his mace with its terrible spikes to fall to the ground. He could do nothing but just stand helplessly in front of her, muttering over and over again the blind words: “Ghosta! So you’ve really and truly come! Ghosta! So you’ve really and truly come!”

But she, with a gesture like that of a warrior-queen, whose lightest word was obeyed by thousands, lifted both her arms towards him, took his bare head in her bare hands, and, drawing it down towards her breast, kissed him on the forehead.

Peleg felt this to be a momentous kiss, a sacramental kiss, a kiss belonging to a ritual for the union of a man and a woman that was older than Sodom and Gomorrha, older than Tyre and Sidon, older than Babylon and Nineveh.

For a moment he stood with his eyes closed; and then, with a deep gasp for breath, as if he had just defeated an army of rivals, he bent down and picked up his iron weapon. This he now grasped tightly in his right hand, and taking Ghosta’s right hand in his own left, he led her away, up a mossy slope between scattered yellow stalks of last autumn’s bracken and a few dead clumps of last summer’s heather, till, completely hidden from any possible onlookers from either Convent or Priory, he led her into the entrance chamber of the cave of Manawyddan, which had been a favourite resort of his since he first followed Sir Mort to that district of Wessex.

The cave was indeed so completely hidden by a grove of alders and willows that it was by no means universally known even to natives of those parts. The two of them had no sooner entered it than Ghosta's whole attitude changed. The maternal heart in her was at once touched to the quick by the various little semi-domestic arrangements that this gigantic lover of hers had made in this secret hermitage of his, such as the strewings of dry reeds that covered the floor, such as a couple of great iron trivets, one of which was carrying a deep copper basin and the other supporting a kind of extempore frying-pan which had clearly served its purpose extremely well not so very long ago. In one corner of the cave there was a large earthenware bowl of water and by the side of it a little jug with a handle that looked more Greek than Roman for ladling the water into other receptacles.

As Peleg noticed the deeply amused, and intensely practical interest that Ghosta took in all these objects, he told himself that he had been wise to keep the existence of this cave, which had originally been shown to him by a travelling tinker from Wales, entirely to himself. This Welsh tinker had told him about certain ancient Welsh gods, who had travelled through the land like himself doing work in leather and in various metals. He had explained that he himself, in every district he visited, selected some special spot where he could labour unmolested at his job and fulfil the various professional orders he obtained in that neighbourhood; and he swore that it had been in a vision of one of these old tribal deities, a being who called himself Manawyddan fab-Llyr, that he had learnt of this cave and been assured, that if he kept the secret to himself, nobody would disturb him there.

It was too early for more than a few tiny leaf-buds to have appeared on the willow and alder boughs that in a confused mass hid the mouth of the cave; but at about ten yards distance outside this half-circle of entangled trunks, and closely twisted twigs, grew an immense pine.

The rough bark of this tree, for it was a tree that stood with its back, so to speak, to the cave and to the cave's bodyguard of entwined branches and twigs, had become for Peleg a token of the precise hour; for its colour darkened and lightened, flickered and shadowed, according to the advancing and retreating, the self-concealing and self-revealing, of Sun and Moon and the intermittent rising and falling of the wind.

Though he had only once or twice actually passed a night in this cave, he had of late amused himself by making careful preparations for a winter night there. He had prepared a tall barrier of wooden bars that exactly fitted the mouth of the cave, but was easily lifted up and could be deposited, after use, beneath one of the interior walls, a barrier that he could render proof against wind and snow and rain by covering it with the skins of cattle and sheep.

What he felt especially proud of, as he showed the cave's domestic conveniences to his beautiful Hebrew friend, was a tightly wedged mass of clean and dry hay, with which he had packed from floor to ceiling a rocky recess in one of the cave's corners, towards which the ground sloped upwards a little.

He studied every flicker of her expression with boyish solemnity, as he now proceeded to strew on the ground at the back of the cave a thick sprinkling of this pleasantly-scented summer-hay for their February siesta. It seemed to him that she whitened a little at the first glance she threw upon this lover's bed, then reddened a little, but she continued to watch his every movement with an expression that it would have been totally impossible for him to interpret; but which revealed in reality something of that infinitely maternal and desperately romantic tenderness that young Tilton was struggling now so intensely, day after day, with his hammer and chisel, to convey to his carved image of the Virgin as he imagined her uttering her immemorial "Magnificat".

And quite suddenly, and as it may well be imagined, to Peleg's wonder and delight, Ghosta took the whole situation into her own hands. "Let's make a good fire," she cried, "and warm the whole place before we lie down! And let's heat some water and have a good drink of hot red wine!"

Such had been his secret meticulous preparations for a situation exactly like this one, only built up entirely in his imagination, that few lovers would believe, however deeply they trusted their tale-bearers, how small was the lapse of time before a blazing fire of sticks and logs, unattended by any great volume of smoke, was burning triumphantly, and before they were exchanging with each other deep draughts of red wine mixed with bubbling water.

The effect of these timely preparations were enhanced by the noon-day sunshine, which poured down upon them past the great pine-tree outside, one of whose two big boughs lay on the ground, while the other was extended wide, with a gesture as comprehensive as that with which Jacob, after wrestling all night with the angel, must have greeted the hills and valleys and rivers of the Promised Land.

Then as they replaced the goblets, from which they had been drinking, on the wide shelf that ran round the cave, Ghosta uttered the most astonishing words that her companion had ever heard issuing from human lips.

"Now is the moment, O my friend, when you and I must strip ourselves of all. For a man knoweth not the woman he loves, nor does a woman know the man she loves, until each is as naked as the other."

The words struck him like a ritual, mystical and solemn, but the natural, half-laughing way she came close up to him and proceeded to loosen the buckle of his belt, and then, drawing back a few paces, began with incredible rapidity, but with gay and laughing interjections, and indeed with half-humorous and almost mischievous smiles at certain particularly crucial moments, to fling off every stitch of her clothing, made him feel at ease with the whole universe.

Peleg imitated her as fast as he could; but perhaps it was significant of the double stream of blood in his veins that, before they lay down together on that sweet-scented bed of hay, he lifted his wooden screen across the entrance to their amorous hermitage and hung over it a large bull's hide.

As he did so he couldn't help being struck by the sun-warmth which reached his fingers from this same skin, for he had snatched it up from the top of a pile that ever since dawn had been in reach of the Sun. Nor did the gigantic amorist, while the Sun above the bull's-hide screen caressed his own swarthy neck, fail to note with something like philosophical vanity that he was not so absorbed by the passion of love as to be unable to get, even at this moment of moments, a quite definite sensuous pleasure from the touch of the Lord of Life.

But when once those two lay down together, all other thoughts, impressions, experiences, sensations were absorbed and engulfed in the blind intermingling of two bodies, two souls, two spirits; so much so that the shock and the blood of her ravishment by him, and the furious onslaught of his possession of her, were both swept into a whirling vortex of rainbow-irradiated bubbles, tossed into space, as the confluent torrents of their two life-streams became one terrific river.

Calling up these blinding moments in calmer blood, our Mongolian giant could not help being struck by the fact that it was Ghosta, and not he, who fell into a sleep of blissful exhaustion when their ecstasy was over. This, he decided after long and delicate ponderings, was due to the fact that, in her case, body, soul, and spirit were much more intimately united than in his; so that when their union had been fully achieved, there was no residual reservoir left, of “energeia akinesis”, or “unruffled force”, such as could keep her consciousness alert and observant: while in his case, whether due to his masculinity or to his stature, there remained a definite level of mental awareness that was completely unaffected by what senses, or soul, or spirit, were feeling or had felt.

And this awareness was closely allied to action. What Peleg did, therefore, when the trance of their beatitude had ebbed and she was asleep, was to slip noiselessly from Ghosta’s side, and — with the stealthy movements of a male panther arranging the fragments of his half-devoured prey before distributing them to its little ones while their mother slept — to re-assume his garments one by one, till he was completely clad. Then, with a fond but not lingering glance at his sleeping mate, he stole into the interior of the cave and began completing, as far as it was possible to do such a thing without the usual accompanying sounds, all the preparations upon which of late he had been secretly engaged, so that he might be in a position to offer his re-discovered bride, when the moment came, the sort of romantic, but deliciously tasting and completely satisfying meal, that was worthy of such a never-to-be-repeated occasion.

Perhaps nothing since they had found each other again — for their supreme embrace just now had been to them something outside time and space — struck Ghosta’s Hebrew-girlish mind more poignantly than what she saw when, fully awake at last and with her clothes on again, she entered that inner chamber of the cave and beheld her lover’s quaint preparations for what might have been called their consummation feast.

But she kept her feelings to herself, for it was a deeply congenital characteristic of Ghosta's nature to avoid above everything the quick exclamations and exuberant outcries with which it seems irresistible to some of the nicest ladies in the world to express, or at least to convey the impression that they're expressing, the feelings of the heart.

But her smile told a lot; and as far as the preparation for their love-feast went, which he had so quaintly and crudely set in motion, her quick and competent hands soon had them seated side by side on a bench of pine-wood opposite a big round shield on a tall brazen tripod, covered with a white cloth and a couple of large earthenware plates.

Peleg was soon explaining that, when they had finished their meal, he was anxious to take her to the Fortress, where he hoped she would be able by her beauty and the power of her personality to persuade Lady Val to let her join the large-kitchen-establishment of Roque, which, though situated, as he explained, within the confines of the Fortress, was really an independent organization by whose methods of procedure the whole Manor benefited.

He was so eager and voluble about this idea of his that she should find a place for herself, and so certain that such a place would be pretty near the top, that for a long while he never saw how little she was responding to the picture he was so vigorously painting of their future at the Fortress.

When at last he paused, however, he was not only startled but shocked and hurt. He had stopped in mid-flow, so to speak, with the idea of clearing the channel-bed of his torrent of exultant prediction, so that her stream of consciousness might join and mingle absolutely with his own, and he was stunned and confounded by the way she replied.

"No, no, my darling Peleg!" she cried. "I can't imagine myself working in the midst of this great manorial kitchen! I know too well all it takes to prepare meals for those who plough and sow and plant and reap and bind and clear the ground of weeds! And as for having to be polite to this presumptuous and insolent bailiff of theirs, this brutal Randolph Sygerius — Heavens! I wouldn't consider it for a second. But don't look sad, my precious Peleg; for I wouldn't mind coming across to the Fortress now and again, whenever Lady Val was short-handed or had any special visitors to cater for.

"But to work as a rule and every day in your manorial kitchen, the Lord God of Israel forbid! No, my dearest one! No, no, no! I'll go with you to Rome. I'll go with you to Jerusalem. I'll go with you to Sicily. I'll go with you to Constantinople. I'll go with you to Corinth. I'll go with you to Samarcand or to Trebizond or to Jericho. But even for you, my first and my last true love, I will not work in an English manorial kitchen!"

Peleg turned round and laid his great hands on her shoulders and stared at her. They were sitting side by side with their backs to a wall of wet dark stone. Down this wall dripped continually small trickles of water; while the wall itself was broken here and there by deep greenish-black clefts of incredible depth. In fact these cracks in the wall gave the impression that, were they enlarged so that a small person could worm himself into them, they might be found to lead, if the explorer had the courage to persevere and follow one of them to the bitter end, right to the very centre of the whole planet, where such an explorer would be liable to be devoured by that fabulous creature called the Horm, the legends about whom were evidently so appalling, and so likely to be disclosing a horrible reality, that, long before any written chronicler existed, they must have been deliberately suppressed by the self-preservative consciousness of the human race.

When Peleg turned towards her in his startled surprise and clutched her shoulders, they both had their backs to these sinister cracks in the wall and their faces towards the ponderous arch under which they had made their bed; and beyond that arch, outside the cave altogether, they could see, outlined against the sky, that huge mystical pine-tree, which stretched out its branch-arm for, or against, the frequenters of that ancient cave, in a gesture as wholly inscrutable as it seemed to be wholly indestructible.

"Do you realize what you're saying, child?" Peleg groaned, as he shook the girl slowly forward and slowly backward, while his large hands, had anywandering progeny of that subterranean Horm been peering at them from behind, would have hidden completely beneath their knuckles and veins and wrinkles and creases of loose pendulous skin all the lovely rondures of the girl's feminine shoulders.

"Don't you understand," he muttered, "that I am for ever committed, body and soul, to the service of Sir Mort Abyssum? I could no more leave the Fortress than that old tree out there could leave the place where it grows, unless a hurricane uprooted it, or lightning struck it, or a savage tree-hater cut it down with a murderous axe!"

He let her shoulders go and dropped his arms; and for some time they just stared at each other, both angry, but both afraid of what they might say or do in their anger. Peleg had learnt in his world, just as Ghosta had learnt in hers, that it is wiser not to quarrel with a creature who instinctively gathers itself together before hitting back, so that, when it does strike, the blow shall be a deadly one.

At last, very quitely, Ghosta spoke: "I am ready to agree, my friend," she said, "if you are anxious for me to go with you to the Fortress and have an interview with your Lady Val; but I can tell you this in advance, and you'll see for yourself the truth of my prediction, if you accompany me into the presence of this lady: Lady Val will loathe the sight of me, and will command Sir Mort to have nothing to do with me! I don't say for a moment that he'll obey her in this, but she'll no more want to have me working in the manorial kitchen than I want to work there. It's this ancient hatred of us Jews which all the races in Europe feel, and which a certain class of men and women in this country especially suffers from.

"I've thought about it a lot lately; and I think it is purely due to our superior intelligence. They feel instinctively that they're not our equals in intelligence and that makes them hate us, and their hatred is continually being intensified by contempt every time they see how, in archery and hunting and tournaments and in all manly sports and in all athletic contests and public games, the simplest and stupidest among them can play a part, whereas we Hebrews — just as did the great Avicebron when he was a child, Avicebron for whom Friar Bacon has such a passion — have always thought that our mighty men of battle, our Samsons and Sauls and Joshuas and Abners and Joabs, were of far less account than our prophets and priests and men of God."

"But Ghosta, my Ghostal What are you saying? Aren't our Scriptures full of the victories of Judah and Israel over their enemies? Wasn't the Lord of Hosts always giving his chosen people triumphant. victories over Syrians and the Assyrians and Babylonians and Philistines?"

Ghosta gave him a most peculiar look, a look that seemed to say: "I shall have to consider this very carefully. You are a man. I am a woman. I shall have to consider whether I can talk to you about these things, and tell you all that I've thought about them for a long time. Don't 'ee look like that, Peleg darling — as if I'd slapped you across the cheek. I shall always tell you the important things of my life, and you'll always tell me the important things of your life. These political and religious questions aren't the true reality of any actual life of a man and a woman who love each other. You might be very interested in them and might be totally indifferent to them, and we could live out our life in perfect contentment.

“Everybody’s life’s like a star with at least forty points branching out in all directions, and every one of these points can turn eventually into a life-long road of unending interest. But at the heart of that star the real Peleg and the real Ghosta can sit at their hearth over their crock of pottage, and watch the shadows on the wall, and hear the wind in the chimney and the rain on the roof, and take to themselves the mystery of everything.

“Well, my dear, you tidy up the room and get it into the shape you like to leave it in when you go out into the world; and I’ll deal with the remains of our meal and clean the things.”

Peleg obeyed her; and until the horizontal rays of the descending Sun thrust the angular shadow of the pine-tree’s elbow almost as far as the cracks in the wet dark wall, out of which the elfin faces of the dumb progeny of the awful Horm could be imagined peering at them, the two of them kept an almost religious silence.

Nor was it only silence they shared: for as they went to and fro about their homely tasks the same thought hovered in their minds; the thought that they were both, save for this miracle of a life together which had only begun today, strangers and pilgrims in a foreign land. And this thought of theirs, as he went on tidying up and arranging, according to his ideas of a proper chamber, the whole appearance of their cave, and as she emptied and washed and dried and polished their pots and pans and dishes, did not only hover about them; it also grew deeper and more definite.

Indeed they had both decided, before they left the cave, she with her black mantle and white hood wrapt round her body and head, and her right hand held tightly in his left, and he with his great iron mace swinging its terrific spikes through the withered stalks of last autumn’s grasses, as if to scare them out of the path of the over-cautiously sprouting new ones, that there was nothing as yet in this new worship of the Trinity, with its Father and Son and Holy Spirit, so closely linked with the Assumption into Heaven of the Blessed Virgin, to compel them, by any spontaneous recognition of a deeper truth, to relinquish their old ancestral faith in Jehovah as their one invisible God, or to bow themselves on the ground before the Crucified Jesus.

That this spiritual decision, by a telepathic interchange of thought that is rare even among lovers, had been accepted by them both, was proved by the murmured exclamations they uttered as they left that glade among the rocks in a wood even more dominated by their union than that cave was dominated by its pine-tree, or those cracks in its wall at the back by that appalling Horm.

XI. EBB AND FLOW

IT WOULD ALMOST seem as if, over every measurable geographical square of the planetary surface of the earth — and this would apply whether our earth were flat or round, or neither the one nor the other — there vibrates a special and particular amount of magnetic receptivity, by means of which each individual creature is attracted to or repelled by all the other creatures who are dwelling in or are passing through the same arena, an attraction or repulsion which is obviously stronger or weaker in proportion to the type of creature who is exerting it or feeling it.

If this theory has any truth, it was under the influence of something beyond mere accident or chance that, when this terribly-armed adherent of the House of Abyssum, holding by the hand his cloaked and flashing-eyed bride, just as the Sun was sinking behind them on that perfect February day in the year of Grace twelve hundred and seventy two, came to be within measurable distance of Spardo filius Regis Bohemiensis, along with his deformed horse known as Cheiron, the two pairs moved hurriedly to their encounter.

Peleg had met Spardo several times already, and himself was well known to Spardo; but Peleg was at this moment not a little disturbed by such a meeting and was extremely disinclined to allow it to be a cause of delay in the important business of introducing Ghosta to the interior of the Fortress of Roque. But Ghosta was, as may well be imagined, fascinated at once by the sight of this extraordinary horse, with what under the horizontal rays of the setting Sun did really look like a human head beginning to thrust itself forth through that horribly swollen neck.

Spardo himself treated the gigantic Mongol as he treated everybody with whom he had any contact in that part of Wessex. Without disregarding him, he behaved as if the giant had been some inanimate object, a chair perhaps, or a bench, or a ladder, or a door, or a stone outside a door, or a mat in front of the fire where his supper was being prepared, or the hand-rail beside the steps leading up to the chamber where he was to sleep, or even the barrel of oats near the comfortable manger, he would presently leave Cheiron when he had replenished his bin.

The huge Tartar managed to restrain his impatience for the space of about five minutes while Ghosta's black robe and white hood, and Spardo's flapping beard, mud-stained jerkin, and motley-coloured leather breeches, kept circling round and round that impassive horse, whose own gaze, with its far-away inscrutable stare, seemed to be fixed upon some invisible landscape where events were taking place that hadn't the faintest connection with all this fuss about that unfortunate swelling in his own neck.

When however for the third time Ghosta bent in absorbed concentration above that weird deformity, Peleg could bear it no longer. "Pardon me, Master Spardo," he cried, "but I've got an appointment for this lady at the Fortress, and it won't do to keep Lady Val waiting!"

With these words he flung his left arm round his obsessed girl, administered to Cheiron's flank a friendly tap with the knuckle of the hand from which the great mace was swinging, gave Cheiron's master an affable nod, and muttering something in Hebrew, that might have meant, as far as Spardo could follow it, "Goodbye till we meet in Hell!" he strode off with the lady on his left and the mace on his right.

Whether to their eventual advantage or disadvantage, it is curious that no instinct warned Peleg just then that the worst possible moment for winning the favour of the Lady of Roque was during the particular hour she was accustomed to move to and fro between the manorial kitchen and the dining hall, with occasional interruptions from Nurse Rampant and Mother Guggery, and intermittent debouchings up and down the steps leading to her daughter's chamber. If it hadn't been that his nerves were so strung-up by his possession of Ghosta that all life's ordinary routine seemed projected to a distance, rather like that unknown vision upon which Cheiron's gaze seemed to be fixed, he would certainly have realized this fact.

Indeed it may easily be that he did realize it, only not with sufficient intensity to allow it to influence his action. In any case, with a massive recklessness that was a deep element in his nature, though it was a rare event for him to draw upon it, Peleg led Ghosta to the great gate of the Fortress, where as a quite natural event the gate-keeper admitted them without even glancing up at his wife's window to see if their entrance aroused her more shrewd attention.

Once inside the Fortress, the worthy Cortex straightway escorted them, without stopping to obtain the mediation of any of the servants, to the familiar corridor between the dining-hall and the kitchen, where at this hour Lady Val was almost always to be found. And there indeed they found her. And if we are to assume — though at these mysterious and fatal moments in human lives, where so many paths into the unknown future seem to offer themselves, it is a doubtful wisdom to assume anything — that happy relations between Sir Mort's lady and Peleg's lady was a desirable occurrence, it was unlucky that neither Nurse Rampant nor old mother Guggery happened to be present at this encounter; for both these women had the gift, refined upon by age-long practice, of softening and modifying the impact upon the touchy and susceptible Lady Val, of any troublesome intruder.

The Tartar giant saw in a moment how completely his attempt to establish a happy understanding between these two women was doomed to absolute failure. But it was too late to retreat now; and so he blundered on.

“Pardon my intrusion, my lady, but this is an old friend of mine who comes from that so much fought-over strip of land between the Tigris and the Euphrates, where so many of your own renowned ancestors won their glory. I have already told my friend here many of those heroic stories that your revered children love to relate. Your son Tilton, for instance, has often told us about that amazing encounter between your great-grandfather, Sir Stephen Dormaquil, and that monstrous Tartar with three arms who fought with six sharp-pointed elephants’ tusks, one in each of his six hands; and who, after being chopped into sixteen pieces by your noble ancestor, was carried off to the top of Mount Carmel by eagles, and there was so completely disposed of that not a bone of his own nor the splinter of his ivory weapons was ever seen again. My friend here, my Lady, has thought of nothing else, since I told her about Sir Stephen and the other Dormaquils, and she begged me to bring her here just to see, if only for a moment, the living descendant of such heroic people.”

Peleg was so pleased with the whole situation, so proud of himself in Ghosta’s presence for his tactful speech, and so proud of himself in Lady Val’s presence for making it so easy for Ghosta to keep a discreet silence, that Sir Mort would have thought him pathetically childish not to have detected what was going on, all the while he was speaking, between the two women.

But then Sir Mort knew the mother of his three children better than the wisest of his henchmen could possibly know the lady of his house. Besides, Peleg was not only a foreigner and an oriental; he was also a giant, and looking down upon that pair of feminine brows and eyebrows, each of them quivering with implacable hostility, he was so impervious to the wordless, and you might almost say to the mindless, aura of antagonism, automatically generated between them, that he stept backwards as if to avoid a blow at the tone in Lady Val's voice as she remarked to Ghosta:

"You want employment here, I take it? Are you prepared to do any kind of work? Or do you want something special? We've no opening just now for a new hand indoors, but it's quite possible, if you apply to our bailiff, Master Randolph Sygerius, that he'll be able to find you work in the garden. We depend a lot on green food and we gather it all the year round; so if you — —"

"I happen to be quite satisfied with what I'm doing in the Convent just at present, Lady, I thank you. Indeed so far I've never been driven to work out-of-doors, but if ever — —"

"Where, if I may enquire," interrupted Lady Val, her voice growing shrill, "were you brought up? My family here have given work I know, in past times, to black females. In fact if I remember correctly, my grandfather's bailiff employed a family of Ethiopians. Of course this particular family may have been the slaves of some trader who died over here when he was selling leopards' skins; but if you wait in the scullery till after dinner, you'll be able, or Peleg here will be able on your behalf, to catch Master Randy, our present bailiff. Do you help, may I ask, in the Convent latrine? I remember there was — —"

"My lady, my lady — —" broke in Peleg at this point. "My friend here is a learned Jewess, who has worked with Doctors and with Rabbis of our ancient faith, copying, for instance, with pencils and brushes certain faded pages in the Hebrew scriptures. And so, no doubt, though the Convent kitchen must already have come to depend on her delicate touch with their food, we can hardly expect — —"

"Be quiet, Peleg!" almost screamed Lady Val. "Since you brought this woman here to stare at me with her bold, black, impertinent eyes, perhaps you'll tell me whether she wants to be allowed to prepare for me some of those Jewish spells with her pencils and her brushes, such as I can use on my enemies in this place? If so, you can tell her that, though she may have bewitched you and some of those simple nuns, who in such things are no wiser than children, I won't have her bewitching me or my young daughter! But take her into the scullery, Peleg, and find a corner there for her till after dinner and then take her back to the convent. I don't want any Jewish sorceress in my house or garden or kitchen! And what's more—" This was added, when, without any other retort, Ghosta had wrapt her mantle more tightly round her shoulders and pulled her hood more closely round her face and had turned her dark eyes with a mute interrogation towards Peleg—"And what's more," announced Lady Val, "I shall have to have a very serious talk with Sir Mort about this whole subject of your making friends with women of this kind. But let that go now."

This "let that go" was uttered in the confident tone of a person for whom victory in a battle implies the power to be generous.

"You must tell Cook, Peleg," she went on, "to give your friend what supper she has time to scrape together while she's dishing up dinner. I can see she hasn't been taught in her childhood, and hasn't had an opportunity to learn since, how a well-brought-up maiden, of any race in the world, behaves when she enters anyone's house; but I'm sure she didn't mean to be rude, just standing there and staring. I don't know anything about Pharisees and Sadducees, and not much about Solomon and the Queen of Sheba; but I do know that because Queen Jezabel worshipped idols, she was thrown out of a window to be eaten by dogs. So you can, both of you, see that I am not quite ignorant of the Hebrew scriptures — —"

With the sort of inclination of a half-veiled head that the mighty Sisera might have received in the entrance to the tent of Heber the Kenite, Ghosta turned away, and, followed submissively by Peleg, began to move off, not, however, towards the kitchen, but towards the door by which they entered.

They hadn't gone many paces, however, towards this door, when they were met by an extremely youthful personage, tricked out in the very latest armorial fashion for budding warriors, and before they could stand aside to let him pass, Lady Val was greeting him, and he was greeting Peleg and gazing respectfully and admiringly at Ghosta.

"Why, if it isn't our dear Sir William!" cried Lady Val — delighted, so Ghosta's giant lover told himself, at so good an excuse for smoothing over the biting sting of Ghosta's dignity under her crude abuse. "How nice you look, my darling boy, in that breast-plate and that scarf and that belt! Where is Raymond de Laon? Oh, of course I know! You men mustn't give each other away! He's with Lil-Umbra, of course. Oh yes! This is a great friend of our Peleg! I've just been discussing with him what place we can find for her in our little barony. Why, how very nicely you did that, my dear boy!"

This final remark was involuntarily drawn from the lady by the really perfect alacrity with which the slender little Sir William, after skipping up to her side, knelt down on one knee and kissed the knuckles of the hand she held out to him.

It was clear to Peleg, as she began talking rapidly to the young newly-made knight, and after every sentence shot a quick glance in their direction to see if they were still there, that her desire to have this lad to herself was intense. "She's wishing that her Tilton and her John were more like this elegant young man," the Tartar told himself. And then he thought: "I know Ghosta wants me to go off with her and that we ought to go; but I would like to see how this little elf-knight wins favour before we leave them!"

Young William Bancor of Gone was certainly what the doting old King Henry had called him at first sight — the liveliest and sprightliest little “Knave of Hearts” in the whole kingdom. His self-confidence and aplomb and his humorous enjoyment of his own attractive presence gave a zest to every moment which anyone spent in his company. Everybody could see at a glance how conceited he was. But he had no pride at all; and was prepared to throw his whole body, soul, and spirit into showing off before the poorest and meanest beggar he met. He “made love,” so to speak, to every man, woman, and child, who crossed his path.

And not only to them. To horses, dogs and cats, to birds in cages, to pigs in sties, to sheep in folds, to cattle in stalls — to them all he sang his song and danced his dance! When he was eating out-of-doors he would pay court to the nearest toad or frog or blind-worm. When he was sucking an orange before going to bed, he would make overtures to a spider.

He had no pride, and he had very little vanity. He was as conceited of his eyes, nose, mouth, ears, hair, legs, ankles, feet, as he was of his voice, his manners, and his knowledge of the world. It was enough that the quality, the feature, the member was his quality, his feature, his member, for it to be the most remarkable quality, feature, member in the world!

His self-admiration was wholly indiscriminate. He wasn’t vain of his hair, or of his eyes or his figure, or of his skill in riding or fencing, compared with other people’s hair and so forth. He compared them with nothing. They were his; and that alone made them incomparable.

Sir William never spent, as some young men do, considerable time at the mirror, arranging his hair, his expression, his pose, his dress, his gestures. He never wasted his own or other people’s time by explaining and justifying his opinions. They were his: that was enough. When asked for them he handed them to the asker, as a pilgrim might hand out pebbles from a sacred shore, or an exorcizer might sprinkle holy water on the walls of a haunted chamber.

He was younger than John, and a good deal younger than Tilton; whereas Raymond de Laon was over twenty-five. Sir William enjoyed life so intensely that it was a pleasure to everybody who knew him to be with him. So absolutely lacking in pride was he that he seemed to be as tickled by his own blunders, by his own foolishness, by his own cowardice, by his own weakness, by his own superstition, as were his friends in their affectionate entertainment and as were his enemies in their malicious amusement.

It must have been this gift of being all things to all men, on the strength of a conceit so immeasurable, that had enabled this singular boy at a yet earlier age to be actually able, under the wise encouragement of his father, to act in collusion with young John as one of the intermediaries between Roger Bacon and Pope Clement IV.

“How is your father’s injury from those Lost Towers devils?” enquired Lady Val of the lad, just as he was launching forth, for the benefit of Ghosta and her Tartar, upon a tale he had heard about a miraculous and terraqueous crusade of sea-eagles, who conveyed in their beaks from Chesil-Beach to the Holy Land enough pebble-stones of carnelian to enable the walls of Jerusalem to rival the hanging gardens of Babylon.

“O he’s healing up quick and easy, Lady,” replied Sir William: “the great difficulty at home just now is mother’s quarrel with both Raymond and Friar Bacon. She tells father he ought never to have invited Raymond here at all, because somebody younger, somebody more like me, she says, would look better going about with Lil-Umbra.”

These words caused even Ghosta to awake from a trance that had already made her lover recall the expression in the eyes of the horse Cheiron. But it can be imagined how they roused in Lady Val’s soul a sharp-pointed, outward-whirling arrow-head of flame-like fury. The idea of her only female offspring, the only daughter she would ever have — and do we not know that the closest association possible between human personalities is between a mother and a daughter? — becoming the official lady-love of this popinjay of a nursery-antic struck her on the quick.

She had had a good many more day-dreams about Lil-Umbra's future than Lil-Umbra ever had herself. For just as her father did, Lil-Umbra lived in the four elements, and one of the reasons why she had such a special partiality for Heber Sygerius was that the old ex-bailiff had, like Sir Mort, only in a different way, unusual awareness of the less palpable and more mysterious qualities of earth, air, fire and water.

Thus it was that when young Sir William blurted this out about his mother's attitude to Raymond de Laon, who, after all, was himself only a young man, an intense and violent surge of emotion rose in Lady Val's deepest being, swept up from the pit of her stomach into both her breasts, whirled up dizzily from there into her brain, and finally exploded in an outburst, the essence of which was irrepressible fury with fate because her secret, wild, ideal dreams about her daughter's future had been blighted forever; but, odd though it may sound, the form this fury took was nothing more or less than a desperate curiosity.

"Do, O please do, my dear William, tell me what that wise, clever, deep-seeing mother of yours finds wrong with Raymond de Laon! I expect she has a hundred times more insight than I shall ever have, and knows the world a hundred times better than I shall ever know it. Does your dear intellectual mother feel that something is wrong with Raymond's religion, or with his morals, or with his manners, or with his proper wish to get on in the world and to give his wife, when he has a wife, a proper position in the world? Or does your deep-searching mother — come a bit nearer, my boy, for I don’t want to be overheard — feel that Raymond is perhaps not quite, not altogether, not wholly and entirely — I see you know what I mean, so I can speak quite simply — right in his mind? I have seen Lil-Umbra look strangely at him once or twice when they’ve been talking, as if he were saying something rather, you know what I mean, my dear boy, rather wild and — and funny?”

The youngest of all the knights on whom the aged and ailing son of the brother of Richard Coeur-de-Lion had bestowed the accolade shut his open mouth, half-closed his roving eyes, and frowned. He was evidently thinking hard: not pretending to think, but really thinking.

Then, with an upward leap of his whole slender little person and a metallic tinkling of the hilt of his dagger against the hilt of his sword as his excitable hands rushed to his belt, Sir William Boncor exclaimed eagerly: “Yes! oh yes! I heard him say once, when someone was talking about the Day of Judgment and the Last Day: ‘In my Philosophy,’ he said, ‘there is no Day of Judgment nor any Last Day. There is only Now. We are born. We grow up: we have children: we die. And then the next generation is born; grows up; and dies. That’s my Philosophy as to the way things go.”

Sir William’s flickering little frame subsided upon its heels with a gasp of ineffable self-satisfaction. The confident smile of generations of just men condemning a crazy aberration broadened upon his triumphant face. With a faint shrug of his shoulders he seemed to be saying to every doubting devil in the universe, “I am righteous, I am!” It was at this well-timed moment that the wily Mogol took advantage of the long, half-amused, half-puzzled, but by no means disarmed look, that Lady Val fixed upon the self-satisfied young knight, and without asking permission, or letting his companion make the slightest parting obeisance, took Ghosta’s arm and led her out of that vortex of crazy foam by the way they had entered it.

"Mother thinks," Sir William began again, "that you don't realize half of what Raymond puts into Lil-Umbra's head. Mother even told father yesterday, when she was angry with him because he wouldn't shave off his beard, that Raymond will soon be dressing up Lil-Umbra in boy's clothes and taking her with him to Paris."

The unction with which this youngest of all the newly-dubbed knights at the court of the doting old man, who had reigned longer than any living monarch in Christendom, let these words fall upon Lady Val's tense nerves, was like the squeezing of a gobbet of spikenard upon an itching skin. As the ointment oozed forth upon the inflamed place, the fever behind it was driven in, not drawn out.

Lady Val's whole face twitched and her fingers clasped and unclasped the brooch at her waist. And then, as she gazed at this tricked-out image of youthful conceit, who was talking to her about the vindictiveness — and didn't she know intricacies of that underground stream well enough! — of her rival at Cone, there suddenly whirled up within her the blindest and most desperate wave of emotion she had ever felt in her life.

Her own mind, as it grew aware of what she felt, interpreted it as pure unmitigated and entirely justifiable indignation with Lady Ulanda of Cone, but in reality it was far more complicated. It was compounded of an intense revolt against the way fate had been treating her of late, mingled with a wild longing that her children's Dormaquil blood might suddenly assert itself and turn the whole tide of events in a completely new direction. Under the pressure of this surge of emotion, in the flood of which so many long pent-up feelings were breaking loose, she felt as though at any moment she might easily do something unexpectedly violent. It was an emotion too general, as well as too blind, to be fully interpreted by the simple definition “hatred of Lady Ulanda”, but as the thing uncoiled itself from the deepest centre of her being she began to be afraid of what she might do.

Lady Val had very rarely been as conscious of her personal inner life as she was at this moment. The sudden loosening within her of this long dammed up reservoir of suppressed fury forced the torrent of emotion into a psychic channel that so far had been left high and dry. She very rarely thought of herself at all when she was angry with Sir Mort or with Tilton or John; and in Lil-Umbra’s case she was so used to associating her daughter’s personality with her own that, when she got angry with her, it was like her right hand getting angry with her left hand.

Anger with Lil-Umbra was indeed a unique feeling, too deep-rooted to be easily articulated. But what she felt at this particular moment was a wild identification of herself with the very substance of the great house in which she lived. She felt as if she herself were the Fortress of Roque, and that every stone, every carving, every buttress, every arrow-slit, every stair, every tower, every wall, every rafter, every gate, every door, every threshold to every door, of this whole old place was calling out from within herself to herself, and reminding her that they and she together were a living part and portion of the diffused presence of the spirits of all her ancestors.

She suddenly felt that the whole place, which was herself and yet much more than herself, was being threatened by her and her children with a ghastly doom, a doom irretrievable, inescapable, and final. She told herself that it was she and none other who had brought this doom upon them all; and that she had done it by yielding to her love for Sir Mort and letting him be the father of her children.

As with most of us at some desperate climax of our lives, the wild passion of anger, which had driven this tragic awareness into an inner chamber of her consciousness, changed its own nature when it had achieved this end. It was a strange sadness that now filled Lady Val's soul, as she thought of this fatal name "Abyssum" drifting and floating and flowing across every surface and through every crevice and crack of the massive stones whereof the Fortress of Roque was built.

"He is too queer, too eccentric, too remote from real life," she told herself, "to be able to save this place and to guard our name from oblivion."

It was as if the agitated lady's soul had been whirling round the outside of the Fortress as violently as it had whirled round the inside, for it happened at that moment that a single dead alder-leaf, stirred up from the bank of a small stream in the direction of Cone Castle, and wafted through one of the arrow-slit windows in some higher portion of the Fortress, came floating down to the floor of that ante-room.

Where the dead leaf fell, there did it rest; and it rested on the ground almost mid-way between the comically pretentious young knight and the desperately agitated lady of the house. Whether either of them noticed this wrinkled symbol of the passing generations, as it fell between them, neither of them later would have been able to say. Very likely they both did, but without any reaction capable of being recalled.

Situations like this, when two human beings are brought together by fate, one of them in a state of feverish mental activity and the other in a state of complacent quiescence, one of them with nerves quivering and senses vibrant, and the other with both nerves and senses lulled into a trance of self-satisfaction, have the effect sometimes of putting very queer thoughts into the mind of one or other of the pair.

What came into the head of Lady Val at that moment was a fantastic theory of her husband's about which he was in the habit of expatiating at great length and upon the most inopportune occasions. Sir Mort's theory was — and though he would swear to her and to the children that it was based on his own experience, she never could see, however excited he got about it, that it was possible for one man's experience to cover such an immense field — that there was what he was pleased to describe as an invisible Dimension that existed over the whole surface of land and sea; and that into this Dimension rushed all the thoughts and feelings and passions and even sensations of everything that was subject to these things.

His theory culminated in the amazing dogma that everything that existed had such feelings, not even excluding rocks and stones and earth-mould. And he further held that this invisible Dimension was much more crowded and much more active at certain geographical points round the surface of land and water than at others. Even where there are no human beings, this spiritual atmosphere would, he maintained, be there just the same. For not only must there be, universally emanating from the whole body of our planet, feelings that we must think of as the feelings of our Mother the Earth herself, but there must also be the feelings — or semi-conscious vibrations corresponding to feelings — of all the separate material elements whereof the substance of the planet is composed.

In fact Sir Mort insisted that all the feelings of all the things in the world are to be found in this invisible Dimension, and the fact that the earth as the earth has universal feelings does not mean that the separate parts and diverse substances of which she is composed are lacking in individual feelings. In fact he insisted that this invisible Dimension, or atmospheric sounding-board, of the planet upon which we live, while predominant in it are the feelings of all living men, women, and children, includes also the feelings of all beasts, birds, fishes, reptiles, insects and worms as well as of trees, plants, mosses, funguses, grasses and all vegetation.

And when we thus speak of the projected thoughts and feelings and emotions of all things, it must be remembered that we are not suggesting the existence of any actual souls that can survive the death of their bodily presence. When we are dead, Sir Mort maintained, we are absolutely dead. But while we live we are all, including the myriads of sub-human lives in air, on land, and in water, from whales to earth-worms and the tiniest gnats, in constant contact with an invisible overshadowing atmospheric mist, crowded with feelings and dreams and emotions and what might be called sense-emanations and thought-eidola issuing from all that exists, whether superhuman, human, or sub-human, whether organic or inorganic. This atmospheric dimension does not, Sir Mort argued, contain the sort of entities we are in the habit of thinking of as souls; for these perish when we perish, but it contains the thoughts and feelings and intimations and sensations which, though they grow fainter with time, do not cease to exist when the body and soul which projected them have both come to an end.

While we are still struggling, enduring, enjoying, as we move or rest in the earth, air, or water, of our terraqueous globe, there will always be this atmospheric aura about us where the psychic reactions engendered by the attractions and repulsions, the devourings and escapings, that go on in life mount up and remain, drifting and floating here and there in a curious chaotic mixture of the pleasant and the unpleasant.

And it is because of this atmospheric arena always about us, whether indoors or out-of-doors, whether on the surface of plains or mountains, whether in earth-mines or undersea-caverns, whether in any level of the air, or above any fiery crater or tumultuous sea, that those among us — and Sir Mort obviously included himself in this select category — who are alive to these rarefied visitations, are frequently exhilarated or saddened without any apparent inward or outward cause.

These sudden variations of mood without apparent cause are — Sir Mort would explain, though he assumed that his wife knew nothing of such subtle emotions — extremely puzzling phenomena. But they can, he would point out, be made less mysterious if we think of this atmospheric dimension of psychic reactions as composed not only of the sensations of all living things from the cleverest human beings and the most intelligent animals, birds, fishes and reptiles, to the most simple-minded tadpoles, jelly-fish, star-fish, earth-worms, and insects, together with the vast mass of all the vegetable growth in the world, but of such sensations as they occur in the strain and stress of cosmogonic chance.

It was all in a second curiously enough, as this tidal memory of her husband's ten-thousand times repeated harangue swept over her, that she actually found herself wondering whether there might not really be a grain of truth in all this craziness. Dimension or no dimension, there must be a reason for this ebbing and flowing of our feelings, and for our being sometimes so mysteriously happy, and sometimes so unutterably sad.

"Well," she thought, "I can't stand here staring at little Popinjay all night! I must get rid of the boy somehow." And as she raised her hands to feel whether her hair was in proper order, she became half conscious of that alder-leaf on the floor between herself, the self-questioning Lady Val, and her visitor, the quiescent and self-approving Sir William.

"She," Sir William was thinking, "must be suffering a lot. Poor, poor woman! She must know, after all I've said, that she has given her daughter to the wrong man! So I really must be kind to her in her unhappiness."

But what the unhappy lady was thinking was this: "I'll tell Ulanda what we all feel about Baron Boncor's beard, for I think that will trouble her arrogant mind more than anything else."

And what, we might wonder, was that alder-leaf's parent-tree thinking in its nakedness as it bowed before the wind? Was it thinking, "If only I could stretch a quarter of an inch nearer the water I would tell this blind, stupid, silly, deaf, dumb, idiotic stream in what direction it ought to flow if it wants to reach the sea."

And if no thought of that leaf on the floor crossed the furthest fringe of its parent-tree's cogitations, you may be sure that neither Sir William nor Lady Val gave the slightest attention to its fate; and there it would have lain for the rest of that evening and the whole of that night had not old Mother Guggery been sent from the kitchen to ask some important semi-culinary, semi-social question of the Lady of the Manor.

Mother Guggery always used a massive ebony stick when she walked, though physically she had not the least need of such support, and she showed now by the way she came stumping up between the young knight and Lady Val that the moment her curiosity was satisfied as to what they were talking about, or being silent about, she would turn her back upon the young man and concentrate on her mission to the lady.

But in a household as turbulent with new starts and old upshots, with new conspiracies and old frustrations, as was this Fortress of Roque, it was impossible, especially at the close of a sunny day at this time of the year, and upon such a central and crucial debating-ground as this particular spot, for any discussion to be long confined to its originators.

Thus before Mother Guggery had got down to the business of her message, who must come drifting in but Lady Val's younger son, the intellectual young John, who was often called "John of London" at the Priory, because of his frequent visits to the King's court on behalf of Friar Bacon. He now came loitering and drifting towards his mother with the air of one who had been using his wits all day long to such exhaustive effect among the high problems of metaphysic and theology that he has earned the right, now that the day is over and darkness is falling, to forget these high matters — yes! to forget this difficult super-world with its niceties of the human conscience, its nuances of Trinitarian Personalities, and its dissolving facets of unfathomable Absolutes, and to give himself up to any frivolity that drifted across his path in that domestic portico between kitchen and dining-hall.

Nor does life often fail us under such conditions; for there is Something in life that is at once different from Chance and yet not quite identical with all that we mean by the word Fate; and it is this Something that almost always provides us with some spontaneous motive when we are, so to speak, angling for an urge to pursue any available flibbertigibbet.

And thus it now happened with the younger son of Sir Mort Abyssum. Mother Guggery, having assumed by her lady's look that more was in the air than she could cope with just then, came bolt out with the message from the kitchen, and, as she turned to go, her eyes fell on that last year's alder-leaf lying on the floor. With the end of her ebony stick the old woman endeavoured, by obstinately poking at it, to get the leaf near enough to her feet to be able to stoop and pick it up. This whole picture, the ebony stick, the thin bent back, the patient motionless leaf, was enough, when taken in at a glance, to cause young John to rush forward and snatch up the leaf himself.

And then, all in a second, an airy connection struck him between this whole small event and the teaching of Friar Bacon, who had always instructed him to save such vegetable waifs from bonfires, and to cast them, loose and free, as near their birthplace as possible. So into the young man's most intimate pocket went this lucky leaf to be disposed of later.

XII. THE HERESY HUNT

IT WAS MORE than a surprise to the simpler dwellers in that portion of Wessex dominated by the traditional Manors of Roque and of Cone, and perpetually being interfered with by the unprecedented and incalculable domain of Lost Towers, when the holy, the thrice-blessed, the miraculously learned representative of the Holy Father himself in Rome, Bonaventura, the most famous of all Franciscans since Saint Francis, began, in that early spring of the year of grace 1272, searching the district for heretics and unbelievers, and using as his band of retainers nothing less than a regular cohort of brown-vested bandits from the swamps of Lost Towers.

And this singular heresy-hunt, led by a reputed saint commanding a body-guard of reputed devils, was an incredible event even to the good-natured Baron of Cone himself, whom it disturbed not a little. He finally made up his mind to accept it at its face-value; but since his youth, when serving under King Henry at the battle of Lewes, he had beheld the triumph of Simon de Montfort, he had never had such a spiritual shock.

When in the course of chronicling these events we seek to understand this shock, we are driven to conclude that it came from a certain inherent simplicity in Baron Boncor's nature, which instinctively accepted without question all those natural assumptions about good and evil, which like the biblical "charity" are only too apt to "cover a multitude of sins."

In spite of the rapid healing of the serious hurt he had received from the arrow, shot at him by Baron Maldung, he felt convinced that it would be a case of taking the side of the Devil against God if he gave any aid, shelter, refreshment, hospitality, information, comfort, encouragement or welcome to Bonaventura and his brown-jerkin’d band.

It was quite another thing with Lady Ulanda, Baron Boncor’s wife. Lady Ulanda had recently abandoned herself to a savage campaign against Friar Bacon and all his works. Ulanda was anything but a religious lady. Her whole nature was practical. She was in the fullest sense a woman of action. She was suspicious of all thought, of all art, of all mental analysis. She wasn’t a vicious woman, but she was what is called a possessive woman, to a degree that was a danger to everybody round her and especially to the object of this possessiveness.

The object of it in this case was no child in her domestic world and no lover in the world outside. It was simply and solely her husband. And it was because of several very curious reasons, some physical, some mental, and some the result of occurrences in the early days of her marriage, that this dominant element in her nature had never from the beginning asserted itself in any perceptible degree in regard to her son. Her attitude to young Sir William was more like that of an affectionate aunt than a mother. She doted on him as a fanciful old maid might dote on a favourite pet; and it was a real blow to her when destiny brought it about that she was compelled to witness, day by day, the rapidly growing love-affair between her husband’s friend and cousin, Raymond de Laon, and the daughter of Lady Val of the Fortress.

Ulanda’s almost frantic hostility to Friar Bacon was intimately connected with Baron Boncor’s affection for his relative Raymond. It had been pain and poison to her from the start — the interest Baron Boncor took in Raymond. She had hated his coming to be an inmate of their castle from the very first, but Boncor was so set upon it that, without a greater quarrel than she dared to embark on, she had to accept it.

At the bottom of it was her simple recognition that her husband's regard for Raymond de Laon was not unconnected with the young man's exceptional good looks and the magnetic charm of his whole personality. She knew only too well that she herself, though full of an intense vitality and always able to carry off with dignity the proud assumptions of high-born authority, was grotesquely lacking in that sort of tender and appealing physical beauty which wins favour wherever it goes.

Like many another high-spirited and passionate lady, Ulanda of Cone felt such an intense longing to be as beautiful in reality as she was beautiful in her inner ideal of herself, that she had actually visited Friar Bacon in that upper chamber in the Priory where he was virtually a prisoner, and made a direct personal face-to-face appeal to him to help her, by means of those mysterious arts in which she understood he was such a master, to acquire, without any drastic change in her appearance, that particular magnetic charm by which the most formidable of men can be seduced and captivated by a woman.

As any of the serious disciples and pupils of the scientific Friar could have warned her, this shameless and unblushing assumption that he was some kind of a sex-wizard annoyed Roger Bacon so much that he refused point-blank to have anything to do with her; and Lady Ulanda came down the stone staircase from the Friar's chamber resolved to have the most deadly revenge she could bring about on a man who refused so rudely — and he a sort of half-condemned heretic too — a natural and perfectly lawful request from a lady of her importance in that western district of the kingdom.

Lady Ulanda was not particularly fussy or punctilious in what might be called the heraldic or antiquarian aspects of the Barony of Cone. In fact she was a good deal less primed in such matters than were most of her contemporary ladies of title. She herself came of an old yeoman family called Dunderog entirely independent of any baronial manor, but claiming direct descent from Ralph Rorsuk, the predatory nephew of King Stephen.

When not fishing or hunting or fighting or riding between his arable-fields and his pasture-fields, or surveying his forestry, Baron Boncor was in the habit of spending his time in a spacious chamber at the top of a small round tower above the south-west ramparts of the Castle. This chamber ever since his grandfather once, on a pilgrimage to Rome, purchased some illuminated scrolls, and obtained in the same city the aid of a famous book-binder to cover them with specially prepared skins, had come to be known as the Library.

Boncor's grandfather had fastened with golden-headed nails upon an enormous oak table opposite the hearth in this room a great number of large pictorial maps of the world, adapted to the comprehension of unclassical and unscholarly persons by the appearance at certain crucial points, on both land and sea, of various land-monsters and sea-monsters, and also of various voyagers, these latter enlarged in size so as to indicate by their dresses, arms, and banners, whether they came from Christian or Heathen countries, while the ships that carried them were reduced in size in comparison with the men — and women too sometimes — whom they carried, as if to compel recognition that a Power and a Mystery, that is at once half-human and half-divine, is ruling and will always rule the Air, the Earth, the Water and the Fire.

On each side of a blazing fire of pine logs, kept in constant flame by sticks from a big pile in a capacious copper container, were two deep well-cushioned chairs, that resembled the rudder divided sterns of a couple of barges rather than baronial judgment-seats or collegiate library-benches or cathedral choir-stalls.

It was between these two seats that the huge low eight-legged table of dark oak stood that was covered with these pictures of the world. One corner of this enormously large and very low table, on the surface of which Behemoths and Leviathans and dragons and sea-serpents were disporting themselves, was devoted to the art of book-binding, an art in which the present Baron of Cone took a lively and a practical interest.

On this corner of the table adjoining the Baron’s chair was a careful selection of the skins of small local wild animals, by the aid of which the Baron was wont to practise with slow and sedulous care the by no means easy art of making bindings for both sacred and profane manuscripts.

The delicate results of his devoted concentration on this unusual task could be seen meticulously arranged on various wooden stands beneath all the four walls of the chamber, including the one where a low and very narrow door opened on the stairway that led to the foot of the tower. It was not until an evening in the middle of February in that eventful Christian year of 1272 that the stored-up, banked-up, piled-up fury of Lady Ulanda against Friar Bacon burst out in full enough force, as she sat in the other curiously carved and richly cushioned chair over their fire of pine logs to make that easy-going Lord of the Manor of Cone realize that the situation was serious.

“If you don’t do something and do it quickly,” hissed Ulanda, sitting straight up at the edge of her seat, and with her long, bare arms giving the rim of the great table, which extended its breadth and its length at their side, a series of desperate blows with her knuckles, “I shall go mad!”

Across the maps fastened with golden nails to the table and making it look like the mingling of an illustrated bestiary with an illustrated cosmography, it seemed to Baron Boncor that under these violent blows all those weird sea-monsters and land-monsters quivered into a new life and ceased to be merely pictures. But the Baron's look of bewildered concern only agitated her still more; and with a frantic artfulness she manipulated her knuckles so that her enormous signet-rings — rings that she only wore when she felt especially angry with the world, and which always made her husband think of certain pre-historic rings that had been found by one of his ploughmen near an ancient burial mound in the immediate vicinity of his castle — beat upon the table.

Ulanda's parents were both dead and she had no relatives left, but she always maintained that these two rings had belonged to Rorsuk, King Stephen's nephew, and that it was because he had forgotten to put them on at some royal banquet that he was found murdered that same night in the bed of one of the court ladies.

At any rate the sound that Ulanda's rings, one of which carried on it the semblance of a wild-boar and the other the semblance of a whale, caused to vibrate across that monster-bearing table, suggested that a sea-serpent was catching its breath as it neared the land at the sight of a Behemoth munching grass on the sea-shore.

It was at this moment, before the bewildered Baron could formulate any appeal to her enraged soul, that they both became aware of steps on the tower staircase. They looked at each other and they looked at the door. But no indignant look and no muttered curse could stop that door from opening. And there, quietly crossing the threshold, was Raymond de Laon!

Raymond was as fair-haired as Baron Boncor, but his hair was straight, not curly like the Baron's, and if he had grown a beard it would probably have been feathery and wispy in the manner of Spardo's. In figure he was tall and slender, and his face had an alert, intent, interrogating look, as if he were forever searching for something he couldn't find, and yet not at all as if this search was painful or as if he felt any touch of anger or desperation at not finding what he sought.

The first thing he did on entering the chamber was to turn half-round, even while he was in the act of making a low obeisance, and to close the door. This he did with extreme punctiliousness and almost with the air of being a confederate in an exciting conspiracy. But the door once closed and his obeisance over, it was with a most unembarrassed and easy manner that he advanced to the edge of the great table, and leaning forward across it with the tips of his long fingers just touching it, he completely, although very politely, disregarded the evident hostility on the lady's face and addressed himself entirely to Baron Boncor, who had risen with a friendly greeting and now sank down, composed and attentive, to hear what his young friend had to say.

"I came to tell you, my lord," Raymond began, "that your people in the reception room downstairs have just been considerably disturbed by the unexpected appearance among them tonight of a group of men from Lost Towers. None of my friends among your people have been able to tell me who it was who let these bandits come in. I fancy myself it was some young rogue who has been looking for an excuse to leave Cone altogether and to join these crazy followers of Lost Towers. Though evidently puzzled how they got in, your excellent Ralph Turgo, unwilling to be the one to start trouble, began at once giving them refreshments.

"Well, I took advantage of this moment of relaxation to ask a few questions of one of these Lost Towers men; and what I picked up from him was an amazing piece of news. It appears that Bonaventura, head of all the Franciscans, is lodging at Bumset Priory tonight, and that he himself, and no one else, has hired for the occasion these master-ruffians from Lost Towers with the intention of using them as his own retainers, so that he can drag Friar Bacon out of his prison there, and carry him off to a ship that's waiting on the Thames in London to take him to France where he'll never he heard of again.

"I heard them telling our Turgo — and Ralph's a crafty fellow, you know, when it comes to inducing rascals like these Brown Tunics to talk — just what they told me, that Bonaventura wants them to carry off from the Priory-prison not only the Friar himself and all his unholy and heathen books, but also this Brazen Head of his, about which we hear so much. This Brazen Head he wants them to carry into some empty space in the forest, and when once they've got it there — in some empty space, you understand, between the Fortress and Lost Towers — to hammer it to bits with stones and plough-shares and iron clubs!"

Having thus delivered his startling news with dramatic intensity straight across that curious table which now bore upon its geographical face all the most terrifying monsters, of land, sea, and air, that have ever defied man's domination of the world, the fair-haired lover of Lil-Umbra let his whole tension relax, and in an easy and quiet and apologetic way moved round the table till he reached the arm of Baron Boncor's chair over which he bent.

"I didn't want to bother you with all this, my dear Baron," he murmured, "but it struck me as such an unexpected coalition between God and the Devil that it gave me the feeling of an unpleasant conspiracy against all quiet and moderate people who dislike extremes. I can't myself quite explain the shock it gave me; but an unpleasant shock it was. I rather think it had to do with the peculiar colour of the clothes these men wear, which is almost exactly the colour of that liquid we always see between the stones in those places where they slaughter animals.

"I must have imagined the actual spectacle of these savage brown tunics doing the abominable bidding of this ferocious angel of God, who evidently would have loved to have seen hammered into unrecognizable bits not only the Friar's Brazen Head but the Friar's own human, all-too-human skull!"

"And a good thing too!" hissed Lady Ulanda, rising to her feet and confronting her husband's young friend across the outer edge of a picture of a terrifying sea, whose waves were breaking on the shores of what that primeval map called "the Land of Cathay," and on whose breaking waves a monster was riding, whose head resembled the head of a colossal lizard and its rear end the tail of a gigantic dolphin.

"Forgive her, Raymond!" murmured the Baron gently. "The poor old girl had a bit of a shock a day or two ago." Something in the tone of his voice induced Ulanda to resume her seat; though those ominous rings on her fingers jangled remorselessly still against the table's edge.

"May I tell him about your visit to the Friar?" enquired the Baron; and added hurriedly: "I think I ought to tell him, you know, because then he'll realize better our whole feeling about the Friar and his confounded Brazen Oracle."

Ulanda's reply to this question was only a bowing of her head still lower over her knees. But her husband firmly, though very gently, went on. "Yes, she went to see this Bacon fellow to ask him to help her in preparing some of those ointments for which our present-day ladies have such a mania — the sort of ointment, you know, that that queer tinker or whatever he is, who rides a horse with a swelling in its neck like the head of a man, is always trying to sell and swearing too — I've often heard him at it! — that it's what they used in Babylon when the whale swallowed Jonah.

"And how do you suppose this modern Simon Magus received our lady! No! I'll tell him, my precious. Don't you interrupt! You can correct me later. He burst into a fit of fury and acted to Ulanda with unpardonable discourtesy — Forgive me, Raymond! It's only my shoulder. I didn't draw back from your hand — lean against the back of my neck. I don't get the ghost of a twinge there! He's not really a good bowman, our Lost Towers rogue: and I don't myself think he's much of a catch for Satan. I mean I don't think he's half as corrupt or half as clever as his wife and daughter. What do you say, my dear, on that nice point?"

But Ulanda who had flung herself back in her chair, her knuckles white with the intensity with which she clutched the carved lionheads at its elbow, took no notice of this amiable request.

"Tell him at once," she ejaculated, spitting out the words in a low hoarse voice, and with as complete disregard for the presence of Raymond as if what she said had to pass no further than from one organic portion of her own person to another, "tell him at once," and it was as if the gall within her addressed itself to the midriff within her, "that it matters nothing to us by whose hand this accurst wizard is unfrocked and sent begging, as long as it is done, and all his fabrications pounded into dust! Tell him to say to Bonaventura that when the job is completed, we hope to welcome him here and do all we can to help him in his hunt for other traffickers with the Devil!"

It was difficult for Raymond to get the precise expression on that curly-bearded face, as Boncor, while slowly rising from his chair, turned towards him.

What increased the young man's uncertainty on this point was the fact that the act of rising caused a spasm of pain to pass through Boncor's wounded shoulder, and this, though largely concealed by his beard, for pain affects the mouths of certain types of men more than their eyes or foreheads, did perceptibly obscure the intimately direct look which the Baron fixed upon his friend.

"I shall go downstairs with him at once, my dear, and deal with these Red-Brown Tunics from the Towers, and have a word with Turgo. You may depend on it, my treasure, that all your rightful dignity, and all your natural lady-like feelings will be considered to the uttermost in the arrangements your old adorer makes; so don't worry! Keep the fire up and get out some wine by the time we come up again! And have a sip yourself for a while! We shan't be as long as, O I know so well how long you're now imagining we'll be! You'll see. Thanks, Raymond."

And all that Ulanda could now hear were the double thuddings of their feet, her husband's considerably heavier than his friend's, as the two men tramped down the turret stairs.

Ulanda sat still, seeing nothing but the living heart of the fire in front of her, and hearing nothing but the dark, deep, dead silence that surrounded the crackling of those burning sticks. Her thoughts were much less desperate than Raymond could possibly have imagined, as he accompanied her husband into the reception chamber on the ground floor below. To be alone always suited her; and though she knew well at the bottom of her heart that her husband would never, in spite of his encouraging words, really see to it that her longed-for revenge on Roger Bacon would be brought about, she was able, now that she was no more actually in the presence of this friendship she hated so much, to treat the whole matter, and her own feelings about it, with something approaching a philosophic mind.

And the most powerful of all the divinities with whom it is our destiny to get more acquainted the older we grow — namely, that frivolous, merciless, apparently irresponsible goddess, whose name is Tyche or Chance — did not refuse at this crisis in her life to give the passionate Ulanda the breathing-space to which any sort of humane judicial authority would have taken for granted she was entitled; for there sounded now a quite different step upon the turret stairs, a step the familiar vibration of which in place of making her sit up and prepare for action made her relax with an ineffable sense of relief.

"O Mabbernob! Do you know what has just happened to me? And for the first time too in all the days of my life? And it wasn't because I'm a real knight either, and knighted by the King himself! You'll never guess, Mabbernob darling, what it was! But try a moment: O do try a moment to guess, before I sit down!"

An affectionately friendly and a comfortably appreciative smile spread softly over Ulanda's whole personality. She felt — she always felt in this manner — just exactly as when, after a second's submerging under the waters of unconsciousness, she had first beheld this only offspring of her love for the Lord of Cone lying beside her. It had not been very long before she found herself translating a constantly repeated sequence of babyish babblement into the word "Mabbernob," by which the little creature was designating the womb from which it came and the paps that fed it.

"Well, well," she now replied, in an affectionately jocular tone, "Honey-Pot holy, Honey-Pot mighty, Honey-Pot washed and dressed, tell Mabbernob the whole story!"

The young knight stalked solemnly to Ulanda's side of the big table, placed the back of a hand clutching a pair of gauntlets against his left hip, tightened his bare fingers about the handle of his sword, and tilted his chin in the air. "It was," he announced, "as I went into the ante-room just now. There were half-a-dozen fellows there, all trick'd out in that funny red-brown stuff they wear at the Towers, stuff that when you see it at close quarters is all made of rags, rags patched together you know, like the clots and clouts of wandering beggars on the Icen Way: and what must they do the moment they saw me standing there, but rush forward, kneel down before me, stretch out their arms towards me, and cry in the sort of voice — do you remember, Mabbernob? — in which those play-acting masqueraders who came from Sicily cried, when they acted Sabine prisoners begging to have back their wives!

"But what these poor devils cried was — but do tell me this, Mabbernob, before I go on; has Father been hunting over there and catching these wretches for sport instead of badgers and foxes? — what, I say, they cried was:

"'Be our leader, Sir William, be our leader against this wicked, hateful, abominable hell-born Friar Bacon who has devilishly been making, with all his infernal cleverness, out of tin and iron and copper and brass a real breathing, thinking human being, just exactly as if he were God, a Being, you must understand, made of Brass, a Being who predicts the end of the world, a Being who has the power not only to predict the end of the world but — think of their believing that, Mabbernob! — to bring it about! So please, please, please, Sir William,' these poor wretches cried out, 'consent to be our leader and help us to break into little pieces this New Man invented by this New Devil! Thou art a knight, Sir William, and here is work proper to thy knightly arms!'"

"Sit down over there in your Father's chair, son of my heart, and you and I will discuss this whole matter as carefully as we can."

Ulanda's voice was so extremely quiet that her son, though he wasn't quite the well-balanced sage he fancied himself to be, received not the faintest intimation of the seething and smouldering hurricane of feverish thoughts that was whirling in her head.

"Shall I use this child?" she asked herself. "Boncor will never go as far as I want; and these wretches have nothing to lose and everything to gain by killing this devil of a Friar! Besides if Lord Edward comes home before he's expected and before Henry dies, he'll be less inclined to make a fuss if it's an excitable boy who brought about the killing of this sorcerer, and did it by the hands of this Lost Towers gang who've always been irresponsible outlaws."

Thud — thud — thud — Ah! there were the steps of her bearded husband and his handsome and diplomatic young friend! As she heard these steps there was something about the image of her husband's beard that flung new fuel on her fury. In these subtle fits of nervous rage, which most of us experience at one time or another, some particular visual image will often detach itself from its proper setting, like a scarf or a belt or a brooch or a feather from some old picture upon the wall, and fly to blend itself with the bodily target of our resentment, even partaking, though the luckless thing is in itself absolutely innocent, in the special objectionableness of the cause of our rancour.

Thus it was that several seconds before the actual appearance of the middle-aged man she loved and the young man she hated, the curly beard of the former and the clear-cut Hellenic profile of the latter rose so vividly before her mind's eye that, in a flash of mad fury, Ulanda decided that at all costs, and in spite of all her love for the man himself, Boncor's beard must be cut off.

The idea of a beardless Boncor did indeed so fulfil and so satisfy her wrath that, as she listened to what the two men were saying, she became actually aware, though she wouldn't let herself enjoy that awareness, of a relaxation in the bitterness of her feelings. Something had come into her mind now that resembled a faint reflection in a sprinkling of water, by the side of a weary and unending road, along which she was riding.

She watched with an abstracted gaze how her son settled himself more and more comfortably in his father's chair, and as she rubbed with the inside tips of the trembling fingers of one hand the white knuckles of the other, which was fiercely pressed against the edge of the maps of all the world, she vividly imagined herself stroking, with an absolutely sated satisfaction, the bare, soft, hairless chin of the man she possessed.

But at this moment, as Boncor and Raymond crossed the room, she felt as if they were both as transparent as ghosts.

“They’ve gone, Ulanda,” Boncor announced, “and you should have seen the effect of the light they carried, as it fell on the clump of firs at our gate!”

“And then on their red-brown costumes,” added Raymond de Laon.

“Is Bonaventura waiting for them?” Ulanda enquired. “Is he going boldly to lead them into the Priory and straight up the steps into that chamber where the wretch manufactures his devilish machines?” As the two of them moved up to the table they both replied at once.

“I told them plainly that I wouldn’t have any killing of Friars on land that belongs to me. But when they asked: ‘Will you forbid your people to meddle with them as they carry off the sorcerer?’ I answered that I never interfere with private quarrels between different sections of my people. If the pious ones want to kill the impious ones, Let the Devil look after his own! is what I say. And if the profane ones want to kill the pious ones, Leave it to God! is my motto.”

“You know, lady, there are some quite presentable fellows among these Lost Towers rascals! I expected them to look like a pack of thieves,” added Raymond de Laon, “but, I assure you, Lady, they weren’t all like that!”

It was at this point that little Sir William, who had been listening to their words like a prince in a fairy-tale, rose portentously to his feet. “Don’t you think, Father, don’t you think, Raymond, that it would be a good thing if I went down and talked things over with Turgo? When I discussed with him last week the question of what weapons our Cone bodyguard had better carry on important occasions, he was very impressed by what I told him I'd seen in London at King Henry's court. I noticed just now when I saw what they were carrying — I mean the ones who were going into the forest to keep watch on these brown-backed bandits — that Turgo had taken my advice. But there was just one little thing that he'd forgotten on which I had specially insisted, namely that their short Roman blades should be unsheathed before placing them in their belts; and that their belts should be furnished with leather clasps, or leather bands, all the way round their waists, so that it would be possible for each man" — Here the new-made knight clapt his hands to his own belt, which bristled with the handles of two or three gleaming blades— "for each man at any sudden attack to defend himself with desolating — no! I mean devastating — no! what I had in mind was penetrating, for the daggers of course must be ready to go in — I mean to be plunged into their enemies' bodies. I think — don't you agree, Father? — that it might be a real help to our good Master Turgo if I went more fully into this matter of the way our Cone bodyguard should be armed at this important chorus — I mean crisis — in this history of our house here, and perhaps of — of — of this hemisphere. Don't you agree with me, father?"

The belted knight's progenitor bowed his head. But having gasped and gurgled and almost choked in his effort not to laugh, he glanced appealingly at his wife, and there was a prolonged — and for Raymond de Laon — an embarrassing silence.

The truth was that Ulanda hadn't been listening. Not a single word of all that her son had so pontifically repeated about belts and daggers had "penetrated" the walls of her mind. She had known he was speaking "in character". She had known that her husband was trying not to laugh. She had known that Raymond was vaguely watching all three of them with ironic detachment, and was probably calculating in his own mind how early in the morning he would have to wake up if he were to get a glimpse of Lil-Umbra before their breakfast at the Fortress, and whether he could make himself wake up or whether he'd better get Turgo to wake him.

Ulanda knew all these things. But as at this instant she glanced under the left arm of her boastful offspring and caught a certain humorously resigned expression in the eyes of her mate, she suddenly felt such a rush of love for him that she could hardly keep herself from betraying it. But she used all her will-power to struggle against this wave of emotion; and, as she overcame it, it became clear to her that to have yielded to it at this moment would have meant the giving up for good of her sworn revenge upon Friar Bacon.

It was at this precise point in Ulanda's cogitations that wild excited cries and alarming crashing sounds were heard in the rooms below, followed by a rush of half-a-dozen feet up their staircase. Raymond ran to the door that opened on these stairs and jerked it wide open, repeating as he did so in a high-pitched voice: "What the devil is this? What on earth's happening?"

But the broad-shouldered Turgo, with half-a-dozen stalwart and extremely excited men-at-arms behind him, flung him aside, and bursting into the room, stood like a rocky water-fall of indignation in front of the three persons grouped round that map-laden table, behind which, in the absence of fresh logs, the fire was almost dead.

"It's too much to endure, my lord! It's too much for anybody to endure! There's a big lot of men from the Fortress outside there now, led, yes! actually led, by that boy John who's the younger of them two, so he ain't even the heir to Roque! He's only a young scholard, that's what he is, yes! that's all he is — just a scrap of a lad at school! And there he is outside the main gate of Cone waving God knows what sort of weapon in his hand and defying these Lost Towers men and our men and all the men of Wessex to touch his precious Friar and his Friar's bedevilments!"

At this point the formidable bailiff of Cone straightened his tremendous shoulders to a degree that might have made even the powerful lover of Ghosta take notice.

"The man we need here now," bellowed Turgo, "is Lord Edward himself — O may he soon be our lord and King! — who is already on ship-board on his way home. It's him we need now, in this wretched bandit-beset country! Lord Edward would soon settle this crazy confusion in our ancient forest! Why, when he was with the King in London, none of these curst, insurrectionary barons dared lift a cry or wave a banner in this forest of ours! No, they daren't, I tell you, my lord. They daren't, I tell you, my lady! That's what we need here today, a proper knightly prince like Lord Edward!"

"I'll come down at once, Turgo," said Boncor, giving his wife an enquiring glance and apparently taking for granted that she would confirm his decision. "You'd better stay up here with your mother, son," he added in rather a less assured tone, when he noticed how nervously and anxiously the newly-made knight was pulling out and thrusting back the various silver-handled and brass-handled daggers which protruded from his leather belt.

In a flash Ulanda rushed round the table and clutched her husband by his left wrist. She had seen in a sudden vision these Fortress adherents, urged on by this crazy young John, and full of the idea that Friar Bacon, the greatest teacher in the world, must be saved at all costs, striking the already-wounded Boncor a blow that would be his death; while she, bereft of the love of her life, would be doomed to abide for the rest of her mortal days listening to this swaggering son of hers and trying to make him turn his words into deeds. God in Heaven, no! that would be more than she could bear! Let all three of them perish before that happened!

"You go down with Turgo, Sonny!" she cried. "Your father's a wounded man. I can't possibly let him fight with those devils! Only for Christ's blessed sake take care of yourself, son. I don't want you wounded too!"

Only once before in all his life had the Lord of Cone been required by the fate or by the chance that governs us all to make a psychic effort comparable with the one he had to make now. But he succeeded in making it; and the apparent ease with which he accepted the issue, when he had done so, was a triumph for his personality of which not a soul present had the faintest shadow of an idea.

"All right my dear; I'll stay with you. Off you go, William! Do whatever Turgo thinks best when you're down there. That little fool John has no right to bring his Dad's men into our place. But I've heard he's the best disciple the Friar's got round here; and we know what these students are! Keep an eye on our lad, Turgo, my friend. Remember he's the youngest knight of the oldest king in Christendom! I should say we do indeed need Lord Edward here; and I warrant these confounded lands he's crusading in, whether they're Arabian or Christian, will go on in the same turmoil whether he's there or not."

By the time the Lord of Cone had completely covered up the heart-heaving moral effort he'd just made in thus remaining in the library of his Castle, both Turgo and Sir William had reached the stairs, the latter much more concerned with the arrangement of the weapons in his own belt than with the whereabouts of the son of his sovereign, and the door had been closed behind them.

Ulanda promptly pushed both her quiescent lord into his chair and sliding down upon her knee drew his head towards her own. But it was then that the goddess of chance displayed her most devilish impishness. In the impetuosity of this gesture of affection the impulsive lady had forgotten a certain most perilously explosive inhibition in her own nerves; namely her loathing of beards.

But now, as their heads met, her husband's curly beard tickled her cheek. By long practice she had acquired the art of kissing him without incurring this contact. But the truth was that she had come to be obsessed of late more than ever before by this loathing for, and intolerable disgust at, the touch of a man's beard. The Baron indeed had recently begun to grow aware of this nervous mania of hers, and he often found himself wondering why at an earlier stage in their alliance she had not protested against his refusal to shave. This refusal of his was wholly instinctive.

He was constitutionally slow-moving; and was addicted to the habit of adapting himself to existing conditions; and one of the most obvious of such conditions was the simple law of Nature that the chins of men grew beards. Thus between these two persons there inevitably existed, lodged in the physical make-up of them both, the perilous possibility of a bodily, primeval, skin-for-skin quarrel of a serious kind.

It was an unfortunate coincidence however that at the very moment when her cheek was touched by the lips she loved and the beard she hated, there should have come to her ears from outside their secluded retreat, and even from outside the Castle itself, tumultuous cries and shouts and the noise of blows mixed with resounding yells of anger and pain.

These sounds may possibly have intensified her feelings by adding to her nervous mania a shiver of anxiety, though not more than a shiver, about her son. In a mad reaction against the touch of that bushy beard, she leapt up from his knee and uttered a piercing scream of rage, that flew out into the night like a wild bird whose wings were on fire.

It might well have happened that such a scream, rising from aggravated feminine nerves, and whirling off into the darkness from a height above the tops of the tallest trees, especially when the court-yard and gateway of the place were resounding with blows and cries, would have dissolved in the air unregarded by anyone except the two persons concerned.

But either by another random hit from the wanton bow of chance or, let us hope, by some special intervention of a brave man's guardian angel, this scream from Ulanda gave to the death-pangs of young Ralph Gaulter of Evercreech the one thing needed to wholly redeem his desperation.

Gaulter had only just entered the service of the Baron of Cone, and he had only done so because of a savage tragedy, three or four generations ago, when his great-grandmother, Matilda Gaulter, had been raped by one of the Lords of Roque. But at the moment of Ulanda's piercing scream that seemed to come down from heaven, young Gaulter was on his back on the grass with one of the red-brown bandits kneeling on his chest and pressing a broad and rusty kitchen-knife deep into his neck.

From his childhood he had heard tales of this ancestress of his, her beauty, her pride and her pitiful end, and now in his death throes the idea took hold of him that he was giving up his life in some mysterious way for this dead woman's living sake, and that this cry from above actually came from Matilda Gaulter.

Thus as the pressure of that broken, broad-headed, rusty knife just below the apple of his throat made his life-blood spurt forth from beneath his chin till it drenched his distorted and desperate face, the dying youth felt absolutely convinced that he really was, in these death-gasps and under these spouts of blood, sacrificing his life for this old ancestress of his who had been so horribly wronged.

Black gulfs of death might swallow up his body and threaten his soul, but the fairy-tale Great-Granny of all the years of his life was saved forever!

XIII. THE BRAZEN HEAD

RALPH GAULTER WAS the only one who, in this irresponsible three-cornered hurly-burly, lost his life. Others were wounded in the confusion but none of them mortally; while in the struggle of young John and his couple of henchmen with the red-brown bandits from Lost Towers it soon became clear that it was this latter group — tipsy though half of them were, and wildly excited though all of them were — who were destined to win; though when they had carried the Brazen Head away into the forest, and so well out of reach of all possible rescue or recovery, that Bonaventura himself felt justified in returning to the Priory, young John and his two companions obstinately pursued them.

Bonaventura evidently felt sure that when his red-brown allies had grown a little more sober they would finish the job and pound the Head to pieces. What really saved this unparalleled invention from destruction was not the protective magic, whether we call it "black" or "white", of its creator. It was something, though it is impossible to say exactly what, in the Head itself, just as if by some inexplicable chance the creative energy in the Friar had overreached its proper scientific limits, and had created a being capable, not only of personifying its own identity, but of escaping altogether from the control of its creator.

By the power of his immense sacerdotal reputation over the whole of Europe, Bonaventura had finally managed so to convince the Prior that he had some special mandate from the Holy Father at Rome, that he was actually permitted to lead his bodyguard of reckless devils into the Friar's chamber. Here he had made them open the sacred alcove and wrench from its recess and carry downstairs the imperturbable Head.

With the person of Bacon himself he could not meddle, for the Prior of Bumset was alone responsible for his official prisoner; but it was a startling as well as a bewildering surprise to him when the Friar made not the very faintest attempt to resist this sacrilegious and autocratic invasion of his chamber, but from an absolutely calm and wholly preoccupied absorption in what he was writing at his table, simply looked up once or twice, neither smiling nor frowning, but treating the whole incident as if the General of the Order and his piratical allies were so many negligible mice.

Of what happened later, when Bonaventura, leaving the destruction of the Brazen Head to his reckless allies, had honoured and delighted the Prior by consenting to share that epicurean ecclesiastic's evening meal and to sleep that night under the priory roof, neither the Baron of Cone nor his over-wrought lady could ever get a clear or consecutive account.

It was obviously due to the commonsense and tact — yes! and no less to the courage — of Raymond de Laon that young Sir William was spared any grievous shock, whether to his person, or to his "amour propre," or to his reputation, in the confused mêlée that accompanied the triumphant departure of the excited bandits of Lost Towers, carrying with them into the depth of the forest the Brazen Head.

They were not as numerous as they seemed to be, nor half as formidable, and they were so proud of being given "carte blanche" to be the violent executioners of the will and purpose of the Pope of Rome that they couldn't resist shouting and dancing in a wild orgy of excitement round the mysterious object they were carrying.

Many of them waved spears and javelins. Others brandished two-edged swords. A few carried torches, and some had bows and arrows with which they just amused themselves, shooting blindly into the pine-trees above their heads, as if to dislodge any living creature who might be there, whether bird or bat or squirrel or wild-cat, anything in fact that might be up there and could be hit by a random shot. It took four of them to bear the weight of the Brazen Head, which they had fastened with ropes to a couple of fir-poles, and which in the thick grey darkness looked like the head of some colossal decapitated giant whom they had caught asleep.

The confused henchmen of Baron Boncor, who were much better armed, but at the same time much less certain of the reason of their arming, or of the cause of the turmoil, than any other of the groups involved, were endeavouring, in a thinly-dispersed, widely-scattered circle, to enclose the wild men of Lost Towers till they could be assaulted from every side at once and compelled to surrender their animate-inanimate spoil. The formation of this mobile circle had been the plan of Raymond de Laon and it would have been a very good plan if the course of events had followed any sort of rational order. But at that time of night and with no less than three Baronies, each acting like the troop of a separate dominion, events were badly diverted from their logical cause-and-effect sequence.

De Laon himself, armed with a long straight sword, and with a small round shield almost exactly like some of the shields depicted on certain ancient vase-paintings, kept running at full speed round this extended circle, exhorting its human figures to draw in as steadily and resolutely as possible round this dancing and shouting crew of excited bandits.

Young John of the Fortress, who hadn’t been left for long without full information of what was happening in regard to the greatest of all the inventions of his admired instructor, had soon appeared on the scene with a rather eccentric couple of Roque-Manor adherents ready to follow their leader anywhere, but really rather out for adventure than for any particular cause or principle; and all John did was to lead them blindly forward, straight towards the bandits who were carrying the Brazen Head, the appearance of which made the lad think, the moment he caught sight of it under the flickering torches, of the description in the Jewish Scriptures of the “Ark of the Covenant” containing the spiritual presence of Jehovah.

So well had all the Fortress people been trained by their lord and lady to keep an eye on Tilton and John and Lil-Umbra, while they let these young people feel they were completely free to act as they pleased, that the nearer young John — who had no weapon but a peculiar kind of axe fastened to a long pole, a weapon he had invented for himself — approached this thing of mystery, the more closely was he hedged in by two free-men of the Manor of Roque, who were both equally eccentric, but who could at a pinch hoist John upon their shoulders and make off with him.

All might have gone well for the friends and liberators of the Brazen Head; and the madly chanting bandits of Lost Towers might have been put to headlong flight, leaving their projected victim, free from even a single hammer-blow, staring up at his rescuers in divine detachment from his bed upon the silvery-grey ground-lichen, had it not been for one of those annoying accidents that we love to call “ironical”, because by the use of this classic word we endow the antics of acrobatic chance with a conscious flightiness that takes away the shame of our human frustration and defeat.

What actually happened was that at the very moment when young John and his supporters came near to advancing point-blank upon the ruffians who carried the Bronze Head, Sir William Boncor, the youngest belted knight of the longest-reigning monarch in the world, stumbled over a hole in the earth containing the offspring, a male and a female, of the common badger.

These little creatures had been well-suckled that day at noon by their mother; and as a result they crept in a sleepy manner to the mouth of their hole, thinking to themselves that the moment had come for a little independent exploration of the forest; but they felt so satisfied, and so cosy and comfortable, and also so sleepy, that they soon relinquished this desire, and curling themselves up fell into a deeper sleep than they had enjoyed for months.

And it was this happy sleep that was disturbed by the sharply-spurr'd heels of portly little Sir William. These came down on both their little heads, completely separating them from their necks and crushing them together into a pulp of flesh, bones, blood, and bloody hair, against a slab of rock-slate. It was upon this rock-slate thus plastered with a gouache of bones, blood, brains and hair that both the heels of our youthful knight slid awkwardly forward, bringing him down with a mighty crash upon his back-side and extracting from him the sort of indignant and outraged howl against the whole causal sequence of events that had led to this culminating collapse, such as an infant who can run and cry but cannot yet talk naturally utters when brought low.

This event proved to be a turning point in this chaotic skirmish, for it completely brought to an end all further participation of Cone Castle in the confused mêlée. Raymond de Laon, hurrying to pick up the fallen knight, whose howl he knew half-a-mile away, was soon followed by the rest of the Cone party, which was naturally, since it was all happening at the foot of Cone Castle, more numerous than John's followers from Roque; and the result of this was that the blood-and-dirt-clad bearers of the Brazen Head, still recklessly blundering through the darkness, looking for a rock, or a heap of rocks, where they could smash the Head into smithereens, were only followed with any real obstinate determination by the eccentric couple of Fortress-men who through thick and thin stuck to young John.

John himself was agitated through his whole nature. This was the first time he had found himself engaged in a physical struggle the issue of which, whether bad or good, affected what was the main preoccupation of his life — his devotion to Friar Bacon and his work. The Lost Towers gang were still shouting and jesting and leaping and dancing through the darkness, as they swung the Brazen Head, bound with cords to a couple of poles, from one pair of bearers to another; and every now and then they banged at it with some log of wood they picked up in passing, or with some incongruous piece of culinary iron, that, like John's own axe on a pole, was in some ways more deadly than an ordinary sword or spear.

They soon had gone so far, and John had had to follow them so fast, that not only was he himself completely puzzled as to the direction in which he was being led, but his two quaint attendants seemed as much at a loss as he was. One of these was a certain red-haired freeman of the manor called Colin Catteract, whose thin body, long shanks and peculiarly malleable physiognomy, instantaneously expressive of every fantasy that came into his head, made him by the destiny of his inmost identity the sort of individual who is born to be a player, a performer, an actor, especially in such a role as a court-clown or king's jester.

The other was at the extremest opposite pole of human perversity. His name was Ralph Riddel-de-Rie, and he was the best carpenter in Roque, but he had such a habit of using the expression, "clamp 'em up" — an expression that always suggested to the old ex-bailiff in the armoury the figure of some colossal demiurgic world-carpenter, fitting the Earth and the Moon into the sun's chariot, before passing on to deal with Orion or the Pleiades — that he'd got the permanent nickname of "Clamp". He was a short, squat, stumpy man, and was extremely reticent. But when he did utter any opinion, he did so in a portentous tone of grim and final decision.

The present moment however certainly lent itself better to the airy-fairy vivacity of Colin than to the heavy-weather determination of Clamp. These accurst bandits might be in a riotous mood at the moment, but they were skilled in making their way through all the regions of this locality, a locality where the densest thickets or bushes and brakes often led to morasses and pools and reedy swamps, out of which again, in still more surprising contrast, rose grassy slopes and mossy undulations, pillared by tall pines: and they could accomplish this, so completely did they know the whole district, in darkness as well as in the clearest moonlight.

Young John now began to experience real terror. Whither was he being led, he and his friends Colin and Clamp? Were they being decoyed, cunningly and artfully, by this dramatic show-off of a bacchanalian riot, round the utmost outskirts of the Manor of Roque, towards the very brink of the Lost Towers swamp?

It was extremely painful to him to watch that great dim phantasm of a Human Head go bobbing up and down in front of this mad crew; and he began to experience a strange feeling about the Head and a weird fear that It itself — yes! this magical construction of an inventor acting the part of God — might play Satan towards its Creator, and go over to the enemy!

The bandits, after all, weren’t so numerous. There were only about a dozen of them. John had already counted them. And it was clear to him that they were moving much more slowly than at the start. He and his companions had now not the slightest difficulty in keeping up with them. The odd thing was, that though, first one, and then another, among those who were not at the moment helping with the Head, turned round to take a good look at the three men, so obstinately following them, nobody made the faintest attempt to attack them or to stop their pursuit. Could he regard it as possible that they were waiting till they reached some particular spot on the borders of Lost Towers, some spot where they had already arranged that others of their band should await them, possibly under the command of Baron Maldung himself?

John's uneasiness finally rose to such a pitch over the various terrifying possibilities his mind conjured up that he called his two friends to a halt under a massive pine-tree, and put to them the blunt and drastic question whether the three of them were, or were not, rushing madly into a grievous snare? Agitated though he was John couldn't help being struck by the quaint contrast his two supporters made as he produced his small box of flint and tinder and put a light to the unlit torch Colin was carrying.

Colin himself had already begun to laugh, as was his habitual custom under all the chances and changes of mortal life. When he laughed, which was a simple and natural return to his normal condition, his childishly excited face, with the straight, pale, yellow hair waving above it, assumed the appearance of a flickering candleflame, of which his thin flexible body was the candlestick or empty bottle, from which protruded the finger of wax which contained the burning wick.

John had grown vaguely aware as they ran, though it was too dark to make out exactly what was happening to this companion of his, that poor Colin had begun to suffer, under the stress of their effort, some queer change in his appearance; and it was a comfort to see him restored once more to his accustomed look of a wildly blown candle in a dark bottle.

The stoical Clamp, on the contrary, turned towards them both in that flickering torch-ray his usual expression of obstinate indifference to all outward circumstance, or, to be more rigidly correct, to everything that occurred, whether it occurred within the mind or outside the mind.

It was clear that what Master Clamp had been destined by nature to be, or had by sheer force of will moulded himself into being, was what you might call a conscious inanimate, a thing made of wood, or of leather, or of baked clay, whose whole outward and inward nature implied submission — submission to whatever it might be, nervously interior or mechanically exterior, that pushed, impelled, flung, thrust, projected, rejected, lowered, elevated, inflamed, inspired, benumbed, froze, petrified it, according to a definite purpose.

He had a store of rhyming patter which he was in the habit of using as a sort of oil, or slaver, or low-pitched humming accompaniment to this sub-human submission to fate. He would say, without the least flicker of protest, or of complaint, far less of indignation: "That's the gear; I've got it clear: I've got to climb the bank up there. I've got to swish that river through. Under those bushes I've got to go, whether the danger's from spear or bow. It may wipe me off; it may help me on. We be all born; but we bain't all gone."

At this particular moment for instance, while Colin was laughing with his hair, his eyes, his lips, his skin, his ribs, his hips, his shins, his ankles, and with the fluttering fingers of both his hands, what Clamp said was: "If them's going to kill we, them's going to kill we; and if us be going to kill they, that's how t'will be; us'll be alive and them'll be stark staring. Jesus Holy will be Jesus Holy just the same; and Uncle Satan will be Uncle Satan just the same. Yes, frost will freeze and fire will burn and water will drown just the same, whether Roque eat up Towers or Towers eat up Roque. Freeze and burn and drown them will, whether a girt wave of the sea swallows all the bloody land in this blasted world, or whether the waves of every sea on the earth dry up and turn into the sands of the Desert of Sodom; just the same will it be for me, just the same will it be for thee, and just the same for this quiet old tree."

Young John kept turning this torch that Colin had been carrying so carefully for him, and that he himself had so carefully lit, from one vista of the forest to another, and then to the trunk of the tree at their side, and then up to the misty sky. And he thought in his heart:

"How many moments like this have passed for how many men like me since the beginning of the world! Here I am with these two: one dancing and chuckling with glee simply because he doesn't know whether we're going to save the Friar's Brazen Head or not, and the other already sick to death of the whole affair, and ready to be dead rather than make the effort to go on with it! And when I think how my Friar, who is, since Archimedes, the wisest sage and subtlest inventor in history, has created this Head and has given it enough brain to think and enough language to say what it thinks, and how this band of crazy miscreants is at this moment hunting for some heap of stones whereon and wherewith they may hammer it to fragments, I feel as if — as if — —"

And at this point John indeed felt so much as if he were gazing into a bottomless garbage-pit of the whole creation that he concluded his thoughts with a lamentable sigh, a sigh so deep that Colin ceased to laugh upwards and Clamp ceased to groan downwards, while the six troubled apertures which those three persons called their eyes just stared at one another.

And then, without any warning at all, a startling hullabaloo rose widely into the air from the men they were following; and a wild medley of sounds made up of cries, shouts, screams, howls, appeals, threats, curses, surged tumultuously through the forest.

"Come on, for heaven's sake!" gasped young John, brandishing his blazing torch in one hand and his grotesque axe at the end of a pole in the other, and rushing headlong towards the tumult. What they saw when they arrived was the towering figure of Peleg the Mongolian, swinging his terrifying mace with its orbicular head of iron spikes, but himself in evident danger of his life.

John shuddered when he saw what was threatening this strongest of all the supporters of his parents. For two of the Lost Towers men, each of them with one of his knees on the ground while on the other he balanced the end of his bow, were shooting arrow after arrow at him; and already the head-feathers of two arrows were sticking out of his left shoulder.

Luckily for Peleg he was wearing about his shoulders a thick leathery scarf, and so, though the points of the arrows entered his flesh and stuck there, they did not really seriously wound him. Of our three friends young John with his funny-looking weapon and his torch was in front, and queerly enough it was the humpty-dumpty figure of Clamp that was a close second, while Colin, the long-legged, flipperty-flappity antic, made a poor third. This happened, either because, in spite of all his zest for life, Colin was scared of facing the arrows of that dangerous pair, or because — but these secrets belong to those interior thoughts about which not even the boldest historian dares to be dogmatic — if he'd been in front of Clamp, he'd have missed the exquisitely comical sight of the heroic spurt in which that grim little stoic indulged himself at the final lap.

But suddenly, as young John had often in his short life noticed before, but had put it down to the spiritual atmosphere of that particular district, and had even interpreted it to his brother Tilton as the influence of some quite definite "genius loci," the whole situation reversed itself in an instant, and in a contagious rush of wild and desperate panic, the gang of bandits, with those two competent arrow-shooters taking the lead, fled as fast as it was possible for active outlaws to flee, in the general direction of Lost Towers.

It was now revealed to John that Peleg with his mace had not been alone when the three of them had heard this unnatural noise in the forest and had hunted it down.

And what made the whole lot of the bandits scoot off in terror was not Peleg's giant size nor his mace, but the sudden apparition, just to the left of those two kneeling bowmen, of what struck the whole lot of them as a Supernatural Being, possibly the Mother of God Herself, come to put an end to their nonsense.

It was Ghosta. But her black robe, and her white head-covering, and also, though it was too dark to see her features, her formidable dignity of movement, evoked, at that time of night, a spasm of awe that must have resembled the bewildered panic which some prowling rascal, up to no good, would have experienced had he drifted and loafed, without knowing in the least where he was going, along a cemetery path leading to the particular tomb out of which, at the very moment he arrived, Lazarus was being called forth from the dead.

The terror produced by the appearance of Ghosta was of course accentuated by her own powerful spirit. Tough nerves and thick skins and simple minds are sometimes dominated quite unexpectedly by a particular type of formidable intelligence, an intelligence which may easily strike those affected by it as supernatural, whereas in reality it may only be the power of an inspired personality.

Young John himself was affected by the apparition of Ghosta. His heart glowed within him, as, panting for breath after his run and waving his torch in a vigorous boyish manner, he stood staring at the Brazen Head which itself at that moment in the torch-light looked quite as indifferent to all outward events as Clamp himself, whose eyes kept turning heavily from the arrows in Peleg's shoulder to Ghosta's black robe, as if both these noticeable things had only been door-handles needing professional attention.

At any rate when Ghosta, who held a small lantern in her hand, came forward and moved straight to her gigantic Mongolian friend, it was not only those two arrow-shooters, both of whom leapt to their feet in consternation, who bolted in desperate panic, but every man-jack of that whole Lost Towers crowd.

Down on the earth fell the Brazen Head along with the poles on which it was carried and the cords by which it was tied, and a strange and sudden silence fell on the whole forest. Ghosta must have already seen young John and his friends approaching, but she did not even look round as they drew near. She had gone straight up to Peleg; and by the time John was at their side she had pulled out both the arrows which indeed the young man had already surmised must have left only shallow flesh-wounds, and was already bandaging the bleeding places with strips of white linen.

Did she always carry about with her, the young man wondered, these useful medicaments, or had she torn them from her own garments as she approached the scene?

The interest of both Colin and Clamp was concentrated on the Brazen Head upon which John's torch, though only held mechanically in his hand, now flung a direct blaze of light. The violent jolt with which the Head had been dropped, in the supernatural panic produced by Ghosta's appearance, had flung it clear of the poles and had dislodged from its shoulders one of the two ropes, that bound it.

The blaze of torch-light now flung upon its indefinitely moulded features gave it a most extraordinary expression. Its gaze was fixed upon Something. But upon what? That was the question which the airy Colin, as he whirled about it in protracted circle after circle, turning, so to speak, on his own axis, as he made of it a sort of cosmogonic axis for his saraband, and the round-bellied Clamp as he picked up a broken segment of rotten wood from the ground and leant on it, pressing his chin into the moss that covered its natural handle, might well have both been pondering, for they were obviously magnetized as they stared at it, to what degree it actually had been endowed with consciousness.

Its features had been so mistily and vaguely indicated by its human creator that it would have been as impossible for the most inquisitive scrutinizer to make out any expression at all. They seemed to have been arranged by their designer to prevent the possibility of their being used as a medium for any one single human emotion.

The contemplation of them always gave young John the feeling that he was surveying a wide-spread landscape from the top of a mountain. But the Head's eyes were undeniably gazing at something. Was this something a completely different world from the one out of whose elements its human creator had fashioned it, a different world in fact from the one with which we are all familiar?

Ever since the flight of that riotous Lost Towers band it had struck both the mind and the senses of our friend John that a strange silence had fallen upon the whole forest. Was this in fact due, John asked himself, to some real mental gesture of the Brazen Head?

Was it possible that, in creating this automatic Being, Friar Bacon had really created a living actual mind different altogether from all the minds so far created by the natural processes of life and nature? If this was possible, if in fact this is exactly what had happened, might it not be, John couldn't help wondering, that the activity of a mind, whose power of thought was completely different from any mind that has ever existed in the world before, might have such a formidable effect upon the mysterious galvanic forces that constitute the motions of the universe that a definite change would soon become evident not only in every star and planet in the firmament but in every living creature, however small and helpless, in our own immediate earth?

With such thoughts obscurely flitting through his brain John left Ghosta and Peleg to their enjoyment of what he imagined must have been for them both one of the most important moments in their lives. Together they had vanquished the enemy; and John felt sure that after Ghosta's ministration the giant's arrow-hurts would soon heal.

What he didn't feel sure of, as he turned from the two Hebraic lovers to Colin and Clamp, who were by this time engaged in what looked like an extremely absorbing whispered argument, was what effect this shock of falling with a jerk upon the earth would have upon the Head itself.

John had now been left, by the movement, so it seemed to him, of unadulterated fate, alone with the Head. He moved up so close to it that he soon stood within an arm's reach of those inchoate and incomprehensible features.

The Head's face, though it had been emptied by the deliberate intention of its creator, of all human expression, was in no way a blank face. The young man couldn't help uttering an inward and entirely inarticulate prayer to that chaotic brazen physiognomy, while he made absurd attempts to rouse it to some emotion, if only to the emotion of anger, by moving the fiery gleam of the torch he held with repeated switches and twitches and flashes and dashes and whirlings and twirlings between himself and that imperturbably chaotic visage.

But the countenance of the Brazen Head remained completely unmoved. John might just as well have endeavoured to evoke an earthquake or a volcanic eruption by brandishing his torch at the floor of the forest, or to draw down flashes of lightning and torrents of rain by challenging with it what could be seen of the black sky above the tops of the dark trees!

But suddenly the young man felt impelled to stop playing this silly game, and to shift the manner of his hold upon the torch he was carrying. He now began holding it as humbly and reverently as if he were at the rear end of a long procession of worshippers who were moving towards a temple.

And he made this change at the identical moment when they all heard a familiar voice calling to them from the forest and not very far away.

"Good God!" cried John, "that's the old man! I'd know his voice anywhere! Peleg, do you hear him? It's the old bailiff! What on earth is he doing out there at this time of night? The family would be furious if they knew! How have they let him get out of the Fortress? Is he alone?"

But John was talking now to nobody but Ghosta; for Peleg had at once responded to the voice, and had been followed at a mad rush by Colin, whose crazy chucklings and wild gestures had been reduced to the purposeful leapings of a high-mettled steed, and also by Clamp, who kept blurting out as he bounced and bumped along, "I know'd it! I know'd it! I know'd it! I could have told 'ee the whole tale if ye'd cuzzensented to ask it of I! Yes, I could have lighted up this whole blind, blubbered, bloated, blistered fog-patch we've gone and got lost in! Why didn't ye come to I 'stead of letting this kid of a Colin What's-a-clock show itself off?"

And indeed it now struck young John, who was standing close to Ghosta, while she calmly watched the tide of events, that it was only the special kind of darkness of this particular night that had prevented them from recognizing how close they were at this moment to that little postern-door into the Fortress, of which Tilton and he had made use all their lives.

"Here we all are, Master!" The genial voice of the Jewish Mongol carried such an implication of relief, of storms over and haven reached at last, that, as Ghosta moved forward to greet the old bailiff, John knew at once that his flash of insight was absolutely correct, and that they were now at this actual moment at the furthest end of the thick group of oaks and pines, which he had looked at since he was a child and about which, since they were first conscious of such things, they had heard their parents arguing.

Lady Val had always wanted to have those trees cut down, or at least considerably thinned out, as she regarded them as a perfect ambush both for wolves and for wolfish men; but such dense thickets of forest-growth were what, in the whole of Roque, her husband, who was a born hunter, especially loved.

Ghosta had never met the ex-bailiff before, as the old man only left the armoury for the Fortress dinner, his other meals being brought to him as he sat by the fire; so there now ensued in that wild place quite a formal and even courtly ceremonial. John felt it was incumbent upon him in the absence of both the lord and the mistress of the Manor, as well as of their elder son, to play the part of host; and the already somewhat exhausted old gentleman, who approached them leaning very heavily on Peleg's arm, was now compelled to stand as erect as he could and shake hands, not only with Ghosta, but with both Colin and Clamp, while John, constantly interrupted by each gentleman in turn, did his best, with a good deal of blundering pedantry and not a little silly facetiousness, to introduce the one as a lively court-jester and the other as a disillusioned, cynical sage.

But, before he had finished, the look of pitiful exhaustion on the ex-bailiff's face forced him to interrupt himself.

"Here, master," he murmured, "sit down on this, and lean your back against this!" And lugging off the sheep's wool neck-cloth that he had been wearing all that night, he laid it on the ground under the nearest tree-trunk and helped the old man to sit down.

Ghosta at once bent over him, while Colin and Clamp moved off. “Where — is — the — the — the Head?” murmured the old man anxiously, turning his own head this way and that.

Ghosta took the torch from John and ran to Peleg’s side; and John noticed that the first thing she whispered to the giant must have had to do with the arrow-wounds he’d received, for the giant promptly uncovered the places and held the light for her while she examined them.

“So all’s well?” John heard him utter in an interrogative whisper; and it was clear to him that the reply was reassuring.

As soon as she came back, still holding the torch, she asked the old man whether he wanted Peleg to bring the Brazen Head near to him, so that he could examine it. John could see that this bold question at once excited and troubled the ex-bailiff, for, snatching at Ghosta’s robe, he pulled her towards him till she sank on one knee, the torch held at arm’s length above her head.

After a second’s hesitation the old man began a rather bewildering and long-winded rigmarole about something he wanted to ask John. With considerable difficulty, but with more tact than he knew he possessed, John now listened to an agitated and complicated account of a conversation the ex-bailiff of Roque had had earlier in the month with John’s sister, Lil-Umbra.

The old gentleman seemed to have been deeply impressed not only by Lil-Umbra’s beauty but by her intelligence; and, as far as her young brother could make out from what he now heard, there had come a moment in the conversation when some mysterious presence, a presence whose nature neither of them really comprehended, seemed to come between them and to hover over them.

The old man had got it lodged in his head — John could see as much as that — that there was some magic bond, or some fatal link, between this mysterious Brazen Head of Friar Bacon's invention and a beautiful young woman; and John himself was anxious to learn whether his own vague sense of something weird and unusual, and something that he couldn't describe as either good or evil, either angelic or devilish, had been felt by Lil-Umbra also.

Old Heber's hope was that Lil-Umbra may have talked to John about it; as he knew she was in the habit of discussing religious matters with both her brothers. The truth really was that Lil-Umbra's nerves were so strung-up, and her heart was in such a state of tension, as to whether Raymond de Laon would or would not come to the armoury that night, that the whole subject of Friar Bacon and his Brazen Head passed her by very lightly indeed.

But now to the complete surprise of both the young man and the old man, and somewhat to the displeasure of Peleg, who by this time was towering above the three of them, and was by no means indifferent to this thing they were discussing, Ghosta broke in. "What was wanted," she said quietly, "to the completion of Friar Bacon's creation I was myself ready to supply; and at the request of the Friar, I did supply it."

The sound of Peleg's voice above their heads had a queerly hoarse note in it at this moment. "The best thing we can do tonight," he said slowly, "is to carry the Head out of this forest and into the Fortress; and I would suggest that we straightway convey it into the armoury where it will remain under the particular protection of our friend here. I believe" — and at this point the giant laid his hand on the young man's shoulder— "that your Father, Master John, will have no objection when he learns of this having been done. I don't think our conveying the Head into the armoury need disturb anybody's night's rest. In fact I can make certain that it doesn't by carrying it there myself, while Ghosta helps you, master bailiff.

"No one can have heard you leave or they'd have come with you. No one but yourself, I expect — isn't that the case, master bailiff? — heard the noise those wretched Lost Towers men were making; and as you came out you couldn't possibly have barred the door. The whole Fortress is no doubt asleep at this moment; and we shall take care to move so silently that we shan't disturb a living soul in the place. I'll be glad enough to have a rest and a lie-down myself; but I'm not so done-in as not to be able to take this old Brazen Head into our armoury! Once there, I warrant nobody will dare to meddle with it. It'll soon become a regular shrine, and as sacred as Master Tilton's Blessed Virgin."

While her giant was addressing them above their heads, Ghosta and the old man, who still had his back against the tree and John's woollen neck-cloth under his buttocks, were exchanging some extremely curious thoughts. No scrupulous chronicler of human affairs can help being aware out of the instinctive observation of the narrating mind, of the weird manner in which, amid any group of agitated people, when one voice has been monopolizing everybody's attention for several minutes, a hollow gulf of silence is created, across which all manner of disturbing thoughts pass from one person to another.

John himself at this moment, in his corner of this psychic gulf created by Peleg's somewhat dictatorial and irritable monologue, felt so utterly tired, after all the energy he had spent that night, that his mind, in its exhausted state, like the mind of a person who stares vacantly at his bed-posts, began vaguely to wonder whether in this silence around them and with this hoarse voice sounding above their heads, other feelings than human ones, might be in the act of being exchanged, feelings for instance of the mosses, of the ferns, of the tree-roots even, that surrounded them on that forest-floor.

Such vegetation-feelings, John pondered, might be entangling themselves with his own human feelings at this very moment; for after all it was this group of trees and bushes which he had known since his infancy, and which, from what he had seen daily of them out of that postern-door of his birthplace, had become like the fireguard in his nursery, a malleable background to every story he told himself in his day-dreams at noon and to every story he was told by his night-dreams at midnight; and it would be only natural if, on its side, the background of roots and mosses and ferns and lichens and ivy and blades of grass projected obscure invisible sensations, which flitted in and out of his human ones.

But what was this? There was something else. Yes, there was something else at this moment, something that was intruding itself between the furtive and fitful feelings of mosses and roots and ferns and his own weightier cogitations.

“What the hell,” he groaned, “is this confounded thing that has now come into my head?” It was certainly in accordance with the multifarious influences that flit about in our life-stream, like shadowy tadpoles beneath thin ice, that it should have been what the Brazen Head itself was thinking — those thoughts, not of a God-created man, but of a man-created machine, which now butted in, like a misty cloud in the shape of the Minotaur, between the vegetation-feelings of that forest recess and the ideas, whatever they were, that were being exchanged between Ghosta and the old man with his back against the tree.

For there is no doubt that the “something” of which John suddenly became aware was some thought from the Brazen Head. And what the chronicler of these things cannot escape calling to mind was the lack of response that the old ex-bailiff had found in John's sister Lil-Umbra when the latter, her head full of the possible appearance of Raymond de Laon in the armoury, was doing her best to be nice to him. But this lack of response was now wholly compensated for in the old bailiff's mind by Ghosta's attitude.

Young John and the old man were however both vaguely conscious that it was some mysterious connection between the Brazen Head and Ghosta that was now giving to the voice of Peleg, as it rumbled hoarsely above their heads, an irritable and dictatorial tone. The giant concluded with these words: "I'll fetch the Head now, and carry it straight to the postern; for I can see exactly where we are, torch or no torch! Better give the torch back to Master John, Ghosta, and then you all — —" and he threw this out, like a handful of crumbs, in the direction of Colin and Clamp, who, conscious of not being altogether indispensable as the drama thickened, had linked themselves together in the last few minutes in a rather childish though very natural way.

Clamp had picked up a moss-grown stick from the ground that had a couple of tiny ferns growing out of the middle of it, and had poked Colin with it to show him this phenomenon, and the flickering torch had at once revealed those small ferns; and Colin had promptly seized the end of this interesting stick, and now neither of this quaint pair would be likely to relax his grasp.

It was clear that, in their uneasiness as to whether they would be allowed to follow the others into the interior of the Fortress, this mossy stick gave them some curious support, as well as uniting them on this particular occasion.

“And then you can all,” Peleg concluded, “follow me to the little door. Isn’t that the thing, Master John?”

John, who had begun to long for his comfortable bed in the little room that had been his own now for a couple of years, agreed at once; and Peleg, without even glancing at Ghosta, who had obediently handed the torch to John, snatched up the latter’s woollen scarf upon which the old man was no longer sitting, and clapping it upon his own head like a turban, rushed over to where the Brazen Head was surveying them all with the stark indifference of a rocky landscape, and seizing it in his two hands heaved it into the air till he held it propt up on the top of his head. The effort required for this was so great that it drew from him a really terrifying sound, a sound such as Samson must have made when, with the central pillars of the Temple of Dagon in his arms, he bowed himself down and brought down with him the whole of that great building.

An outrush of blood from the two arrow-hurts in his shoulders accompanied this sound; and John, who was close to Ghosta, heard a similar sound, bursting unconsciously it would seem, from her; and it certainly was all he could do to restrain in himself a cry of amazement.

But he had the wit to see what the two of them had to do at this important juncture. He began hurriedly helping the ex-bailiff to his feet. “You take hold of him on your side,” he said to Ghosta, “and I’ll help him on my side!”

And then he shouted after the departing figure of their friend, who was carrying away the Brazen Head on his own head as if it were a gargoyle made of the fossilized features of some antediluvian giant, belonging to the same race, though of an earlier breed, as the man who was carrying it. “Wait for us at the postern, Peleg! We’ll help you in with it!”

The thoughts and feelings of the old man as he stumbled along over the tree-roots and over the mossy stones, while John's torch flung the sort of wayward and flickering bursts of illumination that can be both angelic guides and devilish betrayers, grew more and more intense and more and more unrestrained as they drew near the postern-gate.

"I'm glad I came out," he told himself, "if only to be able to brood over the unbelievable advantage of being allowed to sit by the fire in my own chair in that faithful old armoury until I die. But — Jesus help us! — these young folk seem to think I'm half-dead already! Not one of them asked me whether I wanted to spend my days and nights with the Friar's Head of Brass! But I'm glad they didn't. For it would have been terribly hard to explain what I do want! And now that I come to think of it I seriously believe it was some queer understanding between the Head and me that brought me out here tonight! I wonder what time it is? About two o'clock in the morning, I wouldn't wonder! It has that kind of feeling. O! but this Ghosta-girl had better be careful how near to this Head her home-sickness for Palestine and Jerusalem draws her! I didn't have that queer presentiment for nothing that night when I sat with Lil-Umbra waiting for her lover Raymond!

"Sitting alone by the same fire, day in, day out, a person picks up a few little things about life here below, things that great giant Jews dream not of! And when I watched that little sister of yours, Master John, and talked of this same Head, I knew all of a sudden, and for a certainty, that this Thing, created not by God but by Friar Roger, needed, to make it complete, to make it its real self, to make it a true oracle of life's hidden secrets, to be in some way connected with amaiden, who, without officially losing her maidenhead to the Head, would lose something of her inmost self, her secretest feminine self, to it, giving it that unique power of revelation, of illumination, of ultimate vision, that virgins alone possess!

“There’s the Fortress! We shall be there in a minute! Whether spending the rest of my days with a living intelligence created by man and not by God will lengthen or shorten my days, I don’t know and don’t greatly care! But that it will make life far more interesting to me is certain. I’ve always hoped for something like this to happen and now it has happened! Maybe this will prove a moment in the history of our race of an importance second only to the creation of Adam! We shall see!

“Meanwhile what I’ve got to do now is clear. I must make them all take off their shoes, and not utter a word, even in a whisper! And as for this pair of antics, this Colin and Clamp, hanging on to that pathetic old stick as if it were the sceptre of Solomon, I suppose I must find a corner for them to sleep in, in the Manor kitchen. They won’t do any harm, wherever they are; and I certainly can’t have them in my armoury!”

XIV. FRIAR BACON’S CHAMBER

Several months had passed away into the revolving rubbish-heap of time — or, to placate our final resting-place with a grander name, into the palindromic abyss — since an abode was found for the Head in the armoury of the Fortress and under the guardianship of the old ex-bailiff.

“Why did you straddle me in my nakedness round the neck of that thing of brass?”

These startling words were the first that greeted Friar Bacon from the lips of Ghosta, when the old factotum of his prison-chamber brought her to see him.

“Sit down, my daughter,” the Friar replied, laying down his pen and pushing back across the table from beneath his wrists the parchment upon which he was at work.

“There, child, sit down there!” And he pointed to an upright seat on the opposite side of the table, a seat which in appearance was the sort of chair that any young girl in any epoch would have associated with some sort of goblin royalty and elfin ritual. “And you may leave me,” he added, turning to the lay-brother, “for a few minutes now. I shall not be doing any harm to this good maid, but I want to talk to her alone for a while if you don’t mind.”

Brother Tuck gave them a quick glance and a grave nod, and, shuffling to the door, took himself off.

“Well, my dear, I’ll tell you exactly why, so to speak, I behaved to you as the angel, on Annunciation Day, behaved to our Lady.”

“You don’t mean, I hope, Father,” Ghosta interrupted earnestly, “that you did really marry me to the Head, because if you did I must, with all the power I have, beg you to divorce me at once; for the truth is, Father, I want to marry a man of my own faith and my own race, which, as I expect you already know, is the Jewish faith and the Hebrew race. Yes, Father, I belong and always shall belong to the House of Israel; and it is as impossible for me to enter into such a covenant with any Christian as it would be for a sea-gull to swear fidelity to a barn-door fowl!”

“Listen, dear child,” said the Friar, speaking very slowly and in a voice that was as grave as if he were reciting a pardon on a scaffold. “There are moments in all our lives when it is necessary for us to act in a way that makes use of both good and evil. In actual reality — for we need not drag in that treacherous word ‘truth’, which can cover and justify a thousand abominations — in actual living reality we are compelled — and if you ask me ‘compelled by whom or by what?’ I can only say I do not know — but we are compelled by a force, that may be as much outside the Devil as it is outside God, to do something which is clearly contrary to goodness and righteousness and morality and sanctity and holiness and virtue.

“You must understand, my dear child, that I’m not saying we have at these moments to become one with any devilish power that is opposing God or defying all that the prophets have taught us down the ages. We must honestly recognise, however, that without becoming a part of the Evil Power that opposes itself to God, we are at this particular moment acting contrary to what we know to be the good way and the righteous way.

“The point is that we are acting thus in obedience to a force within us, which we feel by an overpowering instinct to be as much outside the Good as it is outside the Evil, and as much outside God as it is outside the Devil. What we feel, my dear child, at these moments — I mean what I, your old Friar, feels — is that I am obeying an absolutely new revelation, a revelation that may change the entire world.”

Ghosta, who had been listening with concentrated attention to all this, now lifted her elbows onto the table and rested her chin upon her two hands.

“Was it a part,” she enquired earnestly, “of your creation of a living soul in a Bronze Head to make me embrace that Image as you did, straddling across its neck in my nakedness? How did you manage to read my secret thoughts and the hidden feelings of my most secret life? For you were right, Father, you were perfectly right. It had been my desire, while remaining a virgin — for I always had an absolute horror of losing my maidenhead — to experience once in my life before I died, the sensation of giving in a clinging embrace the life-drops from my innermost being to Something that I pressed close against me.

“It needn’t have been a man! That was the queer thing about the longing I had. It was that I, Ghosta, might, in my virginity, and without losing my maidenhead, and indeed, if possible, without having any love for this Something — I didn’t care what it was — which I embraced, be the creator of a completely new, new, new, — No! I was never presumptuous enough to think of it as a new world, let me call it a new form of life in the world. I was always — but you know me through and through already, Father, my Friar of Friars — fascinated by the word Parthenogenesis.

“It is a long word, and I have been told it is a Greek word, and that its meaning is the giving birth to a new life by a girl without losing her maidenhead or forfeiting anything of her natural virginity. So that when you hoisted me a-straddle that day round the neck of the Head of Brass, with my nakedness pressing against its brazen skin, I had an ecstasy. I said to myself: ‘What is happening to me now is the very thing I have always longed for! I am not losing my maidenhead, and yet I am drawing from the inmost depths of myself a dew-drop of living creation.'"

A look of indescribable relief passed over the Friar's troubled face, and he leaned forward across the table and touched with the tips of his long fingers the head which the girl was supporting on her arms as she leant forward.

"The Lord bless thee and keep thee!" he said gravely, "and lift up the light of his countenance upon thee and give thee peace!" And then he added, withdrawing his right hand from his guest's forehead and his left hand from his own manuscript, and tilting his chair a little to the rear on its back legs, "I swear I don't know, my dear daughter, any living woman I could talk to as freely as I am now talking to you. I certainly couldn't do so to any of the ladies who rule the Manors and Castles round here! Have you, my dear child, realized why it is that I go on so steadily refusing all invitations to leave this prison-chamber and go where I'd have more freedom of movement?"

Ghosta smiled a quite whimsical smile. "Yes indeed, Father, I can answer that! This old Prior who is master here, as I know well from my life in the Convent, where the nuns always consider him and his ideas and his policy above any line they are ordered to follow by the lady who immediately rules us, has only one object in life — namely, to enjoy himself as much as he possibly can in the narrow circle into the centre of which fate has dropt him.

"What he has to consider are the hours for meals, for strolling in the grounds, for listening to the anthems and chants from his choir-pew in the chapel, for studying the particular Latin text, whether from the Priory library or from his own private shelves, which carries in its train the largest number of old memories of his far-off youth. Now when we consider this matter quite clearly and honestly, Friar, my revered Father, we find nothing less than the surprising fact that this devotion to his own personal pleasure and interest for the whole of the day, and for whatever portion of the night is at the disposal of his personal will — for we can hardly include the hours when the worthy man is asleep, for our dreams, and I'm sure you'll agree with me there, Father, are not under the control of our will — is identical with what thinking people like ourselves are absorbed in.

"Whereas these rulers of great manorial castles, with their Ladies and their Bailiffs, and these royal rulers of great lands with their Treasurers and Chancellors and Bishops and Captains and Princes, are occupied day and night with meddling in other people's affairs, with invading other people's territories, with taking away other people's property, with imprisoning and murdering other people's subjects and citizens. Haven't I been speaking truly, Father, in what I've just said?"

Ghosta had indeed been uttering these unpopular and unorthodox feelings in a voice not only a good deal louder than the one she generally used, but a great deal more heavily charged with emotion.

Friar Bacon brought his chair back to the table with a jerk and stretched out his right arm clear across his manuscript, upon which from the small square aperture in the roof the sun was at that moment throwing down a long straight ray, a ray more crowded with sun-motes than Ghosta, had she been in a mood to observe such things, would have had to confess she had ever seen in a sun-ray before.

In spite of the fact that they were looking straight into each other's eyes, the Friar's gesture was so unexpected that for a second she disregarded it. Then she met it with her own right hand; and, in the warm pressure that followed, the heart-felt alliance between them was sworn and sealed.

The Friar's hand rested once more on the edge of his manuscript, and hers once more clasped its fellow and propped her chin while her elbows remained on the dark, smooth-polished wood of that round table. And now both the Friar and Ghosta smiled at each other and turned their eyes away. This they both did naturally and instinctively; but having done so, the quick and lively perception they each possessed was severally attracted by the quivering and elongated sun-ray above their heads and its myriads of tiny little dancing specks.

"Isn't it queer to think," commented Ghosta, "how many historical characters such as we read about in the scriptures, and such as they lecture about in the universities, like Moses and Joshua and like Plato and Socrates and Julius Caesar and Cicero and Marcus Aurelius, must have noticed in their colleges and palaces and temples, and especially at crucial moments in their lives, these millions of dancing atoms! What did Socrates feel when these tiny atoms came dancing into his cell while he was waiting for the executioner with the Hemlock?"

"A question indeed, my dear!" echoed the Friar. "And I'd mighty well like to hear how Plato, who was so confoundedly clever at reaching that great teacher's secret thoughts, and cleverer still at giving them the particular twist that would make them fit into his own ideal system, would describe how the great self-doomed corrupter of youth would have argued with such an one, if some God had endowed one of those motes up there with the power of speech and started it off on a metaphysical protest against the claim of the human race to be the only judge amid the atomic children of the Cosmos!"

"O Father, my dear Father!" cried Ghosta in huge delight. "Do go on imagining what one of those tiny dots of matter would say to Socrates if it did question him!"

"Well! for one thing, my dear child," rejoined the Friar, and then he stopped abruptly.

Ghosta, who was turning from him to that descending sun-fall of dancing motes, and then back again to him, had a look of reverence on her face as if he'd really been the great magician that most of his enemies and a few of his friends considered him, and as if he might, at any moment, without moving a hand or a foot, give orders to that sun-stream to alter its course, and as if the sun-ray might obey him, and after making a disconcerting circle round their chamber, might hasten to the door, and vanish down the tower-stairs.

But he went on quite calmly. "Don't you suppose, my dear, that this whole business of being one of the lucky millions of dust-specks, out of the trillions and quadrillions of less lucky ones, must be so exciting to every one of those little objects that the whole of its being would be so absorbed in what is happening to it that it wouldn't have a particle of power left to ask any question of anybody. Yes, and I would say — and wouldn't you, my dear girl, say the same? — that if it had any choice left to it, it would feel it was wiser to lavish all its power of response on that lucky moment than to ponder on suitable philosophical questions to put to — —"

At this point they were interrupted by shouts and cries outside, by a clatter of feet on the stairs, and by the flinging open of the door. It was young John who now rushed in, followed by Colin and Clamp, and three or four of the Fortress's most active retainers. John was carrying a broken piece of statuary pressed against his chest; and this he hurriedly flung down on the Friar's bed in the corner, after a quick nervous glance at the despoiled alcove hard-by where once stood the Brazen Head.

"What on earth is this, Master John?" cried Ghosta, rising to her full height and hurrying to the bed to see what the young man had deposited there. But Friar Bacon remained seated with his pen still between his fingers, and the only special movement he made that Clamp and Colin, who were both observing him closely, were able to discern, was that he began to draw some sort of Euclidian figure at the bottom of the parchment in front of him, and that this Euclidian figure was an equal-sided square surrounded by a circle.

"Father! Father!" murmured Ghosta a moment later, "do, for Heaven's sake, look at this!" and, shaking off young John, who tried to hold her back, and advancing straight to the Friar's chair, from the side opposite to where Clamp had already begun to watch with mute and fascinated absorption the movements of the Friar's pen, she thrust under Roger Bacon's eyes what clearly was the broken half of a female head, elaborately chiselled out of a block of very hard stone.

But a torrent of verbal eloquence, like the sound of a breaking wave to the splashing tune of which the Friar studied what Ghosta thrust beneath his eyes, was uttered by the excitable Colin, and accompanied by such lavish gesticulation that it was like being addressed by one of those flocks of winged angels speaking with one voice, such as in religious altar-pieces often form the flying chariot of God the Father as it descends from Heaven.

"The General of the Franciscan Order, this thrice-accurst Bonaventura," cried Colin making his voice resound through every portion of the chamber, and it was as if the quivering sun-ray, which had removed itself altogether, had suddenly returned in a new incarnation of pure sound, "has now with the help of those ruffians from Lost Towers, whom he swears he has converted, and at the command of the Pope, whom he swears he represents, begun meddling with Master Tilton's statue of Our Lady in that shrine he's building!

"And do you know what this false saint has done now? He has started a shocking and wicked rumour, entirely a lie, of course, but you know how these lies spread — that Master John's sister and his brother Tilton have been found guilty of incest! And — as if that wasn't enough! — do you know what further lie he's invented? He swears that our Master Tilton, heir to the Manor of Roque and to the Fortress Castle, which his mother's family have held since the days of King Stephen, has an even greater sin on his conscience than incest with his sister! For — says this pretty saint, who behaves far worse than Judas — our Master Tilton has committed the supreme sacrilegious sin, of carving the face of Our Lady in the centre of this shrine so that she shall resemble his sister with whom he has sinned!"

"Has Bonaventura really had the gall, John my friend, to go to such lengths as this man says?"

The Friar's voice was as steady, and his manner as quiet and collected, as if he were referring to no more than a point of propriety in some public, metaphysical debate; but Ghosta noticed that he made a slight motion of his hand as if to wave back a little both Colin and Clamp and the two or three armed men who accompanied them.

"Yes, Master, across my heart and on my life," replied John. "That's what he's done! My mother is so upset that she has shut herself up with my sister and won't allow her to go riding with Raymond de Laon, as the two of them had arranged to do today, for fear that this wretched Bonaventura, with his Lost Towers troop, might kidnap her or imprison her, or even carry her with him in a ship to Rome, as he has already done with other ladies who have been accused of various offences of the same sort.

"As for my father, he refuses to take the thing seriously. He says that Tilton ought to be hunting wild boars in the forest instead of building shrines with his own hands and using Lil-Umbra as his model for the Mother of God. But I notice that he has remained at home since the trouble started, and that he's set a guard outside the shrine, to make sure that this mock-saint doesn't excite his cohort of 'converted' robbers to destroy the whole shrine and ruin Tilton's hard work on it for nearly a year!

"What drove me to come, most honoured Friar, to make a special appeal to you, was the fact that I chanced to hear" — young John flushed a little as he announced this, revealing the fact that he had not been able to resist the temptation to listen at his parents' door— "to hear my father tell my mother that if they attacked the shrine again, or came anywhere near the postern-gate again, he would arm all our people, both serfs and freemen, and make such an attack on that damned Lost Towers as would settle them for ever and a day! You see, most reverend Friar, this man undoubtedly was at one time the Pope's emissary or legate or ambassador or whatever the proper legal name is — round here they use a word for him that's too bawdy to repeat — and no doubt at that time when he had the proper seals of office he might have been able to carry off Lil-Umbra, and Tilton too, to Rome and accuse them there. But as it is, with no official credentials from the Pope, and with no proper royal support from our sick King, I don't believe he can do very much to hurt us, except start rumours and spread lies."

Friar Bacon groaned, and bowed his head for a second over his pen and paper. Then he said quietly, but without looking up:

"Sit down a moment, lad, while we consider all this as steadily as we can. What woul*d y*ou advise us to do, Ghosta? Both John and I — that's true, isn't it, lad? — hold the view that at most dangerous and ticklish crises, it's often from the feminine mind we get the best hint as to what to do."

Ghosta didn't hesitate a second. "How did the shock of this wicked accusation," she enquired, "strike your sister and brother, Master John?"

“Well, to tell you the truth—” and it was clear to everybody that young John was very glad to be asked that question, “I felt proud of the way they took it! You know it was Nurse who first told us about the dastardly fabricated tale which this devilish wretch started; and we were all together up in the nursery at the top of the house when she blurted it out. Father had come up about this attack on Tilton’s shrine; and no sooner had Nurse used the word than Tilton threw his arms round Lil-Umbra’s neck, and gave her a great hug and a lot of loud kisses all over her face. ‘Don’t you mind, my darling!’ he cried. ‘If I ever tried to do such wickedness to you I’m sure the good God would strike me dead before it was done!’”

Roger Bacon’s face lit up with satisfaction, and with a certain humorous amusement too, young John thought, as he eagerly watched him; but the Friar’s words when he spoke were anything but final or conclusive:

“But now listen to me, my children both, and you two also my kind friends,” and he made a double gesture with the hand that held his pen, one in the direction of Colin, and the other in the direction of Clamp, “what we’ve got to do now is to think of some way of out-witting this self-appointed representative of the Holy Father, supported — and the thing’s not without precedent in the history of our mad purblind human race — by this local nest of rapscallions. If any better idea comes into your head, Ghosta, while I’m explaining my scheme, let’s hear it at once, and don’t mind interrupting me if you’re afraid of forgetting what you suddenly thought of!

“But this is what has just come into my mind as a good plan. A week ago I had a communication from my friend Peter Peregrinus, who is now lecturing in France, to tell me that the famous master in philosophy, Albert of Cologne — who belongs to the Dominican order, and indeed is such a loyal Dominican that, when he speaks in the University of Paris, he defends his view of Aristotle against both all the Arabian and all the Latin Averroists and completely demolishes them — is at this very moment visiting Oxford! This is an astonishing piece of news to me. I had heard that he was interested in the Summa Theologicae of Alexander of Hales, but I never thought I'd live to hear that the great Albert of Cologne should actually be in this island, still less that he should be visiting Oxford!

"I have exchanged letters with him a good many times, as I suppose all disciples of Aristotle have done, and he and I have always agreed that the science of life didn't end with Plato or with Aristotle or even with Grosseteste or with any other student of philosophy. But, my dears, the reputation of Albert of Cologne all over the world is terrific, greater than that of any other modern master. Every man who can read and write in this whole west country, whether they're Franciscans or Dominicans, Monks, or Friars, Abbots, or Priors or parish priests, have heard nothing but praise of him since they first began their A. B. C.! When you come to metaphysics he's the top boy, so to speak, of the whole schola mundi, if you leave out Israel and India and China! Now if we could send to Albertus some wise and diplomatic representative of our side, in this quarrel with Bonaventura, it strikes me that it's not at all impossible that the great teacher from Cologne might be persuaded to come, as the most famous Dominican, to confront this troublesome Franciscan.

"That would soon, as we used to say in Ilchester, 'settle the hash,' of our Bona, the Venturesome! I am perfectly certain that what started the whole thing was the fact that your excellent parents, John, gave shelter in the Fortress to my Brazen Head. It was this that kindled all this obstinate rage in our ex-legate's mind. He's somehow got it lodged in his one-track sanctified midriff that the Holy Trinity we all worship has received a staggering blow from my having dared to create in the person of my Brazen Head a rival creation to Adam and Eve. I tell you, my good friends, I tell you, John dear, if we could only hit upon the right person to send as an ambassador to the great Albert now in Oxford, a person who would be in a position to escort him down here, with him as the chief Dominican to confront this pseudo-saint of the Franciscans, the whole affair would soon be settled."

As can well be imagined, both Ghosta and John were now murmuring, each with their own special manner of emphasis and intensity, the name of Raymond de Laon; and Friar Bacon, as if to seek still further confirmation of this idea, looked first at Colin and then at Clamp. Both men came so close on getting this faintly interrogative glance that they completely hid the Friar from Ghosta and John, but a double vote of unqualified recognition of Raymond as their Ambassador to Albert of Cologne these two certainly did give; for the voice of Colin seemed to flap its wings in widening circles above every back and every head in the place; and the voice of Clamp seemed to drive in one rusty nail after another as he fastened up their decision over the Norman arch of the event.

"Well then, my friends," cried the Friar, rising from his seat and moving quickly round the two men who were bending over him, "we may take it that our Council chamber has uttered its decisive verdict, and that Raymond de Laon shall be our ambassador to the great Albert in Oxford. Will you convey our request to him, John my lad, and let us know the result as quickly as possible? And now I think I must beg you all to descend to the lower regions of this hospitable Priory; for it is really absolutely necessary for me to finish this page of what I am calling my Opus Major before I sleep tonight; and your arrival, gentlemen, is the cause of this necessity, and I cannot tell you how grateful I am to you all for being this same cause.

"For the real truth is that your sudden appearance and the more than startling interest of what you have announced to me, combined with the expectation of encountering, man to man, he a Dominican and myself a Franciscan, the great Albert of Cologne, has caused me to remember certain intensely important details that I had completely forgotten relating to the journey of Brother William of Rubruck to the Grand Khan at Karakorum in Tartary, where he stayed from December 1253 till July 1254.

"It was Brother William himself when I met him in Paris who told me these things; and although at this moment I was writing about the sermon he told me he preached in Constantinople on Palm Sunday 1253, I had absolutely forgotten that great congress of religions over which the Mongolian Khan presided at Karakorum, a congress of the Mohammedan, Buddhist, and Christian religions, and I really must write about it while it has come back so vividly to my mind. I am sure I would have left out Brother William's description of that Karakorum congress of religions altogether if our little meeting tonight, and our decision to send an ambassador to bring the head of the Dominicans to deal with the head of the Franciscans, hadn't stirred up my memory of what the brother told me."

A universal murmur, in such low tones among themselves as almost to convey the impression that, having been thus commended for stirring up the Friar's mind, they were seized with the fear of so disturbing it by their lively discussion that the effect on his Opus Major would be destructive of the good they had already done, was the immediate result of this grateful appeal to their courtesy. Then without another word, and headed by Colin and Clamp, and followed by Ghosta and young John, they gave a series of quaint little good-night salutations and descended the stairs.

XV. VISITOR FROM PICARDY

Friar Bacon was left standing alone in that topmost chamber of Bumset Priory. He still held the handle-end, so to speak, of the pen he had been using when he rose to return their valedictory gestures; and now automatically began moving it to and fro, as if the talk-charged air of that recently crowded room were itself the parchment upon which it was his destiny to hand down to posterity his ideas and his discoveries. Strange and far-reaching were the thoughts that passed through his head.

"Here am I," he told himself, "one of the curious animals produced upon this planet that have come to be called men, and are now confronted by the necessity of recording for the benefit of future specimens of such creatures, what were the actual causes of our appearance upon this particular promontory of matter."

The Friar at this point ceased inditing invisible words upon the invisible air, and, after deliberately replacing his pen upon the table by the side of his unfinished parchment page, crossed over to his bed and stretched himself out on his back upon it, with his head on the pillow, and clasped his shins with his hands.

"Little did I think," he pondered, "what I should be doing in three years that night when Fontancourt showed me the letter he'd just had from our friend Petrus! Didn't Fontancourt swear to me that Petrus would never stop studying magnetism or writing about his studies? Three years ago that was! O God, O God! what things have happened since then and are still happening!

"Why didn't I tell those fellows just now before they went away that it was Peter Peregrinus, and not their old Roger, who first thought of using a lodestone to draw like to like; and that if it hadn't been for that divine inspiration of his I could never have invented my Brazen Head? How we damnable inventors do love to hug our inventions and get drunk on the glory of them! And now I must needs defend my precious discoveries by setting this Dominican wolf upon our Franciscan fox!"

At this point the Friar let his thin legs sink down side by side on his bed, and lifting his clasped hands as high above his head as they could reach began murmuring — not in Latin, far less in Hebrew, but in the Wessex dialect of his native Ilchester — a homely and natural prayer: "O Everlasting God, who lookest down from far outside all this curst universe of matter which thou hast created" — and here he couldn't resist using, with a wry touch of the incorrigible humour which not only characterized all his intercourse with others, but displayed itself even in his secretest thoughts about himself, and about the whole confused arena of contemporary speculation, as a little private joke between God and himself, the quaint, precise, technical, academic and metaphysical phrase for "outside our whole system of things", namely the phrase "ab exstrinsico", which, as he now muttered it aloud with a sort of chuckle in that slowly darkening room, would have had a queer effect upon any eavesdropper— "and ab exstrinsico save me!"

But after making this appeal to the Mystery at the back of all life, Roger Bacon closed his eyes with such a peaceful sigh that it was clear that he himself felt perfectly satisfied with his little private interview with his creator.

The Friar's descent, or ascent shall we say, into the blessed land of oblivion, now gently and deliciously invaded by the feathered dreams of sleep, was soon disturbed however by a resolutely firm and yet cautiously light knocking at the door, a knocking which did not wake him at first, but mingled with his dreams, and mingled with them in such a curiously prophetic manner that he became vividly aware, even before he awoke, of the personality of the intruder, who was none other than his faithful friend and devoted adherent of a great many years, his servant Miles.

Miles and he had indeed been young men when their association first began, and Miles always absolutely refused to be known by any other name than this Roman word for a soldier. Miles came from the old Roman town of Durnovaria, a town which the people of Wessex had already begun to call Dorchester, just as the older name of Friar Roger's own ancient market-town had recently come to be changed into Ilchester.

Yes! His waking dream had not misled him. There, in the fading, late-afternoon twilight, when he went to the door and opened it, standing erect on the threshold, was his friend, his man, his devoted under-study, his partner, his disciple, his obedient slave, his servitor, his alter ego, Miles of Dorchester!

"Master!" cried Miles in an ecstasy of joy; and flinging his hawk-feather cap into the middle of the room, he fell upon his knees, clasped the Friar tightly round the waist, and pressed his forehead hard against his hero's navel.

"There, there, there!" murmured this latter reassuringly and tenderly, and very much in the tone with which a responsive dog-lover would soothe a majestic, over-emotional, over-sensitive wolf-hound; and as he spoke he raised Miles to his feet, led him across the floor incidentally picking up the man's hawk-feather cap and handing it to him as they went, and seating him in the chair recently occupied by Ghosta, sat down opposite to him and laid his two clasped fists upon his page with the air of one who has decided to substitute some different form of urgent pressure for the one associated with pens and parchment.

One remarkable peculiarity of the man Miles was the way his countenance altered in a moment from a majestic, monumental, and commanding reserve, not unmixed with an astute alertness that had in it something of the primeval and bottomless cunning of a simple animal, into a melting abandonment to an emotion of devotion so extreme that it was almost painful to witness.

The Friar pressed his hand on the man’s shoulder as he himself got up again to set before them both some wine and a couple of goblets. Then, when the Dorchester-born warrior, who, while lifting his glass, looked, with his massive neck and his clear-cut profile, distinctly like a well-known bust of Caesar Augustus, had rested and refreshed himself a little, the Friar put the straight question to him, “Well, old friend,” he enquired, “and what’s the news?”

“He’s down there now. I left him in the lobby. They are all busy in the kitchen, and the Prior’s begun his dinner. So I left him in that dark entrance on that cushioned seat. He’ll be asleep, I wouldn’t wonder, when I go down to him. Shall I tell them in the kitchen that you’d like him to have his supper up here with you? And that whatever they’ve got for you will do for him too? Shall I tell them that you’d like a bottle or so more of wine and of the best they’ve got? And shall I say that they’d better bring out a mattress for him into the lobby where he is now and a few coverings for it?”

Had Ghosta been there still, or indeed had any feminine being been there, she would not have failed to follow the varying expressions that crossed the Friar’s face as he listened to this speech, and to follow them with growing astonishment. Friar Bacon’s countenance, together with the shape of his head, represented, as any intelligent woman would have recognised at once, or any man either, who happened to be possessed of that sort of visual penetration in which most women leave most men far behind, a perfect example of the pure intellect as it struggles almost always with difficulty, and generally totally in vain, to cope with the irrational changes and chances of human life upon this planet.

The Friar had a delicate face in the precise sense in which all the way down the centuries the word “sensitive” has been used. Anyone could see at one glance that the man was abnormally porous to impressions. And it was indeed clear at this moment that the impressions which reached him from the revelations that this Durnovarian retainer of his was so calmly and relentlessly disclosing were of the most crucial intensity; for little complicated patterns of criss-cross interlinings began to appear on his forehead and under his eyes that resembled frost-marks on an exposed window.

It was only when Miles, having entirely finished what it was his business to report, had permitted his Roman features to assume that patient expectant look of an officer anxious to catch from the lips of his general every faintest nuance of the orders issued, that the Friar realized that their relative positions had been reversed, and that it was himself who was now standing in front of Miles, watching and pondering, and asking, not this unqualified fellow-man, but the inscrutable features of Fate itself, what on earth had to be done now.

What he said, when it came, was pathetic enough in its simplicity. “What do you advise me to do, Miles?”

That this typical Centurion had, from old experience of the master he loved so passionately, expected just exactly this supplication, this appeal to a knowledge of life as it went along such as had nothing to do with learning, was proved by the military decisiveness of his answer.

"I think," he replied firmly, putting down his glass, and speaking in his calmest and most Roman tone, "that you'd better send me into the kitchen to emphasize this man's importance, and yet to make it plain that it would be more considerate to Prior Bog to spare him any immediate invasion; at any rate to let us all have dinner in peace before we do anything and before he has to do anything."

A sigh of relief so deep that it seemed to come from the soles of his sandals shook Friar Bacon from head to foot.

"But you'll have to bring him up here, I suppose?"

And when Miles nodded to this his master accepted it as if it were the word of destiny, escape from which would be hopeless.

"Very well," he conceded. "Bring him up; and explain to him that you'll come up yourself a little later with his meal. We don't want anyone else up here, do we?" This last sentence the Friar added in what was almost an appealing tone. And Miles, already at the door, answered with a significant shake of his head.

The moments that followed were among the most painful in Roger Bacon's life. From his habitual loneliness as a scientific prisoner of religion, he had come to be a man of two different worlds; and since each of these worlds required, if he was to deal with it adequately, all the creative power as well as all the destructive power he possessed in his own personality, it was no easy thing to deal with both these worlds at the same time.

It was natural to him to concentrate his attention upon his private world of lonely thought and lonely experiment, and to feel a peculiar kind of nervous suffering whenever it was necessary for him to face the shocks and clashes and misunderstandings of real life.

"And now," he told himself, "I have to meet the one man in all the world with whom I find it hardest to deal."

Yes! There he was! And since the door had been deliberately left open by the departing Miles, it was inevitable that after a series of rather dragging footsteps — to which the Friar, as he stood in the centre of the room, listened with something like a suspension of breath — the man who entered made no pretence of knocking.

He was of low stature and of a thin weak body; but the extraordinary thing about him was his head. The head of Master Peter Peregrinus of Picardy was simply enormous. It made his body and legs look like those of a dwarf, though in reality they weren't quite as small as that. The skin of his face was so deadly white that, if you had come upon him asleep, you would have certainly assumed that he was a corpse. His hair was straight, not curly, and of a glossy jet-black, with each individual hair as thick as that of a horse, so that their combined weight, massed together on the top of his skull, give his whole figure at a distance the effect of a wooden post on an exposed sea-bank, with either a thick growth of dusky seaweed covering the top of it, or a big black feathery bird perched upon it.

The chief peculiarity of Master Peter's mouth was its absence of lips. It was simply a slit in smooth white marbly stone. And it seemed as if in dispensing with lips it had also decided to dispense with teeth. What did appear, and that not unfrequently, was Master Peter's tongue. This object, abnormally long, and unusually pointed, was always shooting out from that slit in its marbly home, and every time it with-drew it gave the impression of having licked up some form of life which it would shortly be digesting.

But what the most ramificating, debouching, circumnavigating, deviating, perambulating chronicler would have had to be leading up to all this while, like a slippery serpent approaching something as hard to catch off-guard as itself, are, as the simplest reader has long ago guessed, Master Peter's eyes. These were so large that when the man was excited, as he always was when not stunned by a blow or sunk into an impenetrable gulf of sleep, they conveyed the impression of being a pair of outlets for some interior volcano that if it were blocked up or barred down, would burst the cranium that contained it into a million smithereens.

It was doubtless to evade, for at least a couple of beats of the pulse of time, a glance into this explosive crater that Roger Bacon, uttering, as casually as he could, the exclamation, “Well! Well! Well!” made a deliberately slow circuit round his visitor from Picardy, and firmly, calmly, magisterially, and yet very softly, closed the door.

On returning from this breathing-space it can be believed he felt no surprise when he found Master Peter already seated at the table, not only tapping with the narrow finger-nail of his longest finger the word “vibrationem” half-way down the parchment page in front of him, but even steering a little horn-cup, with red wine-stains inside it, up and down among the oddly-patterned wood-marks of the table’s edge.

Master Peter’s demonic spirit did indeed so completely dominate the situation that the nervous Friar found himself seated at his own table in the visitor’s seat with the visitor in the host’s seat, found himself staring blindly into those two black holes, each of them a swirling Charybdisian vortex, and listening to the man’s words without asking him a single question or contradicting a single statement he made.

At last the man broke into his own tricky rigmarole by asking a plain blunt question. “Can you guess what I’m doing now?”

“Doing?” echoed Bacon in puzzled bewilderment.

“Yes, yes! Doing! to earn my bread, of course! Doing what you yourself were forced to do when your family was ruined by those scurvy De Montforts and their bloody Barons! You put on a Friar’s grey rags: and I put on sword and shield. And I’m still a man of war, Roger old friend. Get that into your pullulating pipkin! In Picardy, let me tell you, when once you've served your Lord in a vital campaign and given your bowels more action than they're used to, by living on hedges and in ditches, you'll soon find that the lords and prelates, who gain by the blood you lose and the sweat you're drained of and the dung you evacuate, will see to it — it's as much their interest, as it's the interest of the dear God Himself, to have worshippers — that you don't die in an almshouse but live to sit at street-corners, selling burnt almonds, singing ballads, and praising the king."

Petrus Peregrinus had arrived at the two syllables "dear God" in the rush of these words, when, moving very slowly, the door began creaking a little and swinging inwards. By lolling his black head an inch to the left of the Friar's grey shoulder he was able to envisage the appearance of a large metal tray, the rim of which, directed by the hands that held it, was itself propelling the massive weight of that huge oblong of impenetrable wood.

It was as impossible for the troubled apprehension of Roger Bacon to miss this gesture of his formidable visitor as it was for him, the second he observed it, to restrain his cry: "But, Miles, Miles! what we need now ——"

Nobody will ever know for a certainty just what was in the Friar's mind at that moment; although it would be easy to imagine several things. But what happened was that the Friar at that particular moment lost consciousness. Whether he fell, chair and all, to the floor and was lifted up by both men after the tray had been deposited on the table, or whether he had himself, after losing all consciousness of what he was doing, stumbled across the room to his bed and laid himself down on it, must be left as a blank lacuna in any narration of these events, until either Petrus or Miles chooses to reveal what each of them must have retained very clearly in his memory.

What we do know from the consciousness of the Friar himself is that when he awoke from his trance, or whatever may be the correct name for the overwhelming mental oblivion that descended upon him, he found himself lying on his bed with the devoted Miles kneeling beside him and watching his awakening with the most intense and concentrated attention.

"Is he gone?" was the Friar's first question.

"Yes, dear Master," replied Miles. "He's gone."

"Do you know where he's gone?"

"I think, great Master, he's gone to the Fortress."

"Do they expect him there?"

"It is my impression, O most Admirable of all Teachers," responded Miles, "that they have been expecting him for some time."

"How did they know he was here?"

"From what I could make out from him as we went along," replied Miles, rising from his knees and standing, grave and upright, like a majestic Roman statue at the foot of the Friar's bed, "but you know, great master, what he is, and what dung-hill talk he uses and how little he cares whether the person he's talking to understands one jot of what he's saying! I don't take to him, master, and that's the bone truth! He's a scholar right enough. I don't quarrel with his learning. Thee be a man of learning, thee wone self, and I admire 'ee and look up to 'ee for't, like as thee were a kind of God in 'eaven and no nonsense!

"But this bob-by-night, and I don't care who hears me say so, be the sort of Mumbo-Jumbo — Prick-and-Thumbo what they do tell I be found in them girt Fairs in London and Paris and Consinotabel, such as travelling pipshaws do visit in their carry-otteries by day and by night.

"But the man be a man of Latin and Greek, us must allow 'im that much, for all it be worth to 'in, but when I do think of thee, master of mine, and how thy girt wisdom do go along with a girt heart, and how ye do give scoops and bowls o’t, yea! basinsfull o’t, to all and sundry as comes to beg for a crumb of real learning, it do make my gorge to ‘eave up. Thee do use thee’s girt learning to give us more pottage in all our porringers; but this man thinks only of inventing magnets to draw the gold from other men’s treasure-chests into his own. There! If I’ve not gone and done the one thing I didn’t ought to ‘a done — made ‘ee, O master my dear, dead-tired by listening to I!”

At this pathetic self-accusation the Friar quickly opened his eyes.

“No, no!” he cried, “you’ve put new life into me, Miles old friend, by giving me your real and actual feeling about Petrus Peregrinus. But you were beginning to tell me why you thought they were expecting him at the Fortress.”

At this the majestic Roman physiognomy of Miles dissolved into the love-ravaged confusion of a guilty hero-worshipper, and with a convulsive sob he sank on his knees.

“He ate and he drank,” were the words that that crumpled visage now moaned into the edge of the prisoner’s coverlet, “everything I’d brought for both of ye! And then, when he was satisfied, he just went off. He glanced at you before he went and kept muttering to himself without taking any notice of me, “O he’ll come to life in a minute or two! come to life in a minute or two! He’ll come to life in a minute or two!” And off the man went. But I do think I picked up from his randy chat, while I was pegging along by his side and carrying his bundles, that he had been told of your Brazen Head having been taken into the Fortress and put into the armoury; and I think myself, master, that it was with the idea of visiting your Brazen Head that he wanted to get in touch with the lord of the Fortress. At any rate we met young John, and John must have told them to expect him.”

The tone in which Miles uttered this last sentence contained, in its military resonance, a finality which conveyed such an utter removal of all responsibility for what was happening from the recipients of the news it brought, that Roger Bacon, only just hoisted up from the heavenly tide of oblivious sleep, turned over on his bed and closed his eyes.

XVI. THE LODESTONE

PETRUS PEREGRINUS HAD found no difficulty, when once he had descended the stairs, in persuading, by the offer of a sufficient bribe, one of the pleasant-speaking boys from the Prior's kitchen to lead him to the Fortress. Once inside the Fortress he had no difficulty on that particular evening in obtaining a leisurely and agreeable interview with the Lord of the Manor of Roque.

The Baron's curiosity in relation to this singular intruder was lively from the first moment he heard the rumours about him, but as soon as he met him face to face on this night of the man's departure from the Priory, he felt it was imperative that he should have him to himself in private for at least a quarter of an hour.

No! He couldn't deal with the fellow in the presence of the family. For here was his forever indignant, forever outraged, forever grievanced Lady Val, whom he always thought of in his own mind as "Valentia the Irreconcilable", and here was his excitable daughter Lil-Umbra, and here was his anxious, concentrated, architectural-minded elder son Tilton, and finally here was the adventurous young John, who of late had become such a fierce champion of Friar Bacon that he had rendered himself as fully liable to ecclesiastical censure as was the Friar's older friend Raymond, whom Lady Val had already accepted as Lil-Umbra's betrothed.

Here they were, all the lot of them, gathered together in high spirits after a lively evening meal, and simply waiting for some event of an exciting nature to occur. What could he do to get the fellow entirely to himself for a while? He looked first at one of them and then at another, as they all stood round him while the young man from the Priory, having ushered Master Peter into their presence, made a little speech, as dignified as it was natural, emphasizing the fact that the fame of the Brazen Head, possessed of the power of speaking and perhaps even of the power of thinking was what no doubt had brought this notable visitor.

At last the Lord of the Manor of Roque got an inspiration. And it was Lil-Umbra who gave it to him. The others had already begun to talk among themselves when she spoke up boldly and clearly, addressing her father.

"Better take Maître Pierre de Maricourt" — for the traveller had evidently instructed the boy from the Priory kitchen exactly how to announce him— "upstairs to your little room, Father. And then you'll be able to tell us better and clearer about him, so that Mother, and we all, can do him the honour which we feel sure he deserves. Tilton and John and I are so keen to know all about him that we might be a bother to him. But with you to explain — —" And Lil-Umbra ended with a pathetically beseeching glance at Lady Val, as much as to say, "I'll be very very good and do everything, yes, everything, you want me to do, if only you'll agree to this!"

But the Lord of the Fortress was so quick in taking his daughter's wise hint that Lady Val had no chance to intervene, nor had her brothers a chance to accompany the two of them, even with the politest intentions. For throwing his powerful right arm round the slim, frail, weedy little body of his guest, as if he were his uncle rather than his host, he hurried him upstairs to the "little room" to which Lil-Umbra referred.

This, as a matter of fact, was a small apartment next door to their large bed-chamber, an apartment where the Baron kept the smaller, rarer, daintier, more delicate, more breakable utensils of his hunting, fishing, spearing and arrow-shooting gear.

The Baron himself and Peter of Maricourt in Picardy would have indeed been a perfect subject for a painter in oils, had one such been there to watch them; and indeed the mere sight of them, as they sat facing each other in the Baron's "Little Room", might possibly, had Tilton been daring enough and unscrupulous enough to slip up there after them and peep at them through the half-open door, have turned him from a sculptor into a painter.

It was a characteristic of several of the rooms in the Fortress that the doors were so constructed that it was physically impossible for them to be properly shut, so that the young man could have watched them for some time with an interest that might have inspired him with a passion for portrait-painting.

Yes, if the boy had been rude enough to follow them, the effect of the extraordinary vibrations thrown off all the time from the person of Master Peter might have affected this serious-minded young man's life in a really startling manner.

But Tilton did not follow them into that little room with the door that couldn't shut. We may imagine his doing so; but he didn't and that ends it. The chance came. The chance was not taken. The particular sight that, if it had been taken, would have changed his whole life, was never seen by him.

Chroniclers of human history talk of Fate, or Destiny, of what Homer calls "Keer" or doom. But all the time it is the great goddess of Chance — the present chronicler shirks using her name, because to anglicize it we have to turn the Greek letter called "upsilon" into our "Y", which always tempts us to pronounce it like our "i", which spoils its beauty altogether — yes, all the time it is the great goddess of Chance who turns the scale at the supreme crises of our life.

But though the sight of their figures facing each other remained unseen, Master Peter of Maricourt in Picardy and the Lord of the Fortress of Roque certainly did not “beat”, as the saying is, “about the bush”.

“What is that fool of a Friar made of,” queried Master Peter, “that he spends all his time, now that you people have got his Brazen Head, in writing long elaborate criticisms of these miserable doctors in Oxford and Paris, when he must know perfectly well that they are all tarred with the same brush and the same tar, the brush of obstruction and the tar of abstraction?

“And what a simple mind the fellow must have to make these attacks on the stupidity of the great mass of people and on the ignorance of their teachers! What does the man expect of our poor wretched human race? Hasn’t it been the same from the beginning? Can you or anybody else imagine anything different? Jesus Holy! How can the fellow suppose that even the cleverest of our masters with a class of young men before him as simple as our boys are — and they weren’t very different in the days of Confucius or the days of Socrates! — can bring, to what he tells these kids, inspiration and wit and insight enough to start them off looking up words in their Greek and Latin dictionaries?

“And the double-dyed idiot goes further even than that! Do you know, my lord, what I saw with my own eyes written on one of his carefully chosen parchment sheets? You would never guess! Nothing less than a passionate appeal to these teachers and to the young men who themselves want to become teachers, young men of good birth, like your own sons, to study Hebrew! Of course he’s perfectly right — you and I, my lord, don’t need a Grey Friar to tell us that — in indicating that the translations of Hebrew, all except that of the incomparable Jerome, are pretty rotten. But will these kids he’s catering for find the time, find the grammars, find the god-given or devil-given wit, to correct these treacherous and dangerous mistakes?

"How much better it would be for him, my Lord, if he would do what I do — that is to say leave all this theological business alone, and concentrate on experiment and invention; on experiment first, to find out what can be invented so as to be in harmony with Nature; and then, when we've got our invention, experiment again to find how far its use can go and yet remain in harmony with Nature."

The perfectly abysmal self-satisfaction expressed at that moment in the unnaturally large face, under the alarmingly large forehead and beneath that huge crop of jet black hair, roused in the Baron of Roque more anger than he had felt for many a long year. But he succeeded in restraining himself from displaying anything but the alert interest of a polite host in the presence of a voluble guest for several seconds of expectant silence.

"Surely, O great Experimenter, surely, O great Inventor," his alert pose seemed to say, as he leant forward from the round, hard, circular, gilded seat of his small upright armchair and clasped his fingers over his right knee, letting his foot thus balanced in the air sway interrogatively, "surely a man of your calibre didn't allow a simple grey friar of the order we all know so well," the Baron's mute expectancy went on, "to reduce you to the position of a silent listener at a theological lecture?"

The invisible chronicler of all these events, which were of course both physical and psychical, cannot help noting how much more detached from any sort of egotism or self-assertion was this lord of the biggest Manor in Wessex than this plain soldier from Maricourt in Picardy.

The psychic difference between them displayed itself physically with nearly perfect propriety in the way the two men consciously or unconsciously managed their mouths. The red point of Master Peter's tongue kept darting out from between his lips, just as if it were the instantaneously deadly sting of a human-headed Goblin armed with the poison of a hornet; while behind the lips of the Baron's mouth some unspoken word seemed roaming about, testing and trying every surface of the walls of its prison-house, as if conscientiously seeking the entrance to a promised passage of escape, concerning whose existence, though it was supported by universal consent, he himself was rather doubtful.

The only light in what, throughout the whole Fortress, was known as "The Little Room" came from a large oil-lamp in which two wicks, each with its own particular flame, floated quietly, and by their light, on the thin sill of a small square window, looking out on nothing but darkness and square stone towers, a small gnat could be seen marching resolutely up and down.

The only heat in the little room — but this was quite sufficient to make it perfectly warm — came from a stately bronze receptacle containing red-hot coals, with which the Baron's retainers kept it liberally supplied both by day and by night.

What Master Peter was thinking at that moment had certainly little to do with either theology or metaphysics.

"Would it be to my advantage or to my disadvantage," he was asking himself, "to tell this patronizing English lord about the magnetic shock I gave to this fool of a friar? What's against my doing so is the fact that I don't yet know how long the shock I gave him actually lasted; indeed I don't know yet whether it knocked the breath out of him forever! I rather hope it didn't, because there is still that little point about the value of manganese as an ingredient in the making of an elixir, that I ought to ask him. God knows why I forgot."

What the Baron was thinking was: "All these confounded quacks, whether they call themselves scientists or astrologists or alchemists or metaphysicians or inventors or theologians, are only plotting to get power for themselves over other people and glory for themselves over each other! What we must realize is that life goes on exactly the same whether we're with them or without them! When Lord Edward comes home from these absurd crusades we shall all know better where we stand. These damnable Scots want to be hammered into quiescence by somebody who understands the art of war, not the art of changing metals.

"And for these Welsh thieves who keep invading this country, if once metal-changers and sorcerers really begin, as they seem to be beginning, to rule the world, it won't be long before we shall be conquered by some ancient British robber who claims to be descended from Alexander the Great or Julius Caesar.

"But I know what I must do with this rogue — for it's clear he's some sort of oriental gipsy with the devil knows what games and tricks up his sleeve — is to get that fellow Spardo to take him round the ring of all the manors about here, even if he's got to mount him on that unfortunate beast with a man's head coming out of his neck! They told me out yonder that this fellow swears he comes from Picardy and that he likes to be called Maitre Pierre. Well! he can Maître-Pierre it to his heart's content with old Spardo dancing round him, and with that horse — what's its classic name? — to ride on! By God! that's what I'll do!"

At this point, in this curious dialogue between two silences, there suddenly opened one of those queer holes, or gaps, or gulfs, or chasms in the psychic-contact of two speechless persons who are watching each other like two animals, each wondering, in a sort of trance of expectation, not exactly whether it would be a good thing to leap at the other's throat, but whether the power that moves the world, whatever that power may be, will decide on their battling or embracing; and in this hollow void it was brought home to the Lord of the Manor that this Master Peter in front of him was really and truly some kind of Medium.

For what did my lord hear, clearly and unmistakably, at that identical instant, but the familiar voice, carried up on the eddying wind from the darkened forest below, of Spardo himself addressing his weird horse and of Cheiron answering his owner's voice with one of those indescribable sounds made by a self-conscious and self-possessed animal, a sound that had grown to have its quite definite meaning in the language of their mutual understanding.

"Come out with me for a moment, Master Peter of Maricourt, will you please? I want you to meet some very old friends of mine!"

The wanderer from Picardy followed him without hesitation or demur. When they reached the ground-floor the Baron hurried his guest through the anteroom and the entrance-hall, till he got him to the main entrance of the Fortress, and once there, with nothing but a humorous nod to the gate-keeper and the exchange of a more reserved and even a slightly enigmatic quip with the gate-keeper's wife, he pushed open one of the big gates, and with a hand on Master Peter's shoulder got him into the open, where by the light of a lantern hung on the branch of a tree they found Cheiron eating a supper of oats, and his master squatting on a fir-stump beside him devouring from a bowl on his knees some sort of steaming stew which the gate-keeper's wife must have provided.

"Where are you going to sleep tonight, Spardo?" The Lord of the Fortress never for a moment lost his special and peculiar power of propitiating the oddest, queerest, and most intransigent personalities in the world, whether in the human or sub-human sphere of life.

At this moment, without ceasing to transport to his mouth as much stew as his wooden spoon could carry, Spardo didn't hesitate for a second in his reply to this question.

"With your permission, good my lord, I should like to tie up Cheiron in the horse-stall behind the Fortress; for I've got the permission of the dame at your gate, if yourself, good my lord, have no objection, to sleep in her gate-house across there."

"Could the same good lady, do you suppose," said the Lord of the Fortress, "find room on a mattress in the same retreat for my friend Maître Pierre, a foreign gentleman from Picardy?"

The said Master Peter, as may easily be imagined, did not miss one jot of the instinctive sagacity with which the Baron, upon whose good or bad, wise of foolish behaviour so many destinies in that corner of the west country depended, managed to eliminate himself completely, as the local potentate whose whim was law, and to create a half-humorous atmosphere of adventure in which they all were taking chances.

Nor did he miss the perfectly natural manner in which Spardo, who was now scraping the inside of his bowl with his spoon, entered into this game, and instead of rising from the tree-stump on which he was squatting, when he saw Cheiron straining to get some fodder that was just beyond his reach, called out to the Baron, "Kick that stuff nearer the horse, my lord, if you don't mind!"

And when the Baron obeyed this curt command, Spardo only acknowledged it with a nod. It would be almost as difficult for the most penetrating chronicler to describe the thoughts that whirled through the head of Peter of Maricourt at this juncture, as it would be to describe what Cheiron himself was thinking.

But this much might certainly be hazarded: that if Cheiron's thoughts were concentrated partly upon what Spardo had given him to eat, and partly on the question as to whence this food came and how much more of it was available in the place, wherever that place was, from which it came, Master Peter's thoughts were concentrated, first on the question as to whether he dared to make another experiment with the perilous object he kept in a velvet bag between his legs, tightly pressed against his body close to his privy parts, or whether the present moment was even less propitious for an experiment of this sort than was the recent occasion in Roger Bacon's room at Bumset Priory.

The object in that velvet bag, squeezed so scrupulously against his most hidden stretch of skin, was indeed the very centre and focus of Maître Pierre's whole life. It was a magnet of immense and so far of quite unfathomed power.

Ever since he'd been a small boy Maître Pierre had been obsessed by a passion for magnetic experiments, and for the last twenty years his whole life had been given to the study of everything he could pick up on this queer topic.

The accumulated result of this frantic quest — for in many ways it was much more like this quest for the Sangraal than any ordinary alchemistic pursuit — was, as far as the man's own secret life went, only alchemistic on the side. In its main conscious urge what Master Peter of Maricourt was after was nothing less than the deliberate manipulation of his own sexual force, by means of this powerful magnet, for the domination of the souls and wills and minds of other entities.

He was in fact at this moment absorbed in this particular game, just as he had been for the last twenty years, and it was Friar Bacon's psychic awareness of this mania in his friend that always troubled and alarmed him when they were together, although it had a tremendous interest for him. The Friar never let it invade his own experimental work; and whenever it became evident to him as uppermost in Peter’s mind, it troubled him both in his nerves and in his conscience.

Yes! and in something else within him, beyond both nerves and conscience; for Friar Roger in his own spirit was always aware of the presence of an almighty force behind the whole panorama of experience, behind the animal, vegetable and mineral worlds, behind infinite space and infinite time, behind all possible suns, moons, planets and stars, in fact behind all possible, as well as all existing, universes.

It was his consciousness of this remote and ultimate power that Roger Bacon felt he needed to keep his peace of mind and keep him happy and contented in his work. Thus there was always something, in spite of his admiration for Pierre of Picardy, that frightened him about his friend’s attitude, for it struck him as reducing not only his own life, as he knew it himself, but the lives of all other entities as they knew them themselves, the lives of insects, such as midges and moths, the lives of plants and trees, the lives of worms and serpents, the lives of fish in the sea, birds in the air, the lives of the beasts of forest and field; reducing in fact all these lives to the level of lonely, desperate, lost souls, clinging to each other in a boundless, godless, cavernous nothingness, in fact to what he had heard a travelling Welsh tinker call Diddym, “the ultimate Void”.

To the original mind and autocratic humour of the Lord of the Manor of Roque there was something about this scene under the light of that suspended lantern that seemed monstrously comical as well as strangely weird and startling. What was this man up to now?

Master Peter had clearly and obviously some concentrated purpose; but who could possibly know that he was pressing that lodestone of his, in its absurd sheath of flexible velvet, against his naked organs of generation? His eyes, as he did this, were fixed on the head of the horse Cheiron, who was snorting rather indignantly and gazing rather reproachfully at his master, Spardo.

Spardo himself never moved from his seat on the tree-stump which had become for him a sort of elfin throne from which he could, though without any oracular authority, and without attempting to claim any mundane weight, play the part of a wandering goblin, who happened to be making a grave attempt to be an historian of the primitive antics of the human race.

Nor was it very long before both the eccentric Baron of Roque and the observant owner of Cheiron had something to set down in their “year-book” of manorial history. With his hands pressing more and more strongly, and with ever intenser concentration, his precious lodestone against his privy parts, Peter did really seem at that moment to be a man possessed by a fit of insane devilry. It is likely enough that what made him select Cheiron, rather than Cheiron’s master, for his magnetic experiment was the passing glimpse he may have had, when the darkness was broken by some gleam from the lantern swaying in the wind, of that deformity in the horse’s neck.

But whatever it was that set him off practising his tricks in this direction, the result was sufficiently unexpected. Cheiron suddenly leapt up on his hind-legs and advanced, pawing the air with his front-legs, straight upon Master Peter, who promptly scuttled behind the Lord of Roque.

And this moment really produced, if the truth had been carried over the length and breadth of his manorial domain, one of those situations in which this extraordinary owner of this by no means extraordinary strip of fir-forest had a chance of showing that it was not for nothing that the skull of his grandfather, when by some chance it was exposed to the air long after it was buried, had a twist of dark hair gathered round it, indicating, so an Assyrian astrologer who saw it declared, that its zodiacal tendency belonged to the constellation of the Ram, since there had always been known, from the beginning of history, certain rare persons born under that influence, the roots of whose hair came from a deeper level than their skin.

Instead therefore of being in the least perturbed by the towering belly and menacing hooves hovering above him, the Lord of Roque experienced the sort of exultation that Job declares Behemoth felt when he believed he could drain Jordan to the dregs of all its waters.

Spardo was so astonished at what he now beheld that he rose from his seat on the tree-stump and stood like one confounded. Master Peter whose magnetic experiment was the cause of this classic catastrophe, did what Friar Bacon's collapse had clearly not made him do. He carefully shifted, in a number of minute jerks, his perilous lodestone. He did this knowing the thing couldn't be lost, for its velvet container was suspended by a cord from his waist; and he adjusted it now so that while it was still in contact with his bare skin, it was at the base of his stomach and quite out of reach of his organs of generation.

But not a soul in that small lantern-lit group was more astonished than was Cheiron himself when he felt, hurled against his privy parts — which were, and this was no doubt an additional effect of Master Peter's experiment, unusually excited just then — the formidable skull of the Lord of Roque.

Unable now to bring his legs to the ground, the angry horse found his right hoof hanging helplessly over the man's left shoulder and his left hoof thrust out at an extremely awkward and even a painful angle over the man's right shoulder, while he himself, his whole equine shape and deformed neck, was lifted bodily off the ground!

It only lasted a second, this incredible display of human strength, a display that Hercules himself would have witnessed with amazement: but when it was over the Lord of Roque and his deformed antagonist were struggling together on the ground.

And it was then that there occurred the same total collapse of consciousness in the brain of the Lord of the Manor as had occurred some half a dozen hours earlier in the case of Friar Bacon. At one second he was saying to himself: “I am a beast. Man is no more. Your own beasthood learn to adore!” and was beginning to force himself to enjoy the strong hirsute odour of Cheiron’s under-belly, when suddenly, without any warning at all, everything became dark, and he himself became as nonexistent as if he had never been born.

The sharp-eyed dame of the gate-keeper had already left her less alert husband’s side; and with a thick scarf round her head, and a still thicker one round her shoulders, was soon at the side of her unconscious master; and it can be imagined, with an experienced old lady of her sort at the head of affairs, and with the gate-keeper, inspired by her example, obedient to her least hint, how soon it was that the Lord of the Fortress lay stretched out on his own bed with Lady Val bending over him and his three children, along with excited emissaries from every part of the Fortress, hovering round the door.

Both Spardo and Cheiron were comfortably asleep, and also in closer proximity to each other than anyone who had witnessed the recent struggle and its surprising termination would have predicted, before Master Peter of Maricourt had succeeded in persuading the perspicacious lady of the gate-house to allow him a sleeping-place. This indeed, when she found it for him, could not be called under her roof, for it was in the back premises of the Fortress on the opposite side from the entrance, but such as it was, it was so much in the warmest part of the whole building and so surrounded by the sleeping-places of animals, that when Peter of Picardy had settled his great black head on the sack of wool that formed his substantial pillow, he found that the melancholy wailing of the wind across the forest was so comfortably animalized by the noises of the beasts in his immediate vicinity that his thoughts became so agreeable to him that he felt reluctant to fall asleep too quickly.

His present situation was indeed so harmonious with his mood that he disentangled his precious lodestone, which, it would seem, after these two murderous experiments, could scarcely be called a harmless magnet, and examined it as carefully as was possible under the light of a stable-lantern which hung from a time-darkened oak-beam several yards above his pillow.

"I have succeeded," he told himself. "I have succeeded beyond all expectation." Had there been an onlooker at this scene — say an angel or a devil crouched on that wooden beam above the lantern and endowed with a powerful enough sight — he might, or she might, have described this half-natural, half-artificial object to some acquaintance up in the roof in the following terms. "It is about half a foot long and is simply a spear-head of the particular colour which waves take when they are beginning to change from blue to green, a change which happens when the winds rise, not so much as a sign of a coming storm, as to prove that, if a storm did come, they would show themselves to be the proud-curving cohorts they were, of an approaching sea-god."

With exquisite satisfaction did Master Peter of Picardy caress his newly formulated, newly invented, newly tested magnet; and as he did so a series of the wildest fantasies raced through his mind. He saw himself dominating the rulers of all the countries of the world, and through his power over them he saw himself, although always craftily in the background, having his revenge upon the whole human race.

“O how I do hate them all!” he thought. “I hate them with my brain, with my body, and with my soul! I hate them with everything I am, everything I was, and everything I shall be!”

And then he began again to wonder, as he had so often wondered before, whether it was possible that he really was that Antichrist, prophesied of from the beginning of the world, who was destined to destroy the Kingdom of Christ.

“What I would do then,” he told himself, “the moment I had got the world entirely under my control, would be to build up an absolutely different kind of world altogether. I would have no more of this hypocritical humbug about ‘love’ — as if it were possible for any child of the elements, born of earth, air, water and fire, to fight for anything, to achieve anything, to enjoy anything, to become anything, except by the assertion of his separate, distinctive, individual, and unique self — and what I would aim at in my world, in my Antichrist world, in my super-scientific world, would be to create a new race of beings altogether, creatures as superior to what mankind is now as man is superior to beasts, birds, and fishes!”

The demonic delight, which radiated in the train of these thoughts through the whole being of Master Peter, was so deliciously transporting that it carried him away altogether from his material position at that moment, and bore him aloft, as if in a chariot of air and fire, a chariot that flew upward upon the waving of two wings, one of which might have been Space and the other Time, for both together seemed to acquire a mysterious force that soon carried their voyager into a sleep, if sleep it were, where he found himself in reality, if reality it were, beyond all description by the words the human race has hitherto used.

XVII. ALBERT OF COLOGNE

Raymond de Laon was not given to moods of special exultation or to moods of special depression. He possessed an extremely well-balanced nature. He had been saved from quarrels with parents by having been made an orphan at an early age; and he was lucky now in having found a betrothed who exactly suited him. He took the shocks and accidents and misadventures of life with a calm, and yet, in a certain way, with an exultant commonsense, that was as much a support to Lil-Umbra as it was an authentic advantage to himself in his struggle with life. He had certainly done well in his present mission; for here by his side was none other than Albertus Magnus. At this moment with his band of armed retainers, who had been rather unwillingly provided by the authorities of Cone Castle to support him on this daring embassy, he had just reached the entrance to the convent where Ghosta was employed, and they were all now about to pass, while the Sun was at his hottest on that June day, the mysterious cave in the grove of oaks and willows, which Peleg had been assured was the abode of that tinker from Wales about whom the wildest rumours were current.

It was said for instance that he was helped in his work as a travelling tinker by several women from different parts of the country, all of whom had sold their souls to the Devil.

It was at this point that Raymond began rather nervously explaining to the great teacher from Cologne that they would be soon arriving at the main gate of the Fortress of Roque; and he went on to indicate more specifically, what he had already mentioned shyly to him before, namely that Lady Val, who was expecting him as her guest that night, was the mother of the young lady to whom he himself was betrothed, and was the wife of the most formidable boar-hunter and wolf-slayer in all that portion of England. Nor did he hesitate, though even more diffidently, to explain that they were all so weary of the violent personal quarrels between these two belligerent Franciscans, Friar Bacon and Bonaventura that they welcomed the appearance among them of a renowned Dominican whose presence alone would be sufficient to break up these vindictive quarrels.

The whole party paused at this point at the request of the visitor, to enable him to retire behind a clump of willows with a view to relieving himself. When he returned he kept them standing for a moment above the leafy declivity containing the entrance to this cave of the tinker's witch-wives, while he begged Raymond de Laon to tell him as definitely as he could what his own private and personal reaction was in regard to the quarrel between these famous men.

He had no sooner asked this question and Raymond was frowning and biting his lips and searching his mind for an adequate answer, when they all heard quite distinctly, borne up upon the wind from the depths of the leafy gully beneath them a wild husky voice singing a ditty which clearly was, whether they were able to follow all its crazy words or not, a blasphemous defiance of Providence above, of the Church below, and of all that mankind from generation to generation has been taught to hold sacred.

The day was so hot and the sky above was so blue, that the effect of this howl of defiance to everything they had all been accustomed from infancy to venerate was enhanced by the complete absence at that spot of any work of men's hands, whether of wood or stone. It was like a voice from the depths of the earth replying to a voice from uttermost space. It seemed to be addressed to the formless and shapeless rocks of granite and basalt that lay around this small group of travellers, and it seemed to be appealing desperately to earth, air, and water, not to allow the sun-rays that were so lifegiving to all, to fool them by their warmth.

It was the sort of defiance such as the ghost of a baby of a million years ago, a baby or “baban” whose skull, “penglog”, had been discovered in the grave of an antediluvian giant, “gawr”, might have uttered to all oracles and prophets and announcers of revelations and to all deities and pantheons of deities who were already gathering in the mists of the future to claim human worship.

“Until I’m dust I’ll enjoy my hour —
Penglog y Baban yr Gawr!
I’ll gather my harvest and grind my flour —
Penglog y Baban yr Gawr!
With Holy Rood I’ll have naught to do —
Penglog y Baban yr Gawr!
Adam am I, and Eve are you,
And Eden’s wherever we are, we two —
Penglog y Baban yr Gawr!
A mortal’s fate is the same as a mole’s —
Penglog y Baban yr Gawr!
The same as the fishes that leap in shoals,
Penglog y Baban yr Gawr!
Where leaf do fall — there let leaf rest —
Where no Grail be there be no quest —
Be’ee good, be’ee bad, be’ee damned, be’ee blest —
Be’ee North, be’ee South, be’ee East, be’ee West
The whole of Existence is naught but a jest —
Penglog y Baban yr Gawr!”

The effect upon that small company, together with Raymond their leader and Albertus Magnus their visitor, of this weird ditty, a ditty followed by dead silence, save for the sound of the wind in the trees about them and the far-off cry of a buzzard high in the air above them, would have been for anyone concerned with the results of unexpected shocks upon human nerves, of no small interest.

It had an effect however that no chronicler, however sagacious, could possibly have foreseen. Every single one of those six armed men, as well as their leader and his visitor, behaved exactly in the same way. They all were so startled and shocked that they simply dared not comment on what they had heard. Every single one of them pretended — whether to himself as well as to the others who could tell? — that he had heard nothing!

The shock of what they had heard, for all this pretence, followed them, all the same, through the burning heat of this mid-day in June, as they pressed on, leaving the stone circle to their left, and that lonely stone seat where Lil-Umbra, on an early February morning, had asked Peleg such searching questions, on their right, till they approached, not the small postern this time, for they were too large a party, and it was too cogent an occasion, to use that entrance, but the main gate of the Fortress.

As soon as Raymond told him they were approaching their journey's end, Albertus brought their march to a halt and put to his young guide the direct question, which the voice of that cave-devil had for the time postponed.

"And what," he asked him, "is your own private attitude to these disputes?"

The Cone Castle men, who were already alert, now crowded quite close to them, and it became clear to Raymond that they felt unusually concerned. And indeed there was unquestionably something about Albertus Magnus that attracted the attention of intelligent persons wherever he went. He had already held for a couple of years an important bishopric in Germany, but this he had recently resigned together with all the influence and wealth that a bishopric gives in order to devote himself solely and entirely to the metaphysical and botanical and entomological studies that were the main interest of his days upon earth.

This absorption in the mysterious life of all the creatures of Nature and in the whole problem of mind and matter, since it was combined with a lively interest in men and women for themselves, threw a very singular aura round him, an aura which, though it rendered him separate and aloof, endowed his presence with the peculiar attraction which certain rare and evasive animals and birds and insects possess.

And not only was Albertus Magnus an unusual, indeed we might say a unique person in himself, but the particular line of philosophical investigation into which he threw his whole nature linked itself with metaphysical thoroughness to his wide natural sympathy. He himself described it as finding the Universal “before” all, “in” all, and “after” all. He was not only a student of plants, trees, flowers, and insects, but of human beings also; and he sought to find this Universal of his in all its three stages of “before”, “in”, and “after”, in every living thing he studied.

In appearance Albert of Cologne was curiously impressive. He was of medium height but very powerfully built. He always wore, day and night — for it was a weakness of his to be physically sensitive to catching cold, and it was a conviction of his that where he was especially menaced by this affliction was through his head — a curiously shaped white cap that had a remote affinity to an academic cap, and also to the metallic cap of a knight in armour, but was first suggested to him by the singular night-turban worn by an Arabian student of Aristotle with whom he had shared a lodging in early days in Swabia.

But the chief advantage of this ubiquitous protection against colds was that it was made of such soft stuff that any kind of ceremonial head-gear, from a pontifical mitre to a more secular token of authority, could be squeezed over it.

The head of Albert of Cologne was if anything not larger, but smaller, than most human heads. He had a long straight nose with wide sensitive nostrils. He had small ears close to his skull, extremely full and very attractively curved lips, a large mouth that was often open and even had a tendency to dribble, an unaggressive and retreating chin and a pair of small hazel eyes under bushy grey eyebrows, eyes that searched affectionately and longingly into every person and thing he looked at, as if seeking to trace "within" this person or thing the Universal in which he believed, the Universal that had been "before" it and would be "after" it. The truth was he was always aware of the contrast between the touchingly pathetic brittleness, feebleness, silliness and conceitedness of the particular small creature he was regarding and the enormous life-force which brought it to birth.

"What I would like to be able to tell you, Doctor," replied Raymond hesitatingly, fully aware that his Cone Castle friends were glancing quickly from one to another as they followed his words, "would be that I have steadily tried hard, ever since I realized the bewildering complexity of all these ultimate problems, to keep my mind entirely open and my personal conclusions undecided and hanging in the balance. But such is the weakness and such is the pride of human nature, or at any rate, great Doctor, of my nature, that I cannot resist bringing into the workings of my will and of my faith in myself all manner of obstinate prejudices and too-quickly reached conclusions."

Albert of Cologne made a quick little inclination of his head, upon which for this journey through the forest of Wessex, he wore above his white skull-cap, a traveller's variant of a Dominican cowl.

"Please give me, my dear young guide, and let me tell you I shall certainly congratulate your future parents-in-law on having secured for their daughter such a thoughtful and resourceful bridegroom, some general notion of these fixed ideas of yours before we have to separate."

"Well, master; to confess the truth," and Raymond de Laon looked nervously round him at a receding glade of sun-illumined bluebells in one direction, and at several sumptuous bunches of horse-chestnut blossoms in another direction, and finally at the illimitable gulf, of that early June's noon-deep, noon-blue infinity above them, and then, with a quiver of unquestioned sincerity in his voice: "What I feel myself, great master," he said, "is that it's wrong for the church to forbid Friar Bacon to work at his self-chosen inventions. And I also feel that it's wrong, and worse than wrong, in fact I think it is devilishly wicked in this Bonaventura, who by some pious people among us is regarded as a saint, and who at one time was the Pope's Legate, to start the rumour" — here the young man's voice became broken by a sound in his throat that was clearly a choked-down sob — "that my pure-minded young betrothed and her serious-minded elder-brother Tilton have committed the shocking sin of incest."

His voice rose stronger at this point. "This man Bonaventura knows absolutely nothing of us people in the west of England. He knows nothing of the childlike and innocent character of the young man and young girl he is attacking in this gross manner. And further, great master, you must understand that he actually went so far as to urge on a band of notorious outlaws from a castle in this neighbourhood called Lost Towers whose lord is known far and wide as an enemy of God and man, but whom this Bonaventura, for his own secret ends, pretends to have converted, to attack Friar Bacon. It was this rabble who under his direction smashed a shrine which my betrothed's brother was building, and were on the point of destroying Friar Bacon's Brazen Head, if it hadn't been for — —"

Albertus Magnus interrupted him. "You've not forgotten I hope, my young friend," cried the famous teacher, "that it was only your promise that I should be allowed to sleep in the same chamber as this Brazen Head that made me put off my return to Cologne? This particular invention interests me profoundly. To tell you the truth, Raymond de Laon, what I had been hearing from England about the experimental theories concerning physical science originated by your great Robert Grosseteste had led me to aim at something very much on Friar Roger's lines. It was when they made me a bishop that I had too much work and too much responsibility to be able to go on with such things; and I warrant it was the same with your Grosseteste who must have been both a real scientist and a real saint.

"But I can tell you this, my lad — I can tell you this, my friends — when a thinker gets an appointment all his thinking's done. We are just idiots if we imagine we can accept responsible positions in Church or State and go on thinking just the same. I tell you, my dear lad, I tell you, my excellent friends, the noble words I have already read written by this Friar Bacon have interested me greatly. He knows Aristotle through and through and few scholars have better interpreted the secretum secretorum of all matter, I mean the energeia-akinesis, or 'energy without fuss', that is at the heart of the world.

"And as for his Brazen Head, I have tried myself in my own blundering and amateurish way to invent a machine that can use what we have come to call the agens intellectus, or the mental driving-force, that exists in the ultimate substance of things and which we are told in the scriptures is the Spirit of God. But I seem to be saying things contrary to what you are feeling about all this, my dear son, and I beg you to tell me at once where your difficulty lies; for I can see that many of our friends here are interested in this point, and I shall perhaps have more to tell you when I have spent a night under your betrothed's roof and in company with your Friar's Brazen Head."

Raymond de Laon looked round at the faces about him, and he was forced to admit to himself that they did indeed look surprisingly interested as to what he would say in reply to all this. He made up his mind to blurt out the precise truth.

"You are quite right, master," he said, making a peculiar gurgling noise in his throat before each word he uttered, as if it had been projected out of him by squeezing his wind-pipe. "There is a thing that I really must ask you, master, while I have a chance, for there is no telling how long my destiny will enable me to remain at Cone Castle where already I am by no means, as my friends here could tell you, what at Oxford they call a persona grata with everybody. But what I want to ask you is this, for my betrothed's younger brother, whose name is John, and whose quickness in learning things has been a tremendous help to the Friar, has recently, in his talk anyway, shown a tendency to follow some of the more satirical Latin poets and to grow sceptical about our holy faith and I am not clever enough, nor is my betrothed, to refute young John's arguments; but I certainly think he goes much further in the direction of unbelief than the Friar himself does, who indeed, from what I've been able to pick up, remains an entirely orthodox Christian. My question, great doctor, is simply this: Where, in a world composed of matter possessed of this energeia-akinesis, does God come in? What place in fact is left, in a world of such self-creative energy as you describe, for any sort of Creator?”

The moment was a singularly intense one for that small group of about a dozen men. The average intelligence among the retainers of the Lord of Cone was a good deal higher than it was at the Fortress; and ever since Raymond’s official betrothal to Lil-Umbra, whose young brother was known to be a reckless supporter of the Friar, there had been lively discussions in the ground-floor reception-hall, as well as in the kitchen, as to whether the Friar was inspired by God or by the Devil.

Not for nothing had Albertus been an active bishop for a couple of years. By his use-and-wont contacts under such conditions with all sorts of people he had developed, to a degree unusual in such a speculative thinker, an awareness of the thoughts and feelings of the people that surrounded him, or that at any moment accompanied him, or that happened to be listening to him.

From boyhood he had been a naturalist, and by this time he knew much more about birds and beasts and insects than any other thinker of that epoch who was proficient in Greek and Latin.

At this moment as he encountered the earnest faces round him and noted the almost distressed look in the long thin countenance of Raymond de Laon, a countenance that already bore more wrinkles between the eyebrows than seemed natural for so handsome and diplomatic a youth, he suddenly caught sight of a butterfly he had come to name a “Wood Argus” because of the markings on its wings, that now had settled, since this group of two-legged monsters seemed inclined to be quiescent, on a little poplar-twig just above a regular bed of bluebells.

A particularly brilliant ray of June sunshine was at that second turning into a shining little arrow-head of gleaming silver the white stalk of one of these flowers, and as he watched it, Albert of Cologne couldn't help wondering whether this particular "Wood-Argus" came regularly at this particular hour to this particular spot.

In a small leafy grove just outside Cologne he had frequently constituted himself a patient and watchful sentinel of whatever light-winged butterfly-emperor ruled that forest-glade, a sentinel big enough to ward off any feathered freebooter, who might come sweeping down through the fragrant air-gulfs of the noon-heat, with the deliberate intention of snapping up so divine a mouthful.

He now had the experience and the wit to see clearly that by his reference to the self-creative energy of the "Hulee", or "raw-material" or "formless timber", as Homer might have called it, out of which the world is made, he had touched an extremely ticklish subject, in fact the subject of all subjects, he now told himself, about which, in connection with Friar Roger, the intelligent minority was most hotly divided.

"I must be careful," he thought. "O how mixed up, how cruelly mixed up with our personal prejudices, is every exciting topic we touch!"

And then, when it must have been clear to them all that he was longing to say something that was very important to himself, but found it hard to get the right words for it, his eyes were caught by the largest of a few dark holes in the ground in front of him, obviously caused by the cloven hooves of some wandering steer or heifer, and which had been filled with water by last night's rain. Upon this small black pool, in his effort to decide what it would be best to say, he was now fixedly staring. As he stared, he suddenly grew aware that the mid-day Sun was also busy with this hand's-breadth of dark water, and that he was now staring into his own reflected visage, above which his complicated head-wear had already become among the bluebells a portentously hovering shadow.

"What place is left for a Creator?" was now the question which the mind behind that bulging forehead, those quivering nostrils, those small deep-set tearful eyes, had to answer; and as, aware of that attentive group of men, and of that more than attentive young lover, the great teacher from Cologne struggled with the riddle of existence, he felt as if this floating "something" that was himself, now confronted by this likeness of a not very striking human face in the wet hoof-print of an animal, was being carried, just as that reflected face looked as if it were being carried, up, up, up, through all Space and all Time, searching for the thrice-blessed gulf of absolute nothingness that is beyond all that has a name.

At last the words came. "There are some of us," he said, speaking slowly, and beneath and against and under, so it felt to him, the warm breath of every star in the firmament, "who hold that all the ideal words that we philosophers use, such as 'matter' and 'substance' and 'form' and 'essence' and 'finite' and 'infinite' and 'transitory' and 'eternal' and 'nature' and 'super-nature' are only so many names, sounding syllables that signify nothing. Others hold that these words represent ultimate and basic realities by the use of which we recognize and interpret the Entelecheia of existence, that would be just meaningless smoke without them!

"Now what I hold, my dear friends, is especially difficult to make clear because it partakes of the opposite opinions of both those two camps of thought. I do hold, as strongly and as absolutely as it is possible to hold anything, that behind all the visible and intelligible phenomena of the cosmos there exists the invisible and unintelligible reality which we call God.

"According to the philosophy of the greatest of all philosophers — I speak of Aristotle — the material stuff of which the Cosmos is composed is eternal, and contains within itself the creative energy that builds the world and produces all the innumerable lives around us, such as we know and such as we are. But we Christians have been given a — a — a — —”

Here he hesitated and a very queer sound came from his body as he stood there before them, like a great black rook come down from a nest that a quarter of a year ago has served its purpose to the limit and now awaits its dissolution, a sound that might have been an explosion of wind, either from mouth or from anus, but a sound that resembled the cry of an unborn child, that with the permission of nature had been engendered in the duodenum of an elderly man by deliberate impregnation from a superhuman minotaur—“have been given a — a Revelation that alters from top to bottom the whole situation.”

Here his voice rose just as used to rise the voice of each of the Homeric heroes at some special crisis in the Trojan War. “We cannot, we dare not, we must not, lest we become the murderers of the truth that is in us, deny the integrity of our own reason. And if we accept our reason we must recognize that the deepest, wisest, completest embodiment of it, so far, and until this moment, is to be found in the works of Aristotle; and Aristotle maintains that since matter is eternal in its inherent essence and is capable, in itself and by its own secret energy, of renewing the universe, and of bringing into existence an everlasting recurrence of the multiple forms we see around us, we are driven by our reason to assume that the cosmos is eternal. But this whole assumption, this whole implication, this whole conclusion is surpassed and transcended” — Albert’s voice became the voice of a trumpet — “by the Revelation brought by Christ, the revelation of Christ Himself and the revelation of the Holy Spirit!”

The warrior-retainers from Cone Castle were so accustomed to associate any reference, in any formal service of worship, to the Holy Ghost, as a sign that this same service had reached its termination, that now they all solemnly and mechanically, just as in some ordinary daily ceremonial, lowered one knee to the earth, and then, standing erect, murmured the word "amen".

Albert of Cologne would never have become what undoubtedly he had, by the pure power of his intrinsic personality, quite deservedly become, the best philosophical teacher in Europe, if he hadn't long ago acquired the power of not losing his temper, or the thread of his discourse, or even his own zest for the subject, when the bulk of his audience missed the whole point, as they certainly did now.

The grand trick he had acquired was a very daring one, and one whose nature would have been extremely shocking to many pious souls, namely the device of treating the words of Jesus, on almost all the well-known occasions when the Master uttered decisive and pregnant announcements, as if they contained in them, however tragic they might be, a peculiar element of sheer humour.

And the psychic trick Albertus used on this occasion was the wisest possible one he could have used, namely the trick of appropriating to himself and to his own feelings at such moments the bold and perhaps scandalous assumption that the Son of God was humorously aware of the sublime stupidity of the race of mortals, whose flesh he had submissively adopted for some unknown and secret purpose of his Divine Parent.

Raymond de Laon however had not bowed the knee at the reference to the Paraclete, nor had he stiffened himself in preparation for entering the Fortress. His face had indeed taken on a look of infinite relief. He had in fact been terribly afraid that Albert would at this juncture try to do what so many of the so-called Averroists did — namely, slur over the Athenian thinker's conviction as to the eternity of "Matter" or "Hulee", and insert into this unconscionable substance a nebulous and vaporous wedge of divine providence.

To Raymond it was a turning point in his whole mental life, this frank and free admission, by Albertus of Cologne, that, if a student honestly followed Aristotle, he couldn't, with any integrity of mind or any consent of reason, refuse to accept the Aristotelian conclusion as to the eternity of the world.

It was therefore with the abysmal craving of his deepest nature that Raymond now awaited from Albert some notion of what he actually meant by the word Revelation.

"What we must do as Christians," Albert of Cologne announced slowly, "is just to accept by a pure and simple act of faith the Revelation of Jesus that He was, and is, the Son of God, and that God in the beginning created the world. There are therefore," Albert went on quietly, "two accounts of the origin of all things: first the view offered us by the greatest of all human thinkers that the world never had a beginning, but has always existed, and secondly the revelation of Jesus that He and He only is the true Son of God, and that in the beginning God created the world.

"The first of these opinions is the one we hold when we follow our human reason. The second is the one we hold when we accept the view that Jesus is the Son of God, and what He tells us about the universe is the truth. Which of these two views about the beginning of things we as individuals accept will therefore depend upon how far we are ready to follow Faith, when it goes beyond Reason and even when it flatly contradicts the view derived from Reason.

"If Matter is eternal, why then the world we live in is likewise eternal, for it is made of Matter or what the Greeks called "hulee"; and, if our world is eternal, it has not been created by anyone. When Jesus talked of 'His Father in Heaven', it is quite clear that he spoke as a Jew, and that he was thinking of the God of the Jews. By the Divinity within Him on the strength of which He spoke, He was Himself convinced that He was the Son of God, and it was in the Power of this conviction that He enlarged his Father's Godhead till it went far beyond the Jewish race. The God of the Jews, though nameless, we call Jehovah; but the God whom Jesus called Father was the God of the whole world, who existed before he created all that is, and who will go on existing when all that is has ceased to exist."

Raymond de Laon had missed no syllable of this pronouncement; nor had he failed to notice how easily, naturally, and unofficially this tremendous Credo had been declared.

"Will Lady Val," he thought, "let me take Lil-Umbra for a short ride after their visitor has been properly welcomed and has gone to the armoury to rest? Will they find the old bailiff still there? Or will they have moved him elsewhere so that this man can sleep alone, as he clearly wants to do, with that awful Brazen Head? God in Heaven! I wouldn't sleep with that Thing in the room, though by so doing I were to be crowned King of Poland! What if the Thing Inside came out and stood by the head of my bed? I verily believe I'd go crazy with terror! O I do so long to talk to Lil-Umbra about all these things. She's got all young John's cleverness and all Tilton's soundness and good sense."

"Well, my Lord Albertus, shall we move on again? It's not more than a mile from here."

"I'm at your service, my son; and I warrant that you, my lads" — and he gave the Cone Castle group a friendly smile— "will be thankful enough to exchange our theology for a beaker of good ale or even a flagon of cider!"

XVIII. THE VIGIL

THE SILENCE OF them all was very marked as they threaded their way between mossy fir-stumps and ferny rocks, while the hot noon-rays, hidden by one branch and revealed between two branches, and forever being broken and intercepted by the dark feathery foliage of ancestral pines, turned the endless bluebells, upon which it seemed impossible to avoid treading, into an elfin army of some aboriginal pixy-monarch, who though confronted by a cohort of giants was by no means frustrated in his attempt to add yet another outpost to his sylvan realm. It was indeed a natural part, this speechless silence of them all, of the sweltering docility of every forest creature under the royal glare of the lord of life.

When they came in sight of the Great Gate of the Fortress a curious psychic event occurred. This was an event that, in itself without any further evidence, is a proof that all those wild and desperate feelings which reach us from every quarter of the horizon, passing from the north to the west, and from the west, through the north again, to the south, are sometimes fully justified.

For here, precisely and exactly here, where, by a superhuman and Herculean heave, such as more than the muscles of any ordinary human frame could have endured without cracking or breaking, the Lord of the Manor of Roque lifted the horse Cheiron from his four hooves and rolled him over on the ground, the appalling strain of the effort he made, and the weird desperation of the awareness accompanying it, had actually created a living spirit.

And at this point in their approach to this spot every single one of this small company, including Raymond and Albert the Great, felt a definite stab in the region of their heart, as if an invisible spirit had struck them just there.

And if Albert of Cologne had boldly enquired: “To what tribe of spirits do you belong?” this “Genius Loci” might well have answered with the words: “I am the spirit of a supernatural effort, an effort that was not only an effort of muscles but an effort of will and an effort of mind and an effort that drew into itself a positively unlawful, insupportable, and intolerable strength from all the living things about it, from the trees, from the creatures of the earth, from the birds of the air, from the actual stones and rocks and earth-mould of this place, so that”, thus might the spirit of that shock, the spirit of that superhuman strain have replied to the bold question of the sage from Cologne, “so that I am a spirit which to the end of time, yes! until ice from above, or fire from below, destroy this whole forest, will embody in a shudder of this air the effort this man made; one of the most terrific efforts ever made on this earth since Hercules lifted up the Giant Antaeus in his arms to strangle him in the air; and I, the spirit of this appalling effort, will remain here to guard this man’s gate against all his enemies unto the third and fourth millennium of his descendants!”

It was about this man, the Lord of the Manor of Roque and the master of the Fortress, that Albertus Magnus enquired at once, the moment he was ushered by Raymond de Laon in to the presence of Lady Val.

“Yes, O yes!” the lady replied, “and I’ll certainly tell him that your first question, reverend sir, was about his health. He strained something inside him. Gorthruk, our manor leech, who came here five years ago straight from Oxford, and is said to have studied medicine under the court physician in Paris, is of opinion that though the injury itself can never, by the nature of it, heal itself, my husband will very shortly be well enough to resume his hunting and fishing and his usual protective investigations round the outskirts of the Manor.

“Gorthruk has given us an ivory box containing three or four compartments each one of which contains several differently tasting tablets. Gorthruk says that, in his own village of Tintinhull, the blacksmith has been kept alive by just such curative pills for four and twenty years, after a strain similar to the one suffered by my husband; only his trouble — the blacksmith’s I mean — was caused by a wrestling-match with the bailiff of the Manor of Montacute who was a very heavy man, and thus, when the blacksmith of Tintinhull picked him up in his arms and threw him into the village duck-pond, the village priest, whose name was Humph, and who came from Gloster, had to wade into the pond to get him out; for he hit his head on Gammer Grundy’s bucket, which had lain there, down in the mud, since the days of Thomas a Becket.”

Raymond de Laon had never before heard his betrothed’s mother talk in this free and easy way; but he told himself it must be due to the fact that all women, especially those in responsible positions and those with important households to look after, are invariably anxious to win favour with church dignitaries.

They are also, Raymond’s erratic thoughts ran on, often much more interested than are their hunting and fishing and fighting husbands, in historical and philosophical subjects, in spite of the fact that their opportunities for such studies are so much less. As to the easy homeliness of Lady Val’s talk, “don’t they all go on in that sort of way,” Raymond said to himself, “when they want to captivate us? The only alternative I suppose would be sculleries, store-cupboards, and meat-skewers, with a sagacious allusion, or even a sly glance now and again, towards bed-clothes.”

Whether sage or sly in her welcome, Lady Val soon disposed of her chief guest, and arranged for the Gone Castle contingent to dine at an earlier hour than was usual and at a special table in the dining-hall. She likewise gave her most regal and gracious permission to Raymond, as a reward for his skill as a tutelary ambassador, to take Lil-Umbra for a couple of hours' ride in the forest.

"You'd better," she added, as the pair went off, "start, and come back too, by the main entrance. Your father has placed such a powerful guard at Tilton's shrine that there's no possible danger from that quarter. But as nurse always used to say, 'It's silly to shout till the Devil's gone out.'"

With a big silver tray arranged conveniently between them upon a stool made of exquisitely slender delicately twisted willow-twigs, upon which stood two glasses and a huge beaker of red wine and a few oaten cakes, the old ex-bailiff of the manor of Roque found a perfect listener to his rambling talk in the great Albert of Cologne.

Accustomed to the part of the chief talker in the presence of less experienced, less volatile, less egocentric and much younger hearers, it was an indescribable relief to Albert the Great to rest and recline in this ancient armoury and listen in peace to this old gentleman's rambling stories of an up-and-down long life full of the simple power of representative authority and of the simple piety of unquestionable conviction.

There in the background, just as if "It" also was listening to the old man's talk, stood the Brazen Head, its confused multiple-mooded expression rejecting placidly any dogmatic solution of the entangled problem of existence. It may well be believed that Albertus Magnus didn't confine himself to listening. Every now and again with the subtle wisdom of a born decipherer of difficult old documents he interpolated at certain turning-points a question by which into the unpremeditated debouchings of the senile narrator there was insinuated a flickering lantern, tied, as it were, round the neck of a darting bird, a lantern that might be compared to some providential firefly giving a celestial clarification to our dark pilgrimage through the mists of Chaos to the City of Cosmos.

But what struck Albertus Magnus most about this loquacious old gentleman was his attitude towards the Brazen Head. There was the Brazen Head, quite close to the ex-bailiff's side, in fact almost touching the old man's right shoulder; but its presence didn't seem to disturb him in the least. Nor was it as if he altogether disregarded it. It was as if he and it had already reached some personal understanding between themselves, by virtue of which there was no longer any necessity for both of them to speak, since, when the ex-bailiff spoke, he spoke for them both.

"The whole trouble in this Fortress," the ex-bailiff was presently murmuring, "comes from the fact that Lil-Umbra's brothers are so different from each other that they are always arguing and disputing. This makes it necessary for Lil-Umbra to keep the balance between them, sometimes taking the side of Tilton the elder one, and sometimes the side of John the younger one."

"But I should have thought," protested the great teacher from Cologne, "that just for that very reason their sister's mind would gain enormously and show signs of wonderful development."

"You see, it's like this, great Master," murmured the old man rather querulously. "The elder boy is mad about architecture and about carving, while the younger thinks of nothing but what Friar Bacon has lately written or is likely to write; and the moment the poor girl feels sympathetic towards the artist brother, the other one, the younger one, gets indignant and begins railing against God and the church; and this of course sets the elder one off upon his particular hobby-horse, and they argue with each other just as, we are always being told, you great doctors of divinity dispute together, about essences and qualities and aspects and substances and forms, and how powerful angels are, and how crafty devils are, and whether the world had a beginning and whether it will have an end: and the result of all this is just the very opposite of what you have just now suggested; for the dear girl — and she is, I tell you, my lord, the sweetest and loveliest creature you ever saw — begins to hate the whole subject and to wish she'd been born a Mohammedan, or a Buddhist, or anything rather than a Christian."

"You will, I hope," threw in Albert of Cologne eagerly, for he recognized at once that he was on dangerous ground; and he didn't fail to notice that this peace-loving old gentleman, who wandered a little in his mind, had a deep tenderness for this young maiden who was the betrothed of Raymond de Laon, "you will, I hope, forgive an impertinent and even a discourteous question, but I'd be very thankful if you'd tell me what it was in the relations between this maid of whom you speak and her brother Tilton, the builder and sculptor with his own hands of a shrine to Our Lady, that made it possible for Bonaventura to accuse them of the terrible sin of incest?"

To his great relief this daring, rude, and even outrageous question did not seem to trouble the old ex-bailiff in the very least.

"O that's easily explained, great Doctor! Searching round in the ardent spirit of a born sculptor for some living model for the figure of Our Lady that he was so anxious to carve for the shrine he was building, it naturally came into his head to make use of the perfect form and heavenly features of his chaste and beautiful sister.

"But when this accurst Bonaventura saw Master Tilton's Blessed Virgin holding the Holy Babe, he commanded those bandits from Lost Towers to hammer the whole thing to bits! You may well indeed look horrified, O greatest of all Churchly Doctors, but I haven't sat here since my retirement from office, with the lady Lil-Umbra visiting me daily, and Master Tilton and Master John, one or the other of them, coming in to see me pretty well once a week, without learning something of what goes on; learning, I mean, what historians learn by living after the event, only I've been learning it by watching the event closely and yet watching it from a certain distance while it was going on.

"And I can tell you this, great Doctor — and do you, as Master John, who has been trying to learn Greek, says Homer always says, 'and do you lay it to heart' — all persons, whether male or female, who make it the chief object of their lives to seek out and uncover sexual sins and sexual obliquities in other persons, are themselves — and you can perceive it, O most renowned Doctor, in their countenance, especially in their mouths and nostrils and eyes — are themselves just the very ones to be most easily assailed by an itching desire to enjoy the very same lecherous sensations which they are so anxious to condemn.

"Now, O mighty Sage, please accept my word. The moment I encountered this Bonaventura at close quarters, I knew at once from the man's eyes and mouth and lips and nostrils that he was the sort of person who could easily be completely obsessed by sexual lust. What sins this man has committed in his own life I have not of course, O great one from Cologne, any way of knowing. But this I can tell you and this I do know; though being a little shaky in my mind from old age, you must take what I tell you with your own reservations. This abominable legend about Lil-Umbra and Tilton is simply the outward and visible expression of the viciousness of the fellow's own nature."

These final words of the ex-bailiff were uttered with such intensity that the face of his hearer, which was as much a hieroglyph of sympathy as, according to the old man, Bonaventura's was of lechery, positively became a quivering crow's beak of concentrated attention.

"I would like to know very much indeed, O most renowned of doctors," went on the old man, "just what you feel about this matter of Roger Bacon's influence over young people, like our mutual friend Raymond de Laon and like Lady Lil-Umbra's brother John. Do you consider that this Friar, who is such an adept in all these new scientific inventions, has a good or a bad influence over our younger generation? Whether because of the presence of That Thing" — and the old man gave a significant jerk of his shoulder in the direction of the object indicated— "or because of this wicked lie invented by Bonaventura, or simply because I've been more impressed than ever of late by the goodness and sweetness of Lady Lil-Umbra, I've been thinking a great deal about Friar Roger and his new science; and I've come to the conclusion, mighty Doctor, that there's a change coming over the whole of Christendom — I might go so far as to say over the whole world — and I've decided that it's the duty of all of us who are believers, to think out carefully for ourselves what our position is.

"It was all very well when we were young to just repeat the lessons taught us by our parents or by our priest or in our school, but when we become men — that's what I've been thinking lately in this old armoury of ours, great master — we ought to 'put away', as holy scripture says, 'childish things'; and not only so, but we ought to examine, yes! examine down to the very bottom, all our inherited presumptions, suppositions, and beliefs, everything in fact to which we've become accustomed, everything that we now take for granted; yes, examine it all, examine it over and over again from the very start, rejecting this and retaining that, as our separate, independent, individual spirit tells us, for it is our individual spirit that, at the bottom of everything, is, and always will — —"

He was interrupted in his speech, and the magnate from Cologne was interrupted in his sympathetic listening by the sudden opening of the armoury door and the entrance of none other than the gigantic Mongolian Jew, Peleg. Peleg walked with slow deliberate steps straight to where the two men were seated, and addressed himself to the ex-bailiff.

"Lady Val has sent me, sir," he said, "to convey you, if you will be good enough to allow me to help you, to my lord's Little Room. My lady wishes me to say that her first thought was to have the two young masters' beds moved there for the night, but my lord felt strongly that you would yourself prefer the Little Room to any other and feel more independent there. You will be, my lady wished me to say, quite as comfortable there, perhaps more comfortable than you are here in the armoury."

The relief on the face of the old man at hearing this news was so evident to Albertus Magnus, that this latter suppressed his instinctive inclination to make a polite apology for being so anxious to spend the night quite alone with the Image of Brass.

"If," he thought, "I make a fuss about any of this business, I shall be only confusing the issue. What I want is to have this armoury to myself for just one night — to myself along with this man-created man — if that's what you are!" and he shot at the Brazen Head a challenging and yet a pitying glance before turning his half-scouring, half-cleansing, and altogether benevolent little eyes upon the gigantic Peleg.

"The little room!" cried the old man. "Nothing in this place could please me better! And, Peleg, old friend, I am indeed perfectly ready to go there at once if you will give me your support."

Without further speech, and with one of Peleg's powerful arms round his shoulder, the old man rose stiffly to his feet, and laying his left hand with a sublime indifference to this weird entity's claim to be a living soul, upon the shoulder of the Brazen Head, as if it had been the wooden back of a negligible bench in some public hall-way, he offered his right hand to Albert of Cologne.

"We shall meet, your — your — your Eminence," he murmured, clearly regarding their visitor as a Papal Legate, or at least as a Cardinal, "and then we shall, I hope, be able to finish our conversation."

Albert of Cologne looked at him with all that humorous tenderness he liked to think he had learnt from Jesus. "I shan't forget, you may be sure," he said, "the exact point we've reached in our talk! Peleg here can well imagine," and he gave Peleg a subtly-charged smile, as if he'd known him for years rather than was now seeing him for the first time, "just what we were discussing! and perhaps you wouldn't," he added, "mind telling the Lady Valentia that I feel too exhausted to require any dinner tonight, and shall soon take advantage of the excellent bed I see ready for me. And no doubt I shall dream of all the wonderful people and of all the amazing things I shall encounter tomorrow."

With these final words he lowered himself in his chair, thrust out his heels with a somnolent leathery sound across the reed-woven rug in front of him, and closed his eyes, while Peleg in dutiful silence led the ex-bailiff from the room.

Into the deep quiet that followed their departure Albertus sank down, as if into the original ocean of silence out of which all sounds first sprang. Sleep was certainly what the man from Cologne needed, and he must have slept till not only the light of that long June afternoon was over, but its evening twilight too; for, when he awoke, the armoury was nearly dark.

As soon as he was on his feet, however, the first thing he looked at, by the light of the small uncovered oil-lamp that stood in front of it, was a tiny image of the Virgin, which had been a gift to the ex-bailiff by his grandmother in his childhood and which was very precious to him.

What, to confess the truth, made it especially precious to him was the fact that his little sister — who was his only youthful companion, for his parents had no other children — had once, in one of her moods, whether a mood of skittishness or of naughtiness, or because she had overheard it in some argument between priests, carved in big letters, clear across the base of the little image, the single word Parthenogenesis.

Moira had been drowned in the river Wey and her body carried out to sea before she was fourteen, and the ex-bailiff's son, Randolph, had steadily refused, probably because of some prejudice of his wife against the child's name, which is Greek for Destiny or Fate, to use it for any of his own daughters, of whom he had several. So nowhere upon earth save in her brother's heart, and in the exquisite trouble she herself had taken to form those fifteen letters, did there exist any memorial of the little carver of that big word.

It certainly was not of those significant syllables, nor of the question as to who had inscribed them upon that small image, that Albertus Magnus of Cologne was thinking as, by the help of the flame at that tiny shrine, he lit the chief light of the armoury and began making his preparations for the night. Once safe in bed, with an excellent pillow under his throbbing skull, and the armoury-light turned low, and a couple of warm blankets over him, he gazed steadily at the Brazen Head.

"If you can manage for me to spend one night entirely alone with the Head," he had told Raymond de Laon, "I will most certainly come."

Well! Here he was, alone with It, and there were four or five hours of total darkness in front of him and no apparent danger of any interruption to whatever communion of body, mind, or even spirit he could bring about between this man-created Being and himself.

Albertus had by nature an outward-working mind, and his natural urge to talk, to teach, to write, to read, to direct, to examine, to explore, to plan, to construct, to build, to organise, to reform, to originate, was so powerful that it was extremely difficult — O much worse than difficult! — extremely repulsive and even loathsome to him to indulge in any sort of introspection.

It was pain and grief to him to analyse his own thoughts, feelings, impressions, and reactions. He might have been bolder in this direction, if he had not known by instinct that there were sleeping devils in the intricate corridors of his mind that it would be dangerous to disturb. He was indeed continuously aware of a particular region in his response to life that held a dark, ultimate, indescribable horror for him.

It was in fact so horrible that it was imperative for him to avoid this region of his mind at all costs. It was a region which, if he couldn't steer his way round it, and, as far as this was humanly possible, forget it, and behave as if it didn't exist, would eventually by the pressure of its sheer horror disintegrate his whole intelligence.

It is perfectly possible for an energetic and powerfully galvanic will to win renown for its owner, while the deepest part of the personality which that towering will-power has to carry along with it, just as a swiftly driving chariot might have to carry in the belly of its body a writhing and squirming serpent, may be secretly twitching and quivering with all manner of maniacal distastes and repugnances.

"All my life," thought Albertus Magnus, "I've been escaping from myself. What I've been always secretly afraid of is neither God nor the Devil, neither man nor beast: it is simply and solely myself!"

He had grown so accustomed to make certain deeply intimate and yet automatic debouchings and deviations from the direct path in his consciousness of life, so as to dodge, and carefully circumnavigate, and craftily avoid, all those places where his most fearful personal mania and most horrified shrinking would be brought into play, that it was a dangerous shock to him to find that the presence of the Brazen Head disturbed this wise habit.

The only companion, whether male or female, to whom he had ever given a hint of this lake of horror in a secret valley of his soul, was Thomas Aquinas, with whom he had shared lodgings in more than one great seat of learning, and of whom he would retort when the others ridiculed Thomas as a dumb ox, “when this dumb ox starts bellowing, he’ll make the whole world listen.” But we can well believe that it would not have been easy to make a young metaphysician of Thomas’s calibre realize the existence of such a background to his adored teacher’s lively lessons.

But whether Thomas Aquinas realized before he died — for the master outlived the pupil by several years — all that the great Albert’s benevolent energy concealed behind its absorbing and compelling instruction, there can be little doubt that this supreme teacher’s frightful necessity to keep his own nervous malady in the background had something to do with the desperate fervour of his way of teaching.

The more passionately and comprehendingly he could follow and interpret the subtle distinctions in theology, the further he was able to withdraw himself from that appalling lake of horror in the secret depths of his own mind.

What he found himself wondering now — as with rather a troublesome effort he squeezed the thickest of his two pillows under the back of his own head and stared at the Head of Brass — was why the word, that he had by chance noticed inscribed in childish capital letters on that little image of the Blessed Virgin, kept hovering on the intervening air, like faint streaks of splashed blood, between himself and the expressionless countenance of the Brazen Head.

"But surely," he thought, "in the creation of that Image and in the elaborate workmanship or exquisite machinery that he gave to it," here he jerked his own head forward almost defiantly— "yes! I'm talking of you, you new Adam, you Adam of wires and wheels and screws and scuttles, and I'm telling you now, here and now, that what your man-maker forgot when he wound you up was the touch of a Virgin!"

What happened then was a volcano-like explosion of feeling, an explosion to which both Magnus and the Brazen Head must have contributed something. The accumulation of force which burst at that moment drew from Albertus, in one whole rush, all the smouldering depths of the spirit with which he had for the best years of his life flooded the gaping arteries of his devoted pupils; while the imprisoned demonic power in the Brazen Head, which seemed only to have been waiting an opportunity to escape, burst forth to meet what the other was giving.

It was not until much later that Albertus was able to offer — to himself we must understand — some kind of an account of what happened. He felt as if the whole dark, enormous, inscrutable mass of blackish-greyish matter, which Aristotle called "Hulee", and which the philosopher and many of his disciples held was eternal, indestructible, and without beginning, was now around him on every side. He could see it, he could feel it, he could smell it, and it was bearing him up, up, up, on the titanic curves of an agglomeration of merciless substance!

Wildly and desperately Albertus realized that the material substance of his own body had begun to grow larger and larger; and as he was carried upward he became frantically and dizzily aware that in front of him was only empty Space, yes! Space absolutely empty, leading on and on and on, with no limit and without an end!

And then suddenly he spoke to himself in a still small voice. “Albert, old friend,” he said to himself, “there’s no need for you to be alone in Space like this. You have forgotten what all creatures ought never to forget. You have forgotten that there is also Time.”

And at the thought of Time — Time that can reduce Space by measuring the segments of it, Time that can remember backwards to wherever man has been or might have been, Time that can imagine forwards to wherever man will be or could be, Time that’s our friendly and customary home, Time that belonged to our fathers before us and will belong to our children after us, Time that clothes us as with familiar raiment and nourishes us as with bread and wine, Time that gives us a bed to sleep on, Time that gives us a tent to cover us and a fire to warm us — Albertus of Cologne had no sooner uttered these words in a low voice, himself speaking to himself, than lo and behold! he was back again in the armoury of the Fortress, back again with his thickest pillow squeezed under his neck, back again with the flickering blood-stained letters of the word Parthenogenesis hovering in the darkness between himself and the Brazen Head.

And he was only aware of being back again, for a second or two of submission to Time, the magic power which had delivered him, when he was lost, to all that was and all that might be, in a deep and dreamless sleep.

XIX. MASTER PETER PEREGRINUS

IT WAS NOT until the late summer of the year of grace 1272 that Petrus Peregrinus of Picardy approached the channel between France and England with the intention of crossing to the district in this latter country, where his scientific rival Roger Bacon was still incarcerated. He had been supporting himself in his usual manner, till what he called his "experiments in magnetism" brought him serious enemies, and so discomforted the local authorities as to endanger his freedom of movement. It was then that he decided upon a bold move.

In plain words he joined, for the time being, and with an understanding that he could leave it whenever he wished, no less important a body of European soldiers than one of the divisions of the King of France. He took service in this particular body of men not from any hostility to the Swiss or the Spanish or the Portuguese or the Italians or the Germans, but purely from a desire to earn money which he could save up and spend on leisure to study magnetism and to write a treatise on it.

He had been in luck this particular summer; for though the force he chose to join had had nothing to do with any crusade, nor had been used for any important campaign, it had been posted in a part of the country where there was a constant demand for military aid in the protection of rich farmers and of their flocks and their barns from wandering bands of marauders, whose extreme destitution had made them freebooters.

Petrus had given himself up to all manner of mad dreams while his camp was moved from place to place; but in one way and another he had saved up quite a little hoard of such silver pieces as were exchangeable coins, if not current coins, in most of the countries of Europe.

It was on a hot day in late summer, and he had reached a little circular valley in Savoy, when an event occurred that was of importance in his life. He suddenly came upon a cross-road hut in the centre of this little valley, which was inhabited by a couple of persons who were so aged as to look barely human. He had been along this border of Savoy before but had never before passed through this particular valley, but it was here he was destined to receive, or here that pure chance flung upon him, an inspiration of a very curious kind.

Whether this inspiration came from an angel, and had an angelic purpose behind it, or came from a devil, and had a diabolic purpose behind it, it would be impossible to say. But either, if for the nonce we rule pure chance out of it as the arbiter of such events, was certainly possible.

An angelic power might very well have decided that, before Peter Peregrinus had continued his tortuous career for another day, it would be good for the world in general if it were cut short. On the other hand a devilish power might easily have come to the conclusion that there was nobody on earth at this hour who, if only preserved alive for a few moons longer, could work so much harm to the human race as this traveller from Picardy.

“What do you call your turnpike corner?” enquired Peter of this couple of age-stricken ones, as they sat side by side on a wooden bench, filling a big wooden bucket with a mess of sour milk and mouldy bread and bad potatoes, while a big bristling sow of a yellowish colour uplifted her snout from a hollow place scooped out of the ground before them.

“What does the lord on his feet say?” enquired the antiquity who wore male clothes, addressing the antiquity who wore female clothes.

The woman made no reply to this question. But she rose to her feet and held out a long skinny arm with a regular birds' claw at the end of it.

"Give silver, great lord of the highway," she murmured huskily in a queer French patois: "and me yes! even me, will give you the magic word for your long travel."

The enormous head of Peter of Maricourt moved a little, or perhaps we ought to say drooped a little forward, while from the white expanse of his face, like the sting of a creature that might have stung itself to death in the days of the father of Abraham, protruded the sharp tip of a presumably human tongue.

His black eyes seemed to the companion of the female antiquity, who still kept opening and closing her extended fingers, to flow into each other till they ceased to be two bottomless blacknesses and became one. But whether they were one or two, they evidently read in the Cretan Maze of feminine wrinkles upon which they were now concentrated that that seemingly dried up fountain of wisdom had a tap that was well worth tapping.

"Yes, by Satan," the traveller must have thought, "I'll get something out of you!" for he was not only nodding with his head now, but he was also searching in the lining of his jerkin.

At last he brought out a couple of silver coins, a big one and a little one. These he turned over in his fingers many times, so as to make sure the woman saw just what they were and the difference between them. Having satisfied himself that both these things had been observed, he negligently flipped the edges of the two pieces of silver together and permitted his own raptorial orbs to relapse into their respective hollows, while they took in the geographical position of this most pitiful of all possible turnpikes.

He soon became aware that the narrow road he had come by, and the three radiating roads now offering themselves as rivals for his next move, were all sloping upwards. And the queer thing was that, while there were occasional trees, some big, some small, some deciduous, some coniferous, along the edges of all these roads, the ridge or rim of the shallow grassy basin out of which they all led and over which they all vanished into the void or into the clouds, was entirely bare, bare of gorse or bracken or blackthorn, so nakedly bare that it was possible even to note the varying height of particular patches of ordinary meadow grass.

"Why is it," the man asked himself, "that to stand at the bottom of a shallow bowl like this and look up at its grassy rim, about half a mile, I suppose, from this hut, gives me such complete acceptance of my fate as I feel at this moment? If my fate had been totally different from what it is, I mean different from the fate of being the Antichrist, who has been prophesied of as long as the Christ has been prophesied of, should I, I wonder, feel this same acceptance of it simply from staring up at this rim of grass?

"If, for instance I'd been a Jewish youth like Moses and had come here straight from a vision of the burning bush, with the voice of Jehovah issuing from it and the revelation that it was my fate to lead Israel out of Egypt, should I be feeling this same calm acceptance of such a fate as I feel now when I fall into my role as the self-appointed antagonist of Jesus? Is there perhaps a revelation of some planetary Anangkee, or sublime Necessity, in the mere presence of a naked rondure of earth and grass like this against the whole of empty Space?"

With this thought and with this spectacle in his mind, Petrus Peregrinus returned the larger of the two silver coins to the folds of his jerkin and handed the smaller one to the woman, who clutched it, and proceeded to bite it with what were obviously the only teeth in her head that were opposite each other.

Clearly satisfied with the sensation in her mouth caused by this action, she opened with a metallic snap a small receptacle fastened to a leather belt round her waist and slipped the coin inside.

"And now," cried Petrus Peregrinus, fumbling with a bag in the lining of his jerkin adjoining the abode of his special treasure the loadstone. Presently he produced from this receptacle a small live slow-worm, at the sight of which the woman in front of him was seized with panic, and leaving her seat crouched down behind her mate, who groaned and shut his eyes.

All Petrus did however was to fling the slow-worm into the uplifted jaws of the great sow, who promptly bit off its head. Nobody but Petrus saw the pitiful flap which the tail of the slow-worm made to avoid following its head down the sow's throat. These are the things that, if they can only be seen by the right person, lead to some very curious conclusions as to the mystery of life. For as the sow lay down to digest what it had swallowed, the decapitated tail, without wriggling at all and with a final motion of infinite relaxation, as if it were thankfully joining the vast army of exhausted organisms whose reckless, desperate, and aggressive "heads" have flung them aside, stretched out to welcome eternal rest.

"And now," murmured Petrus Peregrinus, "I shall leave you, and take the road to the nearest port for the Isle of Britain where I have a greater conquest to achieve than you — or he — —" and he nodded at the old man with closed eyes— "or you either, old lady — —" and with the handle of his sheathed sword-dagger he prodded the sow's back— "could possibly understand. And that" — and he pointed to the continuation, over the rim of the valley, of the road by which he had come, "that will be the way I shall go."

With this he turned his back upon them all, upon the old man, whose whole conscious personality seemed devoted to the task of allowing nothing to make him open his eyes, upon the sow who was clearly finding the digestion of a small saurian head an occupation both peaceful and soothing, upon the absolutely motionless body of the decapitated slow-worm, against which, as against the side of a Leviathan, two small insects were already tentatively extending their minute feelers, and finally upon the old lady, who, as she watched that small dark figure — for his soldier's cap was black, his jerkin was black, a heavy velvet cloak he carried on his arm was black, his stockings and wooden shoes were black, while the blackest of all was his one single weapon, that half-sword, half-dagger, which he left in its sheath and used as a short staff to support his steps on any uphill road — uttered from the depths of her whole being the oldest of all European curses.

It wasn't till he was just not quite out of hearing that the old woman stretched out both her arms to give full expression to this malediction. With the fingers of both her hands tightly closed she repeated the word Erre!

"Erre! Erre!" she cried over and over again, pronouncing each syllable of the word with peculiar emphasis.

Petrus of Maricourt turned quickly enough when he caught those two syllables upon the air. In Picardy, as well as in Savoy, and of course everywhere along the shore of the Mediterranean, that phrase was used to express loathing and bitter contempt. So there was the magic word that he had stopped so long at that turn-pike hovel to extract from its witch-wife! Erre! And the word was the very same curse that had been heard in all the harbours of all the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean and Aegean since the days of Homer.

Petrus Peregrinus hadn't been a traveller in all parts of Europe for nothing, and he had often pondered on the mystery of this word with its deadly rush of execration— "Get out of here, you rat, you maggot, you worm, you abomination, you lump of filth!" — and he knew well that it had been allowed to remain in all the most authoritative texts of the Homeric manuscripts, and must have been passed, not only by the Athenian censors of the days of King Peisistratus of Athens, but by the far more particular censors of the Library of Alexandria and by the tremendous scholars who revised the "Codex Marcianus" in the Library of San Marco in Venice.

He made no retort to it at this moment however; but every time he pressed his scabbarded sword-dagger into the ground to support his steps over the rim of the basin-like declivity from which he was now rapidly emerging, he concentrated his whole soul upon a solemn covenant he was now making with himself.

"It has become clear to me," murmured his inmost heart communing with itself, "that my chief enemy at this moment among the righteous is Albertus of Cologne. He seems to have got some secretus secretorum out of the raw material of the Aristotelian "hulee", of which the universe is made, that enables him to cast some sort of spell over his pupils. He's been having with him of late, and they say they live together in the same lodging, which always gives a teacher a special personal influence over a young man, that eccentric silent youth with a big head who is called Aquinas. Yes! I know what you want me to do, my darling little Rod of Power!"

And the weak-legged, black-garbed, black-capped, wooden-booted climber upwards clutched, as he mounted the rim of the depression, the lodestone in the slit of his breeches.

"You want me to go straight to this great donkey of Cologne, who makes friends not with handsome young people but with great head-heavy lunatics, who think of nothing but dovetailing fantastical dogmas, and when I'm face to face with this double-dyed idiot, you want me to let you loose on him, to make him skip a bit! Don't tell me that's not what you want, for I know very well it is! But listen to me, my precious little Baton of Power. You're the Wand of Merlin the Brython. You're the Rod of Moses the Israelite. You're the finger that Jehovah lifted when He bade the World leap up like a fish out of Nothing.

"But though you are all you are, little Push-Pin of Omnipotence, the fact remains that, if I am to win in this contest with Albertus Magnus in this arena of this amphitheatre of the universe, I must confront the fellow face to face.

"Well, little soul-prick of the world's gizzard, you think that's impossible don't you? And you think since it is impossible, you and I will have to find another way of getting round this beggar and outwitting him! But let me tell you now, my Magnet of Satan, it's not impossible. I've just heard — never you mind how or by whom! — that he's been invited by Roger Bacon — yes! by Friar Bacon himself, Push-Pin, my devilkin! and you take note of that! — to go and see for himself that Brazen Head magicked into life by Brother Bacon. So that's where you and I come in, little lovely, and so let Holy Jesus beware!"

The small dark figure with his black military boots, black military cap, and black sheathed weapon to support his weak legs, was now well across the rim of the geological earth-circle over which that Homeric "Erre! Erre!" of the old woman had hurried him.

Looking round at all he saw and at how the highway he was following was losing itself in a distance that he knew well was westward and seaward, our resolute antagonist of the Christian religion, whom many people would have described as a grotesque little idiot but whom Paul of Tarsus and Jesus of Nazareth would have taken as seriously as he took himself, plucked now from out of his garments the magic lodestone with which he hoped to frustrate the whole Revelation. Rubbing it up and down against the tight black garments that covered his emaciated flanks, just as if he were sharpening a butcher's knife, he proceeded to stretch the thing out to the full length of his arm and began working it up and down as if he were actually making a slit in some vast, invisible, planetary tent, through which when once his stabber, his prodder, his love-piercer, his hope-drainer, his life-borer, his faith-rinser, his root-sucker, his magnet of universal destruction had found its way, it might really hurt and wound and injure whatever universe or multiverse there might be outside and beyond our world.

Once clear of this whole district and aiming for the channel between France and England, our peregrinating Antichrist pursued his future movements with what really was uncommonly careful consideration. Having made straight for the channel, he followed the French coast harbour by harbour, till he hit upon the precise sort of vessel he wanted sailing direct to a Wessex port.

All went well, just as he hoped, and it was not until he had actually disembarked that any trouble came, and when trouble did come, it came from out of his own head, and not from any external event. How it came, why it came, and what made it come, Petrus had not then, and never had afterwards, any clear idea.

It came suddenly out of his memory, as he stood on the shore after waving farewell to the ship that had brought him there: and it came to him just as if somebody else were telling the story, somebody, however, who knew his thoughts and feelings with a perfectly terrible exactitude, somebody in fact who was uncomfortably like God.

What came to him was his memory of a certain occasion when, with other French soldiers, he was being conveyed in a French ship along the shores of Palestine not far from the Port of Acre. Here, because of something he had done or had not done, the ship's commander had had him thrown overboard.

He had not clung very long, however, to an overturned boat which happened to drift past him, when he suddenly found himself close under the bows of the grandest British vessel that in all his peregrinations he had ever beheld. That this vessel was English there could be no doubt, and that it carried on board some extremely important, perhaps even some royal personage seemed more than likely.

"Can it be Lord Edward's ship?" he thought; and in a shorter time than it would have taken him to consult his lodestone, which he always treated as a familiar spirit, he found himself hauled on board this formidable vessel and confronted with its royal voyager who, as he had predicted, was indeed no other than Lord Edward himself, the heir to the British throne.

The whole interview that followed took place on the main deck of this crusading vessel.

"I thought you were right, Gunter," Lord Edward muttered, addressing the master of the vessel, a man whose most marked propensity was the power of becoming nothing, and a predilection for becoming nothing, or as near nothing as it was possible for a native of the harbour of Weymouth, near the ancient city of Durnovaria, with a handsome wife and a dozen children, to become.

"My sailor-friend here," went on the warrior-prince, addressing Petrus now, but practising as he spoke, just as if he were quite alone, some particular gesture in the difficult art of slinging, “assures me that his wife has relatives in Picardy and that he felt quite certain, from the tone of your voice just now when you answered him from the sea, that you were from that part of the world. Is that so, master? Well, in any case,” — and Edward turned a shrewd glance upon the vessel from which Petrus had been flung, and which was now making use of every inch of sail it possessed to get quickly away— “your friends aren’t waiting for you! May I ask what your business is? Or are you, as seems more likely from your looks, now that I see you close, travelling to London from some foreign court? Are you perhaps from Madrid or from — —”

Their conversation was interrupted by a series of piercing and painful screams, and Edward turned angrily to the ship’s captain whom he had addressed as “Gunter”. “Haven’t I told you I won’t have that man allowed to make that noise! Didn’t I tell you to tie him up so that he can’t scream? Its all in the way he’s tied, I tell you! The point I insist on is that he should suffer pain; but that doesn’t mean that I want to hear his shrieks. In fact if he’s tied so that he can’t shriek, he’ll suffer a lot more. To shriek is a relief. That’s why Nature lets us indulge in it. I trust you haven’t forgotten, Gunter, quite all I ordered. I am accustomed to being obeyed at sea as promptly as on land. That man deliberately disobeyed me, and he must suffer till he has learnt his lesson!”

It was almost as if the sea itself, with the whole weight of the steel-green purple-shadowed mass of its salt water, had risen up to protest against this haughty announcement; for a terrific wave curved up out of the deep at that point and completely drowned both the screams from below and the exchange of words between the Lord Edward and Master Gunter and Peter of Maricourt.

But it may easily be believed that the last named had not missed the rough brutality with which the future ruler of England had referred to this victim of his violent temper; and as he gazed at him now while all three of them were watched rather humorously by a couple of sailors, his own bodily longing to change his clothes became far less important to him than a rush of purely emotional feeling that quivered through every nerve of his body, a rush of desperate hatred of this powerful, dominating, ruggedly handsome, battle-loving, strong-willed Lord Edward.

And under the power of this blind rush of emotional hatred which he longed to gratify by some spectacular use of his precious lodestone, he realised that this was a crisis in his life.

"Yes," he thought, "may my soul burn in hell if I don't give this great English bully something to make him remember those screams."

But as he watched him closely and dallied with the instrument pressed against his own body, it came over him with the unutterable force of a premonition totally beyond the range of his own fighting spirit, that it would be useless to try to work by magnetism the death of this particular tyrant.

"But wait a moment" — he felt as if these words were reaching him out of the air— "What about this hammering bully's offspring? He's the King's son. Will not his son be King also when the time comes? And how unlikely, how almost impossible, as the world goes, it would be for the son of a man of iron like this, a back-breaker and a skull-cracker, a master of armies and a sacker of cities, to be born like his begetter, or, if the child were a girl, for her to be a stirrer up of savagery and slaughter! So listen, Lodestone darling! Don't you agree with me, you precious little heart-breaker, life-piercer, lava-flinger, angel-slayer, blow-them-up-alive? Surely you do, my darlingest of little volcanoes? Surely you do? Very well then, my pretty one! The covenant's signed and sealed twixt thee and me. What we'll do is to lie in wait for the feeble offspring of our great shark; and when we've got him we'll fix him! We'll follow him up all his life — or if we're dead our spirits shall — and he shall die screaming!"

It was a curious thing — indeed it was what we pathetic tribes of mortals love to call "one of those things" — that almost simultaneously with Petrus's private talk with his lodestone, Master Gunter, who had gone below, came up again, and going straight up to Lord Edward, announced the death of the man who had been screaming. But that was not all, for there suddenly fell in the midst of the three of them, slam-bang upon the deck, the bleeding, mangled body of a small sea-bird that had been suddenly seized by a roving sea-hawk ready for any mouthful but not inclined to pause for a substantial meal.

The sanguinary slap that the fall of this small feathered corpse made upon the deck, and the shrill wail from the creature's mate that followed it, shook Petrus out of his diffidence to such a degree that he boldly asked Master Gunter whether he could give him a berth and have his clothes dried; and it was almost within touch of the man who had just paid the last penalty for defying the ruler not only of the land, but of the waves of the sea, that Peter of Picardy fell asleep that night hugging his lodestone.

XX. THE CERNE GIANT

IT WAS OF these events that our student of magnetism was thinking now, as he stood staring for almost five minutes at the uneven curves of the sea-tide's advances and retreats, as if he were listening to an invisible Brazen Head reporting these things to a mixed court of celestial and infernal judges. When, however, he shook off his memories, he found himself on the edge of a series of wide-stretching reedy swamps, interspersed with estuaries of salt water where wind-tossed alders and wind-swept willows led to lonely huts on flat marshy levels, only separated from the sea by desolate sand-dunes, whose human inhabitants lived on the finned and feathered natives they snared and slew.

Peter of Maricourt was in his most natural element here, for the human beings he encountered had for so many hundreds of years been accustomed to just such predatory explorers that they were as little surprised by the strange appearance of some of them as by the weird accents of others, or by the extraordinary weapons used by yet more unusual apparitions.

As may well be imagined a large portion of the retainers of Lost Towers had been supplied from dwellers in this sea-bordering marsh-land which was inserted, so to say, along that coast between high-rolling chalk hills like a wet wide-open entrance-gate between towering walls.

Lilith of Lost Towers found most of her female intimates in the human hovels sprinkled along these desolate haunts of unusual sea-birds interspersed with wild geese and wild ducks. Nor was it unnatural that this strange maiden herself should in some of her moods, when out of touch it might be with both her parents, pay lengthy visits to these intimates of her own sex in these lonely places.

“As it happened however,” so the wisest chroniclers, who are also the humblest, are always being reduced to admitting, Lilith’s chief confederate didn’t live in the midst of these sea-marshes but on the edge of a quite different stretch of country. This was an expanse of rough, wild moorland, covered with heather, which, as long at any rate as local memory went, had been regarded as once belonging to the ancient Welsh god or king whose name was Llyr or Lear. The woman in this case was Mother Wurzel, who lived in the part of this moor and from which there was a rider’s track leading to what was once the important Roman city of Durnovaria, where Lilith’s friend as a practiser of both black and white magic had clients of many different sorts.

Petrus Peregrinus had visited the rather unusual abode of Mother Wurzel more than once in his expeditions through Wessex, for it was his practice, when he had too soon exhausted the money he had earned by soldiering, to make use of the innumerable tricks which his pet lodestone could play to keep him in bread and in cheese and in wine.

The habitation of Mother Wurzel was founded upon a very small circle of tall upright stones. The stones must have originally come from the isle of Portland, but they looked as if before being brought here they had stood in a much wider circle; for they had a rather uneasy expression, as if they were not receiving their due of respect in their present crowded and somewhat humiliating position.

And yet the maker of this queer habitation cannot have been totally indifferent to the elements of dignity and beauty, for great care had been taken with regard to making the superstructure harmonize with this queer base. The space within the circle had been given a smooth marble floor and a roof arched as carefully as the crypt of a cathedral, and there had been placed over that one single wooden chamber entirely built of oak. The first time Petrus entered this dwelling, which was called Deadstone, he enquired of Mother Wurzel how on earth she had got possession of it; and she explained that it really belonged to the Lord of Lost Towers, but that he, under his daughter's influence, had made it over in perpetuity to herself as his daughter's friend.

Having got safely clear of the formidable Lord Edward, it didn't take the wanderer from Picardy very long to reach Deadstone, and after an enjoyable night there, for Mother Wurzel's middled-aged daughter, whose name was Puggie-Wuggie, had more deliciously wicked little ways when once you had her by your side in bed than any feminine being Petrus had ever known, he was allowed the privilege of meeting Lilith herself.

When once these two were together, however, things moved more crucially; and everything, at least for our student of magnetism, became much more complicated. In the first place there happened to him something that had never happened to him in his life before. He became completely infatuated with this fatal young lady.

The scrupulous chronicler of these agitating events has to endeavour in his narration of them to proceed as cautiously and meticulously as the events themselves seemed to be proceeding. As always with the actual impacts of life, there were so many different currents joining our special stream of events that this same stream was constantly being thickened here and thinned there, darkened here and lightened there, rendered bluish here and greenish there, and even splashed, it might be, with horrifying drops of blood at certain other places in its course.

At least that is how it all presented itself to Peter of Maricourt; and it did so with such ever-increasing, and now and then with such overlapping, overwhelming, overpowering, and almost drowning force, that he felt as he looked at her that, whether she yielded to his obsession or whether she didn't yield to his obsession, it was now quite as important to him to remain in sight of her as it was to know that he, the gate-keeper's son in the manor of Maricourt, was really and truly the long rumoured, long predicted, long prophesied Antichrist of sacred tradition.

The little red point of Peter's tongue didn't stay quiet any longer within the inner side of its menacing port-cullis. It came out; or, as a more elegant historian would say, it issued forth. What in plain words it did, this tongue of the enemy of Christ, was to lick both its upper lip and its lower lip, a proceeding that would have been a staggering sight for Peter's only friend, his precious lodestone, if that object, now pressed so nervously against its owner's organ of generation, had possessed the power of vision.

"You are asking me, my beautiful one," he was now saying to Lilith, "what I want you to do for me at this juncture. Well! I'll tell you exactly what's in my mind. I think the thing for us to do is to go as quickly as possible to the Fortress, while this ex-bishop from Cologne is still there.

"Since I've found out how perfectly beautiful and irresistible you are, it has come over me that if I want to stop this man's interference with everybody's affairs in this part of the world — and you know how deep the gulf has already grown — down to the centre of the universe — between Bonaventura, and his dicegames with Satan, and Friar Bacon and his attempts to change the creative methods of God by getting some parcener of Eve to help him in the making of Adam. You know of course, my beautiful one, the difficulties we have to surmount if we really are to put a stop to this man's meddling? But here is my plan, my dear, if you'll help me to carry it out.

“In the first place we’ve got to pretend that we are horrified, beyond all expression, by this assault on Bacon’s Brazen Image, which must be to us of course the work of a loyal believer in Christ; and not only so but must contain within itself a splash, a spark, a breath, a sip, a sigh, a bubble, a dewdrop of that Spirit they believe in, who, at Pentecost, descended from Heaven in the shape of a thousand flames of fire and lodged on the heads of a crazy crowd of Jewish madmen.

“Of course it was in the shape of a dove that the Thing descended on Jesus himself at his baptism in Jordan. But by the time of Pentecost Jesus was already ‘ascended’, and when this Ghost they call ‘Holy’ ‘descended’, it came as a sort of Substitute for Jesus to keep things going till the event they call the ‘Crack of Doom’ or the ‘Last Day’.”

While Petrus was thus lecturing her on what, if they were to be successful in destroying it all, it was necessary for them to know, he was embracing her with every portion of his mind and not a few portions of his body.

“What we’ve got to do, my loveliest of all possible Eves, is to remember how long these confounded doctors of the church have been confusing our brains with their absurd problems about the embryo in the womb. This poor little urchin of a formless foetus begins by being on a par with the vegetable world, and has only got what they call a ‘vegetative soul’. Then, when it is a tiny bit bigger, and is being definitely fed upon the substance of its mother’s life, it is promoted to share the lives of all baby-creatures of the animal world and is allowed to possess what they call a ‘nutritive soul’. But just listen to this, my sweet,” and, as he spoke, his amorous caresses made it clear that he would not in the least object to becoming the begetter of the kind of creature he was describing.

“What we’ve got to remember is that this luckless infant only possesses a real soul when it is separated from its mother. What they try to drag in is the old Jewish Jehovah as the Creator of heaven and earth. And at this point, my beautiful one, we’ve got to remember that the great Aristotle, whom they all regard as the wisest of thinkers, taught that there never was a beginning, but that the matter out of which our world sprang into existence contained, and still contains in its own nature, all the creative energy that is needed. You do see, don’t you, my precious, how confusing these learned doctors are? You know, don’t you, how they tell us that we must hate the Jews because the Jewish Priests wanted Pilate to crucify Jesus?

“And yet they are always telling us that Jesus himself was the Son of David, and a descendant of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. The truth is, my darling, we’ve got to make it clear to everyone we have any influence over that this whole business of the Christian religion is full of paradoxes, blunders, manias, idiocies, and ridiculous contradictions.

“Now listen, my pet; wouldn’t you like to come up with me now, as they say Satan was always wanting Jesus to go up with him, to the top of some high hill near here to see the wonders of the world and the glories of them?”

The simple-minded chronicler of these events can only record at this point that the daughter of Maldung of Lost Towers gave Petrus of Picardy a very piercing look. But with this piercing look there was mingled — and no other female in the wide world could so charge a single glance — an overpowering appeal and a desperate cry, a cry that was thrown into the very heart of her seduced-seducer, a cry that sounded like: “Take me! Take me! Take me! or I shall melt into thin air!”

“What about our visiting the Cerne Giant?” she whispered. No sooner did this murmur become audible than Petrus leapt to his feet elated and transported.

“Yes! yes! yes!” he cried; and began in his excitement to make a most curious gurgling noise, a noise which, if anyone who did not know him had heard it, would have suggested the bubbling and exploding, the bursting and dissolving, of a miraculous stream of salt water that had somehow or another got into the centre of a rushing waterfall of fresh water.

Nor did it take these two very long to climb up to the Cerne Giant, which was still as it had been for thousands of years — just a figure on the summit-slope of a grassy chalk hill where the grass had been religiously, though most heathenly, prevented from invading by the least fraction of an inch the preposterous picture, in white upon green, of a monstrous giant with his sexual organ erect, awaiting, you might say, the thousand-years-postponed arrival of his female partner, with whom he might play the immemorial game in full and shameless sight of the far-off sea and the eternally receding sky.

Petrus Peregrinus had removed his hand from the magnet beneath his clothes; but he still kept using his short sword in its black scabbard to assist his steps and to play one part of a third leg. The arm and hand and fingers, however, which, like the wind-tossed branches sprouting from a tree that had the power of motion, belonged to whatever activity he chose to exert on his left hand, were entirely free during their rapid ascent to that expectant Cerne Giant.

It must indeed have been a profoundly religious, as well as a profoundly sacrilegious, instinct in more than a thousand generations of Wessex men and women, that had preserved this defiant superhuman figure, thus exposed in the chalk-grown grass on that particular hill. Never once, from beginning to end of their association, would Pierre de Maricourt, have been able to say that any movement he ever made in connection with Lilith, whether in his mind or with any portion of his body, was ever made on his own initiative. Everything he did or said or thought would have struck him, had he ever tried to recapture it, as pure and simple obedience to Lilith.

And yet, always there, close to his side, was his magic lodestone, ready to be brought into contact with every motion of his will, whether towards exertion or relaxation, whether towards attraction or repulsion, whether towards love or hate.

Plug! Plug! Plod! Plod! thudded his short black-sheathed sword-dagger into that grass-grown chalk hill. He could hear the sound of a bell tolling in the bell-tower of a monastic church at the foot of the hill behind him; and he found himself taking a queer satisfaction in mixing the sound of this monotonous bell with the feeling of pressure in the palm of his right hand from each step he took supported by his leather-covered weapon.

Wild, strange, weird, and often quite mad, are the thoughts and fancies of every one of us with regard to each other; but, when we come to face it, the most crazy and indeed the most disturbing and upsetting of all our imaginative excursions are when, as a man, we have a woman, or as a woman, we have a man at whom to let fly.

Plod! Plod! Plod! But while he ascended that hill, to the sound of the holy bell of Cerne, Peter’s left hand and active fingers found time to untie every knot, loosen every tape, release every pin, disentangle every fold of the most intimate garments of the lovely creature at his side; with the result that, when their four feet and his plodding stick finally touched the chalk-white base of the Giant’s throne, there was nothing for it but a mutual collapse beneath the generative tool of that gigantic figure and an unavoidable union of their two bodies then and there.

No man will ever know what thoughts, and still less what feelings, passed through the consciousness of Lilith, while Petrus wreaked upon her the full measure of his unconscionable lust; but the thoughts and feelings of our great specialist in magnetism were very definite. Although with his face buried in the disordered tangles of Lilith's hair, he could not see the sea, nor the Isle of the Slingers, nor that majestic beach of semi-precious stones that has come to be named Chesil, Petrus was in some curious and peculiar way conscious of these things.

As he merged his life with Lilith's, it seemed to him as though the whole cosmos were being cleft in twain. It seemed to him as if he were himself all the oceans and seas and lakes and channels and estuaries and rivers in the world, and as if the slender form he was clasping were all the continents and capes and promontories and islands, round which, and across which, and into the heart of which, all these waters, salter than tears, were pouring their life.

And as these desperate paroxysms of ecstatic union went on beneath that shameless symbol of primeval audacity, it seemed to Petrus as if he were something more than those wave-curves and wave-spoutings. It seemed to him as if he were at that transcendant moment a real, actual, living incarnation of all the creative semen of human life from the day of Adam, the first man.

He felt as if beneath their united bodies the whole of that haunted West Country, from the furthest promontory of the Isle of Slingers to the furthest shoals of the mist-darkened Severn, were heaving up towards the Moon.

Was it, he thought in his nerve-dazed trance, that ever since Joseph of Arimathea brought the blood of Jesus to this coast, consecrating thereby the Mystery of Virginity and throwing a strange and desecrating shadow upon the greater Mystery of Procreation, there had been a craving, a longing, a hungering and thirsting, in the whole earthy substance of this portion of the West, so that the actual soil and sand and stones and rocks and gravel and pebbles of Wessex, along with the very slime of the worms beneath and the slugs above and the spawn of the frogs and the scum of the newts, and the cuckoo-spit of the smallest insect, had been roused to revolt against this preposterous edict of unnatural purity.

And Petrus of Maricourt swore within himself that it was upon him, and upon him alone of all men living or dead, that the burden of the tremendous deliverance was laid.

“I am the one,” he cried to the very tune of his embraces of Lilith, “appointed from the dawn of history to lead the revolt of all natural earthly life, whether human, animal, vegetable, or mineral, against this accurst inhibition, inspired by these mad religious teachers from Palestine. Anti-Christ! Antichrist! Anti-christ! That is what I am. And the crazy joke of it is that this Jesus, whom they call the Second Person of this Trinity they’ve invented, always said that we were all the Sons of God.”

At this point Petrus of Picardy scrambled to his feet, and bending down modestly and courteously over his companion arranged and tidied her disturbed garments.

It was nearly dark by the time Peter of Maricourt and Lilith of Lost Towers passed that glen of the Welsh Tinker which was so near the gate of the Convent. They were on their way to the Priory, where they hoped to waylay Albertus Magnus, who had — so local rumour informed them — been invited that night to dine with the Prior. It was in the mind of Petrus Peregrinus that they might encounter young John there too, setting off for home from his daily visit to the imprisoned Friar. This possibility however Petrus refrained from communicating to Lilith, though exactly what his motive was for this particular piece of rather curious reticence he would have been himself puzzled to say, although it might enter the head of a mean-minded chronicler that it had something to do with the good looks and youth of the person in question.

It was in any case much less of a surprise to the girl from Lost Towers than to the man from Maricourt when up from the Tinker's Cave, where these children of Israel had been stealing between their separate duties a celestial hour of delicious happiness without troubling their heads about Welsh gods or Welsh tinkers or Welsh witches, came the giant Peleg holding his Ghosta by the hand.

The path upward of the ascending pair crossed irrevocably the path of the couple who were skirting the edge of the declivity, so that an encounter was inescapable. Any aboriginal spirit at this juncture, whether that of a deity, or a tinker, or a witch, who possessed the power of reading the thoughts in alien brains, would have been fascinated, as it darted like a sand-martin from cavity to cavity in these unusual skulls, to note the absolute difference between what was going on in all four heads.

Lilith was wondering whether she lost anything by the fact that the deliciously wicked delight, which she derived from leading people into mischief while she satisfied her senses with their erotic embraces, had never been, even to the faintest wafture of such a thing, touched by the breath of romantic love. "What the devil can that feeling be like?" she wondered irritably.

Peleg said to himself: "This queer-looking little fellow in black stumping along with a Roman sword for a staff must be the Lost Towers' latest pick-up. From the fellow's expression I doubt if the wench has got him as completely as she thinks she has!"

Petrus thought: "Haven't I met this dark girl somewhere before round here? Or is it you, my pretty one," and he gave a caressing squeeze to the lodestone in his innermost garment, "who have pointed her out to me when we were going about? Whoever she is, she's a powerful person; and I'd be a prize idiot to neglect her help in my Antichrist crusade and a plain fool not to try to find what she herself feels about this damned Brazen Head?"

As for Ghosta herself; she was acquainted, by reason of her job in the Convent kitchen, with all the gossip of the neighbourhood, for the Nuns heard everything, and those among them who weren't born to be spiritual were the best authorities in the district on all that was going on, on the quarrels and alliances, on the friendships and enmities, on the misunderstandings and idiotic manias, in all the various manorial centres whose circles of authority over-lapped at this point.

"O I do hope and pray," Ghosta cried in her heart, "that Peleg's discovery of this traveller's association with Lost Towers won't start him off again on his mad suspicion of their being some sexual connection between me and the Friar!"

It was naturally enough the clever clasper of that dangerous magnetic weapon who broke the somewhat awkward silence with which the pair ascending from the cave encountered the pair skirting that tricky declivity.

"I am a visitor to your country, Master" — here Petrus bowed politely to the Jewish giant— "to your country, Mistress" — and here he did the same to Ghosta— "with the purpose of inspecting this wonderful invention of your Friar Bacon of which I have been told by this gentle lady, whom I had the good fortune to meet when I first landed on your shores, and which she tells me is to be found in a Castle called the Fortress of Roque, the Lord of which has only recently recovered from an attack made upon him by a demented animal, by a horse in fact, whom some wicked magician had tried to turn into one of those classical creatures who have men's heads on horses' necks and were called Centaurs, and one of them indeed" — here the traveller bowed graciously to both the giant and Ghosta— "as frequenters of monastic libraries, like yourselves, no doubt know, was a sort of schoolmaster to swift-footed Achilles."

"You had better take them to the main Fortress gate, Peleg," said Ghosta quickly. "I must run back to the Convent now, and I shan't have to ring that big front bell anyway, for I'll get in at the back, where there's a door close to the passage where my room is. I'll be here," she added in a lower voice, giving the great knuckles of the giant whose right hand was squeezed into his leather belt, a quick pressure, "tomorrow, wet or fine, at the same time as today!"

And with this she was off; and they all watched her tall slight figure hurry down the path towards the Convent.

"Well, Master — well, Mistress Lilith," said Peleg, "shall we go straight to the Fortress? It's inside the Fortress, you know, in fact in the armoury, that the Friar's Brazen Head has been put for safety. This Papal Legate, or whatever he calls himself, whose name has such a friendly sound — I mean Bonaventura — has been making so much trouble round here that we — but I mustn't go on like this with you, Mistress Lilith, here; for you naturally have to take the side of your dad and I naturally have to take the side of my lord — but anyway, you, sir, as an experienced traveller, will have seen many local divergencies far more extreme than any of ours and bringing with them far more risky consequences to the country concerned."

Lilith smiled at him with a quick, humorously confidential smile, as much as to say, "O my dear big man, you weren't born in the midst of our silly little dissensions, but you'll have to take us as you find us."

"Somebody told us as we came along," murmured Petrus almost wistfully, "that, if we wanted to have a word with Albert of Cologne, who has come over here to see Friar Bacon, we ought to go to the Priory where the great man has been invited tonight to dine with the reverend Prior. It would be a pity, wouldn't it, to put you to the trouble of showing us the way to the Fortress, only to find when we reach it that the man we are seeking has just left to go to the Priory?"

To this fretful commentary upon the course of events it was Lilith, not the Jewish giant, who replied.

"The obvious thing to do," she said, stepping forward quickly, and with one slender hand putting pressure on the giant's hip and with the other upon the elbow of Petrus Peregrinus, "is to get to the Fortress as quickly as we can and find out if the man has yet started for the Priory. It may well happen that we shall be allowed to accompany him there, and possibly be able to eat a crust with the Friar, while Albertus is dining with Prior Bog."

The long legs of Peleg and the short legs of Petrus found themselves obeying her, almost as if they'd been the fore-legs and the hind-legs of the same horse drawing her chariot.

"Little does this fellow guess," thought Petrus pressing his sword-staff into the rocks and the lichen and the moss and the mud and the grass, and his lodestone into his own scrotum, "that the sole reason of our desire to meet this Albertus is to put an end to his fight on behalf of Christ, and to help this self-worshipping Bonaventura to smash to atoms the Friar's Brazen Head."

But, whatever their thoughts, they all three hurried on, and had the Welsh tinker or one of his witch-wives watched them pass, they would have seemed like a giant from Palestine accompanied by a dwarf from Egypt and led by a siren from the Isles of Greece.

The truth was that Peleg and Lilith between them managed to lead the student of magnetism so rapidly, and by paths so completely unknown to him, that it was neither a surprise nor a shock when the girl stopped them with an excited gesture and pointed to a moving mass of gleaming weapons at the foot of four great dark-foliaged pines, and cried out in a thin, wavering, wispy voice, as if she'd been a frightened maiden from the convent rather than the seductive heiress of Lost Towers: "There! there! there's a lot of soldiers! Your friend from Cologne must have brought a big bodyguard with him! They're coming this way. What about waiting for them here?"

It was then that Peleg intervened. He spoke slowly and deliberately; but it was clear that he was agitated by what he saw.

"It seems to me, Master Petrus, that those are King's Men from London; and what is more, Mistress Lilith, I believe I hear some royal music. So it can't be the ecclesiastic from Germany. It must be some royal captain on his way from London to tell us all some important news. Perhaps King Henry is dying. News doesn't travel as fast in this island as it does between the Tigris and the Eu — —" He stopped suddenly; and Lilith, who had been watching him, turned round, as suddenly, to her other companion.

But her other companion was behaving in a very strange manner. It appeared that Petrus Peregrinus was undergoing a kind of mental agitation so extreme that it amounted to something resembling a fit. He was holding both his hands to his ears, as if to render himself deaf to some sound that he was finding too horrible to endure; and he was doing this without losing his hold of the sheathed weapon he had been using as a staff.

Suddenly with a choking gasp he let his hands sink down till his weapon, held to his wrist by a strap, trailed in the dust. At the same time an expression of incredible relief relaxed his features and clouded with a misty haze his incredibly black eyes. Both Peleg and Lilith surveyed him with astonishment, an astonishment that was increased when they heard him talking to himself, and doing so in English though with a strong French accent.

“Thank the Devil he’ll be dead soon now! And thank the Devil that he can put so much power into his voice that even in the midst of this unspeakable way they’re murdering him a lot of the pain goes into his screams. O thanks be to the Devil! He’s quite dead now!”

Pierre of Maricourt became silent at that point, and leant so heavily on his scabbarded weapon that it sank several inches into the marshy ground upon which, at the sight of the gleaming arms of those distant men, they had all three paused.

“What is it Sieur de Maricourt?” enquired Lilith. “Nobody is screaming here. Nobody is being killed here. What is it, Maitre Pierre?”

The reply came slowly but quite clearly, each word of it being like an enormous gobbet of human flesh, steaming with red foam and dripping with hot blood.

“No! no! this thing is not happening now. It’s going to happen! It — is — all — in — the — future. I — am — making it — happen. It’s going to happen to the son of — never mind that! — who is being tortured to death in a castle whose name is — whose name begins with B. But he’s dead now; and with his screams went a lot of his pain — into the air! My little pretty one and I have done it … the prince of … of … of … of … But never mind that! But mark you … it has … it has … it has to happen! Little Pretty and I have done it already! All the rest can be left to the huge wave of natural necessity that carries us all before it. But there are certain” — and here even Lilith, the daughter of Baron Maldung of Lost Towers, was startled by the look of concentrated, merciless, indeed you might say insane ferocity in the two enormous black eyes, now almost become one, above the traveller’s raptorial beak— “but there are certain turnpike valleys, in the future lives of us all,” he went on, “in which things can be made to happen to us, either as a blessing or as a curse, by concentrated will supported by concentrated prayer addressed to Heaven or — mark you! — to Hell: certain turnpike valleys I say that this great rushing universal stream of Necessity lacks the power to touch.

“These turnpikes in our lives are so indurated, so scooped and gouged out, so chiselled and indented, so engraved, so branded by the intense will and the intense prayer of our worst enemy or our best friend, that this frantic hate or this desperate love works those effects that our excitable doctors of divinity, like this confounded Cologne potentate, call miracles.

“And in a popular sense they are miracles. But we must remember that the mass of people are so stupid, yes! so stupid and dull-witted and silly, that anything achieved by exceptional will-power or exceptional energy appears miraculous. And these accursed ecclesiastics are worse than the mob; for they are at bottom as stupid as the mob, but they have learnt the tricks of their trade and know how to appear both learned and clever.”

Peleg and Lilith exchanged amused glances at this point; for it had become clear to them that this student of magnetism had already become, not only a professor, but a professor whose contempt for other professors surpassed his contempt for common humanity. His companions’ thoughts must somehow have reached him, but instead of quelling his professorial desire to lecture, not so much to teach others as to get the thrill of haranguing others, these thoughts of theirs drove him on. For human beings are only surpassed in their quickness of emotional reaction to unspoken thoughts by one other animal on earth; namely by dogs; but unlike the reactions of dogs, our reactions are generally contradictory. This is proved by the way Petrus acted now.

He straightened his rounded shoulders and thin legs, and hurriedly clambered up upon a broad flat stone. Mounted on this natural rostrum he stretched out his black-sheathed sword-dagger towards the soldiers, who were now definitely marching in their direction, and cried in a shrill voice:

"And these military people too! What do any of them know of the real nature of the necessities of the country, or of the king, or of the nation? All they know is how to obey their trumpets and bugles. After the vulgar herd, and after the grotesque array of half-doting, ridiculously pontifical teachers, the most absurd body of men to be found in our crazy world are soldiers — yes! every kind of soldiers, soldiers of Kings, soldiers of Queens, soldiers of Regents, soldiers of sovereign realms who have only Dictators!

"You tell me those soldiers are English soldiers. Well, I can only tell you that I feel unutterable contempt for every soldier serving in that force and obeying a kindly King who is weak and dying, and only longing to obey a King who is strong, hard, and brutal and loves fighting for fighting's sake. I tell you there's not one single one of all these men now marching in their damned orderly ranks towards us, who has the intelligence of an ordinary dog, not one single one!"

Peter Peregrinus now descended from his stone of oration and put a straight question to the beautiful Lilith. "Well, little lady? Had we better wait their arrival here? Or shall we just go boldly on to meet them, and then enquire, of whatever captain or centurion or prince who is leading them, whether he knows just where Albertus of Cologne is passing the night? We could tell him that I have come from a besieger's camp in France, especially to bring him an important message."

No chronicler could describe in words the expression on the face of Petrus Peregrinus at this moment. Neither Peleg from above him nor Lilith from below him had ever seen anything like the way those black eyes, just as if they had become the one solitary eye of an antediluvian creation from the bottom of the ocean, looked with an indescribably inward look at what his own red tongue was doing in its own cave-like mouth, into which it seemed as if this one eye must be able to watch this unique tongue tentatively emerging from the devil knows how much deeper a cavern, and beginning its exploration of the blood-sucking meat-mill which it has entered.

But the eyes of Peter of Maricourt saw something now that drew them away from his own interior being. He saw two young men coming towards them down the slope of a hill, from a direction that was at right angles to the direct line between the place where they stood and the point now reached by the advancing soldiers. To him they were unknown; but the moment Peleg, following the obviously startled look he saw him turn in that direction, caught sight of them, their identity was revealed.

"Why! there are Master Tilton and Master John! Do you wish me, Mistress Lilith, to call to them? I don't think they have seen us yet; and to tell you the truth I don't think they are likely to see us till they get quite close! It's plain to me: indeed I can clearly hear," and he exchanged a quick glance with Lilith, "that they're arguing and disputing; and when those two begin that sort of thing, there's no use trying to make them notice anything."

It was Lilith who spoke then. "And what," she enquired gaily, "do you think, Master Peter?"

What Peter thought, before anything else occurred to him, was simply how queer it was to see his wicked temptress of Lost Towers act like an ordinary and natural girl. It was clear that she was delighted with this new turn to the stream of events.

Peter of Maricourt didn't openly hesitate. But in his heart he did more than hesitate. What rushed across his mind, as the girl waited for his answer, was the thought that, if he could deprive the Fortress of both its young men, it would be a better stroke in his Antichrist crusade than even if he managed to put an end to Albertus of Cologne.

He closed his mouth firmly against any premature licking of his lips; but there had come an excited note into his voice which it was impossible to miss, though he answered quietly enough.

“There are times in life, little lady,” he said, “when we can only listen to the ticking of the clock of fate and wait for what is destined to happen. This is one of those times.”

XXI. THE PENANCE

"But haven't you the power to see," young John was saying to his elder brother, his voice mounting up almost to a shout, "that the church has just created this whole business of the Trinity in order to catch the three in its fishing-net?"

"What three classes," enquired Tilton, "have you got in your head?"

"In my head — nothing!" cried the other indignantly, "the classes I'm talking about are with us always. They are here in the Fortress! They are there in the Priory! They are everywhere. I am talking about first, stupid, simple, ordinary people: second, artistic, imaginative people: third, strong ambitious people. This third class is of course the class who govern and rule us — not always on thrones or on horseback, or in chariots — very often entirely behind the scenes.

"By the idea of God the Father they catch the strong rulers who imprison and execute their enemies. By the ideas of God the Son they catch the simple, stupid mass of ordinary people who aren't tricky or clever enough to be anything but good and obedient, and who make of what they call Love a mystical and magical power that works miracles.

"And finally by the idea of the Holy Ghost they catch the poets, the story-tellers, the musicians, the painters, the builders and the scholars; and these are the ones who have invented Our Lady, and made Her the Mother of God, and the Fourth great Panel of the Pythagorean square!"

"I've heard enough of your fancies and theories, John," retorted his brother. "For heaven's sake let's take advantage of having the whole day to ourselves, while Mother and Father are both taken up with listening to this Dominican from Germany refuting this Franciscan from Italy."

John decided at this point that he must be more practical in talking to Tilton.

"Presently," he remarked, "they'll be having — father and mother I mean — a nice tricky job if these King's Men from London demand shelter for the night. I can't make out what the idea was in sending them down here at all. I don't believe the old King had anything to do with it. I fancy there's some 'funny business', as we say in Oxford, going on in the King's court. What we want is Lord Edward back again! Why does he go on with this ridiculous crusade? What's this city of Acre, to him, or him to it, that he should fight for it? What I think about this whole affair is — —"

"Please, John, don't go on any more like this! And look there — Isn't that our Peleg? Who on earth are those two with him? Why — John! If that's not Lilith of Lost Towers! Who's that man with her? He's a foreigner of some sort. He doesn't look as if he knew his head from his tail. He's mad or something! There! He's seen us now. What the devil is he up to? He's moving about watching us with his hands pressed between his legs as if he were turning himself into a flying battering-ram."

"Never mind him, Tilton. He's nothing to us. The person for us to watch is that devilish girl! God in Heaven, but she's a beauty! I'd like to —— Listen, Tilton, why shouldn't we get hold of her? Let's carry her back to the Fortress as a prisoner-of-war!"

"John, John, what's come over you? What's the matter with you? You're looking at me as if you'd like to knock my head off. What have I done to make you so angry? Do you think I want to start fighting as to which of us should have that girl? Heaven help you John! You're getting queer. It's that confounded Brazen Head that's the trouble. Ever since that blasted thing came into the armoury you've been behaving more and more queerly. Didn't I hear you the other day tell mother that you'd like to go and visit Iscalis — or what do they teach us to call that village now — Ilchester! And why? I know the damned place. There's nothing there but a river, and a few houses by a bridge, and a lot of marshy fields! You think it's wonderful because your precious Friar's uncle or brother or somebody lives there. I tell you it's not half as exciting as Montacute, where at least there's a high pointed hill, or as Glastonbury, where King Arthur's grave is!"

"If you don't stop talking such nonsense, Tilton, I'll give you such a rap over your dull, stupid, traditional, commonplace, church-building skull that you won't be able to sleep for — —"

"Stop that, you two fools!"

The sudden appearance of the utterer of these surprising words was as much of a shock to the two brothers as it was to Lilith and Maitre Pierre de Maricourt. Peleg was less startled because he had been for some while able, from the watch-tower of his own height, to detect some creature's secretive movements from alder-bush to alder-bush, scrub-oak to scrub-oak, weeping-willow to weeping-willow; but he hadn't imagined for a minute that a warrior in the rather extravagant accoutrements of a captain from the Royal Guard should be following these tactics.

But so it was. The intruder, who had interrupted not only this old familiar quarrel between the brothers that was being so craftily fomented by Master Peter and his pet lodestone, but who also had diverted from their aim that traveller's further plans, turned out to be none other than Perspicax himself, captain of these King's Men who had just arrived, and a cousin of Friar Bacon and like him a native of Ilchester.

By this time Perspicax, through his social skill in the delicate art of handling superiors and his formidable gift for inspiring respect in inferiors, had become one of the most active and important military officers that the old king possessed.

Having heard of the disturbances stirred up by Bonaventura and of the local war — for it had by now become more than a feud — between the Manor of Roque and the Barony of Lost Towers, Perspicax had persuaded the already dying Henry to let him come down to the Wessex Coast with a quite large squadron of King's Men.

With a few decisive explanations and a moderate use of his enormous powers of persuasion and domination, Perspicax soon had all the five of them, the two young men, equally with Peleg and Lilith and Master Peter of Picardy, under his personal control.

He led them all straight back to the Fortress, and he found no difficulty in arranging with the door-keeper, or rather with the door-keeper's competent dame, exactly just where and how the whole lot of his men had best encamp that night, and what special additions to their already substantial supply of food and drink they might expect to receive. He then found no difficulty at all in smoothing the way with Lady Val and the Baron, not only for the reception of Peter Peregrinus, but even — and this made everybody in the Fortress exchange puzzled and excited comments — for the conferring of a solitary night's rest in a suitable chamber upon Lilith of Lost Towers.

Once safely alone in a small room at the back of the Fortress, a room which their nurse, in that instinctive forestalling of awkward situations which had made her what she was to all of them, had reserved as a sort of retiring-place for herself, our lonely traveller, whose magnetic power had led him to regard himself as Antichrist, decided that it would be silly to play any of his tricks with "Little Pretty" while he was only half-alive by reason of an overpowering need for sleep.

So, removing the said “Little Pretty” from its coign of vantage at the fulcrum of its owner’s life-force, and placing it on a small bracket at the foot of a stone image of Our Lady that had obviously come from over-sea, for its whole style suggested North Italy, he managed with the most reverent and the most delicate care to prop it up in such a manner that “it”, or “her”, or “he”, was supported by the droop of the Virgin’s robe as it hung between her knees.

This duty having been satisfactorily performed, with a final worshipful glance at the foot-long object of his veneration, now safely if sacrilegiously propped up at the knees of the Mother of God, Petrus flung his sword on the floor, wrapped the bed-blanket round him just as he was, and sank into an impenetrable sleep.

What he would have done if there hadn’t been a clear sky and a three-quarter Moon that night, together with a window through which this luminary could shine, and a particularly well-polished metallic receptacle for both solid and liquid human excreta from which its light was brilliantly reflected, is indeed a question. He would either have had to play his tricks in pitch darkness or he would have had to give them up till the arrival of dawn.

As it was, it must have been about midnight when he awoke; and awoke to find himself in full moonlight. He tossed off the blanket, picked up his sword, still in its black sheath, and hung it on the handle of the closed door, a handle very imposingly moulded and much more like the hilt of a Roman sword than was the object which he suspended from it.

Then he rushed to the base of the image against the wall, extricated his egregious darling from between the knees of Our Lady, and held it up in the moonlight. The lodestone was about seven inches in length and about one inch in diameter. Its colour was a pale pinkish grey touched here and there with blots and smears of a dim yellowish tint. But one end of the thing was a good deal thicker than the other, and this thicker end did unquestionably possess a certain remote likeness to a human head.

Nor was an obscure resemblance to a human face quite wanting either, if a person did what the thing's owner was certainly always doing, that is to say if he made a lively use of the imagination. The thing, however, never changed its expression. No imagination could make it do that.

But its expression was one which, if this dressing-room of the old nurse of the Fortress could speak, it would have described as "wicked curiosity".

With those peering eyes at such a queer angle to each other, with that almost frog-like nose and mouth, with that forehead that seemed to bulge where it ought to retreat, with those ears that looked as if in the endless process of listening to dirty sounds and yet more dirty echoes, they had been worn into filthy cracks, all these characteristics only required a little imagination to be the perfect attributes of a lodestone converted into an orectic and prurient spy.

Sitting on the edge of his bed after pressing to his lips in the moonlight the particular smear on his pet's visage that he liked to pretend was its mouth, Petrus now jigged the thing up and down in the air towards what he assumed to be the southern and eastern and western portions of the Fortress.

He vaguely took it for granted, from what seemed to him to be the position of the Moon, that he was sitting with his back to the north; and it was one of his occult theories that it was always from the north that great magicians — and of course Antichrist must be a very great magician — always came and always summoned their devils.

The southern populations of the world might be gluttonous, lecherous, and wine-bibbing, but it was from the north, and from no other quarter of the compass, that Satan always set forth on his goings to and fro over the earth.

There is no doubt that, compared with the authentic inventive genius of Friar Bacon, Master Peter of Maricourt had only an extremely exalted imagination. For years he had used this imagination to complete in every way he could what might be called the feminization of his precious lodestone. What he had to do at this moment was not at all easy. He had to make a guess as to the particular direction, north or south or east or west of where he was now, in which a room had been found for Lilith in this ramshackle edifice. But assuming, from the outrageous tales he had listened to when with Mother Wurzel and her daughter at Deadstone, that Tilton would be far too occupied with his sister Lil-Umbra to give Lilith a thought, he forced "Little Pretty" to concentrate her dangerous attention upon young John.

In fact he went so far as to direct the whole of his own will-power, and the whole of the magnetism in "Little Pretty" that worked with this will-power, towards establishing an erotic connection between young John and Lilith.

"The time must be now," he told himself, "about half-way between midnight and one o'clock. In that case, shouldn't 'Little Pretty' draw young John to slip quietly on bare feet or in silent sandals to Lilith's room? She'll be wise enough to guess who it is if he knocks gently at her door, and once together he'll be her slave forever!

"That it's such a devil of an effort to me to do this may simply be because I'm her slave! I am, I am, I am her slave; I confess it. But not perhaps forever. I've enjoyed her so fully, so utterly, so completely — and from such enjoyment the male animal enjoys anyway the sensation of domination — that I already feel to a certain degree free from her: not altogether free of course, because I shall never to the end of my days enjoy anyone as I do her, but still a good deal more free than I ever thought would be possible before we visited the Cerne Giant. Well, Master John, you've got, you've got, you've got to go to Lilith's room!"

He pointed the head of the lodestone towards a certain queer stain on one of the walls, a stain that he had noticed directly he entered the room, which had by this time associated itself in his mind with a spurt of blood from some rarely affected human vein.

It was at this moment to his unspeakable surprise that he heard a knocking at his own door. He plunged his "Little Pretty" into a much more natural place than the knees of the Madonna, and scrambling across his bed, for he had been sitting with his back to his own door as he thought of young John's door, he unhooked his sword from the bronze door-handle, and holding it, still in its black sheath, in his right hand, he opened the door with his left.

It was Lilith herself who now slipped into his room, slim as a hamadryad from the Moon who has descended straight from the clouds, and arrayed in a floating white night-gown much too large for her, which she had borrowed for that one night from Lil-Umbra. This garment hung so loosely on her slender figure that, as she stretched herself upon his bed, Petrus of Picardy was compelled, for the third time in his whole life, to give himself up to such a wave of passionate adoration that he felt he could sacrifice even the pride of being Antichrist in his worship of those pearly contours of Lilith's body, now resting there like a white shell half-revealed and half-concealed beneath a wavy tangle of foam as it lies on the sand.

Although he had already enjoyed her that same day at the foot of the Cerne Giant to a degree that he supposed must have exhausted all his seminal energy, and though this day itself had followed a night of the grotesque debaucheries of Deadstone, it suddenly came over him that, if he clutched his lodestone tightly enough in his hand while he was enjoying her now, he would find himself endowed with a superhuman power.

And so it did, in God's truth and the Devil's truth, happen, before the two of them were asleep. And, as may be imagined, the sleep that followed this Elysian ecstasy was so deep for them both that the dawn was well advanced before Petrus realized that the light which was making his eyes blink so hopelessly as he tried to open them was the light not of the Moon but of the Sun.

"I'll wrap this round me," whispered Lilith hurriedly, snatching up the blanket from the bed, "and, when I'm dressed to go out, I'll come back here for you; for I want you to take me home. So don't go till I come!" And, as he kissed her, Petrus recognized that this really was a solemn league and covenant between them.

His dressing took no time at all, and he had comfortable leisure to caress his "Little Pretty", otherwise his demonic lodestone, to his heart's content, as well as to make the pillows and the extremely primitive goat-skin rug that covered the foot of the bed look as if the room had been used solely as a retiring place for relieving human bowels; and since there was no way he could empty that particular piece of furniture, all he could do was to sit on the bed and wait.

When at last Lilith returned, she looked as fresh as a wild, white convolvulus on an ivy-covered wall.

"I've found a way out," she whispered hurriedly, "and once out I know how to dodge this camp of King's Men. Just come quietly after me, step by step as quickly as you can, and we'll soon be clear of this blessed place."

Petrus obeyed, and she led him out of the Fortress by a small door among the sheds and stables, the look of which and the general atmospheric odour of that part of the establishment reminded him of the occasion when the Lord of the Manor had suffered a fall wrestling with Spardo's deformed horse, and when the idea of filling the prophetic role of the actual Antichrist had first entered his own head.

Lilith was perfectly right about her ability to dodge the camp of the King's Men. At one point they did catch the voice of Perspicax giving orders in that effective competent way that was a second nature with him. And though it can well be believed how tightly Petrus clutched his little monster to his navel at this sound, he was far too scared of throwing everything into a chaos, in which anything might happen, to take the risk of pointing the lodestone at this man from Iscala who boasted himself to be a first cousin of the maker of the Brazen Head.

But the authoritative voice of Roger Bacon's relative from Iscala had hardly died down, when lo! directly in their path through the forest, appeared a group of about a dozen men, unmistakably clothed in the red-brown attire of Lost Towers. These men were advancing with the swift, furtive, stealthy, wild-animal-like self-confidence of a perfectly trained body of woodsmen, to whom every aspect of forest life had been familiar from earliest boyhood.

Without a cry of delight or the faintest sign of surprise Lilith ran towards them; and in a pulse-beat of his agitated heart our all-too-human Antichrist began searching with the tip of his tongue the whole surface of the cavernous roof of his mouth, as if that tongue of his, which could be a deadly sting, had also the power of transforming itself into a divining-rod, a rod that could reveal the presence of any drop of the water of life in any portion of the skull that contained it.

But while Lilith was gliding in and out of the ranks of her red-brown adherents, like a "Wood-White" butterfly dominating a confused rabble of billowing and swirling “Meadow-Browns”, there suddenly emerged, walking towards him in an extremely dignified, though somewhat dramatic manner, out of the centre of the red-brown men, no less a personage than Bonaventura himself!

This tremendous redeemer of footpads was evidently deeply impressed by the revelation that Lilith, whose entrancing body he had only resisted because God destined him to be Pope or the maker of Popes, had a man-friend.

He recognized at once the black cap Petrus was wearing as part of the uniform of one of the best troops among the soldiers of the King of France; and the wild hope rushed into his mind that this siren of a girl had just come back from crossing the Channel with a body of men as large, if not larger, than the King’s Men who would shortly be waking from their sleep in the camp of this Perspicax of Iscala or Ilchester.

This descent upon Wessex of the King’s Men from London had been the second startling blow that Bonaventura had received in the last few days. The first was the appearance, totally unforeseen by him, of Albertus of Cologne, for whom, as the most famous of all teachers in the Dominican order, he, as the best known Franciscan throughout the world, felt the emotions that all of us experience, though some of us are cleverer than others in hiding them, when confronted by a successful rival.

Petrus of Maricourt clutched “Little Pretty” tightly against his skin and looked his opponent full in the face. “Mistress Lilith told me,” he said, “that I might have the proud pleasure of meeting the late legate of the Holy Father and the greatest doctor that our Holy Faith possesses in Paris and Oxford, but I never for one moment imagined that her words would come true. Your eminence knows what young ladies are, and of course I have already heard that your reverence disapproves of Friar Bacon’s Brazen

Head. In fact, to be quite truthful, I have answered a number of people on this point by telling them bluntly and squarely that some of Friar Bacon's inventions are under examination by the highest authorities in the Church, in case they may turn out to have no divine sanction but, on the contrary — —" here Petrus bowed with his head and scraped with his foot, as he had seen his mother do when the Lord of Maricourt walked down the street— "on the contrary, are the work of the Devil."

"What, if I may enquire," asked Bonaventura, "is your name? And what, if you will absolve me of gross inquisitiveness, is your purpose in visiting these parts?"

Our traveller clutched with his left hand the body of "Little Pretty" under his clothes, and placing his right hand against the hilt of his eternally sheathed sword, he proceeded to balance his bottom upon this convenient knot of hammered metal-work and got strength and relief by so doing.

Indeed for a moment or two, as he listened to Bonaventura repeating his question with the judicial unction of an official executioner at the oriental court of Karakorum, he experienced a delicious thrill of complete irresponsibility, as if he had been an anonymous figure seated on a marble stool impervious to the goings on of mortals.

"My name, your Eminence, is Pierre de Maricourt, and I come from Picardy. My profession, as you see, is that of a soldier of the King of France. But I am also a student of the ancient tongues and I spend my wages in buying books. I know a little Greek and Latin, your Eminence, already; and I hope, before I die, to be able to learn a little Hebrew. I came over to have an opportunity of acquiring at close quarters a few details about the kind of mistakes — in orthodox divinity I mean — which Friar Bacon has been making."

Petrus spoke slowly from more than one motive, and from more than one motive too he kept his terrific black eyes fixed as magnetically as he could upon Bonaventura's face. Beneath his clothes, as you may believe, he kept the head of Little Pretty — for he knew by touch her head from her tail — aimed straight at his interlocutor and it soon became clear that Little Pretty's effect, aided by the intensity of his own magnetic gaze was overmastering.

Bonaventura began showing signs of extreme agitation. He kept turning round and glancing anxiously at the brown-and-red jerkins and breeches of the group he had just left, as if he were afraid that the presence of their young mistress among them might dispel and destroy his own authority over them, and even result in some form of action entirely different from the line he wished them to take.

In his own secret consciousness Bonaventura was more upset than he had been for years. "I must," he told himself, "adopt some powerful course of action with this accurst runaway from Picardy, who evidently is a lecherous pick-up of Lilith's. I must frighten him in some sort of way."

Meanwhile Petrus had commenced in dead silence conveying his wishes to "Little Pretty".

"We must will him to lift up first one of his legs and then the other," he told her, articulating his intention very definitely and moving her head, still pressed against his skin, so that it should point straight at Bonaventura's skull. "First one and then the other, my treasure!" he repeated.

And behold! it actually happened; yes! it happened just exactly as our scientific student of magnetism had indicated to his precious magnet. Up went one leg of the General of the Grey Friars, while he made a shuffling movement with the foot still on the ground.

“Now make him lift the other, my sweet!” And down came Bonaventura’s left leg and up went his right. “Make the old sod dance a proper jig now, pretty one. We’ll learn him to be a Legate!”

And to the absolute amazement of a couple of Lost Towers men who had turned to look back while the rest of the crew were following Lilith into the Forest, and to the even greater astonishment of Friar Roger’s cousin from London, the enterprising Perspicax, who having been invited the night before to take his breakfast with Tilton and young John and possibly even with their parents too, if the Baron got back in time from his morning jaunt, now stood at Peter Peregrinus’ elbow.

“Is that a new kind of penance?” enquired the commander of the King’s Men.

“Do you know, Capitaine, I really do believe that it is!” replied Maître Pierre de Maricourt. “And the odd thing is,” he continued, twisting “Little Pretty” around against his own body so that her head pointed straight at the centre of the intruder’s not very high forehead, “the odd thing is that this particular penance is infectious! I even feel like joining it myself!” And he shuffled a little with the toes and heels of his sandals in the long grass.

To the commander of the King’s Men this untimely dance was indeed infectious. He raised his well-armoured knees in this grotesque jig even higher than the stately personage before them was lifting his grey robe; and he even went so far, for he had a daring and reckless spirit under his military restraint, as to stretch out his right hand and seize, much to this latter’s discomfiture, Bonaventura’s left hand.

This crazy dance, which might well have been, so Petrus grimly assured himself as he watched them, a dance in honour of an East-Indian idol, performed at Karakorum before the Khan, went on without a pause till the last of the red-brown bandits, together with their “leukolenian” or white-armed princess, had disappeared, and until a little group of highly amused but somewhat puzzled King's Men had come up from the camp and arranged themselves in a line, evidently waiting for the morning's proper business to begin.

It was from sheer exhaustion that both these dancers, Bonaventura in his noble grey garments and Perspicax in his by no means ignoble royal colours, finally and simultaneously sank, side by side, upon the moss and small ferns and wood-grass and ground-lichen beneath a half-circle of the massive trunks of five majestic pines. Mingled with an infernal satisfaction which distorted his face and made his tongue cleave to the roof of his mouth — and of course all chroniclers of Peter Peregrinus who neglect the physical motions of his tongue are dodging something essential — was a totally unexpected pity for the prostrate Perspicax.

What brought this pity into the erratic heart of our traveller was the simple pride which his humiliated victim had taken in being a soldier. This pride brought back to him his own childhood, and suggested to his mind the behaviour of the stately officials of the castle at Maricourt, and he couldn't help muttering aloud a familiar tag of Homeric Greek that he had learnt as a boy in a monastic school: "Ephane mega seema!" "There appeared a great sign!"

And indeed as he watched the King's Men lift up their commander and carry him off to their camp, and as he himself was assisting Bonaventura to his feet, there appeared, coming from between those enormous pine-trees, whose branchless trunks enhanced the romance of every event that occurred beneath them, no less a couple of celebrities than Albertus Magnus of Cologne and Friar Roger Bacon!

It was clear in a second to the wielder of "Little Pretty" that the great Dominican, who looked indeed a rampart of strength in his singular head-dress and peat-black raiment, had compelled the Prior of Bumset to liberate his captive, at least for a time.

“Whither were they bent now?” he thought. “Who could say? They must have started at dawn from the Priory! The Cologne man must have stayed the night there; perhaps in the very chamber of Roger Bacon, with whom he may have been arguing and discussing all night. There’s simply no limit,” thus Peter Peregrinus’ thoughts ran on, “to these learned idiots’ powers of disputation.”

Curiously enough in the agitating look-skirmish and gesture-drama that ensued between these four men — with “Little Pretty”, the deadly lodestone, pressed against the skin of Master Peter — the one who conducted himself with the greatest ease and the most successful assurance was Bonaventura.

Master Peter, as you can well imagine, didn’t miss this fact; his agile mind kept turning it over and over, and even as he hurried to be the first to speak, he decided that this superiority in social self-possession came from the fact of Bonaventura’s much wider experience of the contemporary world and more intimate knowledge of the royal courts of Europe than Friar Bacon could possibly have — or Albertus either, in spite of his two years as a Bishop.

“You will pardon me, your Reverence, I trust, for addressing you without your permission. But I am a student of scientific magnetism — a most complicated subject — and I was anxious to visit this famous inventor of the Brazen Head whom I now find in your company.”

At this point Friar Bacon, who, to Peter’s discerning black eyes, was far the most embarrassed of all the four, spoke out strongly, though Petrus could almost see his heart beating under his grey robe and his pulses throbbing under his grey sleeves.

“What we must all do now, and you with us, Master — —”

“Petrus of Maricourt in Picardy!” interposed Bonaventura with a nod and a smile.

“And you with us, Master Petrus,” went on Friar Bacon, “is to take advantage of my cousin Perspicax having a body of King’s Men from London with him, and go straight to Lost Towers and possess ourselves of it in the King’s name. King Henry, though very ill, is still alive, and we all know what his son, Lord Edward, would do if he were with us today! He would make short work of this stronghold of bandits, who have for some many years troubled the lives of quiet people in this part of our land! So the first thing we must do — and I trust you will accompany us, Maître Pierre de Maricourt — is to go to the camp and tell my Cousin Perspicax to assemble his men at once and follow us to Lost Towers.”

Petrus told himself as he looked from this Friar in grey to the courtly Bonaventura, also in grey, and from them both to the black raiment and incredible headgear of Albert the Great, that what he really needed at this crisis in his life was one clear and definite and decisive word from the Devil Himself — for He alone could really help him at such an amazing concatenation as this — telling him by what word, what blow, what death-dance, he, Petrus, ought to make it clear to the whole lot of them that the long-predicted Antichrist was at last really among them, and that the hour had come for the crashing down, once for all, of the whole shaky edifice of the Christian faith.

“It is extraordinary,” Petrus told himself, as he followed the two grey figures and the one black figure in the direction in which the King’s Men had just conveyed their exhausted commander, “how a weak, timid, nervous, hermit of philosophy like this Roger Bacon can suddenly take the lead, and without any ‘Little Pretty’ pressed against his skin, can dominate — can dare to try to dominate — two such figures as this Grey One and this Black One, not to mention Antichrist himself, who in the shape of a lodestone-bearer has come among them!

"But it shows one thing. It shows that when a man is quiet and peaceful and timid and philosophical, and scared of both God and the Devil, and longs to live entirely for his own lonely sensations and for his fine points of learning and for the mystery of words, there may come a moment when he suddenly finds himself with a power of plunging into action and of abandoning himself to reckless and desperate moves, such as much stronger characters and much more formidable wills would never dare to display."

The four singular visitors were not long in discovering that, although he had so recently been down in the very depths of impotence, Friar Roger's cousin from Ilchester was now perfectly ready to retake complete command of the bulk of his men. And so without more ado, they set out through the forest and actually found themselves in less than a couple of hours at the entrance to Lost Towers.

They were, however, certainly not prepared for what they found when they reached those gates. Instead of riding for pure pleasure that morning, far less engaging in any boar-hunt or any wolf-hunt, the Lord of the Manor of Roque had left his bed while it was still quite dark, and had taken with him, completely unknown to Lady Val or Lil-Umbra or either of his two sons, the whole force of all the best Fortress-fighters who were available, and had hurried off with them to Cone Castle, where he obtained an interview with Lady Ulanda and her son. As for Baron Boncor himself, he had heard about the squadron of King's Men arriving by forced marches into Wessex and had foreseen that Friar Bacon and his Brazen Head were bound to be included in the local trouble which the arrival of this royal force was sure to bring with it. And so, knowing that nothing would stop

Lady Ulanda from rushing openly and shamelessly into the fray as long as there was the faintest chance that it might lead to the destruction of the inventor of the Head, he had already taken his own sensible counsel and nobody else's.

Having for once been able to slip out of their mutual bed without waking his infatuated lady, he had gone bare-footed to his cousin Raymond's chamber and communicated his intention to him. Raymond de Laon did exactly what his friend wanted him to do. He dressed with incredible speed, picked up a long hunting-spear with which, by climbing upon a particular buttress, he could tap on Lil-Umbra's window-sill at the Fortress, and glided, more like a beneficent spirit than an enamoured young man, out of Cone Castle and clear away from its precincts.

"Yes," he promised his cousin, "I'll hang around in the forest, clear of Perspicax's camp, till it's light enough for a talk at her window. So you get away, while the going's good. Don't give me a thought!"

So after ordering the obstreperous Turgo on no account to leave the Castle till his return, Boncor set off with only one attendant, namely a certain Bob Talirag, who had an aunt who worked there, and hurried through the forest by the first light of dawn to Bumset Priory. He felt he must see Roger Bacon and discuss the whole matter with him, not even excluding, if the Friar proved friendly, Lady Ulanda's prejudice and the unfortunate misunderstanding that had given birth to this prejudice.

But, as happens so often in our complicated world, this sensible course of action, taken by the only really wise and good ruler in that part of Wessex, was taken too late. The only person to be got hold of at that hour in Bumset Priory was Lay-Brother Tuck, who with some difficulty was roused from a drunken sleep. This was achieved by Bob Talirag, who obtained an entrance by climbing into the window of his Aunt Moll, an aged scullery-maid.

Brother Tuck, wrapt up against the chill of dawn in all his bedclothes, was soon seated on the top step of the Priory entrance, with the door open behind him. "The truth is my Lord," murmured the dishevelled and perspiring Tuck "I wake up slowly."

"Are we to enter without further parley, my Lord?" enquired Bob Talirag, who, having been brave enough to disturb his respected and formidable Aunt Moll, felt ready for anything.

But before Boncor could reply, above the muffled head of Brother Tuck, who was fully prepared to go to sleep again, appeared the already quite decently attired figure of Bob Talirag's aunt.

"I am sorry, my lord, to have to say such a thing — be quiet Bob! I'm not talking to you! — but the truth is, my lord, his Reverence the Prior is still fast asleep. And when his Reverence the Prior is asleep" — and Bob Talirag's aunt gave vent to a high-pitched chuckle of an experienced jackdaw who has already educated more than one brood of open-mouthed ignoramuses in the ways of the world— "nobody can see nobody".

"Could this young friend of yours, my dear Dame," enquired Boncor quietly, "run upstairs to ask Friar Bacon if I could come up to give him a word of warning?"

"One minute, my Lord," replied the lady, and disappeared; while Brother Tuck, who had roused himself to consciousness again under his perambulated bed-clothes, went on more obscurely than before:

"The question I asked King Stephen in my dream was the simple question: who was the giant who had so many wives that in the end they turned him into a puppy-dog and wouldn't let him do his business in his own palace? And do you know what King Stephen answered? He said the giant's name was Boncor! And when he uttered that name, your name, my lord, do you know what I heard? I heard a choir of angels singing in a great purple cloud, and do you know, my lord, what words they sang? They sang a song my granny taught me when I was young. It went something … something like this:

"If you're only good,
When you feel your heart prick,
In the depths of the wood
You will hear a Tick-Tick.
If you're only bad,
When you feel your heart burst,
You'll go howling mad
And take best for worst!
With the end of your rod
Mix honey and gall,
So that neither God
Nor the Devil gets all!
A drop of the worst
Is the way to the best:
Let the Devil take the first:
And let God have the rest!"

Bob Talirag could see that to the Baron of Cone this blasphemous jingle was by no means unpleasing; but the news brought by Auntie Moll, when the old lady returned from the interior of Bumset, was so startling that it drove away all other impressions.

It appeared that Albert the Great of Cologne had spent the night with Friar Bacon, and then, before any one in the Priory save Brother Tuck, who was too drunk to know his head from his tail, was awake, had carried the Friar off with him, no one knew whither. Bob Talirag's aunt was pretty certain that it was to the camp of the King's Men from London that the two of them had gone, but she wouldn't swear to this.

"Well, Mistress," said Boncor, "that's where we must go! And please accept this small token of our gratitude for your information."

Saying this he must have handed her a golden coin; for the final impression Bob Talirag had of his Aunt Moll was of her supporting Lay-Brother Tuck, bed-clothes and all, with one arm, as they went in under the curved archway, while with the other she shook her clenched fist, containing the coin she had received, in an ecstasy of exultation.

XXII. THE ORACLE

If the visit of Baron Boncor of Cone to the Priory of Bumset was too late to achieve anything to the easing of the tension in Wessex, the visit of Sir Mort to Boncor's wife Ulanda and her extremely ingenuous son was, from Sir Mort's point of view, a triumphant success. He found Lady Ulanda in more than harmony with his project, and it proved easy enough, with the assistance of the lively Colin and the resolute Clamp, not to speak of the youthful Sir William, who might himself have well been called a "King's Man", to add the toughest of the Cone retainers to his own stalwarts.

"I'll come with you! I'll come with you! I'll come with you!" cried Lady Ulanda; and then to her son: "No! Never mind where your Father's gone! It's a grand chance for you to show your metal as a true knight of our King, who is a nephew of Richard the Lion-hearted! Besides, I'm coming myself! Yes! my child, your mother herself is coming! I've not got the blood of Rursuk and King Stephen for nothing; Sir Mort here agrees with me that we don't need Brazen Heads, or Grey Friars either, to guard our shores!

"Farewell good Turgo! Greet your master when he comes back, and say I told you to tell him that I shall be very angry indeed if he follows us! Tell him that, till his shoulder is entirely healed, he must, he must behave as a wounded man. Where the devil he's gone to now, only God knows! He has a way of climbing high hills before breakfast! I've never known him eat a morsel till he's been to the ridiculous top of some silly hill! I can't cure him of this madness. Yes! He's up there!" — and the besotted lady pointed solemnly to four visible uplands, one on the north, one on the south, one on the east, and one on the west, and gazed so reverently at each of these small eminences, that Sir Mort, accustomed to Lady Val's very different attitude to himself, began to wonder whether this formidable woman wouldn't have benefited by the advice, when she was a child, of Nurse Rampant or even of somebody like Mother Guggery.

She had an expression on her face as she raised it to those four uplands as if her husband had been a divine personage rather than a human one.

But Sir Mort kept saying to himself: "Remember this, my good friend. The greatest worries in life come from the heads of these Orders of fanatical men, whatever they call themselves, and it's worth while being a little rough, even with the elements you worship, if you can give a crack or two to these same bloody heads! There's this head of the Franciscans trying to make the thieves of Lost Towers into heroic crusaders, if they'll smash the Brazen Head along with its maker's head! And now here's this Cologne fellow, who's head of the Black Friars, and who's bound to be savagely hostile to every Grey Friar in the land, whether he's a Head-maker or a Head-breaker!"

In such terms did what we have been taught to call "thought" pass in and out of Sir Mort's skull. And meanwhile the whole party, made up of the best fighters of both the Fortress and Cone Castle, didn't take long in reaching the outskirts of the former. There quite suddenly and without giving the lovers time to move, they came upon Peleg and Ghosta embracing each other beneath an oak tree.

After a hurried glance at Lady Ulanda — but that pathetically infatuated devotee of her lawful mate was so occupied with hill-tops that she had no eye for the roots of oaks — Sir Mort addressed the lovers in his most friendly and direct manner. He wasn't even humorous at their expense. He took the whole thing naturally and, as some historian would have put it, "in his stride".

"I tell you what you two might do for me," he told them. "You might run into the armoury and bring out the Brazen Head. You could carry it, couldn't you, Peleg? And you wouldn't mind putting a hand on it, would you, lady, if the thing tottered a bit on his shoulders? You see, don't you, that if we're to finish off these devils by the help of the King's Men, we mustn't leave any hostages behind?"

It can be imagined how quickly the lovers obeyed him; and this daring worshipper of the elements was not to prod the earth, splash the rain-water in a hollow elder-stump, wave his spear in the air and brandish it towards the only star still visible, before the Mongolian Jew-giant, accompanied by Ghosta with one long white arm raised to the Thing on her friend's shoulder, rejoined the weirdly heterogeneous group that, with Ulanda in its centre blazing with love and hate, now appeared at the entrance to Lost Towers.

Lilith was already there, and Perspicax with his King's Men was already there. Never since he first fabricated his demonic lodestone, after a much longer time spent upon it than Friar Roger ever spent on the Brazen Head, had Petrus Peregrinus felt more excited than he felt at this supreme hour of his life.

He had had to earn his living under terribly heavy handicaps so as to get the leisure to study, whereas Bacon's family after the defeat of Simon de Montfort had at least recovered something, though not very much, of their considerable manorial property. Not that Friar Roger had kept one silver piece of his private inheritance. The amount he had spent— "squandered", some would say, "given back to the Devil", was a more common opinion — on his scientific labours, was really startling. But it had all gone, and now he had nothing but what he could get, as a begging Friar, from the imaginative, the pious, and the charitable.

But here they were! Yes, here was the imprisoned Friar, and here was the wandering native of Maricourt, the one watching his Brazen Head swaying to and fro on the shoulder of a Jewish giant, and the other pressing his precious lodestone against his own body as he awaited his chance, not only to prove that in his person Antichrist had actually come, but to do something with "Little Pretty" in the presence of all men, that would show the world — even if he died while showing it — that by magnetism, and by magnetism alone, did the stars move on their courses, and Suns and Moons wax and wane!

It was Albertus Magnus, and he alone, who caught the full significance of this strange conclave, which was partly a human council of war against the caprices of Nature, and partly a parliament of primitive superstitious tribes instinctively fearful of being tricked into mystic slavery to some crafty Khan of Karakorum!

The red-brown jerkins and tunics and breeches, and the red-brown caps with short brown-and-white feathers sticking out in a queerly insolent and defiant manner, either above the wearer's left ear or above his right ear, according to his individual taste, were drawn up in thick battalions on the two stony ridges in front of the main entrance to Lost Towers.

They were armed with the most deadly-looking weapons, like broad double-edged Roman sword-blades fixed into the massive handles of ordinary hunting spears. It seemed to Albertus that the King's Men under Perspicax would not have a chance of victory, even though assisted by the wilder and less disciplined retainers from Gone Castle and the Fortress.

But the Cologne teacher had hardly reached this conclusion, with which without doubt most of his efficient and practical friends in that great centre of learning would have entirely agreed, when the sort of unexpected confusion arose such as probably only that particular portion of England in the whole western half of the entire world could have evoked.

The Lord and Lady of Lost Towers were evidently quarrelling between themselves; for the man's voice and the woman's voice were clearly audible above the general hoarse murmur and the general jarring chatter.

Presently both their figures, each pushed forward, evidently by their immediate attendants, hers female, and his male, were projected through the red-black lines with their alarming weapons and forced to come forward, though it was evident to everybody that the real force of the emotional feelings of those two was directed, not against the King's men and not against the mass of men from the Fortress and from Cone, but solely against each other.

But something less personal and much more far-reaching was now beginning to happen. This dangerous disturbance did not — so it seemed to Albertus — have any connection with the quarrel between their Lord and their Lady. It sprang from among a group of serfs, who were clearly setting out to do some autumnal job in the harvest-field and had just been met by similar groups from both the manors of Cone and Roque, who had joined the free followers of their respective lords of the manor out of curiosity rather than local patriotism.

Among these were old Dod Pole, that natural-born rebel, and several of his family, including not only little Bet, his great-granddaughter, but also his granddaughter Oona, or Una as many people called her, with whom — at least so we overheard the impulsive young John declare — his brother Tilton was in love.

These serfs, tagging along with the Fortress and Cone people, had quickly become the noisiest among their whole dramatic crowd, and talking earnestly among them by this time was none other than the outlandish figure of Spardo, mounted on his horse Cheiron, at the sight of whom, as it may be well believed, the father of Tilton and young John felt some rather odd feelings!

And not only at the sight of that pair was it Sir Mort's destiny, that fine morning, to suffer curious sensations; for lo and behold! before his very eyes, only sufficiently far away for him not to have to undergo any immediate responsibility — and what in the devil's name had brought them here? — were all his own family except Lady Val herself! There they all were: John so dark and slight and eager, Tilton so massively tall and fair and impassive, yes! and even Lil-Umbra herself, on horseback as usual — how that wench did love riding! — and her wise and tactful knight from Laon on horseback at her side.

Thank the gods, yes! His daughter was certainly like himself and knew sound wood from rotten wood! Would he never be able to make Valentia more sensible? The egoism of Sir Mort was so profoundly self-centred that it never entered his head to ask of destiny the obvious question — how it was that, just on this critical day and at this crucial hour when the Master and the Mistress of Lost Towers, having exhausted their verbal artillery, had become a pair of motley antagonists, wrestling in the midst of their red-brown retainers, all the whole neighbourhood supported by the enterprising Perspicax with the King's Men should have appeared on the scene to witness the victory of defeat of one or other of these sad, mad, and absurdly fantastic persons!

But the really scrupulous historian of the reckless and quite crazy doings of all of us mortal men will have made a shrewd guess already as to the particular cause of this queer concatenation.

"O how wonderful," said Petrus Peregrinus to himself, "how wonderful, O how far beyond all I have ever hoped or imagined or dreamed could happen to me, to actually be selected by" — he was going to utter the word "Providence" but just stopped himself in time!— "by Destiny, to be the Antichrist himself, the real, actual, historic person predicted by every prophet who ever prophesied from the foundation of the world!"

Deep into the top-curve of the bony arch between his belly and his thighs, and just above his generative organs, Petrus had dug the blunt, thick, staring-eyed cranium of the demonic lodestone he persisted in calling "Little Pretty", and while he dug it into himself, he had summoned into his presence every living person old or young, male or female, he had ever met or ever heard of in that district.

"I'll have your false heart out of you!" cried the Lady of Lost Towers.

"I'll tear the devil's-dam tongue out of your hell's throat for you!" cried the Lord of Lost Towers.

And then, before either Bonaventura in his grey robe or Albertus in his black robe could force a passage through the red-brown mêlée, some devoted adherent of the mistress of the Castle smashed the master's skull with a heavy stone, and some furious armour-bearer of the murdered Maldung knelt on the lady and strangled her to death with his two hands, before his own head was severed from his crouching body and all three corpses were soaked in his blood.

For several seconds there was a ghastly hush after this, as if over that whole worked-up mass of human creatures an enormous dark feather had fallen from the Empyrean, a feather struck from the wing of the Eagle of Zeus by the lightning-swift descent of some falling star.

Then the whole company of serfs who were present — those who had been following old Dod Pole, their one revolutionary mouth-piece, as well as those who were on their way to their labour in the fields — moved instinctively forward, while Dod Pole himself, leaping up from their midst upon the marble pedestal of the broken and prostrate figure of some forgotten Roman ruler, almost hidden now under yellow moss and white lichen and tiny ferns, began an exultant threnody over all the deaths of all the wrongful owners of a planet that should be owned in common by all mankind.

“I call upon you, my brothers and fellow workers,” cried old Dod Pole, in that trumpet-toned voice which had made him the prophet of those Wessex serfs for the last half century, “I call upon you to let these manor-lords, with their reeves and their bailiffs and their priests and their prelates, know, once for all, how we, the people of the West Country, really regard them and hold them! We hold them in contempt! We hold them to be thieves and robbers who claim the hell-born and not heaven-born right to hand down their stolen property from generation to generation!

“Yes, my friends, it is we who plough and sow and plant and reap and gather the harvest and bake the bread and butcher the meat! It is we, the shepherds and the hedge-planters, we, the cattle-tenders and the swine-herders, who own this sacred and holy and God-given earth of ours! Did these manor-lords create the earth? Did these water-lords create the seas and the rivers and the lakes and the ponds? Did they create the beasts of the earth and the fishes of the sea? Was it at their command that the birds of the air first spread their wings?

“Come, my friends, my companions, my brothers, let us make haste to show to these land-robbers and sea-shore thieves what their true position on this earth really is! They are all the same, every one of them! Handing down they are what they’ve stolen, from father to son, and son to grandson; and all the good earth and all the precious sea-shore of which they have robbed us curses them as wicked thieves! Come let us show them what we think of them! To your tents, O Israel!”

There must have been some immemorial power in this final cry, uttered in a really terrifying voice by old Dod Pole; for a most striking result followed at once, followed with that thundering finality that mankind knows as the most awe-inspiring sound in all human experience — a reverberating echo.

"Off with ye! Off with ye!" were now the words that rose from that whole heaving mass of red-brown rascality; and what they all proceeded to do came with the shock of a long-predicted earthquake that has now come. They tore off their mud-coloured tunics and jerkins, yes! and even in some cases their breeches too; though it interested the half-mad intelligence of Sir Mort to note that they had the wit — and he smiled sympathetically as he observed this — to throw nothing away.

Warm though the sun was, there was quite enough of autumn already in the air to make this a natural gesture, especially as the marshes and swamps to the west of Lost Towers only ended at the sand-dunes of the channel.

What most of them did was to wrap their mud-coloured vestments round their necks, though some, it is true, made bundles of them which they carried under their arms or even on their heads. But it was to the beat of the reverberating echo of Dod Pole's "Off with ye!" that they vanished among the pine-trunks of the forest and the reedstalks of the swamp.

And so now, wholly devoid of any defence at all, the great gates of the ancient stronghold of Lost Towers stood wide open. And they stood open in front of the most fantastic conglomeration of people that had ever gathered together in that part of Wessex for any purpose, whether in the stone age, or in the bronze age, or in the age of King Arthur.

The whole company gazed in silence upon those open doors at the base of that huge tower; and it was as if their united will-power had called upon Lilith to appear. For there, before the whole lot of them, Lilith now defiantly stood; and it seemed as if, in her complete loneliness, she were uttering a contemptuous challenge to every event and every object and every earthly person and every super-earthly person in the entire multiverse.

And Petrus Peregrinus, as he watched her, felt an overpowering wave of emotion sweep over him. "Yes!" he thought. "You, and you alone, come what may, in this world or any other world, are my one true love, and with you at my side I shall feel myself to be the real and only real Antichrist, destined by the creative power of Nature herself to destroy once and for all this poisonous, this corrupt, this rotten, this suppurating, this decomposing, this infecting, this contaminatory, this fulsome, this fetid, this fatal farce of an explanation of life, based on a crazy belief in the Persons of the Trinity."

Rendered almost heroic, cruel coward as he was, by this wild resurgence of his love for Lilith, Petrus of Maricourt rushed up the slope, and leaping over the corpses and splashing through the blood, was on the point of ascending the stone pavement in the centre of which she stood, when between them, hot and perspiring with the effort he was making, appeared in grey and greedy stateliness, the figure of Bonaventura.

"O St. Francis, help your child now or never!" was what the man prayed; and with every nerve in his body he announced to himself, "This is my moment! I shall be the next Pope myself or the appointer of the next Pope! I must lay my hand, before this whole crowd, upon this girl's head!"

In the twinkling of an eye, yes! in the pulse-beat of the most incorrigible vein in his whole body, Petrus turned the blunt thickskulled cranium of his "Little Pretty" full upon this grey-garbed interloper. "Off you go, my stately friend!" he murmured in his heart as he kept the other end — the "tail" we might call it — of his deadly lodestone pressed tight against himself.

Nor was the response for a second in doubt.

“That girl is too great a temptation!” the appointer of Popes told himself. “I should do for myself if I touched the tip of her fingers! A person can’t have it both ways! In a country of devils such as this England is, a natural-born Saint like me can make no headway. I have heard that even their famous Robert Grosseteste thought sometimes about making Brazen Images that could speak! No! Where there is any northern influence at all some sort of devilry’s sure to enter.

“Yes, dear God, I hear you, dear God, you are the only one in the whole world who understands me, I hear you clearly! You are advising me to take ship at once for France, and when well across their channel of sea-devils to make my way to Dijon and then to Avignon. No! I’ll be too dignified to bid anybody farewell. I expect they will listen all the better to that shallow orator from Cologne.

“They tell me that he, just like this Bacon from Ilchester, has long been promising all the boys who come to see him, especially if they come from Italy, grants from the Pope, for O! how he longs to put a little devilry from the north into the mind of that pupil of his called Aquinas! But you won’t succeed, you ugly great lecturer on the loves of bed-bugs and on the moral yearnings of will-o’-the-wisps! You won’t succeed!

“No! No! The north will always breed new devils for the south to exorcize. Yes, I must be off at once to the nearest sea-port. Why! There is that funny horse with the swollen neck, and that crazy fellow who takes it about! God must have sent that pair especially to take me to the coast!”

With these words comforting his heart, Bonaventura strode off. He knew well that he, the great Franciscan Pope-maker, if not the next Pope, was simply running away. But he justified his precipitate flight on the sound rational ground — and the unprejudiced chronicler must recognize that this was an authentic justification — that to be defeated in single spiritual combat by Albertus would be a much more serious blow to his personal career than a swift strategic retreat, a retreat which could always be explained as a sudden imperative call from Rome.

With all these thoughts settling themselves in his mind he now strode with as much dignity and self-possession down the slope as he had done a few minutes earlier up the slope, and even Albertus himself couldn’t resist observing with a sort of humorous self-derogatory admiration, that was almost like the feeling of a rival athlete, the way Bonaventura managed his feet and his steps under that grey robe as he descended, calling aloud in authoritative tones to Spardo, and, when at Cheiron’s side, hesitating not a second to mount the animal, an effort which he carried through with dignified ease and even with a certain grace.

Spardo himself, it must be confessed, was not greatly pleased by being taken possession of in this wholesale manner. Even if his employment by Bonaventura turned out well as a matter of business, he was not the son of his father for nothing. There was something ignoble in forsaking this tragic drama at the crucial point. But what was the alternative?

Cheiron was responding with interest to the way Bonaventura managed the reins; and the best thing he himself could do now was to make an exit worthy of leaving Lost Towers to its fate. And a dramatic exit he did manage to make. He suddenly seized, as he followed Cheiron and Cheiron’s stately rider, one of the massive pikestaves, which were really very dangerous weapons, carried by the King’s Men.

The person whose weapon Spardo seized naturally refused to relinquish it, until Perspicax himself, who was only a few paces away and who wasn’t at all anxious to start trouble, gave the man a nod to let him have the thing. Once in his possession none of the King’s Men, nor any member of any conceivable body-guard of royal persons, could have handled this weapon, in which the piercingness of a spear is mingled in such appalling unity with the cleavingness of an axe, more professionally than Spardo.

“Bastard I may be,” every swing and sweep of his feather-like beard seemed to chant to the hairy flanks of Cheiron and the flapping skirts of Bonaventura, “Bastard I may be, but my father was a King! Where is there a King here, among these petty baronies and manories and flanories? Kings of Bohemia are Kings indeed; and, as the song says, ‘the heart of the laurel is in its seed’; but these scrabblement codfish blown in from the sea haven’t got a King nearer than London; and the one they’ve got is a dying one, ‘fed upon pap and sleeping on sap’, as the song says.”

To feel this terrific weapon in his hand, and to feel that with it he could destroy anyone he wished at any moment, gave Spardo such lively satisfaction that it reconciled him to following his horse and its stately rider, even though it meant his own departure from this memorable scene; but by keeping a firm hold with his free hand on the back of Cheiron’s saddle he considerably reduced the pace of their retirement.

After using all his own magnetic will-power in addition to all the magnetism in his precious lodestone, to bring everybody to this particular spot, Petrus Peregrinus was beginning to find that it was easier to bring people together than to manage them when they were brought. Here certainly they all were!

But he knew only too well, as pressing “Little Pretty’s” oblong cranium harder and harder against himself, he awaited the next move of chance or providence, that his own future was anything but assured.

Suddenly he became aware that, not only was the black-robed form of Albertus Magnus approaching him, but that the gigantic figure of Peleg, carrying the Brazen Head itself on his shoulder, with Ghosta at his side with one arm raised to help in supporting the thing’s weight, was also, yard by yard, slowly ascending the slope.

What unluckily nobody had seen — or luckily perhaps, for who can tell from what horrors to be safely dead may save any of us — was that by the force of his scientific magnetism Petrus had drawn Heber Sygerius, the old ex-bailiff himself, out of Sir Mort’s “Little Room”, and dragged him all through the forest, and not by the easiest route either, till he sank absolutely exhausted, just where this particular trail ended, at the foot of the Lost Towers slope.

Old Heber knew exactly where he was; and the odd thing was that, though totally exhausted and unable to advance another step, he felt, as he stretched himself out on the warm, dead, dry, brown pine-needles, and allowed his whole body to relax and his whole being to sink down and down and down and down into a deep delicious bed of submission to the need for everlasting rest, a wave of greater happiness than he had ever known in all his long life.

It may well be that what gives to the wind along that Wessex coast its indescribable mixture of vague sorrow and wild obscure joy comes from its passing, on its unpredictable path, the floating hair of so many love-lorn maidens and the wild-tossed beards of so many desolate old men.

As it blew now across those forests and those swamps, it might have been suspected of taking a goblinish delight in switching and twitching and bewitching the crazy wisps that fluttered this way and that from Spardo’s chin. Was its long-drawn wail made deeper, was its wild exultation made shriller, when it became the choric accompaniment to Spardo’s careless killing of the one man in all that place who had prayed morning by morning and night by night for years that he might perish by just such a stroke and cross Acheron while he slept? For with the weapon he had snatched the Bohemian Bastard beheaded old Heber.

It must have been his awareness of the black-robed teacher from Cologne advancing so rapidly up the slope behind him that made Peter Peregrinus start running towards Lilith, as she stood defying all possible universes with her slender girlish back to the open doors of the absolutely empty and deserted Lost Towers. When he was just beneath her and only a foot or so below her, he gazed passionately at her face. He not only felt an over-mastering longing to possess her, but a longing to possess her in complete solitude. And where could he find such solitude if not within the mysterious castle before him, at whose entrance she stood?

But as he gazed at her he saw to his dismay that there had come into her face a look of horror at him and of loathing of him and of contempt for him, such as he had never seen upon anyone’s face before.

“All the same for that”, as Homer puts it when he deals with these crises in human affairs, Petrus moved towards her. What drove him, what actuated him was clear enough. The difficult question for any chronicler to decide is the question as to whence within the almost closed circle of this strange man’s consciousness he drew the strength, the energy, the spirit, to enable him to risk all, in this almost heroic manner? For that he was risking all was a truth he felt in himself, and of which he had not the slightest doubt.

And yet, cold-blooded, calculating, unscrupulous egoist as he was, he could not have been blind to the fact that there was no reason in the ordinary natural course of events why anyone, who so far had derived all sorts of thrilling feelings from being alone in life and being absolutely impervious to everything save his own private, uncommitted responses to life, should run a risk of this magnitude. Yes, from what region, or channel, or nerve in his being, did he derive the courage to take such a chance? Is it perhaps that in the lives of all human beings there come moments when some particular desire — in Peregrinus's case just now, what we call "the passion of love" — drives such a sharp wedge into the rocky substance of our animal nature that it goes clean through it, leaving a slit or crevice or crack in the mysterious thing that Grosseteste taught Roger Bacon to analyse very carefully, the thing which the theologians declared to be the vegetative soul of the foetus developing a nutritive soul, which is thus laid open for "Something", we can call it a rational soul, to enter from the limitless Outside when the infant is born.

Yes, he was risking his all and he knew it. And yet with this strength that came to him from somewhere outside himself, perhaps from the great "Outside" of all our planetary struggles, he still went forward, pressing the lodestone desperately against the fork of his body and repeating hoarsely in the depths of his being: "I am Antichrist! I am Antichrist!"

Lilith retreated till she was in the space between the two big doors; then seizing them both with outstretched arms, she tried to shut herself inside. But she was too late; and it was together, and with a combined effort, that they finally got the great doors shut and barred, leaving only their dark woodwork in the centre of that vast structure of stone as the target for all that crowd of onlookers.

Only one of the numerous people, whom the demonic power in Peter of Maricourt's lodestone had succeeded in gathering before those closed gates, gave any thought at that moment to what was happening behind those closed doors, and that one was Roger Bacon.

"It is like what went on," he told himself, "between the Devil and the first wife of Adam; the very same devil who a little later was present at the creation of Eve. If I weren't so tired I'd work out a clear map of these zodiacal revolutions in Time and Space."

It was indeed only natural that our Friar felt "tired" as he had not been out of his prison-chamber for more than a year. But he felt in good spirits and extremely interested in all he saw. So he seated himself on the mossy root of the oldest oak-tree in sight, a tree that might well have been an offshoot of the yet older one on which the bird rested who first brought to Britain the news of the death of Jesus; and from this secure position, as he contemplated the crowd and watched his own creation, the Brazen Head, balanced on the shoulder of Peleg and supported by what Homer would have called the "leukolenian" arm of the stately Ghosta, he allowed his mind to drift in a mood of fascinated wonder over the long eddies and aberrations of mankind's historic pilgrimage down the ages, pondering upon its pathetic, humorous, and tragical struggles with itself, with Nature, and with the innumerable false prophets and false gods who from the beginning have led us all astray.

But as he rested under that oak, half-awake and half-asleep and unusually happy, he suddenly became aware, by no very unnatural thought-transference, of the laboured approach to his side of none other than Lay-Brother Tuck from the Priory. The most hostile historian could have caught nothing but friendly amusement in the tone wherein this anticipator of all mankind's wildest inventions replied to this interruption when he heard himself greeted by Brother Tuck.

"Sit down, Brother," was all the Friar said. "So you've come for me, have you? Well, well! We shan't have any trouble except in our own legs as we go back. O no! I haven't the faintest intention of leaving my room in the Priory, my 'Prison' some call it, but you and I know better! We know how little I regard it as anything like that! What did I become a Friar for? Wasn't it for a quiet study to work in? You know that, Tuck old friend, as well as I do! Nobody but you, Tuck old rogue — Here! Sit you down here! You must be fairly done in after all that distance! — nobody but you knows what racy stories go round in our rollicking Bumset!

“Yes, and nobody but I know what a patient listener you are, my dear, to my irreverent gossip about the so-called ‘makers of history’, whose crazy ideas I have to describe to the Holy Father to prove I’m not idling away my time.

“Just look at all these people, Tuck! Just look at them! Do you know what got them here? I can’t tell you exactly; but I can tell you this much. It has to do with a discovery in magnetism by this acquaintance of mine — I hesitate to call him a friend, as, to confess the truth, I’m rather scared of him and a bit nervous — I always have been since I first encountered the man somewhere abroad — I don’t think it was in Paris — a bit nervous — you know how cowardly I am, Tuck old friend! — that he might start his magnetic experiments on me!

“But let him go. And by God, he has gone! He’s behind those barred gates now, practising on young Mistress Lilith, who’s just watched her parents murder each other, and seen all their people and all their serfs bolt after a speech by Dod Pole! Yes, that Lilith-girl watched her father and mother fight to the death; and then saw all her people, both bond and free, strip off their clothes and rush away into the woods and marshes!

“Old Dod Pole made one of those orations of his that everyone’s been telling me about. And do you know, Tuck my friend, the old boy struck some note in my midriff that brought back to my mind a scene at Montacute when — but what on earth is that Dominican from Cologne, and a demi-semi bishop he is, too, preaching about now up there? Can you catch what he’s saying?”

It was clear enough that Brother Tuck had caught very distinctly one point anyway in the Dominican’s speech: “Well! I never thought I’d live to hear — —” he now cried out.

Roger Bacon turned to him with the most lively interest. “Hear what? For God’s sake, old friend, stop chuckling like an enamoured goblin and tell me what the fellow’s saying! You’ve had lots of foreigners in your kitchen and ought to know their accent by now! My long walk to this confounded place and this wild wind and the whistling of those King’s Men seem to have made me stone deaf.”

Lay-Brother Tuck rose on his toes, for the angel who presided at his birth had decreed that, if he was to be the merriest of the sons of his mother, he must consent to be the shortest. He also seized a branch of the oak above the Friar’s head and hoisted himself up a little, placing a screen of leaves between Roger Bacon and the astonishing spectacle before him.

But the Friar had trained himself too long to accept such crampings of vision to fall into a rage because he now couldn’t see this black-robed figure at the gate of Lost Towers any better than he could hear him.

“He’s got a thing on his head,” announced Brother Tuck, “more like a turban than a mitre.”

“Never mind what he’s got on his head, Tuck. Tell me, for Jesus’s sake, what the fellow’s saying.”

“He’s offering to marry anybody who wants to be married.”

“Nonsense, Tuck! Nonsense! No priest of our time, even if he were Archbishop of Ireland, would stand on a hill before the gates of Hell and offer marriage to the world!”

“But he is, he is! I tell you, Friar, he is! He’s saying that the great evil of our time is that people don’t marry early enough!”

“Not early enough, Tuck! God in Heaven! Haven’t I been trying all my life to stop this curst habit of marrying little girls of twelve to old men of sixty? Not early enough! What will these doctors of theology want to do next? Marry babies to each other? Marry foetuses in separate wombs, on the chance that they turn out of opposite sexes?

“The truth must be that we monks and nuns and friars are finding our celibate life so indescribably tedious that we want to increase the number of these kicking, scratching, biting, beating, strangling couples, in order that we can at least feel thankful we’re free from the claws of a mate! But shall we never see, O my turtle-dove of Tucks, that it’s our mania for marriage itself that’s spoiling our world? Nature can provide us with loyal and faithful mates without our having formally to create such monstrosities of scratching and clawing.”

Friar Roger continued for several minutes this diatribe against marriage; but Lay-Brother Tuck was by this time far too fascinated by what was going on to pay his metaphysical friend any further attention.

Roger Bacon’s own mind, however, was itself soon wandering from the problem of marriage. It was of astrology he was thinking now as he stared heavenward above the left buttock of Brother Tuck and through an impenetrable mass of oak-leaves. Thus it was not the mid-day sunshine beating down on the black robes and elaborate head-dress of the teacher of St. Thomas Aquinas that the inventor of the Brazen Head was now beholding, but the black abysses of the star-sprinkled midnight sky wherein he saw, although many of them would in reality when midnight came have been totally invisible, all the stars that were important as signs of the zodiac.

But something in the whole atmosphere of this particular spot on the earth’s surface at this particular moment soon forced our great scientist’s mind back upon the religious creed which from childhood he had been taught to take for granted.

He shut his eyes to both the blue sun-bright sky of reality and the black starlit sky of his imagination and began murmuring to himself:

“Dicit ut audiat vocem Domini et vocem angelorum et videat angelos transfiguratos — He says that he heard the voice of the Lord and the voice of angels and that he saw transfigured angels.

“Christo vero habuit divinum testimonium, quod testimonium Deus Pater fecit ei — Christ truly had a divine testimony, namely the testimony which God the Father himself made on his behalf.

“Hic est Filius Meus dilectus in quo mihti complacuit. This is my Beloved Son in whom I am well pleased.”

Had some observant passer-by, endowed, let us suppose, with the power of reading a person’s thoughts, caught the drift of the Friar’s murmured words, he might well have been astonished that so great a scientist, whose inventions were beginning to be the wonder of the whole intellectual world, should be muttering at a crisis like this sentences that were involved in the very foundation of the Christian faith. The truth was that Roger Bacon had taken Aristotle for granted with one side of his nature, and the New Testament equally for granted with the other side of his nature, and had never, as Albertus of Cologne did, brought them into logical opposition to each other and into logical relation with each other.

But, after all, Friar Roger’s ways are the ways of Nature herself in regard to these abysmal matters. Out of the confusion which she seems to prefer to any orderly workshop, Nature seems anxious to thicken out the drama she has inaugurated by creating ironic commentaries upon her own doings, whose choruses are not so much the expression of approval or disapproval as of humorous recognition, and produce the effect of a faint orchestral accompaniment, an accompaniment that reaches us from extremely far away and possibly from a sphere totally different from our own.

If Friar Bacon had not been so absorbed in his interior vision of the signs of the zodiac and of the relation between Mercurius and Virgo and in the agitating conclusion he had reached — for to him by far the most interesting aspect of astronomy was astrology — about the perilous influence of our earthly satellite, the Moon— “Luna significat super-nigromanciam et mendacium — The moon is significant of higher black magic and trickery” — he would have doubtless had some striking commentary to make upon what was now going on in front of those closed gates of Lost Towers.

All that morning Albertus Magnus had been saying to himself: “Whatever it was that brought all these people here and brought me on the top of them all, I’d be worse than the self-conscious fool I am if I didn’t take advantage of it in some way. That’s what’s the matter with me. I’m no good at creating situations. I just accept them and make the necessary plunges and darts and dives and gestures as seem called for.

“The one single act of my whole life” — so the great teacher’s thoughts ran on, even after he had begun acting his part for today— “that I did entirely on my own and under no influence from outside was when I gave up that bishopric: aye!” and Albertus indulged in a grotesque dramatic shudder and wrinkled up all his malleable features; “aye! aye! but it was an appalling experience, those two years of being a bishop! But what on earth am I going to do with this chance the Lord has thrown in my path?”

And then the inspiration came to him.

“Sex is the maddest force there is. Why then not consecrate this madness? All the way down the history of our race — not to speak of certain beasts and birds — males and females have gone through curious ceremonies to celebrate this union. When we Christianize marriage, it is to demonstrate our share in Christ’s own desperate and eternal act of faith that

He was the Son of God. Sex is the greatest pleasure and the greatest pain in life; and the ceremonious consecration of the joining together of sex-mates has been the instinctive retort of all animal life to the insanity of sex from the beginning of the world.”

Thus did the thoughts of Albertus Magnus run on, even while he began the quaint performance into which his “guardian angel”, or, if you like, “his conscience” — although that word introduces just as many insoluble riddles — had now precipitated him.

“Come hither my son Tilton, sculptor and carver and builder of a shrine! Come hither my daughter Una, of the family of Pole, largest of all the families upon the said manor! If you Tilton take you Una to be your wedded wife, and if you Una take you Tilton to be your wedded husband, all the old deep rifts, between those who work on the land and those who own and fight for the land, will be healed!”

To the absolute amazement of Brother Tuck and of a good many others of those who were watching this queer scene, but not to the surprise of young John, who was now standing at Sir Mort’s side and explaining to him more things than Sir Mort could or would or can be imagined ever wanting to understand, both Tilton and Una now appeared hand-in-hand before Albertus Magnus.

So accustomed was Albertus to this particular ceremony, every word of which he knew by heart, that it was not long before this pair’s union was consecrated, consecrated before men and before birds and beasts and angels and demons, consecrated as one flesh.

This had no sooner been done than bursting forth from the band of people who surrounded Sir Mort, and followed with obvious anxiety by both the Baron Boncor and his boy-knight Sir William, there emerged in a furious rush of frenzy like a shrieking Valkyrie the figure of Lady Ulanda, whose whole body — since to increase her speed, or perhaps deliberately to enhance the effect of her wrath, she kept tearing from her person one flimsy garment after another — was positively contorted with emotion.

It was purely against Friar Bacon that her anger was directed; for, by his cold refusal on that one fatal visit of hers to his room, to play the part of her dresser-up and devoted medico-magico, he had hurt that centre of a woman's life-illusion, a blow to which goes deeper into her essential being than if you cut off one of her arms at the wrist or one of her feet at the ankle.

When she reached the spot where the gigantic Peleg was standing, with Roger Bacon's Brazen Head upon his shoulder, to the pedestal of which — for the Head had nothing except that neck upon which Ghosta had confessed to have had, in complete nakedness, a mysterious sexual ecstasy — Ghosta's perfect white arms were now raised, Ulanda for one second stood still.

Then with a wild cry she flung herself, not only against the weird Object, alive and yet not alive, created by the Friar, but upon all three of them, clawing at Peleg's throat with one hand, seizing Ghosta's right arm with the other, and shaking them both so violently that the Brazen Head fell to the ground!

By what some would call Providence, others Chance, and yet others the protective power of the Devil, the Brazen Head descended to the earth the right way up, and indeed sank into a patch of grass so smoothly and easily that it rested there at once in complete quiescence, as if that little patch of greenery had risen to meet it out of the abyss as its destined home.

There was something about this startling event, whether you considered it an event in favour of the Head or against the interest of the Head, that affected everybody who was looking on. The person who was most affected was young John; for his link with Roger Bacon was so intimate and close that to see Roger's creation fall from the giant Peleg's shoulder clear to the ground was more than young John's heart could bear, and he acted as a child might have done.

He fell on his knees, covered his face with his hands, and burst into a fit of violent sobbing and weeping. Young John's sobs, however, since he knelt on the ground and pressed his hands to his face, were not loud enough to turn people's attention away from Albertus Magnus.

This simple-minded great man, who had become without knowing it the most important teacher in the world, having successfully married John's dear brother Tilton to the beautiful Una or Oona and thus having ended the feud between the old rebel Dod Pole and the bailiff-family of Sygerius, had evidently, in that energetic innocence and inspired foolhardiness that characterized him, decided to continue his marriage campaign and had summoned, loudly and clearly, Raymond de Laon and Lil-Umbra to come before him.

The sound of their names roused Sir Mort from the trance he'd fallen into, a trance, or a cessation of every bodily activity save breath and pulse and heart-beat, which was more familiar to his family than any other mood of his, but which covered in reality a much more consciously philosophical attitude to life than Lady Val or his three children realized.

Sir Mort was a queer mixture of a predatory animal with the sort of animal that predatory creatures, including men, are so addicted to hunting: and it now struck him that here was a supreme opportunity for an absolute escape from all those accompaniments of marriage that Lady Val would most certainly have insisted upon. It pleased him also to note that Lady Ulanda, who was now clinging to her husband's arm with an expression of abandoned and doting felicity, was evidently beside herself with satisfaction at having caused the collapse of Roger Bacon's Brazen Head, even if no further than to the ground.

It was a lucky thing for young John, this abrupt and unexpected summons of Lil-Umbra and her betrothed Raymond to this unpremeditated exchange of marriage vows; for Tilton and his bride had roused Sir Mort from his "hunter's trance," and were conversing eagerly with him, and there was no one immediately available to hold the horses of these new candidates for the marriage sacrament. So that it fell to the lot of young John to stand between these two horses, one of which was called "Rip" and the other "Strip", and get a tight hold on both pairs of reins.

The impetuously well-meaning Albertus was himself just then a little bit worried by a tickling at the back of one of his ears, which he erroneously fancied to be due to some mis-arrangement of his head-dress, but which really was caused by the fluttering of a midge. And it was this small annoyance that made him completely forget to use one rather important sentence in the course of the ceremony, a sentence the omission of which made no real difference but had an odd effect. But though the excited Lil-Umbra did not notice this lapse, her calmer companion stored it up in his mind as one of those humorous accidents that seem intentionally to disturb the dignity of our human life upon earth as a professional fool rattles his bells.

Although the accident to the Brazen Head had set John weeping like a child it now became necessary for him to take the two horses down the hill, where he tied them, with the help of Lay-Brother Tuck, to Friar Bacon's oak-tree.

It was a much less agitating meeting than he expected that young John had then with his adored master. The Friar treated him, he noticed, with deep pride and satisfaction, rather as a responsible fully grown-up man and as an equal, than as a pupil or disciple.

"You and I mustn't let ourselves," the Friar told him quietly, "get too agitated, whatever they do to our Brazen Head. We know he is, poor old dear, only about a fiftieth part of a real person. We've given him the power of calculation along certain lines; and I hope, though I am not quite sure about that, that in a great crisis he might even speak. But I am afraid the poor dear is still devoid of real life, for so far we haven't learnt the art of creating life, though we may learn it before we've done.

"But we must remember that all living creatures, even worms and insects and sea-shells, have a consciousness of being themselves and only themselves, and have the power of saying to themselves like Jehovah, I am that I am. I wish I could believe that our poor old Brazen Head, whom an angry woman just now threw to the ground, has the power of saying to itself: 'I am the Brazen Head, made by Roger Bacon. I am as much of a real conscious self as that daddy-long-legs now resting on my shoulder!'"

Young John couldn't even smile at this, for the occasion was too serious. Pressing his knuckles against his own cheek to prevent the flush he felt mounting up under his skin, he boldly asked him a very delicate and crucial question.

"I needn't tell you, Father," he said, "how you have always taken the place for me since I was a boy of all other human loves and devotions. When I think of embracing anyone or of being embraced and of the closest intimacies" — at this point, as he felt his cheeks begin to burn, he thought with relief that, in the burning sun-ray that poured between those branches, nothing of what he experienced beneath his skin could possibly be observed — "I seem never able to think of anybody but of you, my beloved master. Now that Tilton, my elder brother, has found a mate, it's not, I hope, my duty to marry anybody, or. to have children by anybody. Nor, as long as I feel no special call to join a religious order, is it, I hope, my duty to become a monk or a friar? What I want to do, master most dear, is to serve you and help you, until I die. When you let me take that ‘Opus’ of yours abroad and place it where I knew it would reach the Holy Father, I felt happier than I’d ever been in my life before. You don’t think, master, do you, that I’m shirking my duty by refusing to marry and have children?”

Friar Bacon only revealed by a very faint trembling in his voice how deeply he was affected by his pupil’s words. What he said was emphatic and definite.

“As long as we are considerate to other people,” he said, “and as kind and sympathetic towards them as our circumstances permit, we have all got to live to ourselves, for ourselves, in ourselves and by ourselves. This is how, as Aristotle teaches, matter produces us out of itself, as a product to satisfy its deep ‘privation’, or its desperate yearning and craving to possess what it feels could proceed from it, but what, so far in its long history, has not proceeded from it!

“You, my son, have so far dedicated your whole life to learning. And as long as you feel thus impelled, I think you should so continue. But on the other hand if by fate or chance you met a girl you loved, and who loved you, I would say you had better marry and use your education to help this old world of ours out of its ignorance in some practical and active way.

“As long as I am alive I shall cling to your help and hold fast to your love as the most precious help and the most sacred love that life has allowed me to know. And when death divides us, remember this. The fruits of a learning that has been harder than slavery to acquire will be sweeter than the roses of Sharon to enjoy.”

Ghosta had sunk down beside the Brazen Head the moment it was upon the ground, and she was still pressing the palms of her hands against its neck and against its shoulders and upon its implacably oracular chin. She wasn't weeping as John had wept, but she was evidently affected by some strong interior emotion.

And it would have been clear to anyone present at this unusual scene, whose interest had been aroused by these two immigrants from Palestine, that the gigantic Peleg, who was standing over her, was not a little disturbed by this emotion of hers.

"Have mercy upon me Almighty Jehovah, Lord God of Israel, Lord God of Sarah and Leah, of Rachel and Rebecca!" this proud, reserved, and most beautiful daughter of Israel prayed. And as she prayed, she reminded herself that in a certain sense she had quite deliberately mingled her virginal life in a weird erotic ecstasy with the sub-human, sub-animal, sub-vegetable life of this Brazen Head beside her.

"Is there," she allowed herself to whisper to the thing, "is there any way I can get rid of this mad terror I have of the passing of time?"

But Ghosta and Peleg weren't the only pair of lovers brought to that place by the magnetism of "Little Pretty."

"What is it my angel?" asked Raymond de Laon of Lil-Umbra, as in their new relation they descended the slope towards their horses. "Are you hurt? Are you afraid? Have you seen something? Have you thought of something?"

For the first time since they first met Raymond noticed that Lil-Umbra had difficulty in replying. But with an effort she spoke clearly and distinctly.

"Something terrible is going to happen! I feel it all through me. But not to us, Raymond; no, not to you or to me. But stop, Raymond. Turn and look at those closed doors!"

He gazed at her in silence, and they both swung round, her eyes wide and terrified, staring at the entrance to the Castle, but his still fixed on her face. But as so often happens in a human crisis, they were suddenly jerked out of their tension by a voice at Raymond's side; and there, close at his elbow, was none other than Lay-Brother Tuck!

"He's gone to sleep, my lord of Laon! He's gone to sleep, my lady of Leon! And I thought perhaps you'd take him back to the Priory on one of your horses and perhaps take me on the other! If you will agree to celebrate your union by this great charity before going to — to wherever you are going for your wedding-night — to the Fortress I expect — I can promise you not only my own special prayers, but the special prayers of the whole Priory of Bumset!

"The most lucky first night," Brother Tuck went on, "that a bride and bridegroom can possibly have for their first bed together is a great and sweet charity, such as it would be to both me and the Friar if you found it in you to do for us this gallant and beautiful deed!"

Lay-Brother Tuck now began to bob and babble and bubble and burble round them so buoyantly that the tender clasp with which Lil-Umbra was holding Raymond's hand became first an indignant pressure and then an angry clutch.

"Bridegroom with Bride you be!" he went on. "And I be a'begging of 'ee to let me's wone baby-self and Friar's man-mighty self sit astride of your 'osses while you makes 'em gallop. 'Gallopy up and gallopy to it! Gie her a sup and she'll let 'un do it!' Don't 'ee understand, O most elegant lord of far-away Leon, that if the blessed Friar be behind she, and me wone self be behind thee, it won't take long to be at Priory door; and a holy charity you'll have performed."

Lay-Brother Tuck kept bobbing round them so vigorously and making with his short bare arms so many effective if quite inaudible shoo-ings and shush-ings that, in their present dazed state, Lil-Umbra upset by her premonition of catastrophe, and Raymond wondering what Lady Val would say if they did follow Tuck's suggestion and spend their wedding night in the Fortress, they were rushed down the hill just as if they'd been a goose and a gander, until they actually reached the oak under which Friar Bacon, in complete abstraction from all immediate events, was composing one of his most comprehensive sentences as to the relation between astronomy and astrology; and before they really knew what had happened to them, they were cantering rapidly towards Bumset and towards an extremely bewildered reception by Prior Bog.

Albertus Magnus of Cologne, having finished what in the energetic and impulsive simplicity of his mind he had suddenly conceived to be the will of the Maker and Sustainer of our incomprehensible universe, came slowly down the slope towards the group of manorial lords and their families who now surrounded Tilton and his bride Una. To the end of that generation some sticklers for local tradition persisted in calling Una by the more romantic name of Oona; and in his desire to make his brother as poetical as he could, so that he might be as far as possible from his own scientific and philosophical ideal, young John always warmly and ardently supported the Oona side in the division of opinion as to this maiden's name.

Indeed it more than once crossed the mind of Lil-Umbra, when she noted Tilton's interest in this beautiful member of what might be called the revolutionary family of old Dod Pole, whose influence was so great among the serfs of the Manor of Roque, that there was really something more daring and unconventional about Tilton's unashamed attraction to a girl of this class than in all young John’s free-thinking attitude towards the foundations of the Christian faith.

What on earth their mother would think, what on earth their mother would feel, what on earth their mother would do and say, when Tilton and his bride, whether she was called Una or Oona, got home to the family hearth that night, she hardly dared to imagine.

“I mustn’t, I can’t wish this man from Cologne hadn’t come among us,” she said to herself. “But with Mother’s excitable nerves where anything to do with marriage comes in, and her sensitiveness about noble blood and noble manners, she may be furious with Father for letting this Albertus marry us off like this, as calmly as a Spanish prince breeds Arabian horses!”

But it was not of Tilton’s bride that Lil-Umbra was thinking as she accompanied Raymond in their wild ride to the Priory, carrying with them both the creator of the Brazen Head and the Priory court fool, Lay-Brother Tuck; it was about that premonitory shock she had suffered just before they began their ride through the forest.

What on earth had that meant, that vision she had suddenly seen of the whole of Lost Towers going up in fragments like the flaming scoriae lava from a bursting volcano, up, up, up, towards a black and thundering sky!

It was curious that both the great manor-lords, the father of Lil-Umbra and the devoted friend of Raymond, accepted without a murmur Albertus’ high-handed meddling with the destiny of marriage. Yes, both the scrupulous Baron Boncor and the unscrupulous Sir Mort Abyssum, took with complete sang froid the startling events that now began to occur. These events which future chroniclers will, let us hope, describe as calmly as we are describing them now, were heralded by a singular fit, or seizure, or obsession, so odd that it would be difficult to account for it, on the part of young Sir William Boncor, who surely must have been the youngest of all knights who ever received the accolade.

It is a faithful chronicler's duty, not only to his sovereign lord but to his own lawful heirs and descendants, to record the queerest occurrences just as they occur without either obsequious or malicious exaggeration. And what Sir William did at this point was to dance a grotesque dance, a dance that had become popular at all the country fairs in Cornwall and had just spread into Wessex, a dance that was called "Jig it for Judy" and that had gestures in it that were more amusing than seemly.

Lady Ulanda at first pretended not to notice Sir William's whirligig arabesque, but when the stately figure of Albertus of Cologne in his Dominican weeds joined their group and looked askance at this inexplicable tom-foolery, she let go her hold on her husband's wrist and gave her son a shrewish cuff across his left ear-hole.

This maternal rebuke having successfully quieted her youthful knight-errant, Ulanda turned her attention to the Brazen Head, and with her hand once more caressing Baron Boncor's wrist, as if she had chosen him as her only true-love that very day, she set herself to wonder whether anything especially disconcerting would happen to her if she suddenly snatched up the flintiest of the stones that sprinkled the hillside, and rushing straight at that Brazen Head in defiance of the Jewish couple who appeared to be guarding it, gave it a few of the straight blows she burned and throbbed to give its human creator.

The sun was already well-past its meridian, and there was a queer dark cloud resembling the head of a giant just above the sea-ward horizon, when everyone heard far away to the north a distinct roll of thunder.

"What the devil are all these people waiting for?" Perspicax enquired of Colin and Clamp, who, from an instinctive feeling that when King's Men from London awaited events, events were sure to arrive, felt reluctant to depart.

“I think I saw old Dod Pole’s Bet hurrying off home with Bailiff Randy’s daughter Crumb,” replied Colin rather wistfull; for he had a tender feeling for both these little maids, especially for the exquisite way Crumb’s hair would float on the wind when there was wind on which it could float.

“I can tell you whither those little birds are flitting!” threw in the unequivocal Clamp. “They’re off to take the news to Lady Val!”

The prediction of Clamp proved correct. At that familiar little postern, whence from her infancy, and before she had so much as heard of the formidable House of Abyssum, she had peered out into the forest, Lady Val was even now listening to the sound of horses’ hooves growing first nearer and then further.

And well indeed might the lady listen to those hoof-beats, for the horses were bringing, not only Roger Bacon and Brother Tuck to the gate of the Priory, but Lil-Umbra and Raymond de Laon to that very door.

“Don’t ‘ee cry, child! They will all be back soon!” whispered Nurse Rampant on her left hand.

“Not without having seen and having spoke to the girt Devil himself, every thumping one of them!” grunted old mother Guggery on her right hand.

Young John had remained standing alone after Lil-Umbra and Raymond had carried off Roger Bacon and Brother Tuck. He had heard that roll of thunder. He had seen that cloud like a giant’s head. And he was now staring at the closed doors of Lost Towers. Why he was compelled to stare at them he could not have told a living soul, not even his master Roger Bacon, for whom his devoted love went beyond all reason.

But suddenly young John saw those doors open wide and two human forms holding each other by the hand come forth, the forms of Petrus Peregrinus of Maricourt and Lilith of Lost Towers. Young John had always dreaded certain particular mental images, and the worst of all among these was the image of something different from the male organ of generation being thrust into a female's womb. Another was the image of a fiery rod being thrust into a man's anus.

Both these terrifying images now rushed simultaneously into young John's mind and even seemed to incarnate themselves in the human figures of Petrus Peregrinus and Lilith.

But the moment Petrus Peregrinus began speaking, these horrible images vanished from young John's mind — vanished forever, nor, until his death long afterwards, ever returned to trouble him. They did not even dare — although horrible images of this sort clearly possess devilish intelligencies of their own — to come near him on his deathbed.

"I am Antichrist!" were the words that Petrus was now shouting, and shouting in a voice whose appallingly penetrating tone none who heard it that day ever forgot to the end of their lives.

It was as if some power, far beyond the reach of any wanderer from Picardy, had spoken out of a hiding-place as old as the world. What young John did in the depths of his mind to drive into silence, not only the insane voice of this Antichrist from Maricourt, but the much less insane and for that very reason the far more loathsome voices of the treacherous and hypocritical and meretricious champions of a Christ with whom they had less in common than had His most shameless enemy; what young John did in the depths of his mind to overwhelm both of these was a very singular thing.

He gathered up all those wild and strange speculations about microscopes and telescopes and air-vessels and sub-marine vessels, of which Friar Bacon was always talking to him, and made of them in his mind a great mechanical shield which was so convoluted in its metalwork that it could repel any sound in the whole universe; and the echo it threw back when that Antichrist cry reached it was at once so rocky and aerial and oceanic and fiery that, as it rolled into space, it carried away with it both the pious hypocrisy that had been pierced by the voice of Antichrist and its own heroic recalcitrance to them both. In fact it carried everything away.

But when the echo from that shield he had mentally created from all those metallic elements died down, young John saw to his astonishment Lilith fling one of her long white arms about her companion's shoulders and swing him round till they both faced the castle.

Then young John saw the girl raise up both her arms, and he noticed that she held in her hands a curious little object like an extra large pen or pencil or a leafless hog-weed-stalk or a small six-inches-long bull-rush.

This little object Lilith first lifted up towards the sky, and then, with an incredibly swift movement of her arm, turned it against the Castle. And at once, clear before John's eyes, and before the eyes of all who were present, the whole structure of Lost Towers went up into the air, went up with the swiftness of a falling star, only it was a star that in this case was not falling but rising, until it vanished from sight in the blue depths of the empyrean. Then both those two figures turned to each other, each of them with raised arms. And it became clear to John for one blinding second that all four hands were clasped round that strange little object.

"They are pointing it at their own bodies!" he said to himself. And his vision of what they were doing was indeed the truth. Both their bodies now burst into flame and became one single fiery ball; and as John watched it, this burning orb became so dazzling as to shine in his eyes with the blaze of a sapphire, and he perceived that it was moving fast through the air towards the Brazen Head. At that moment he heard the Head speak.

"Time was," it said. "Time is," it said. "And time will — —"

But the burning meteor then fell upon it, and neither it nor what destroyed it was ever seen again.

PREFACE

I AM ANXIOUS to begin these few remarks of my own about Homer's Iliad by expressing my gratitude to my old friend, J. Redwood-Anderson, and also to my younger friend, his wife, Gwyneth Redwood-Anderson, for their unparalleled help to me in writing this paraphrase or walking commentary upon the Iliad. And I also want to express my gratitude to the Professor of Classical Literature in Stanford University, for permission to base my own work upon the prose translation opposite the Greek text in my copy of the Heinemann edition in the Loeb Classical Library. Finally I want to recommend very strongly to every student of Homer the Homeric Dictionary, beautifully illustrated, and reprinted in 1902 by Richard Clay and Sons Ltd. composed by Dr. Georg Autenrieth of Zweibruchen in Bavaria and translated by Robert Porter Keep of Easthampton, Mass. U.S.A.

It is not necessary, as I think of the youthful readers I am particularly anxious to persuade to read this book, to enter here upon such questions as to what Greek city gave birth to Homer, or how many centuries elapsed between the Iliad and the Odyssey. Sufficient it is to say I feel it grows clearer and clearer the more familiar you become with both Iliad and Odyssey that these two poems had different authors or originals and that there is an historic gap of three or four hundred years between them.

If a youthful mind, whether a masculine or feminine one, were to ask me point-blank the question I am presently going to ask you all — and how much more expressive and full of meaning those two words "point-blank" are than this vaporously-vague grandiloquent expression full of vaunting pomposity that many of us are tempted these days to use, namely “by and large”; and what actually does “by and large” mean? I always see it accompanied by that particular gesture in a speaker that implies “I am too grand an orator to descend to silly details” — the question “In what respect does Homer’s Iliad surpass Dante and Shakespeare and Milton and Goethe?” I would answer at once: It is not nearly as imaginative as Dante. It is not nearly as dramatic as Shakespeare. It is not nearly as eloquent as Milton. It is not nearly as philosophical as Faust. And yet it is a greater poem than the Inferno or King Lear or Paradise Lost or Faust! Why is this? In what way can it possibly surpass these masterpieces?

I will tell you at once. By being more realistic and more natural. In other words, it is more like what has happened, is happening, and will happen to us all, from the very beginning, in our history in this world until the end of human life upon this earth. Of course we use different weapons against each other and against the various sub-human living creatures who surround us than they used in the Iliad. So they did in the earliest cave-men times, twenty thousand years ago. So they will do in future times when many of us will have successfully invaded our planetary neighbours in space. But I tell you, my dear young questioner, it isn’t the instrument we use in our quarrels with one another that counts. Some of us may simply use our tongues. Others among us may simply use our silences. Others may — O! there is no end to our weapons against each other! There may even come a day when by means of repeated concentrated thought applied for a certain length of time we shall be able so strongly and intensely to wish Mr. So-and-So or Mrs. So-and-So dead that the particular person will die and not a soul will be able to accuse the killer.

No, we must get out of our heads that because the Homeric people use swords and spears and arrows against each other that the whole of the Iliad is just an old-fashioned fairy-tale like Jack the Giant Killer or Cinderella. It is much more than that! It has the varieties of character, the mysterious intricacies of character, the inexplicable vagaries of character, the confounding leaps and plunges of character that we get in Hardy and Dostoievsky and Dickens and Victor Hugo and Thomas Mann; and it has also got the romantic surprises of Sir Walter Scott, as when we find the beautiful Briseïs tearing her hair on the ground by the dead body of Patroclus.

No, let me repeat once again, what has made Homer for three thousand years the greatest poet in the world is his naturalness. We love each other as in Homer. We hate each other as in Homer. We are perpetually being interfered with as in Homer by chance and fate and necessity, by invisible influences for good and by invisible influences for evil, and we see the unconquerable power that Homer calls keer leading our parents, leading our uncles and aunts, leading our grandparents to a particular death; and there do exist among us those who even feel this implacable destiny propelling themselves to a definite end, actually indicated as inescapable when some particular date in the calendar is reached or when some particular event has occurred. Thus Achilles assures his horse Xanthus, who is dragging his chariot, and who turns his head to remind him that if he kills Hector his own end will shortly follow, that he needs no reminding of this keer, for he knows it well, but "all the same for that" — alia kai empees, as Homer puts it — he intends to drive on to the end.

What is so particularly natural about the Iliad and what is such a daily inspiration to me in my ordinary life is the place he gives to women. First of all are the beautiful mistresses of the houses and halls of Homer's warriors, such as Argive Helen, carried off from Menelaus by Paris, alias Alexander; such as Hector's mother, Hecabe, and his wife, Andromache, and his half-sister, the beautiful prophetess Cassandra, whom Agamemnon takes captive and conveys to his home. Then there are the women who are taken captive by the conquerors who have slain their parents, husbands and sons. These women are treated at first as if they are slaves. In fact we are told in one place that their value is equal to the value of four oxen. But when once they enter the dwelling of their conqueror and take up their abode there, they very quickly dominate the whole house.

The beautiful Lady of the House may go off on her own and leave her lord as Helen did Menelaus, but these women brought into the Homeric hall as "worth four oxen" very quickly by their wisdom, beauty, tact and competence became either the housekeeper, whom Homer calls "the Tamiee" and who always is praised by the guests for the delicious things to eat and drink "which she brings out of her store", or, if the Lord is an old man, as Nestor was, without any Lady, become in that old man's dwelling a beautiful handmaid like Hecamede, daughter of Arsinoos of Tenedos. Homer certainly describes with reverential relish the lovely meal she once arranged upon old Nestor's table, and how ready she would be, as Nestor told them himself, to give Doctor Machaon, the son of the greatest of all doctors, Asclepius, a beautiful cleansing and healing warm bath. I sometimes wonder whether other commentators on Homer share my reluctance to transliterate the vowel "Eeta" into a repetition of our letter "e", which is really the Greek letter "Epsilon". But this double "e" looks so unpleasing that I have thought it better to rely on the notes about pronunciation made by my friend J. Redwood-Anderson, for thus I can insure that a name like that of the girl from Tenedos called Hecamede should not be changed from a name of four syllables to a name of three.

There are many scenes in the Iliad where we touch the reality of our life as it is today when it is transformed for us by our own private thoughts; as for example when we struggle with certain forces of nature. Consider, for instance, the passage in Book XXI, line 308, where the River Scamander calls upon his brother, the River Simois, to help him in his battle with Achilles. Here we have a perfect example of that element in life where the sub-human wrestles with the human and they both are compelled in some strange way to appeal to the super-human to decide their strife. Here the burden of our oldest ballads seems anticipated by Homer, and all those ancient market-town quips and proverbs and all those immemorial fairy-tales and roadside legends reaching us from forests long ago cut down, and from moorlands long ago built over, find their parallel. There is something about the rhythm of the Homeric hexameter that is more able to catch and absorb into its current, as it rolls along, these familiar human situations that are always recurring, than any other form of poetic rhythm except the simplest of our best-known old ballads.

There is an authentic echo of Homer's hexameters in those of that great and unfairly neglected poet, Longfellow, an echo such as none of our cleverest modern poetasters are able to catch, or, indeed, have any wish to catch. Take the first lines of "Evangeline" for example:

> "This is the forest primeval. The murmuring pines and the hemlocks
> Bearded with moss, and in garments green, undisturbed in the twilight.
> Stand like Druids of old, with voices sad and prophetic,
> Stand like harpers hoar, with beards that rest on their bosoms.
> Loud from its rocky caverns the deep-voiced neighbouring ocean
> Speaks and in accents discordant answers the wail of the forest."

Many of the most appealing passages in the Iliad consist of prayers; and it is impossible sometimes not to associate these prayers, such as "O Sun that beholdest all things and hearest all things, O Rivers, O Earth, O all ye lost ones of our race, who, weary of life, rest forever in peace below it all", with the calm, majestic resignation of so many of the Collects in the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England "as by Law established".

My own favourite book in the whole of the Iliad is Book XXI, wherein the gods and goddesses fight among themselves, some taking the side of the Greeks and some the side of the Trojans; and nothing is more perfectly characteristic of Homer as a poet than the fact that the chief of all the immortals, the great Zeus himself, Heavenly Father of both gods and men, regards this fighting among the gods with humorous amusement. I implore all those among Homer's readers who may be following me, as I have been following my imaginary thought-reader, the immortal Aether, to ask themselves whether they can imagine the author of Hamlet and Macbeth and Othello and King Lear and The Tempest, however shrewdly he may hint that the Power above us all laughs at lovers' quarrels, going so far as to suggest that the behaviour of angels and devils, as they contend for the victory in our hearts, is to that great Power a matter for hilarious amusement. Does the Deity in Dante's Divine Comedy even for a moment look down upon it all as if it were a comedy in our sense of the word? Can we imagine for a moment Milton's "Heavenly Muse", who "with mighty wings outspread dove-like satst brooding on the vast Abyss and mad'st it pregnant", chuckling with ribald amusement at the silly quarrels going on in both Heaven and Earth?

What we get as we follow Homer through the Iliad is not at all the feeling that "all the world's a stage and all the men and women merely players", nor is it the feeling that there is what Wordsworth, my own favourite poet, calls

> "... something far more deeply interfused,
> Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,

And the round ocean and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man:
A motion and a spirit that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things.”

Without any of these exalted emotions, derived from the contact of our human souls with the colours and forms and substances of our planetary Earth, dominated by Sun and Moon, as it swings through infinite Space — yes, without any of these emotions, we who love Homer in the way the immortal Aether loved him may find ourselves by degrees learning, without effort, without any particular concentration of will, to enjoy the natural, ordinary course of our daily life with all its shocks, stresses, quarrels, rivalries, frustrations, surprises, desperations and heavenly quiescences, just in the sort of way Keats felt when he wrote that perfect fragment of an ode which begins:

“Mother of Hermes! and still youthful Maia!
  May I sing to thee
As thou wast hymned on the shores of Baiae?”

and which breaks off with the words:

“Rounded by thee, my song should die away
    Content as theirs,
Rich in the simple worship of a day.”

I am tempted to go so far as to say that we Britishers have appreciated Homer more than any other race in the world; and I think a person has only to read a little of Chaucer and Spenser to see why. The truth is we are the most unphilosophical race in the world. We are also, second only to the Saxons and Bavarians of Germany, the fondest of fairy tales in the world. We are certainly the fondest of old ballads and old popular sayings for their own sake. We are the most obstinate in hanging on to old local traditions for their own sake; and finally we are the least cultivated, the least concerned with what is called intellectuality, of all the races in the world. Then again we have appreciated the Jews, and done justice to the Jews, beyond all other western peoples; and if, compared with the Germans, our lack of metaphysical and psychological power is deplorable, and compared with the French, our lack of civilised receptivity and subtle appreciation of the nuances of human life is almost comical, no Europeans have given themselves up with a more impassioned and, I might say, a more childlike abandonment to delight in simple beauty for its own sake than English travellers have done when visiting Italy or Greece.

All these qualities, both positive and negative, when joined together, tend to strengthen my conviction, quite apart from the number of famous translations of the Iliad that have been made in this country, both in prose and verse, that there is something about our attitude to Homer that comes nearer to the attitude of the immortal Aether, to whom I have presumed to give a human consciousness, than that of any other nation. This is no theory; for again and again in watching my friends talking together, and watching men’s attitude to their wives and children, and watching the attitude of their wives and children to them — especially when the ladies, as is now often the case, have to play the part of a Homeric housekeeper and handmaid, as well as that of the beautiful Cassandra, who speaks out so freely, and of the unequalled Helen who may so easily be beguiled — I have been swept away by a fascinating wave of excitement in observing how this stupendous poem, that may easily have been recited by some reciter with my own mania for it three thousand years ago, still embodies the life of men, women and children as it is lived upon this earth. And the exciting thing is that Homer treats his Divine Beings in exactly the same way that he treats us ourselves, his Human Beings. Over and over again, we find ourselves awed and hushed in the presence of his Divine Beings and aware of a natural feeling that their ancient altars must be respected and their legendary ritual upheld; but at the same time there is absolutely nothing of that peculiar atmosphere of unctuous solemnity and oily gloom that some of us find so hard not to associate with our Christian Sunday.

How interesting it is that the peculiar shiver of terrified awe which our great religious prophets and teachers and preachers and saints have, by degrees, ever since the year one of our calendar, forced us to associate with the word God, doesn't enter for a moment into Homer's conception of Zeus, any more than it does into Vergil's conception of Jupiter or Jove. How satisfactory it is to be able to worship Zeus or his daughter Pallas Athene or his sister-wife Hera, without having to think of a God that we have been taught for nearly two thousand years to associate with the "bowing and scraping" of a Hush-a-bye Heaven and the infernal cruelties of a diabolical Spanish Inquisition Hell, not to speak of the Predestination doctrines of Knox and Calvin and the fiery stakes of Bloody Mary.

The essential thing with Homer — and most especially is this true of the Iliad — is the magical, bewitching, irresistible, intoxicating sweep of music of his metre. There is no metre in the world, there never has been, that can equal the hexameter of Homer. No doubt the "blank verse", as I was brought up to call it, of Milton or of Shakespeare — though it's not a very suggestive name — contains, as my friend Redwood-Anderson, our greatest authority on metre, would soon point out, rhythmic subtleties that do not appear in the hexameter at all; but I am sure he will agree with me when I say that no poetical sound in the world carries with it quite the same evocation of sonorous echoes, that rise and fall like the waves of an ocean over rocky promontories, as these transporting “oio” sounds with which Homer’s hexameters are perpetually closing.

Every lover of Homer will I think agree that the most significant and characteristic thing about his gathering, accumulating, enlarging, thickening, expanding, deepening story of human life — of human life as it has been in every age from the beginning and as it will be to the very end — is his emphasis upon the family. He does not, as so many poets since his time have done, talk a great deal about tribes and groups and clans and sects and varieties of idealistic associations, whether pacific or belligerent. What Homer does is to confine himself to the immediate family of the warrior in question. In the speeches they make to each other, in the appeals they make to the people, every single one of them will invariably refer to the father by whom he was begotten; and Homer himself is concerned with this paternal link to such an intense degree that if the two names can possibly be united into one single name he will unite them.

But now let us pause to consider the Homeric attitude to sex love. I think everyone will agree with me that in the passionate love of Achilles for Patroclus there is not a trace of homosexuality. Their love is like the love that existed in historic cases all down the ages between man and man while both men can at the same time have their women. Indeed it is an interesting and remarkable thing that it is impossible to avoid noticing in Homer the complete absence of the least suggestion of homosexuality or of Lesbianism. Considering the emphasis laid upon these erotic eccentricities in this modern age of ours what are we to make of their complete absence in Homer? I would even be inclined to go a little further and to emphasise the absence from the Iliad of any mention of those two sexual aberrations connected with cruelty, namely, what we have come to call Sadism and Masochism. There are several familiar historic cases of tyrants obviously addicted to sadism, and several prehistoric myths and legends whose cruelties can easily be connected with these two sexual aberrations. But there is not, as far as I can discern, a trace of either of them in the Iliad. Is the reason for this the fact that in the Iliad we are dealing with a desperate war, a war that so exhausts everyone's energy that there is no energy left over to indulge in erotic sensations except the most natural and ordinary ones? Or is the reason simply that the lovers of and composers of poetry all the way down human history are so absorbed in the normal current of human life that they instinctively tend to avoid abnormalities, whether erotic or otherwise?

There are those who instinctively prefer the neat Greek tragedians, Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides to Homer. Why, I ask you, do they? The answer is simple. Because they are full of intellectual Ideas and Theories and Interpretations of Life, full of creative Visions and moral Principles as to how human existence upon earth could be improved. Matthew Arnold, one of my own favourite poets, tells us that Sophocles "sees life steadily and sees it whole". O what a pure delight it is to return to Homer after "seeing life whole"! Why, I ask you, is it such a relief and such a comfort? Because Homer has the reality of our natural feeling about life, and Sophocles has an intellectual vision of things that may turn out to be, as my brother A.R.P. said of some wild theory of mine or of Llewelyn's, no reality at all, in fact a lie. Sophocles may see life as "steadily" and as "wholesale" as he likes, but real life, as all men and women and children soon discover from personal experience, is the extreme opposite of anything you can see "steadily" or as "a whole". It is a wild, chaotic series of exhausting contradictions. When is Shakespeare at his greatest? When his characters are philosophizing? Not a bit of it! All the supreme scenes in Shakespeare are when his people are transported by ecstasies of love and hate.

> “And yet I call you servile ministers
> That have with two pernicious daughters joined
> Your high-engendered battles ‘gainst a head
> As old and white as this!”
>
> “Out, out, brief candle! Life’s but a walking shadow...
> ’Tis a tale
> Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury — signifying — nothing!”

But none of the passionate defiances and challenges of Shakespeare’s stage, nor any of the pandemoniacal eloquence of Milton’s angels and archangels, nor the most contorted twists of Browning’s tipsy piety with its belching outbursts of county-council optimism, really expresses, as we all know well, the actual experience of life which we poor mortals from childhood to manhood and womanhood have fled from or endured, have fought against or submitted to, ever since we were born. But Homer does express precisely this. We may be put off by the Greek words or annoyed by the conventional or slangy translations. But now and again, as we go struggling on, there come glimpses and murmurs, as I have sought to make my immortal Aether show, of a natural and wonderful reality that the sweeping tide of these tremendous hexameters has caught up from the simplest human lives. Let us therefore listen to it rolling on with all its multifarious cross-currents, as it has done from the beginning, if there was a beginning, and will do until the end, if there will be an end, suffering and enjoying at the same time what “is all”, as Keats said, “we know on earth and all we need to know.”

THE AETHER SPEAKS

IT WAS NOT till he had almost tired himself out and very nearly blinded himself by his obstinate following of every seaside-track and every mountain-trail and every stretch of forest-upland in his desire to absorb the entire background of the Trojan War, that I, the shining Aether, swept down upon Homer.

He had fallen on his knees when I whirled into his consciousness; and he had no notion whence the inspiration I gave him came. He probably imagined it came from the Muse of Poetry, for I could reach his thoughts deeply enough to know that in his exhaustion he was praying desperately to her. No, he never recognised me as a conscious Being like himself, but I soon threw him into the special kind of ecstatic trance that I alone in the whole world have the power of creating. I do it, of course, through the elements of air and water; but I can only do it when these elements are transfigured by the particular and special light with which I suffuse them.

I shall not meddle with the metre he uses nor with the rhythmic music of the words. That is his affair and the affair of the racial tradition, but I shall waft unto him the greatest of all gifts, the power of reading the thoughts of both gods and men. Nor shall I stop there. I shall give him the power of reading the inmost responses of every form and shape that has ever been assumed by matter. I shall make him see that this does not only apply to birds and beasts and fish and reptiles and worms and insects, but also to the vegetable world of plants and trees and mosses and ferns and reeds and grasses and lichens. But the point at which some among the gods themselves and many among mortals will deny my power is a more mystical and magical point. And here I can only pray that those souls, whether they inhabit mortal or immortal bodies, who have the insolent arrogance to interfere between my beloved bard and me on this vital point may be flung by the Son of Cronos into the depths of Tartarus!

Hear, therefore, all ye who care for the work of a great poet, what I intend to inspire Homer to do. I intend to make him give a special and peculiar kind of vital life to the elements among whom both mortals and immortals have their being; to such things as earth and air and fire and water; to such things as rivers and seas and rocks and stones and sands. O yes! and I have resolved to include all manner of objects familiar to ordinary men and women and indeed created again and again by their own hands. I shall make him feel that things like swords and shields and spears and axes and pitch-forks and shovels — yes! and such things as chairs and tables and altars and idols and images and pictures — have the power, if associated closely enough with human persons, of acquiring a sort of individual life for themselves — yes, a peculiar identity of their own, an identity that implies the possession of a kind of selfconsciousness, a special sort of self-consciousness I admit, but none the less self-consciousness. The longer these Inanimates are seen and looked at and touched and used, the more definitely does this self-consciousness grow within them. I shall have to make him see that all the things with which men are habitually surrounded every day, whether indoors or out of doors, acquire this quality at last. Some of them may be quite little things, many of them quite unimportant things, and if he asks me how they get this identity, I shall answer him at once that it is gradually created in them by the person who habitually glances at them. This happens inevitably, whether the thing is a gate-post, a heavy stone covered in moss, a stile by the roadside, a dead hollow-tree, or an old stump overgrown with ivy.

The creative force that works this miracle is the human mind. What a pupil of mine, who has since become a priest of Apollo, once boldly called the appropriation to themselves by men and women of the creative powers of the Olympian gods, I shall prove to Homer to be a fact. In the process of encountering these so-called inanimate objects, often in complete absentmindedness and mental abstraction, ordinary mortals, living ordinary lives upon earth, do possess the power of creating actual consciousness. I won't call it complete consciousness in the human sense of that marvellous word, but it is an approach to it, just as you might regard a bird's feather, or a fruit's peeling, or a sliver of the bark of a twig, or a single scale from the skin of a fish, as authentically representing the living body from which they have been torn. The object in question may be a picture hanging on a person's wall, or painted on the wall of a person's dwelling. It may be a pier-post between a man's garden and the sea. It may be a ruined wall between a woman's door and the entrance to a broken-down altar where her husband once sacrificed to Athene. But, whatever it may be, these ordinary men and women have in their daily occupations, without the least intention of doing so and without the least knowledge of what is being done — for the noblest creations in this multiverse are unconscious creations — played their creative part.

And I alone, the shining Aether, am an accomplice in this process, for I alone have the power of passing through every form and shape which matter, consciously or unconsciously, has taken. In fact I can pass through the smallest atoms of matter. I can even pass between and around the still smaller particles that compose such atoms. I, the Aether, have watched from its beginning the amazing enterprise of Homer, the enterprise of one who is now a prematurely old man nearly blinded by his heroic struggle to visualise the actual background of every scene of his tremendous poem. All that I shall help him to add to it is only what it would be impossible for him to achieve without my aid.

How could he, for instance, unaided by me, who am the gleaming sky shining above and below Olympus, describe, as he surely ought to describe, the thoughts and feelings of a god or goddess trying to direct the ungovernable actions of a particular man or a particular woman? How could he, without the help of my gleaming and penetrating light, describe the feelings of a man or of a woman just before making a final decision to do or to turn away from doing some desperate and irrevocable deed? Hear me, great Ouranos above! Hear me, great Gaia beneath! It is I and I only who have helped all the poets who have ever existed to catch this reality. To me the Past and the Future are nothing but stalks and leaves; and to me the Present is nothing but a blooming rose-petal with a bitter thorn. As for Eternity, it is to me no better than a puff of stinking wind from the backside of a monstrous chimaera of Space. O my Homer, let Moira guide you to your end and when the Spinners have spun your fate let Keer give you everlasting peace! Let the health of your life, as Cheiron the Centaur teaches, be the abounding ichor of your philosophy, and may your philosophy temper the metal of your moods and carve the contours of the columns of your creation.

Oh yes, my Homer, and never, never let yourself forget, as I hope to make some great prophet cry out before his fellow mortals murder him, that the rhymes of the nursery are the poems nearest to heaven. I never have meddled and I never will meddle with the music or the measures of your verse. The secrets behind these lilts and rhythms, these pulsings of syllables, these intonings of stresses, these balancings of vowels, these echoings of consonants, are things that come from nature, vary with nature and are responded to by nature. Most of these sounds are as old as the hills. Many are lost for ever in the depths of the sea.

But, O Homer of my heart and soul, let me implore you in your eternal praying to the Muses not to forget their mother! Their Mother is Mnemosyne, the goddess of memory! O my Homer, remember that the poetry of all your days and the days upon earth of the race to which you belong comes from memory. Now and then, perhaps, but O so rarely, come gleams to you of something, something beyond all horizons, to which your race is slowly moving, but the weird feelings that these gleams bring with them are ecstatic emotions untranslatable in definite words. No, it is the memories that come to all men, called up by particular objects in their daily life, in their dwellings and along the waysides that lead to their dwellings, rocks on the banks, stones on the paths, fallen trees in the copses, broken masts by the edge of the sea, that call up the memories, sometimes almost too wistful and poignant to be borne, by which the poetry of life is created.

O! And please listen, my most cherished Homer, to yet another thing. Although Mother Gaia, the ancient Earth, is indeed both our beginning and our end, there is a feminine mystery that contains something higher and deeper even than motherhood. This is that immemorial mystery of virginity which is associated, when we think of Olympus, with the personality of Pallas Athene, but which has also a famous historical example in the story of Numa, the first King of Rome. It was only through the incomparable advice of Egeria, the virgin nymph who lived in a cave nearby, that Numa was able to inaugurate a city-state capable of conquering and ruling the world.

O Homer, my heroic Homer, I assure you it is I, the celestial Aether, who alone amid the multitude of universes into which we are all born am able to understand the life-secret that makes male and female so different. Here we touch, I tell you, the ultimate mystery of Being, and though I cannot, even I, fully explain it, I can make you see it. When a woman is ravished, she loses for ever a certain power of insight into Life and Nature which goes beyond all other. I can only suggest that it leads back to whatever it was that existed before the world began. I am well aware that there have been recurrent outbursts of a consecrated cult for Virginity from the earliest appearance of the human race. And it must often have been accompanied by a despairing sigh from the broken heart of an humanity groaning to itself: "If only Virginity had prevailed, we should not now be enduring all this misery!"

But it remains, O most Treasured Homer, that if I only could compel you to follow me in my ethereal flight round these opposing porch-pillars of mortal existence, your place as the greatest of all earthly poets would be established for ever. And O I implore you to listen to me now! Second to the primal mystery of sex in human hearts and senses, the greatest inspiration that I, the divine Aether, can give you, is to make you catch the in-dwelling and the over-shadowing significance of all the simple, natural, essential objects and usages of normal human life. Yes, by Zeus and Poseidon, you must and shall catch the poetry of cooking, of washing, of polishing, of cleaning floors and steps and walls, of shoeing horses, of milking cows, or making saddles and chariot wheels, of turning flour into bread and grapes into wine, of making robes and blankets and rugs and sheets, and of filling cushions with feathers, and pillows with the softest wool, and above all you must understand how houses are built and the earth ploughed, and the wheat and the barley grown. All this I will teach you to see and feel without demanding anything in return.

No, I do not ask you to bend down and worship me in gratitude for the inspiration I am giving you! And why don't I? I don't do it because I am the Immortal One, beyond all gods and men, the Aether between Ouranos and Gaia, the Aether who can see all, except only the kingdom of Pluto and the half-life of the Titans in Tartarus.

No, I take no gift for what I give. What I give is given to you, Homer my old friend, because I want to prove both to gods and men, yes! and even to the Muses themselves, that the greatest poetry is the poetry of that which is in and about and under and throughout all the inescapable things of ordinary human life. Every man, woman and child living upon the earth has to struggle to be happy, fight to be happy, weep, howl, shout, yell to be happy, walk, crawl, run, dance, climb, hide, dig caves, carve boats, build houses, cultivate gardens, in order to be happy, in order to last out to the end. O, and how lucky you terrestrial creatures are that when the end comes you can lie down and go to sleep and never wake up again!

What I am going to help you to do, you old indomitable, indefatigable Homer of my heart, is to accept and enjoy to the limit all the ordinary events in that human life of yours, which, wherever it is played out, is always a magnified view, or a minimized view, of some kind of Trojan War. Yes, I want to help you to describe the amazing life of mortals upon the earth; and when you have ushered each one of them in turn to the brink of the grave I want you to make them long to lie down in peace and sleep an unbroken sleep, or to soothe them, if they are afraid of annihilation, by lovely dreams of a kindly Hermes-Angel who will guide them gently, softly, swiftly when the end comes, to some blest Elysian Field where they can meet everybody again that they want to meet, and forget everything they want to forget forever and forever and forever.

BOOK I

CHANT FOR US, therefore, O poet of poets, what it was that aroused the wrath of Achilles, the son of Peleus — that deadly wrath which worked such immeasurable griefs for the Achaeans and hurled the souls into Hades of so many valiant heroes whose bodies became the prey of dogs and birds: for so, and only so, could the will of Zeus be fulfilled.

And I, the Aether, pray you, O mighty Homer, to begin your chant at the historic moment when Apollo the far-shooter loosed from his bow those arrows of disease and of death upon men and horses and cattle such as warned the other leaders of the Greeks that their King Agamemnon had done wrong in carrying off the daughter of Chryses.

Yes! I hear you. You are telling them, mighty master, and with my aid you are telling them, how wildly among the Grecian ships hauled up on the sand, and how wildly among the huts now being built upon the shore, fluttered and flapped the sea-gulls. Yes, the Greeks had built huts of palm-branches and cedar-saplings and stretches of leather and pieces of sackcloth, and although these wild gulls had seen many strange and pitiful sights, they had never seen anything as pitiful or as strange as what they saw now. For they saw the daughter of Chryses, the priest of Apollo, leaning desperately out of a small window of the largest of these new-built huts and beckoning frantically to a very old and very stately man who was advancing towards her along the sea's edge. Yes, it was the priest of Apollo himself who was threading his way through the sea-drift that was now mingled with the refuse and rubbish of these reckless newcomers, confusedly tangled with shells and sea-weed and sand.

The terrified child of this old man, a young girl named Astyomene, was stretching out her arms to him and crying at the top of her shrill, childish voice:

"O Father! Save me! Save me! Save me from him! He's going to — he's going to—"

The advancing old man soon heard the young girl's cry and recognized it at once as the voice of his daughter. He hastened towards her, waving the sacred embroidery, with its magic tassels, which, as Astyomene well knew, was the dedicated insignia of his office. "Father! Father!" and her voice increased in intensity as she saw that he had heard her and was hastening towards her.

Armed men from many other huts had now surrounded him, but he waved them all aside with a gesture of such authority that they drew back and let him move straight to his daughter's window. Arrived there, he clasped both the girl's hands in one of his own and kissed them again and again. Not only so, but he was so moved at finding her that two or three big tears, an old, self-possessed, authoritative man's unusual tears, fell upon the hands he clasped.

It was then that the group of armed men, who had again gathered round him, again drew back; for the great King himself, wide-ruling Agamemnon, appeared in front of them all. He waved his hand towards Astyomene, indicating that she must withdraw into the interior of the room, a command which she at once, and quite silently, obeyed.

But she still remained in sight of this encounter, an encounter which now framed itself in her window like one of the dramatic pictures which a boy-friend of hers in Apollo's Temple was always trying to paint; but this picture now presented to her, through the square of that fatal window, was terribly real. She saw Agamemnon angrily address her father who was waving in one hand the golden staff, from which blew out into the wind the embroidery with its sacred tassels, and in the other hand he was holding an enormous string-bag that clearly contained, for their gleam was like a load of petrified sunshine, more golden drachmas than Astyomene had ever seen in her life. The frightened girl watched this disturbing scene trembling and shivering from head to foot.

Agamemnon had put off taking her virginity out of a simple and, in fact, almost a pathetic hope, that she might fall in love with him and herself grow desirous of such a consummation. It was this element of a really touching stupidity and complete ignorance of the nature of women that was destined to make this great king's return to his home when the war was over such a tragic one. But Astyomene hadn't to wait long before the climax came. Not just calmly and sternly, but with an outburst of furious anger did Agamemnon refuse to give her back. Probably the cause of this refusal was identical with the fact that she was still a virgin and he hoped that she might fall in love with him, but, whatever its cause, it was cruelly distressing to the captive girl and all she could do was to fall on her knees in the middle of that hateful room, dig both her small fists into her eyes, and sob forth a desperate and pitiful prayer to Apollo.

Not very different from his daughter's feelings were those of her father as he strode back along the sand; and indeed at last so desperate did he feel that, as the waves rolled in and broke at his feet, he found himself making sounds in actual chorus with this sea-roar. Indeed he felt that nothing except wind and sea could give proper expression to the wrath that possessed him. Looking frantically round, he suddenly noticed a little grove of trees. He had never noticed this small grove before, but at that moment, wrought up as he was by the wrath of waves and wind mingling with his own, this little group of trees struck him like a miniature of the temple he served, and rushing into it and planting his golden staff in the leaf-mould beneath its boughs he fell on his knees and prayed more passionately than he had ever done in his whole life before. “Hear me,” he cried aloud, “O thou of the silver bow! Let these Greeks who have robbed me of my dear daughter pay for my tears by thy shafts!”

Having vented his feelings thus, and rising from his knees with a real sense that a great load had been lifted from him, he strode along a broad path on the landward side of a long row of oddly-shaped sand-dunes and made straight for his village and his temple. Such faith he had, this old priest, that as he walked he began actually muttering to himself the brutal words of the man who had robbed him of his daughter, and he muttered them without that sensation of impotent wrath which is one of the worst of all things in this life.

“Old age shall come upon her,” the great, stupid, angry king had bellowed, “in our house in Argos, far from her home, as she works at the loom and shares my bed!” And yet, though the old priest could repeat these very words of this violater of temples, he was aware of a strange feeling at the back of his mind that it was this great, brutal, bullying chieftain that in the long run would be the one to be pitied. “I am not,” the old priest told himself, “a prophet like Calchas. I have no insight into the present; I have no premonition about the future; I have no power of summoning up the past; but I don’t only feel certain that Apollo will compel this despot to give up Astyomene, but I cannot get it out of my head that he will die long before I do.”

When he reached the little town he saluted those he met in the streets with his usual calm and dignified deportment. But glancing up at the sky as he entered the temple, he was amazed to see an illuminated cloud, formed of a shape that was almost human, descend from the air and alight on the ground under a group of trees near those where he had knelt in prayer, and it was with a heart touched by a wild strange hope that he closed the temple-door and walked across the interior plot of grass to his private abode. Nor was his hope unfulfilled. For though the old man could see nothing through the window of his priest's chamber except a narrow alley of that little town, the figure that emerged from beneath those trees was none other than Apollo himself. He had brought down from Olympus his massive silver bow and his quiver full of deadly arrows, each one of which, when he loosed the bowstring, brought pestilence and inescapable doom on those against whom it was aimed.

A god as great as Apollo can survive a crisis like this, slaying enemy after enemy, without having a pause, as a mortal man would have to do, for sleep or food or drink. It was indeed actually for nine days Apollo went on shooting, making sure that these enemies of Troy and spoilers of his Temple should know what it was to insult such a god as he was. He began with their mules; then he proceeded to their dogs; and finally he let loose on them themselves. By the time nine days were past the whole coast-line behind their black ships was burning with funeral pyres.

It was then, and not till then, that the great goddess Hera, the wife of Zeus himself, could no longer bear to look down on all this. So she put it into the mind of Achilles to call an assembly of all the Greek chieftains, including the two sons of Atreus, to consult as to how to propitiate this angry shooter of such deadly arrows. Achilles suggested that their great prophetic magician, Calchas, should be the one to give them advice at this juncture; and so with one accord, though Agamemnon glowered and gloomed at the thought of appealing to him, "for he knows about it all, he knows, he knows!" it was decided by the whole body of them, including every chieftain and every man and every woman who had come in the ships with them, to appeal to Calchas, for he was the one who with his immense knowledge and prophetic wisdom had guided their fleet from Argos to this Trojan shore.

And so Calchas rose up to speak among them; but naturally enough his first words were a direct prayer to Achilles to protect him if what he had to reveal about Agamemnon's behaviour threw that royal despot into a fit of blind rage. This promise Achilles willingly gave, boldly confessing to them all that he knew about himself, not only from Calchas, but from every other prophet he had ever approached, namely that Fate had already decided, that never would he be able to sail from this thrice-accursed shore. "That," he told them, "is my destiny. That is my keer. So I am naturally ready to face anything that happens; for nothing that happens can restore me to my old Father, whether he's dead or alive!"

And then Calchas told them all: how Agamemnon had pillaged the Temple of Apollo and carried off the daughter of Apollo's priest, Chryses, and how this terrible pestilence among men and animals would continue until Astyomene had been given back. Terrific was the great King's rage when Calchas had finished. He rose up with his eyes blazing and flung a torrent of abuse at the prophet, who leaned back against a rock and separated himself, as he had a weird power of doing, from the whole scene, while the raging monarch was denouncing him. As for the impregnable son of Peleus, his eyes were now turned to his devoted Myrmidons, who were watching both of them like persons in a dream.

And well they might, for what Agamemnon was now saying astonished the subject of this desperate quarrel; yes, astonished the girl who listened to it from the window of the King's hut as much as it astonished Achilles and every chieftain present. This King from the city of Mycenae was certainly no ordinary capturer of temples or ravisher of maidens. There was something about what he now had the sublime, if pathetically thickheaded, simplicity to announce to them all, that not only bewildered Astyomene herself, as she listened to him, but astonished every man and every woman who heard him. It became clear that this tall, majestic warrior-monarch had the same sort of single-minded susceptibility to feminine charm as had his brother Menelaus, so obstinately loyal to Helen that in her wayward, girlish reaction to this grim, heavy-weather Argive fidelity she became an easy victim to the amorous beguilements of the crafty son of Priam.

"You wicked Prophet of evil," the great King now cried: "you dark-souled twister of the will of the Olympians, to you, as well as to the whole assembly here present before me, will I announce and declare the truth without mincing my words or dodging what is in my heart. No, I will not evade, as so many of you do, the terrible reality of things. Yes, I will tell you and I will tell the whole world, openly and freely, including the gods of Olympus and all the Titans and giants and monsters in the kingdom of Pluto. Yes, I will tell every living creature in the whole cosmos what I feel; and why not? I am afraid of nothing and I take orders from no living person or dead person, and what I feel in my heart is the truth to me, and it is also the event, that is to say what I shall cause to take place when we have recaptured Helen and burnt Troy to the ground. Zeus has made me king; and therefore all that happens by my will happens by his will. And now I wish you all to know, and I announce it to you with a free heart, that I prefer the daughter of Chryses to Clytemnestra, my wedded wife! Yes, I prefer her; and in my deepest heart I want to live with her in my home. I tell you, my friends, and I would swear to it before the earth and sky, she is in every way the peer of Clytemnestra, in form and stature and in mind and, let me add, by no means inferior to her — for I could see that when I entered her father's temple — in all a woman's gift for all the handicraft and needlework and embroidery that can turn a home into a palace."

There was something about the gigantic innocence, as well as the stupendous egoism and arrogance, in what the man said that undoubtedly had its effect upon them all. The cleverer ones among them, chieftains like Odysseus for instance, must have said to themselves: "It's hard to imagine any woman who wouldn't be touched by this man, who has the boastful heart and yet the sensitive and tender heart of a rampageous boy of ten or eleven." Before the King sat down, however, what every single person in this tortuous and contradictory assembly expected would happen did happen. Achilles leapt to his feet. But before he could utter a word Agamemnon waved to him to sit down and the mysterious majesty the great king possessed compelled even the son of Peleus to do what he was told to do, like a soldier obeying his general.

"But in spite of all my heart's deep desire," the great King went on, "far be it from me to let our people perish under the anger of Apollo. As we consult here we can all smell the bitter smoke from the funeral pyres which are now burning over our comrades' devoted flesh. I tell you I cannot, no! no! by all the gods I cannot, accept this particular maiden as my prize at the expense of so much suffering. There I have decided, especially for the sake of those who are not here, those who are praying for our return in our dear native land, that I will restore this daughter of Chryses to her father, and that I will send her home with a large hecatomb on a big ship manned by a crew of fast rowers under the command of one of our most prominent warriors such as this assembly may select. But I must also make it clear to you all that I have no intention of giving up this perfect maiden without a recompense from you all. Her I have resolved to send back to her dear father, but another equally beautiful prize you must apportion to me, comrades, in her place, else, in default of such a portion given to me by this assembly here gathered together, I fear I must demand from one of you, and let me suggest at once that it shall be from swift-footed Achilles himself, the lovely maiden, in his case the heavenly-complexioned Briseïs, whom we have apportioned to him as his prize. Since I am saving all our people from this appalling pestilence inflicted on us by the far-shooting Apollo because my prize was taken from his temple, it must surely seem just and fair in the eyes of you all that I should despatch our sacred heralds to bring to my tent from the tent of Achilles the fair-complexioned Briseïs, even though she be no longer maid, whom we originally apportioned to this warrior."

After this, with a scowling glare at Achilles from beneath his bushy eyebrows, he did at length sit down. As for Achilles, without even honouring the assembly by rising to his feet, he shouted at the King from where he sat, shouted at him in the tone of an infuriated tiger addressing a domineering camel:

"Thou most covetous and most greedy and most outrageously insolent of the whole crowd of ridiculous adventurers that we all are! What are we doing here in our imaginary daring? What are we here for at all, I ask you? We came, didn't we, didn't we, didn't we, for the sake of your brother and to win back for him his stolen wife? But now when we find that all we've got to do is simply to procure maidens for the House of Atreus when it grows weary of its wedded wives, doesn't this reduce our whole expedition to a ridiculous farce? I came not here to war on the Trojans because they have done harm to me. I came here to win back his wedded wife for your brother Menelaus; and it was because of my bringing so many of my brave Myrmidons to fight for this good cause that you and the rest apportioned to me, so that I might take her home, the adorable Briseïs to whom Aphrodite has given the most transparently exquisite complexion of all maidens in the world. And what do I hear now from your own lips, you dogfaced shameless one! I actually hear you say you will dare to take from me this precious, this beautiful girl, and use her as your harlot, since it is, and I can clearly see it is, a unanimous decision of this momentous assembly of kings — yes, of kings, among which you, you dog-faced braggart, are only one among the rest — that this daughter of the priest of Apollo must be sent back in a big ship, with many rowers, and many beasts to be sacrificed on the Far-Shooter's altar. With this I wholly agree. But if you begin talking of taking my Briseïs from me, I'll just draw my beaked ships into the deep water and set sail back to Phthia whence I came!"

With a deep-bellied growl that sounded as if it came from the midriff of the giant Atlas, the King of Mycenae retorted, sitting straight up in his regal seat, "Fly then, you coward, back to Phthia whence you came, and may they welcome you there more than we want you here! You may be as fierce a fighter as you boast, and we all take your word for it, but by Zeus, who appointed me head-king among you, even as he is the Father both of gods and men, you are not a brave man in your heart, however fast you may be on your feet or strong in your arms with sword or spear. For a really brave man behaves in accordance with occasions and situations, not biting and kicking like an obstinate mule, but acting courteously among his companions, and even yielding to their will, as I am doing now, in giving back the daughter of Chryses. But I can tell you this, you impetuous fool: when I have given back the daughter of Chryses to her father I will show you that in these matters of apportioning prizes I am a great and wide-ruling king, whereas you are only a redoubtable athlete, a fast runner and a skilful swordsman."

These final words of the king, implying a shameful reduction of the whole status of Achilles in the army of the invading Greeks, were too much to be endured.

"Shall I go for him now," the son of Peleus asked himself, drawing his sword a quarter of its whole length out of its sheath; "and when I've killed him defy the whole lot of these ruffian time-servers to dare to meddle with my Briseïs?"

He was on the point of drawing his sword clear from its sheath when he suddenly felt himself seized by the hair and his raised arm forced by an irresistible hand to thrust back the gleaming weapon into its sheath. With an effort of will that needed far more strength than to pierce Agamemnon through the heart, Achilles refrained from revealing by any sign to the king or to the rest of them what had happened; for he knew well that he alone in that spell-bound and agitated assembly knew that the great goddess, Pallas Athene herself, had intervened.

"Yes," the divine lady whispered, helping him to conceal his consciousness of her presence by arranging herself so that, as he listened to her, he might appear to be gazing in deep thought, as was natural enough that he should be, towards the gap in the sand-dunes beneath their circle of benches where the whole sweep of the bay was visible, together with the unbroken horizon of the ocean. "Hera herself bade me come," the goddess was now explaining to him, "for she loves you both and longs to see you rescue Helen and burn Ilios. No, the truth is that the wife of our cloud-bearing, thunderbolt-hurling Zeus could not endure to see the son of Atreus and the son of Thetis engaged in a mortal combat. Curse him with all the curses you can conjure up; turn him into a laughingstock among them all with your bitterest taunts; tell him exactly what you think of him; fling the worst insults at him that you can invent. It will be a rich amusement for us on Olympus to hear what you say, and it will stir against him the mood of this whole conference. But one thing neither Hera nor I can endure, namely that you two shepherds of the people should begin a life-and-death struggle between yourselves. Well! I am off now; but remember my word.

Hit him with all the abuse you can think of, but not with the sword!"

Athene's intervention was so skilfully managed and so quickly over that it never struck either the man who received the abuse, nor the assembly who listened to it, that a subtle change had come over the temper of the furious son of Thetis. His words were as gross and violent, as crude and brutal as before, but they were more ribald and more reckless and they no longer gave the impression that they were leading up to some drastic and serious action. The impression they now made on that conference of chieftains was more as if the assembly had come together to hear a notorious performer play the part of a fabulous buffoon.

"You wine-bibber!" Achilles roared at the King. "You staring dog-face, with the guts of a terrified deer! You who never join the vanguard of a host in a real attack! O no! The life of a true Scout would be like death to a coward of your kidney. Your favourite part is simply to snatch from anyone who presumes to contradict you whatever prize it may be that he has received from his peers! A man-eating King you are, one who thinks that all but yourself are men of nought! But listen to me now; for I hereby swear a mighty oath to you and to all these who are with us here. I swear by this staff which I carry, as thou dost carry thine, this staff that has been bare of leaves and shoots ever since it first left its root in the mountain, by this staff I swear that a day will come when you and the rest will behold our warriors falling and perishing under the hands of man-slaying Hector. I swear a great oath that when that day comes you will find yourselves praying desperately, but praying in vain, for the help of Achilles against Hector! And then, you dog-faced King who are nothing, you will wish that you hadn't insulted and outraged the best fighter among With this word he broke in pieces his staff of office and flung it far from him.

Then arose from the midst of that assembly of the rulers of men one wise and aged, Nestor. King was he of sacred Pylos and he had already outlived two generations and was now ruling over the third generation of his people. Then went up a huge sigh of relief from all that assembly of chieftains; for they knew well the wisdom of Nestor and they had long been praying that he would speak.

“Shame upon you both!” was the way he began; and deep was the approving murmur that reverberated among them all as they heard those well-deserved words. “Priam would rejoice,” he went on, “and the sons of Priam would leap for joy to hear of this terrible contest between you two. Now hearken to my words, and let them sink into both your hearts. You two imagine, each of you, that you are the greatest warriors in the world; but I can assure you I have consorted in my time with men far greater than either of you, and never did they set me at naught. Such warriors I have never since beheld nor shall behold, as Dryas, shepherd of the host, and god-like Polyphemus, and Theseus, son of Aegeus, peer of the immortals. With these men I had fellowship, men who fought with the centaurs when they came down from their caves in the mountains. I forbid you, Agamemnon, to take from him this girl. Let her be. We all joined in giving her to him as a prize. Nor do thou, son of Peleus, be minded to strive with a king such as he is; for though you are valiant and though a goddess bore you, yet he is the mightier, because he is king over many more men than you are.”

Nestor’s words succeeded in putting a stop to any immediate violence between them; but they did not alter the main issue. Back to his tent with his angry Myrmidons rushed Achilles; while Agamemnon proceeded to arrange for the ship and its rowers and to persuade Odysseus to be the ship’s captain that should carry the daughter of Chryses back to her father in Apollo’s temple. But when all this was done the far-ruling tyrant-king sent his two heralds to the tent of Achilles to demand Briseïs.

The heralds themselves, when they reached the tent of the son of Peleus, were so fearful lest the wrath of Achilles should rise to a towering pitch of fury the moment he set eyes on them that they stood side by side in the entrance to his hut without uttering a sound. Like a couple of forlorn statues they stood, wrapped in the folds of their stately ritualistic robes; and they remained deathly silent till the indignant hero himself perceived them and commanded his devoted comrade Patroclus to fetch that lovely maid, whom all the company of the invaders already knew by a word that indicated the transparent delicacy of her complexion.

The perpetual presence of Patroclus in the tent of Achilles, in spite of the fact that their real relationship was pure friendship and had nothing sexual about it, and in spite of the fact that they slept in separate beds, each with a girl at his side, had had the effect of frustrating completely any natural tendency in Briseïs to play the queen in that tent: but she had been happy all the same. Briseïs had the power of being happy when alone, a rare gift, whether in a man or a woman; and in the few months of her captivity she had found that she could extract what to herself she always thought of as her “secret” — a peculiar enchantment emanating from the presence of the very simplest things. She soon had her own favourite glimpses of clumps of bushes with beautiful leaves growing above delicate mosses and wistful flowers. Then there were the masts and decks of the ships. These from her childhood had always fascinated her. They were, indeed, easy to be enjoyed from the tent of Achilles, all those simple objects from which was diffused this mysterious enchantment of hers, an enchantment entirely independent of all human beings. It hovered, for her, round the outward appearances of objects such as plants and posts and rocks and stones and stretches of sand. Yes, and it hovered, this enchantment, even over ashes and dust and bones. But especially did it arise from glimpses of the decks of the ships and the wave-washed edges of harbours and sea-walls. She felt herself to be a votary who was recognised as such by the mysterious powers who ruled the magic world of what mortals think of as the lifeless objects of daily use.

Yes, Briseïs had always been a lonely girl. In her home she had been lonely; so that when she was carried off by foreign invaders she didn't suffer anything like what the daughter of Chryses suffered when she was separated from her father. In fact when the two girls met in the hut of Agamemnon, whither Patroclus had escorted Briseïs while Achilles rushed down to the sands to pray frantically to his mother, the difference between their feelings showed itself very quaintly. Patroclus soon went off to have a chat with one of the great King's bodyguard who was an old acquaintance of his, and, as the King himself was visiting the Cretan contingent, the two captive girls were now alone without fear of interruption.

"Why don't we escape together now, at this very minute?" cried Briseïs eagerly, clutching at one of Astyomene's hands with both of hers.

"Escape, my dear?" said the priest's daughter, in grave astonishment. "But where should we escape to?"

"Why anywhere, of course!" cried Briseïs, her lovely cheeks glowing with excitement. "As long as we're together, no soldier will dare to meddle with us, and neither of us want, do we, do we, my dear, to go home whence we came! We know well enough what looking after parents is; and we also know only too well, don't we, don't we, how our dear parents will marry us off to some rich, elderly ruler who will pay them, not us, very liberally for this pleasant little bargain, or even, if you'll let me say so, for this clever sale!"

"But, my dear Briseïs," protested Astyomene gravely, withdrawing her hand and straightening her back, "if we don't go home to our parents where shall we go? We'll only be met on the high road or on the high sea, if we get as far as that, by some scoundrelly harlot-hunter, who'll sell us to some brothel-keeper in some city-port where merchants most do congregate and where the last we shall see of each other will be when mules drawing a deathwagon stop at some door."

"But, but, but," cried Briseïs, her beautiful cheeks burning with indignation at this pessimistic view of things, "why on earth shan't we have the wit and the spirit, helped on by great Atropos and greater Tyche, to find husbands for ourselves? All gallant and generous men aren't in the elegant neighbourhoods where parents live, or among the merchants selling their goods in the market squares of crowded ports. Are there not plenty of adventurous young men, and men too, just as likely to find hordes of hidden treasure, beyond any merchant's ponderous imagination, as they are to find us, or any other girls to suit their taste? I tell you, my dear, there are, there are, there are such young men; and we shall be a pair of silly crackpots if we lack the spirit to set off to look for these young men!"

Astyomene gazed at her new friend with a long and searching glance. "There is something," she told herself, "about you, my pretty Briseïs, that does not make me take kindly to, or take with a vital response, the sort of adventure you suggest." But again Briseïs appealed to her: "O come on, you sweet slow-wit! Surely you can see that there are ways open for you and me, ways to panoramas of success and happiness?" Astyomene leaned back and sighed. Her gaze wandered from the excited countenance in front of her and floated off, through the window of the hut, over the tents of the camp, till it reached the sea. Even here this curiously fixed gaze of the high priest's daughter avoided the lively preparation that was taking place on board a ship to which some wag had, contrary to custom, given the name of "Glabora", and which had already been selected, though no-one had bothered to tell her so, to convey her to the harbour of Chryse. Watching her as intently as Briseïs was, and waiting as eagerly as Briseïs was, to catch her reaction to this devil-may-care idea of their running away together, it was a complete puzzle to the younger girl when she saw Astyomene's face relax into a passive expression of a dreamy and almost humorous acceptance of whatever it was towards which the wave of destiny was rolling them both.

"It's all very well for you," cried Briseïs, jumping to her feet, "to take things as they come like this! But if what they tell me is likely to happen, and you are sent home, while I have to wait in this accurst hut till this thick-jawed bully of a rampaging tyrant decides to deflower me, and if possible impregnate me with a brute of a babe as like himself as he can thrust into me, am I to take such a destiny lying down? All you've got to do is to sail away, all calm and rejoicing, back to your devoted dad, who'll worship you more than ever now, until some reigning Prince of Troas makes you his reigning Princess! Well! Good luck to you, favoured of the gods! If you ever hear shrieks and wailings in the night, crossing the golden roof of your grand palace, you'll sleep the happier, I dare say, thinking of your refusal to share your life with me."

Astyomene jumped up herself at that and clasped the furious girl's arm.

"It's not, O it's not like that at all!" she began.

But at that moment they were interrupted by the entrance of Agamemnon's housekeeper, Phemië, who was so old that it had become all she could do to arrange the loaves and vegetables and pears and apples and oranges in rows on the kitchen shelves. With an old nurse's instinct she knew at once that the two girls were upset. "I'm lost," she quavered, in a high-pitched lamentation. “The whole lot of them have gone aboard the silly ship. Think of calling a fine Achaean ship on which Theseus may have sailed in his time by such a name as ‘Glabora’! I should think they would be ashamed of such a stupid joke. I wanted to tell my big pet-boy he’d better stop this foolery before it’s too late! Black ships are built for fighting the enemies of Hellas, not for being given baby names and carrying naughty girls like you two home to your nurseries!”

“What’s going on here, Phemië, old girl?” enquired Patroclus when he returned. “Are you sorry to lose Astyomene so soon? Well! I’m sorry to lose Briseïs! But there you are! That’s the way of this world. We’re always finding lovely things and losing lovely things. That’s what I’ve said to Achilles, who is at this moment — I warrant you can believe that, pretty Briseïs, can’t you? — sobbing out his loss of you to his darling Mummy-Goddess! I expect he’ll persuade her — don’t you think so, Phemië? — to rush up to heaven and hug the knees of Father Zeus and persuade him to force your new master to give back our little lovely!”

He now turned to the two girls, who were standing side by side with their backs to the window sill, the sea air blowing through their hair, so that the curls of Briseïs mingled with the waving tresses of Astyomene.

“What’s your opinion, my dears,” Patroclus enquired, “of all this bloody fighting? Don’t you feel, as I do, and as I am sure Achilles does, that there ought to be some way of getting Helen out of the hands of Paris, or of Alexander, as the wretch prefers to be called, without having to go through all this cruel slaughter of men who could be hunting wolves and cutting down forests and ploughing land and sowing barley and wheat?”

It was certainly not expected by Patroclus or by either of the two girls that the reply to this searching question should come from querulous old Phemië; but that’s what happened.

“Fight? Fight? Fight?” the old woman shrilled, in a voice like a desolate gust of wind through a crack in a fast-closed window shutter, “but who wants to fight? The men, the men, the men, always the men! They think it’s to their honour and glory to fight! Helen would have been perfectly happy with Paris. A beautiful woman is always happy with any man who worships her, and Paris certainly worships Helen. I think myself from what I hear — what do you say, you two? You can see, Patroclus, how they both agree with old Phemië — from what I hear along the street, you know, and that’s where you get the real truth of these things, that she found the house of Menelaus intolerably tedious and dull, whereas in Troy she’s had the time of her life! Say what you please against Alexander, son of Priam, he knows all the ways to make a beautiful girl happy, ways of which Menelaus has always been ignorant as — as — you know whom! O no, my good old handsome Patroclus, I give you my word, angry though my big pet-boy would be to hear me say it, that it isn’t Helen who wants to go back to Menelaus, it’s Menelaus who wants to show how honourable he is by fighting Paris! If I got Helen alone, or either of these two girls got Helen alone, you can bet your life we would soon get the truth out of her as to whether she’d sooner be in the house of Menelaus or with Paris in Troy — and she’d say at once, ‘In Troy!’”

While old Phemië was thus speaking out, plain and true, in the camp of the Argives, Achilles was acting exactly as Patroclus knew he would. One thing was certainly clear. He loved Briseïs, as it was quite impossible for Agamemnon to love Astyomene or indeed any girl, however much in his massive and extremely simple mind he might imagine he did! But the son of the aged Peleus was of a totally different psychic nature from the sons of Atreus. He was, for all his strength, of such highly-strung nerves that he responded to whatever was happening with the emotional intensity of a young woman. It is likely enough that Briseïs herself would have been amazed, perhaps even a little touched, had she seen the way, when she had been led off by Patroclus, he ran down to the edge of the sea and sank upon his knees in a fit of passionate sobbing. Terrific warrior as unquestionably he was, there were others almost his equals in sword and spear. But where none of them came near him was in his power of running. Here he had no competitor in the world. On this point the sons of Atreus might well have retorted that his rivals weren't gods but goddesses, such as Iris the Rainbow. Yes, while Astyomene rejected Briseïs' idea that they should run away together and search all the ports of Troas for the sort of young men they fancied, the deserted Achilles, crouching on the sea-weed at the tide's edge, was weeping like an ill-used child.

"O Mother, my Mother," he sobbed, "we both know for what a short span of life you gave birth to me, and we both have accepted this fate for me, haven't we, Mother darling? Yes, I've always accepted it, and you've always accepted it, each of us thankful enough to Atropos that I should have you for mother and you me for son, for however short a time! And O Mother, Mother! We thought, didn't we, O didn't we, Mother dear, that Zeus the Thunderer would honour me all my brief days and make every one of the Achaeans honour me until we took the city of Troy. But here is this arrogant and insolent Agamemnon who thinks that, because he rules over more people than I, I cannot stand up to him, insulting me more than I have ever been insulted and actually taking away from me this lovely girl of whom I've begun to grow really fond!"

He pressed his forehead once more into the wet sea-weed beneath him and burst into a fresh torrent of tears. The breaking of the waves such a short distance away made him insensible to everything but his own sobs. Over his body swept the white sea-gulls, their senses all alert to catch the difference between a living man and a dead man on that sea-coast. They were quick, however, to sweep off in a flash presently, when, rising like a mist out of the depths, but quickly taking her human form, the goddess Thetis bent down over her prostrate son.

"What is it? Tell me, what is it that has hurt you? Hide it not in your heart, my darling. Tell it all, tell it all to me!"

And at that Achilles rose up; and they sat themselves down side by side on the sea-sand and he told her the whole story.

"And I remember so well, Mother dear," he went on, "how you used to tell me the tale in my father's hall, how you saved Zeus, the Thunderer, from his brother Poseidon and all the other gods, when they would have bound him with chains. But you brought Poseidon's monstrous son, Briareus of the hundred arms, and made him sit down by the side of Zeus to protect him. And all the Olympians were so terrified of Briareus that they all at once humbled themselves before Zeus and gave up their idea of binding him with chains. Why not, therefore, now, O Mother dear, why not now go to Zeus and appeal to him on my behalf against Agamemnon? O I implore you to go to Zeus. He is bound to hear you!"

Kissing him lightly on the brow Thetis rose from his side.

"I will go," she said, "and meanwhile do you return to your huts by your ships and wait. Do not give up your wrath. Just wait, till you see what I can do to avenge you. There must be a delay of twelve days in any case, since Zeus has gone to Oceanus, to visit the blessed Ethiopians. But he'll return, and I will plead with him, whether in Olympus, or on Mount Ida, wherever he happens to be! But return now to your friend Patroclus, and wait. I will plead with Zeus on your behalf."

With these words she left him; and so fast did she descend into the depths of the sea that there was to him hardly even the sight of a sinking shadow or vapour or cloud.

But, after the twelve days had passed, Thetis flew faster than any seagull to the top of Olympus, and there she found the son of Cronos seated on the highest peak of the mountain and absolutely alone. And she crouched down before him and deliberately made the oldest and most sacred of all the gestures of divine supplication. She clasped his knees with one of her arms, and lifted up the other, till with the tips of her fingers she could just touch his chin.

For many, many minutes Zeus, the cloud-gatherer, sat silent and still, and neither moved nor spoke. Then at last he said:

“You bring trouble for me, my dear child, long and grievous trouble. Hera, my wife, is bound to find out that you have been here and that we have talked together. You see, the only way I can do real honour to Achilles and cause all the Greeks to appeal to him to aid them is to make Hector a stronger and stronger warrior, so that he slays and wounds and slays more and more of the Greeks. Only by helping Hector can I really help the Trojans and only by helping the Trojans until the Greeks are driven to come begging and imploring Achilles to join them against Troy can I do real honour to your son. Yes, you have brought me great and serious trouble, my dear child, ‘but all the same for that’ — as your son’s own motto runs — I feel bound to do as you beg me to do. So if now I bow my head as a sign between us it will, I can tell you, be a sign for the whole universe that what I consent to and put my seal upon in that manner shall really and truly come to pass.”

Whereupon the son of Cronos bent his brow in assent, and the ambrosial locks waved from his immortal head, and all Olympus shook.

In haste then did Thetis, fearful least Hera should have seen her, fly down like a falling star into the depths of the sea. But Hera had seen, and no sooner were they all gathered together on the summit of Olympus in that circular space surrounded by the marble palaces built for each particular immortal by strong-armed Hephaestus, the great artificer with fire, her own son, begottten by Zeus himself, than she began to give utterance to her pent-up anger.

"What is this that I beheld," she cried, "the first thing this morning when you left our bed and went up to the peak on the summit? Nothing less than that chit of a sea-wench Thetis clasping your knees on behalf of her cross-patch son, who thinks all the world must wait on his sulks and his tempers? I tell you, it's not right that you should hide these things from me!"

"Hold your damned tongue, you devil-haunted thing!" cried the lord of lightning. "Haven't you yet got it into your head that if I lift a finger against you there's no power in heaven or earth can save you?"

At this the Queen of Heaven gave up. But unable to bear the sight of his mother collapsing, rebuked and frightened, in front of them all, upon her familiar throne, Hephaestus intervened.

"For all our sakes, Mother darling," he cried, "please don't vex the Heavenly Father beyond bearing! Have you forgotten how, when I tried to save you before, he lifted me by the foot and hurled me out of heaven? All day long I fell; yes, all day I was falling, and little good did it do me to be the lord of fire. It was in Lemnos I fell as the sun went down. And let those who hate Lemnos say that the Sintians who live there are thieves and robbers; I say they are the kindest people I have ever met!"

Chuckling over his own clumsiness as he carried the sweet nectar round to them all, and panting as he waited on them while he drank himself, he soon had them all rocking with unquenchable laughter, such as never ceased till night came round once more. And lulled by the lyre of Apollo and caught up into every celestial vista by the Muses' arts they finally sought their beds; and when Zeus, the lord of the lightning, slept, golden throned Hera slept by his side.

BOOK II

BUT THE FATHER of Gods and men found that he could not sleep peaceably all that night. He kept waking up and wondering what he could do to start the fighting again between Greeks and Trojans.

"What honour will Achilles get," he said to himself, "if this war doesn't grow more violent?" Suddenly it came to him that he must do something at once to stir up the battle. "If both sides grow sick of it," he said to himself, "who knows what peace or truce or treaty or conference might be arranged before we in Olympus have any notion of what is going on?"

Then the Father of Gods and men very quietly, so as not to waken Hera, whose beautiful white arms — for all authorities on feminine beauty had long since been forced to admit that Hera's arms were the most beautiful that had ever been possessed by any woman since the beginning of time — were extended above their coverlet, tilted his pillow a little at the back of his head. For he had long ago discovered that he could think better on his back than on his side.

"I know! I know! I've got it!" he now told himself.

And indeed the All-Father had made such good use in this new position of his thinking apparatus that he really had got it. Nor could his decision have been better. It was based on his own personal experience in the earlier portion of that very night; for during these hours he had been troubled by a very disturbing dream. It wasn't a nightmare, for that would have wakened him; and in his terror he would have wakened Hera. It was just what his mother Rhea had the habit of describing, when he was visited by one of them, as an oneiros oulos, a deadly dream.

“Come you here to me, Oneiros Oulos,” he now commanded. “I’ve something important for you to do.”

And remaining perfectly still as he lay with the back of his head propped up by a bulge in the pillow, he explained to the airy monster hovering there in front of him with its tail almost touching the white arms of Hera just what he wanted it to do.

While he talked to it in the dawn-twilight of their sacred bedroom its countenance became more and more and more horrible; till, before he had finished his precise instructions, it resembled a bleeding wound divided in its oozing depths into a nose and mouth beneath one single appalling eye which pulsed and palpitated with an interior voracity capable of sucking the life out of a dinosaur.

“Hasten and go, Oulos Oneiros,” he commanded it, not even whispering the words, but uttering their syllables in his thought to that pulsing eye at the bottom of that engulfing maw of ingurgitating blood, “to Agamemnon, son of Atreus, and tell him that we immortals have now agreed together without dissension that he may now arm the long-haired Achaeans and advance at once to take the broad-wayed city of the Trojans.”

So he commanded the terrible Dream; and Oulos Oneiros obeyed him. Swiftly the Dream flew down to Agamemnon’s hut and stood at the head of his bed. Once there, Oulos Oneiros took to himself the form of Nestor, son of Neleus, in whose judgment, among all the elders of the Greeks, Agamemnon had most trust. Speaking through the form of Nestor the deadly Dream announced to Agamemnon that the Olympians were now wholly agreed, and that there was no more dissension between Zeus and Hera about delaying the taking of Troy in order to do honour to Achilles. Let the city be fought for at once, and let Helen be returned to Menelaus. Thus spoke Oulos Oneiros above the bed of Agamemnon through the form of Nestor, whom the sons of Atreus venerated most of all the elders of the Greeks; and when he had thus spoken he departed into the dawn.

And Agamemnon, fully awake now, leapt up from his bed, and, buckling on his armour, rushed off to call a conference straight away of all the Grecian heroes. And the strange thing was that for all his heroic simplicity as a wide-ruling sovereign with more cities to govern than plans for governing them, the King knew by a deep, four-footed-animal instinct that it was Oulos Oneiros, the Dream of Dread, and not Nestor at all who had come to him in the night. And not only knew he this by instinct; but the same simple animal instinct put it into his head to test all other kings and princes and chieftains and tribal leaders among the Greeks by a false suggestion made by himself, the monarch of them all, that after these nine years of vainly besieging this city, so hard to take, the time had come for giving up the whole business and sailing home to Hellas.

With this plan in his head, cunning enough, but not very subtle in its cunning, as soon as he had got them all collected in one place, and as soon as the heralds, of whom there were no less than nine, had with no little difficulty got this huge crowd to sit down quietly in great circles on the ground, Agamemnon made his false speech.

“We thought, my friends,” he shouted, in his most reverberating tone, a tone not quite as far-carrying as his brother’s, for Menelaus was renowned over the whole world for the distance his voice could carry, and for its resonance when he yelled his Spartan war-cry, “yes, we thought that after these nine long years of battling with the Trojans we should be able to take Ilium and burn it to the ground. But we have tried in vain. And now that our ships’ timbers are rotting and our ships’ ropes are growing loose and soft with rain, and our wives are growing weary of waiting for us, and our children are ceasing to be children, let us flee with our ships to our dear native land, for no more is there any hope that we shall take broad-wayed Troy."

The result of this speech was as terrific as could be expected. The whole mass of the rank-and-file, the surging crowd of ordinary men such as to the chieftains were just the "Hoi Polloi" or "the Many", were stirred to action at once. The whole crowd began swaying in one direction, as the West Wind sways a field of corn. Down towards the ships they rushed in a confused horde, and many of them even began trying to pull away the wooden props that kept the ships from sliding into the water. But all this was not unobserved by the Queen of Heaven. Desperately Hera rushed over to Pallas Athene and implored her to fly down at once to the scene of action and stop, at any cost, this mad rush to their ships by the Grecian host.

"Stop them! Stop them!" Hera implored. "Are they going to sail for home, leaving Argive Helen still in the hands of the son of Priam?"

Without a word did gleaming-eyed Athene do at once what Hera bade her. She had no hesitation as to which of the chieftains she would select for her first appeal; and she went straight to the side of Odysseus of many devices, who was standing close to his well-benched ship but had laid no hold upon it, for the thought of such a return with everything unfulfilled saddened and sickened him.

Odysseus knew her at once and obeyed her like a shot. Throwing his cloak to his friend, the herald Eurybates, who came from the same village in Ithaca, he set off at a run; and as soon as he reached the hut of Agamemnon he made the monarch lend him his sacred sceptre, the sign and symbol, a bauble perhaps, but still one symbol of royal authority.

This particular sceptre had been made by Hephaestus, who gave it to Zeus himself, who gave it to Hermes, who gave it to Atreus, who at his death left it to Thyestes, who left it in his turn to Agamemnon. With this in his hand Odysseus hurried through the whole crowd of the Achaeans. Whenever he met a chieftain who seemed especially keen on sailing for home he asked him what wretched spirit had taken possession of him that their heavy-witted King's words about sailing for home were only meant as a test for them all. And whenever he found one of the more formidable of the people especially anxious to hoist sail and be off he used the same expression to him and asked what crazy spirit had got hold of him. But in the case of the ordinary rank and file he added a blow or two with this same bauble of power and denounced the fellow for taking too much on himself.

"We can't all be petty kings in our own right," he told each one of these war-weary nondescripts. "We must have one single monarch to obey, or the confusion becomes ridiculous! Sit down, you noisy one, and stop shouting, can't you! It was Zeus the Father himself, I tell you, who made this man our sovereign lord."

Thus Odysseus rushed to and fro among them, brandishing the great sceptre at the chieftains and actually hitting with it the more obstreperous of the common people. At last he came upon the roguish old clown Thersites, who had a special prejudice against both himself and Achilles, purely on the ground of their being cleverer and more quick to show their ability than the other chiefs.

Thersites was bandy-legged; he was lame in one foot; he had bent shoulders; he had barely any hair on his head; nor was his head itself an ordinary human head. It bulged out like the head of a frog. He could hardly be called a popular figure, since he made fun of anyone who crossed him in anything; and once off in one of his tirades of mockery nothing could stop him. But he undoubtedly was a born clown and his buffoonery was inspired. He could always raise a laugh, and that was enough for him. And there was something in his grotesque deformity which brought it about that if he once started to make a butt of anybody, that person’s natural human dignity became a laughable and absurd thing in itself.

It was in order to get a bit of surplus beyond his ordinary meat and drink and to enjoy some public response to his loquacious clowning that Thersites, just as they were starting, had jumped into one of the sixty ships commanded by Menelaus of Lacedaemon and Sparta, possibly even into the very ship that might have contained Thamyris the Thracian, only on his way thither Thamyris boasted so much of his artistic genius that, as we can well believe, those nine jealous daughters of Zeus, the Muses, saw to it that he was so maimed and blind and dumb before he reached the harbour as to be unable to climb on board. But Thersites did manage to join the men who were to endure “all those struggles and groanings for Helen’s sake”, and once among them he certainly added something startling and shocking, as well as comical, to the excitement of their adventurous voyage.

Once arrived with the rest, Thersites, as he shared their meals, though he was too grotesque a figure to share their sports, was able to make laughing stocks of all the chief leaders, especially of the two sons of Atreus and of the two Ajaxes and of Odysseus from Ithaca and of Achilles the son of Peleus. Of these he made uproarious and often deeply humorous mockery, mockery which was the more effective since they were all so far away from the familiar locations of the old inherited traditions. Nor were there lacking moments when this humorous misfit among mortal men, crouched down by himself under a tree-stump or a tombstone or a sand-dune, allowed himself to ponder on the ways of the gods to human beings in a mood of really philosophical criticism. At times like these Thersites would decide that the whole business of being alive on the surface of Mother Gaia, the Earth, was really not worth the cost, not worth the shocks and pains and miseries and set-backs, and certainly not worth — and in his meditations he used the words that had already become common among them during the discomforts of their voyage — certainly not worth “these struggles and groanings for Helen’s sake”.

“If I was as cunning an old rascal as Odysseus,” he said to himself, “I’d soon enter into some private compact with Pluto, for me to give to him a few sacrificial offerings, and for him to give me a nice little place to myself in some quiet corner of Tartarus.”

At this moment, however, Thersites had found a perfect opportunity for the play of his gift for fooling. He could mock at Achilles for having been given Briseïs as a prize; and he could mock at Agamemnon for wanting to take Briseïs away from Achilles. He now began telling everybody that it was time he was given a beautiful young girl as a prize.

“I suppose,” he told them, “that if I tried to get a ransom from the Trojans for some Trojan boy or girl I’d carried off, I’d soon have the great Agamemnon thundering up to say that all ransoms, whether in gold, silver or bronze or tin or pearls or rubies or diamonds or girls must go to him because he was king of us all, king of the universe, a good substitute for Father Zeus, and well suited to take his place when that monarch happened to be visiting those Blessed Ethiopians of his who most certainly must be adepts at bowing and scraping before him and at giving him gold and silver and girls quite as pretty as those that Agamemnon and Achilles and Odysseus steal from us and then quarrel about among themselves! What do you want from us now, son of Atreus? Do you think I’ve got some beautiful girl hidden away in my tent that it is my duty to offer up to you, our noble King, for your special and private enjoyment? What does he think he is, this King of Puppets, that we should give up every private possession we possess to satisfy his greed for chariots and horses and gold and silver and pearls and diamonds and unravished girls?”

It can be well imagined that it was a considerable surprise to Thersites when Odysseus stopped by his side and reproached him in a grave and serious and personal tone, but slowly and clearly, and loud enough for everyone within hearing to catch all he said.

“If I ever find you again prating and jibing against the King, may my own head, the head of Odysseus, abide no more upon its shoulders, nor may I any more be called the father of Telemachus if I don’t take you and strip you of every rag of clothing you have on and send you wailing to the ships, beaten with shameful blows!”

So spoke Odysseus, and with the sceptre he smote his back and shoulders. Thersites crouched down before him, and a bloody weal rose on his back from the strokes he’d received from that golden sceptre. As he crouched down before Odysseus, Thersites could not conceal from himself that big tears were gathering in his eyes, and when he finally sat down on the ground he could not hide the fact from any passer-by that these tears were now running down his cheeks. But he got no sympathy. Vexed at heart though the people were over their own fate in having to stay in this accursed Trojan land with Troy still untaken, it pleased them to see this buffoon, who in his time had made every one of them foolish in the eyes of their neighbours, shedding tears like a child who has been beaten.

Indeed, as they glanced knowingly at each other, first one and then another would jibe at him, and one would say: “Well, if anyone had it coming to him it was you, you wretch! It was you who made my poor old grand-dad feel such a fool with your taunts that he has never tasted a drop of wine since you went for him!” And another would say, “So you’ve got it yourself now, you who made Clitteros, my poor old uncle, so afraid to show his face at the tents that he’s built himself a hut under a rock at Beach-Turn, and Auntie Cadorva has to carry his supper out there every night!” And another would say, “That’s nothing to what you did to my brother Poppero. Only a few folk know it, but it’s what you did, you rogue! You mimicked his way of talking to his little pet dog Uddel, whom he named after a wolf he used to meet in the forest till they became friends. My brother used to hug this dog Uddel between his knees and keep muttering, ‘uddle — uddle — uddle’, but at last one day he heard everybody laughing and found you, you devil, hugging a little pig and murmuring the same gibberish! That very night he took his dog in his arms and swam out to sea with him until they were both drowned.”

Having finished with Thersites, Odysseus took back the Hephaestian sceptre to Agamemnon and gathered all the chiefs and all the people together and made such an inspiring speech to them that in all their lives none of them had ever heard the like. And after him Nestor the son of Neleus gave them some shrewd practical advice.

The culminating point of Odysseus’ speech was his description of the horrible serpent sent by Zeus as a sign to them before they set sail to Troy. This serpent devoured the nestlings of a mother-sparrow whose nest was in a plane-tree. Eight little birds it devoured, and after them their mother as the ninth. And Odysseus explained how Calchas, their prophetic Seer, told them that it would be in the ninth year that Troy would fall.

Full of practical and immediate wisdom was Nestor’s speech; for he recommended that King Agamemnon should hold at once a general review of all the Greek tribes who had come in their various ships and under various leaders to overthrow Troy and restore Helen to Menelaus. Staggering it must have been to many among this great host, numbering a hundred thousand, and brought here in a thousand ships, when they were confronted by this calculated review of themselves and the vessels that brought them. But old Nestor was perfectly right in demanding such a review and such a calculation, as it gave them all a steadfast background of their homelands and home cities, without which it would have been only too easy to feel lost and bewildered.

Nor was the Heavenly Father, Zeus the son of Cronos, oblivious of the advantage the enemies of Troy derived from this review of all their ships and all their leaders. So he called Iris to him and ordered her to go to Troy and warn the Trojans and tell them that they also had better marshal their forces. And Iris obeyed the voice of the All-Father. She flew down to the city of Troy and took the shape of Polites, one of the sons of Priam.

There was already a crowd round the King at the gate of the city which was called Priam’s Gate, and hither Iris came in the shape of Polites, whom she found acting as sentinel on the top of the Mound of Aesyetes. And in the shape of Polites she begged King Priam to call a great gathering, not only of the Trojans, but also of their allies, in fact of all who had come to aid them from every part of the world. The old King Priam and that “sweet warman”, Hector, his most formidable son, hastened to obey the words of their sentinel Polites, and summoned all their own fighters and all the fighters among their allies to come together on the wide eminence outside the walls of the city which mortal men call Batieia, or the hill of thorn-bushes, but which the immortals still call Mirine, in memory of a fast-rushing Amazonian queen who once lived there.

BOOK III

AND SO THE Achaeans from the sea-coast and the Trojans from the tumulus of Mirine, the Amazon, advanced against each other. But the manner of their advance was curiously different. The Trojans advanced shouting and yelling like a host of geranon or screaming cranes, who, fleeing from the drenching storms and whirling winds of the high mountain-ridges, flap desperate wings in their wild haste to reach the ocean, and as they go bring horror and desolation to the terrified Pygmies over whose abodes they fly. On the other hand, the Greeks or Achaeans advanced in unbroken silence, moving resolutely forward, almost as if they were holding each other's hands, and certainly as if their chief thought was to bear aid, each to his particular companion.

The moment the two armies were within a spear's throw of each other, god-like Alexander, the stealer-away of Helen, strode forward between them. At the sight of him there, behaving like a real warrior, both armies stood stiff and waited in suspense to see what would happen.

Paris, in his heroic mood, or, as he preferred to think of himself, "god-like Alexander", wore a splendid panther-skin over one shoulder and carried a curved bow and a quiver of arrows over the other, and in each hand he brandished a shining spear. Shouting in a high-pitched voice to the army of the Achaeans, he announced that he came forward as a champion, and that he was prepared to fight against whatever champion they liked to set up against him; and he went on to propose that the issue of this private contest should be accepted by them all as the final decision and conclusion of the whole nine years' war.

Nor did the challenge flung out so defiantly by the seducer and abductor of Argive Helen remain unanswered. And it was answered, as every honest man, no doubt, on both sides, hoped it might be, by none other than Argive Helen's husband himself. Down from his chariot with a cry of triumph leapt Menelaus. Even as a lion he leapt down, a hungry lion who has killed a horned stag and goes on greedily devouring his prey, whatever the crowd of young hunters and fierce dogs who now surround him may be doing in their struggle to kill him.

Hector rejoiced to hear the words of his brother Paris, and he hastened forward with his spear held in the middle as a sign of peace. And gladly was it accepted as such, and all the Trojan warriors, when they saw him, began removing their weapons and seating themselves upon the ground. The long-haired Greeks, on the contrary, began shooting arrows and throwing stones. But the great King Agamemnon shouted at them: "Stop that! Stop that at once! Can't you see he has something important to say to us?"

Thereupon Hector lifted up his voice, and with an utterance slow and clear made himself heard by both sides.

"Let us all," he declared, "lay down our arms upon the life-giving earth, while these two men do battle for Helen and her possessions; and whichever of them shall win let him take the woman, and all that belongs to her, to his own home; and let the rest of us swear oaths of friendship, offering due sacrifices to the gods, so that they shall be witnesses of our vows of peace."

And Menelaus, good at the war-cry, now spoke firmly and gently.

"Yes," he said, "I implore you all to hear me, for upon my own heart, more than upon the hearts of any of you, has sorrow come. Let the one of us two for whom death and fate are appointed be content to lie dead. And let two lambs be brought from your city, a white ram and a black ewe, one for the Sun and one for our Mother the Earth. And we on our side will bring yet another lamb, which shall be for Olympian Zeus. And bring also, I beg you, your old King Priam, to take the oath with these sacrifices; for young people cannot altogether be trusted. It is old age that has the power of looking both to the past and to the future, and with an old king present at our oath-taking and sacrifice the issue of it will be far the best for both sides."

Hearing these words, both the Trojans and the Achaeans felt a deep ease of heart. They left their chariots in long rows and laid their armour on the ground and sat down. Hector sent to the city for his father Priam and for the two lambs for sacrifice, while Agamemnon sent the herald, Talthybius, for the lamb to be offered on the Greek side to Zeus.

It was then that the goddess Iris, taking the shape of Laodice, the wife of the son of Antenor and far the loveliest of all the Trojan ladies, hastened to find Helen. Her she found in her hall, weaving a great double-folded purple piece of embroidery on which she was depicting various battle-scenes. Close up to her stepped Iris in the form of Laodice, and whispered in her ear:

"O hasten with me, dear lady, so that you can see what wonders are happening! The battle has ceased. Both sides are sitting on the ground with their spears planted in the earth. Alexander and Menelaus are going to fight a duel alone: and the one who wins will take you to his home with all that is yours."

As she told her this news, Iris breathed into her a sudden intense home-sickness, a longing for her former husband, for her native-land, for her father and mother. At once Helen veiled herself in shining linen, weeping as she did so, and accompanied by Clymene and Aethra, the fairest of her maidens, followed this false image of Laodice to the Scaean Gate. Here, seated on the rampart above the Gate, was the old King Priam surrounded by a large group of aged warriors, now too feeble to fight, who were eagerly chattering together as they watched what was going on, just as cicadas from a tree in the forest lift up their lily-like voices.

And when these old warriors beheld Helen coming among them, “God in Heaven!” they murmured to each other, “little wonder that for a Being as beautiful as this all our host of warriors and these thousands and thousands of Greeks should be willing to die! Why, this woman is more than human! She has the loveliness of the Immortals!”

But Priam called Helen to him and said: “Come hither, dear child, and sit before me, that thou mayest see thy former lord and thy kinsfolk and thy people. Thou art nowise to blame in my eyes. It is the gods I ween who are to blame. Yes, it is they who stirred up against me this accursed war that has been the cause of so many tears. But now do tell me, my dear, who is that huge warrior over there, so valiant and tall and so royal-looking?”

“Most revered and most dread art thou to me, O father of my present lord! But, all the same, I can only say: would that I had died ere I followed thy son and left my bridal chamber and my kinsfolk and my daughter of tender age and the lovely companions of my girlhood! But that was not to be; and now I pine away with weeping. Howbeit I will tell you now at once who that man is about whom you have questioned me. That man is Agamemnon, and he was, as sure as I am with you here, brother-in-law to shameless me.”

“Ah happy son of Atreus!” cried the old Priam as he gazed upon him. “But now for heaven’s sake tell me, my dear child, who is that grand warrior over there? Shorter by a head than the son of Atreus, he seems to me, but broader of shoulders and chest. Like a ram he seems to me, a ram of thick fleece, pacing about through a flock of white ewes?”

To this question Helen, the daughter of Zeus, made an immediate answer.

“He,” she cried, “is Odysseus, the son of Laërtes, skilled in a thousand devices. Yes, though he was born and bred in the rugged island of Ithaca, there’s no branch of wisdom in which he’s not a master.”

Hearing this the wise Antenor turned to her and cried: “O lady, you have uttered a true word! I know how right you are because I myself have entertained him in my halls. When he rises to speak he holds his staff or sceptre stiffly in front of him, as if he were a complete blockhead or dunce or fool, nor does he lift his gaze from the ground. But the moment his great voice rises from his chest the words that rush forth are like windblown snow-flakes on a winter’s day! Nobody in the world can rival him in powerful speech!”

And then it was that the aged Priam caught sight of Ajax.

“And who on earth, my darling child, is that great man, towering above everybody with his head so high and his shoulders so broad?”

“That man,” answered long-robed Helen, “is Ajax, the bulwark of the Achaeans. Oh yes! And standing near him is Idomeneus, the leader of the Cretans, whom Menelaus and I often entertained in our halls. But there are two among the rest of the Achaeans down there below that I cannot see; I mean my own brothers, born with me of my own mother, namely Castor, tamer of horses, and the great boxer, Polydeuces. Whether they never left our lovely home in Lacedaemon, or whether they are here, but disinclined to join in the fray, lest they be jeered at as being so nearly related to me and to all the shame I have brought upon myself, I cannot tell you.”

So she spoke, and little did she know that it was the lifegiving earth itself that held them fast, there in Lacedaemon, their dear native land, both of them dead and buried.

Meanwhile, from the heart of the city and out through the gate into the space between the two hosts went heralds with the sacrificial lambs and a great goat-skin full of the richest and most intoxicating wine, making ready for such sacred vows in the presence of the gods as could not be broken without disaster to all. And one of the heralds, whose name was Idaeus, came up to old Priam's side with a polished bowl and golden cups, and made a grave and formal request for his presence at the oath-taking ceremony.

"Rise, thou son of Laomedon," he said solemnly. "Both Trojans and Achaeans call for thee, that thou mayest swear the oath of unbroken faith to the gods along with the proper sacrifices. Alexander and Menelaus will then fight each other and the one who wins will take to his home the woman and all her belongings; and we on both sides will swear the never-to-be-broken oaths of friendship to which the immortal gods will give their consent."

Thus spoke the herald, and the old King shuddered. But all the same he rose from his seat and bade them harness the horses to his chariot and rode forth to a central place between the two armies. And here Agamemnon opened the ceremony with a solemn prayer.

"O great Zeus," he prayed, "who at this moment dost rule us all from the summit of Mount Ida, and thou Sun who beholdest all things and hearest all things, and ye Rivers and thou Earth, and all ye numberless ones, who weary of life rest in the world below, listen to our prayer and accept our offerings and take vengeance on any of us who have sworn our vows falsely. If Menelaus kill Alexander let him take the woman and all that is hers; and if Alexander kill Menelaus let him keep the woman and all that is hers."

So he spake and cut the lambs' throats. Then rose up the aged Priam.

"Hearken to me," he cried, turning first to his own Trojans and then to the Greeks. "I verily will now go my way back to windy Ilium, since I cannot bear to behold with my own eyes my dear son doing battle with Menelaus.” And then, as he mounted his chariot, “I will take the dead lambs with me,” he added. And, as he watched his driver take the reins of the horses, he looked sadly at those two little blood-stained bodies at his feet. “Sacrifice to the gods? Not a bit of it!” he told himself. “It’s life paying its debt to death! And we all owe that debt; and each of us, sooner or later, will have to pay it! O, how I wish,” and bending down he touched the nearest little lamb with the knuckles of his right hand, “that my end would come before I’ve seen one more drop of blood, never mind for whose sake it is spilt, or for what cause!”

“O how thankful I am,” thought the beautiful but irresponsible Paris, as he adjusted his carefully selected armour to his incomparable limbs, “that I brought brother Lycaon’s corselet as well as my usual one, for it does, it really does, look grander and more imposing, and I shall certainly wear it instead of the other. But what an inspiration it was just now that Aphrodite herself — it must have been she and no other — put into my head! Yes, lie there, my perfect bow, with your arrow waiting all ready to be strung and pulled. You don’t know, master Menelaus, you great shouter of catch-words, how quick I can dodge, and when once I’ve dropped this damned spear and shield, how quick I can shoot! But you’ll find out, my friend, you’ll find out! And what’s more, your ghost shall I see tonight, before it descends to Hades, what kisses I’ll win from Helen, in spite of your being gone for good!”

And when the ground had been measured for them, and when the accustomed throwing of the lots as to which of them should throw his spear first was over, the duel began. Paris threw his spear first as fate decided. But its point was broken and turned aside by the thick Mycenaean shield of Menelaus. Then Menelaus threw his spear and it pierced the shield of Paris and pierced also that showy corselet of his brother Lycaon with which he had been so pleased; but Paris was so slender and so agile that though the spear actually pierced his tunic too he managed to dodge aside with his skin untouched. Then Menelaus drew his silver-handled sword and, rushing at him, struck him a terrific blow full on the helmet, praying desperately to Zeus as he did so and thinking in his deepest heart, "Now to the end of time shall such base wretches who show their gratitude to their hosts by stealing their wives know what to expect!"

But it was not the helmet of Paris that was broken in pieces when these two met; it was the sword of Menelaus. Into four pieces it was broken, and it fell from his hand upon the ground. Then the wrath of Menelaus was turned from this treacherous wife-stealer to the All-Father himself, looking down from Mount Ida so calmly upon this failure of just retribution.

"Father Zeus!" he shouted in his most powerful war-cry yell, "you are the most pernicious of all the gods in the whole world!"

Still yelling with rage against the helpless Paris, or as Paris loved to hear his admirers call him, "the god-like Alexander", Menelaus now rushed upon him with his bare hands, pulled him to the earth and, hauling him by his helmet along the ground, dragged him towards the ranks of the seated Achaeans. Paris himself couldn't utter a sound, for he was being choked by the strap of the helmet under his soft chin: and Menelaus felt the delicious throbbing of satisfied vengeance convulse his whole body and soul.

But he was calculating without the goddess of beauty for beauty's sake and of love for love's sake, and of letting order and decency be shattered under the wheels of the chariot of ecstasy: for here was Aphrodite in a flash between them, with her immortal hands loosening the strap which was choking Paris! Well can we imagine when Menelaus found himself with only the man's helmet in his hands how quickly he flung it amid the ranks of his comrades and turned back to complete his vengeance. But he was too late. Throwing a cloud of impenetrable mist round her darling, she carried him off from that field of contest and, conveying him to his own chamber, laid him upon his bed. Then, telling herself to remember that she always got more delight in vicariously sharing the love of lovers than in being loved or even in loving, this most irresistible of all divinities rushed off to get Helen.

She had, however, to accept the unspoken rule governing the relations between immortals and mortals, so she couldn't summon Helen in her own person. Whose shape had she best assume? This was a very delicate question, for on it no doubt depended the whole success of her struggle to bring these unique lovers together upon that memorable night.

"Better not aim too high," she told herself. "On the other hand, better not let her bring her usual companions, Aethra and Clymene on the scene! Who would be the right person at this particular moment?" Then she had an inspiration. "It must be a very humble person; and yet someone she has known very intimately and known at her old home in Greece in her girlhood. But it mustn't be her nurse. O no!" and Aphrodite smiled with mischievous naughtiness: "I've been too often defeated by a beautiful girl's nurse. They're the shrewdest of all the antagonists I've ever had to deal with; worse than Hera and Athene together!"

And still smiling to herself, and thinking of various shrewd nurses who had not been a match for her, Aphrodite took the form of an ancient dame, a wool-comber, who had been wont to card the fair wool for Helen when she lived in Lacedaemon, and who was well loved by her. In the shape of this old woman, Aphrodite went to Helen's side, who was surrounded now by a crowd of Trojan ladies.

"Come home, my dear," she murmured in her ear, pulling at her glistening white veil; "your god-like Alexander wants you especially tonight. He is lying on the bed in his chamber, freshly bathed, and anointed with the perfume you yourself wanted him to use, and looking more beautiful, my sweet child, than I have ever seen any man look.”

So great was Aphrodite’s power to excite amorous feelings, and so passionate was her private desire at this moment to share, vicariously and unseen by either of the lovers, the ecstasy of their love, that her immortal emotion shone in the eyes of the old woman she impersonated. So much of it indeed shone there, and in the old lady’s whole manner, that Helen was not to be fooled. Women are far quicker to detect the deception when an immortal is impersonating a mortal than men ever are; and not only so, but, although the goddess had already made her inwardly decide that nothing in heaven or earth should prevent her from hastening to the bedchamber of her lover, she was quick to catch the kindred erotic excitement in the beautiful Being at her side.

The old Lacedaemonian wool-comber had by this time vanished into thin air, and the loveliest of mortals was face to face with the loveliest of immortals. Certain it is that whether mortal or immortal they were a couple of very spirited and very discerning young women; and the challenge this time came from the mortal one. Argive Helen had indeed come to the natural conclusion that in Aphrodite she had found a very dangerous rival who was also in love with the seductive and beguiling Paris! She didn’t understand — how could she possibly, as a mortal woman, understand such a weird subtlety? — that Aphrodite could completely gratify her own ecstatic passion for the god-like Alexander vicariously, through her, Helen’s, passion for him. So it was with an explosion of spontaneous anger that she now burst out: “Daimonië, why are you trying to fool me like this? Have you a notion now of carrying me off to Phrygia or Maeonia where you can give me to some other mortal for whom you have a fondness? Anyway, my Menelaus, who has conquered your god-like Alexander, will be wanting now to lead hateful me back to his home. So do you go now, and make love to Paris, and leave Olympus forever; and guard him, and love him, till he either makes you his wife or his slave! Yes*!* you go to him; for I swear to you I will not go to that man's bed, to be mocked at forever by all Trojan women! Besides — O, I can't tell you all I feel — I have a measureless grief at heart!"

And then there happened between these two beautiful and angry women precisely what Olympian Zeus, the parent of both of them, must have foreseen from the start. The immortal one used her immortality to the limit and threatened the mortal one, who naturally and inevitably yielded to an outburst of such supernatural fury.

"Annoy me not, silly girl, lest you make me hate you as much as now I happen to love you; and if I really do hate you, my hate will soon extend to both Greeks and Trojans, and then such disasters will happen to the whole lot of you in this part of the world that more blood and more tears will be shed than you, proud folk, have ever seen, or even expected to see, in your self-satisfied lives!"

So spoke the goddess; and Helen, though her father was also Zeus himself, was seized with fear. And she wrapped herself in her shining mantle and obeyed and went; nor did the Trojan women around her notice her departure, for the goddess saw to that as she led her away.

In silence she led her swiftly through the streets till they came to the Palace of Paris, the son of Priam. Here, as they passed through the portals and went down the passages, all the handmaidens they met turned hurriedly to their task, and when they reached the bedchamber of the god-like Alexander, it was the great goddess herself who got a chair for Helen and made her seat herself by the side of her adorable lord as he lay there in his resplendent beauty. But Helen’s only desire was to pour forth upon him anger and bitter contempt.

“So you’ve come safe away from the battle, have you? O how I wish my former lord, so much braver than you, had done for you and your vain boasting! But challenge him again, will you? O how I wish from the bottom of my heart that you would! But you’d better not! No, I warn you to beware of doing it; for next time, there’s no doubt, fair-haired Menelaus will finish you off once and for all!”

Then Paris made answer very gently. “Chide me not, lady of my heart, with such cruel words. Menelaus has vanquished me this time with the help of Athene. But another time I shall vanquish him; for on our side, too, there are powerful gods! But come; let us take our joy, couched together in love, for never yet hath desire so encompassed my soul, no! not even when I snatched you from lovely Lacedaemon and we had dalliance together on the Island of Cranaë, as it does now. O I swear my longing for you now is the one and only feeling that I have!”

So he besought her and she found, just as before, that she couldn’t resist him, and they embraced each other upon that perfect bed of flexible cords that yielded to every movement.

Meanwhile Menelaus, the son of Atreus, ranged through the throng like a wild beast searching if anywhere he might have sight of Alexander. But he couldn’t accuse his compatriots of hiding him; for well did he know that like himself they all hated him as they hated black death. Then it was that the great king of men, Agamemnon, made a triumphant speech. To his own side he spoke, and to the Trojans and their allies also. And both sides listened to him in silence. To the Trojans and their allies these were the words he spoke.

“Victory is now with Menelaus. Do ye therefore, as has been sworn and agreed upon, with sacrifices to the gods, give back to us Helen with all her treasures, and pay to us in requital such recompense as befits so great an event, such recompense as shall be famous in the minds of men who are yet unborn!”

So spake the son of Atreus, and all the Achaeans shouted assent.

BOOK IV

THE GODS OF Olympus, with Father Zeus in their midst, were now holding a momentous conference. Golden were their thrones and golden were their footstools, and golden was the floor beneath them as they looked down on the city of Troy. And it suddenly entered the mind of Zeus the son of Cronos that this would be an excellent opportunity to tease his wife Hera and his daughter Athene by a few suggestions about a happier future for the city of Priam, for he well knew that both these goddesses, though Hera was not the mother of Athene, were filled with an abysmal hatred for Troy and an insatiable longing to see it go up in flames with its whole population.

And so, while the rosy cheeked Hebe poured out nectar for them all, and they lifted up their golden cups to one another, Zeus suggested in his most fatherly voice — while he thought in his heart "O you pair of spiteful immortals, I'll soon make you dance your dance!" — that since Menelaus had already defeated Paris it might be as well to put an end to the whole murderous war and let Helen return to her Spartan home, and let the city of Priam remain as it was before Paris carried her off.

The wise Athene kept silence at this, holding her fury in check, but Hera burst out: "You dreadful Son of Cronos, what a word you've uttered! Will you deliberately make all my labour in vain, and all the sweat of my horses useless, dragging my chariot to and fro, as I roused the honest Greeks against these tricky Trojans? Well! Act as you please yourself — but let me tell you this. We other gods will have nothing to do with it! Nothing, I tell you! Nothing at all!"

Stirred by his wife's words to hot anger, Zeus the cloud-gatherer thundered his retort.

"Daimonië! What on earth have old Priam's sons done to you that you feel like this? You talk as if you could turn yourself at any moment into a man-devouring monster, a Tartarus-born dragon with six stomachs, each capable of digesting a thousand men and women! I tell you of all cities beneath the sun and starry heaven, wherein men that dwell on the face of the earth have their abode, sacred Ilios is the one most honoured of my heart. Long may Priam and his people keep their good spears cut from tall ash-trees: for never at any time was my altar lacking in the burnt offering, the drink-offering — never lacking, I tell you, in any of the sacrifices or offerings which our worship implies and which is our due."

Then in answer to him spoke ox-eyed queenly Hera, "Verily I have three cities that are dearest to me of all places in the entire world, and I expect you can guess what they are — Argos, Sparta, and Mycenae, each with her beautiful wide streets."

"What, in heaven and earth," thought Zeus, "is she going to say? Surely not that she would sacrifice any of these if I agree to the destruction of Ilios?"

But Hera knew well what the effect of her speaking of these places would have on him. She was fully aware that Zeus had no particular love for any city upon earth and no particular hatred for any city either. "With him," she thought, "everything is immediate and very personal; and I warrant his tenderness for this Ilios or Troy, or whatever else they like to call the doomed place, is purely due to his mania for that pretty boy Ganymede, descended from his son Dardanus. What I've got to do," her thoughts swept on, more like numberless rapid ripples than heaving waves, "is to give these easy, careless, indifferent impulses of his a unity they lack, and even a carefully considered tendency, according to my own well-weighed decisions, as to what is best for us all up here and for men and women down there! The great thing is to be always after him, always speaking my mind to him, always advocating something or opposing something. It doesn't really matter what this something is, as long as I never forget for a second my own secret opinion as to what will be best in the long run for us up here and for them down there. Do I resemble the women of the earth in all this? Yes! I do! I do! I do! I know very well I do! And for that very reason I must be thankful that I am the mother of Hephaestus, who can make for all women, whether in Heaven or on Earth, all that they want that can be made with Fire!"

It was after a thoughtful silence that she then calmly addressed Zeus.

"You must not think, O Lord of us all and sharer of my bed, that I am refusing to obey you. I know from bitter experience how much more powerful you are than I am; and don't you think I've forgotten any of our old trials of strength because I remember them only too clearly. Yes, you are the stronger, and I have enough sense in my head, in spite of all my strong opinions, never to oppose you in the silly way mortal women sometimes oppose their dear lords. But, after all, I am your sister as well as your wife. Crooked-counselling Cronos begat me, just as he begat you, and I was the eldest of his daughters. Let us, I beg you therefore, each yield to the other: I to thee, and thou to me, and all the other immortal gods will follow us. And just hear my advice on this point concerning Troy. Do, I beseech you, command Pallas Athene to go down at once among them and manage things in such a way that, although Menelaus has defeated Paris and although the Greeks are triumphing, the Trojans will be the first to break the oaths they have sworn with sacrifice upon our altars and in defiance of these oaths to do all the harm they can to the triumphing Achaeans."

So skilfully had Hera presented her view of the matter that the Father of Gods and Men gave his clear command straight away to the goddess she had mentioned.

“Haste thee,” he bade her, “with all speed into the midst of their two armies, and arrange the issue in such a way that the Trojans shall be the first to break their vows.”

He couldn’t have ordered Athene to do anything more entirely in accordance with what that gleaming-eyed goddess was herself longing to do. So with a spectacular rush she hurled herself at once down from the summit of Olympus. Her wild descent through the air was seen by both armies, who at once took it to be one of those falling stars that the son of crooked-counselling Cronos hurls down as a portentous warning, making everything feel as if terrible sparks were flying from it. Indeed, many groups of warriors on both sides turned from the sight to each other with the same commentary: “Something serious is going to happen to some of us if we don’t say our prayers and look out!”

It was as natural for Pallas Athene to assume the personality of a man as for Aphrodite to assume the personality of a woman; and the warrior in whose likeness she appeared now was Laodocus, the son of Antenor, and in his form she went quickly through the Trojan ranks hunting for a particular deadly archer, Pandarus by name, who was a son of Lycaon and whose home was near the river Aesepus. The moment she got hold of Pandarus, she began talking to him in a tone which made that cunning archer feel sure that this royal relative of the godlike Alexander was an inspired adviser. Being a man, Pandarus hadn’t the wit to discern, as Argive Helen had done in the case of Aphrodite, the person who lurked behind this inspiration. But he certainly listened to it as devoutly as if he had. Indeed it is likely enough that it jumped with a thought he had been harbouring in his own mind ever since the triumph of Menelaus over Paris.

“Come on,” cried Laodocus, “my Archer of Archers! Now surely has come the supreme chance of a lifetime! No, no, no! Don’t ‘ee think any more about vows and sacrifices! If you only snatch at this grand chance while it is being given you, it’ll be these accursed Greeks who’ll have to sacrifice to Poseidon to waft their wretched ships safe home!”

Pandarus didn’t hesitate a minute. “This clearly,” he said to himself, “is a hint from a spirit akin to my own!” And aloud to the son of Antenor he said:

“I will do exactly what you suggest. You needn’t put into my head the amount of gold and silver I’ll get from Alexander if my arrow flies home. The thing will be well worth doing for the sake of our King, and for the walls and gates and streets of our city, without thinking of the reward which, as you justly state, is bound to be pretty large; but I shall string the bow at once, my friend, according to your word.”

Thus speaking, the crafty archer, Pandarus, fitted an arrow to the most remarkable bow that a man could find at that moment anywhere within or without the walls of Troy. It was a bow constructed by a skilful workman in horn out of the horns of a wild goat; and Pandarus now fitted to this an arrow that had never been used before and was magically charged thick and slab with the life-destroying pains of death. With this arrow strung upon this bow, Pandarus aimed at Menelaus. And as he loosed the arrow he prayed desperately to Apollo, the God of the early Wolf-Light which now shimmered around them, that the flight of this arrow might bring nothing less than the burning to ashes of the body of Menelaus of Sparta upon a blazing funeral pyre. But before he had finished his prayer and had loosed the arrow from his bow the very goddess who had urged him to shoot was at the side of his target. In a second when the arrow had struck Menelaus and had passed through his belt and through both corselet and taslet, Athene brushed it aside as lightly as a mother brushes away a fly from a sleeping babe.

But even so the arrow did graze his flesh and the dark blood began to flow from the wound. The contrast between the red blood, as it now flowed, and the white skin of the warrior's thighs and legs was just as striking as when a woman of Caria stains an ivory cheek-piece for a war-horse with scarlet dye and it turns out to be so beautiful that it is laid aside in a treasure-chamber; though every horseman who sees it craves for it for his horse. Yes, so beautiful showed now the red blood on the white skin of Menelaus! But Agamemnon shuddered when he saw on his brother's legs this stream of blood; and Menelaus himself, devotee of Ares though he was, likewise shuddered, but his spirits quickly rose when he looked at himself closely and marked the slight nature of his wound. But Agamemnon clasped him by the hand and with his mind full of this startling proof of the Trojan's treachery and complete disregard for the oaths they had just sworn even though accompanied by sacrifice to the gods, he delivered himself of an eloquent speech.

"Even though he should die of this wound, my own dear brother, and his bones should rot in this curst Troy-land, the day will come, I tell you all, the day will surely come, I know it, I know it, when Ilios shall be laid low, and the people of Priam, for all their ashen spears, shall see Zeus the son of Cronos shake his dark aegis against them! So shall it be; but all the same, O my dearest brother, deep grief will be mine if thou dost die, and we and all our ships have to return home leaving Argive Helen behind. How could I bear it, O brother, if in future days some accurst Trojan should stamp triumphantly on thy burial-mound and boast: 'Here lie the bones of Menelaus who tried in vain to snatch away from us his Helen, now not of Argos any longer, but of Troy’? O brother, my brother, sooner than such a thing as this should happen, may the wide earth gape for me!”

But the fair-haired Menelaus answered him with cheering words.

“All is well with me, my brother. And I beg you not to trouble and agitate our friends any more. The arrow didn’t touch any fatal spot and the wound I got is only the merest scratch.”

But Agamemnon answered, “I pray indeed you’re right, brother of mine. But all the same I shall send for Machaon, that unequalled doctor, who will soon staunch this blood and put some healing lotion on the place to stop all pain.”

It was none other than Talthybius himself, the swiftest of heralds, that he despatched; who very soon returned, bringing with him Machaon the son of Asclepius. Then they all waited in a circle round the wounded man, while Machaon undid his belt and his corselet and his taslet and drew out the arrow, the point of which was still in his flesh, though it hadn’t gone much below the surface. And after sucking the wound with his lips he laid upon it a certain healing ointment which Cheiron, wisest of the Centaurs, had taught his father Asclepius to use.

Then Agamemnon, having told his driver to have his chariot and horses ready for the moment when he had exhausted himself, started striding up and down among all the ranks of the Achaeans, stirring them up to fight and promising them that the battle was now bound to end with the fall of Troy, since the Trojans had been the ones to break their pledges and disregard their oaths. The extreme and indeed the almost childish simplicity of this great king’s mind was proved during this march on foot from one end of the Achaean encampments to the other. Each camp was pitched upon the portion of the shore nearest to the ships of its occupants, and it happened that, while it was easy for this royal rouser of the war spirit to reach the camp of the Ajax pair and the camp of old Nestor and the camp of Idomeneus the Cretan and his comrade Meriones, it took longer and needed some tiresome scrambling across sand-dunes to reach the camp of Odysseus, son of Laërtes.

Now it happened that Odysseus had not yet caught the rumour that they were all to re-arm and begin fighting again, in spite of the fact that Menelaus had defeated the obstreperous Paris or, as he thought of himself, the god-like Alexander. So what must this majestic simpleton of a wide-ruling monarch do but take for granted that Odysseus, whom all the gods called “the Super-Wise”, was deliberately intending to dodge this annoying re-armament? If the wide-ruling monarch had possessed the intelligence of a faithful dog, he wouldn’t have made such a silly mistake. But what must the big fool do but actually begin, in the presence of their followers, to accuse both Odysseus and a certain Menestheus, son of Peteos, both of whom were encamped near a contingent of Athenians, of avoiding this newly-aroused battle out of mean-spirited selfishness, if not out of skulking cowardice? The men of Ithaca who surrounded Odysseus must have been startled by the way this ridiculous scolding from this wooden-headed ruler hurt the feelings of their chief. But that it did so was proved by the way the man answered. For of all things in the world that his followers must have thought he would be reticent about was his private family life in his island home; and what must he do now but call himself the father of Telemachus, while he indignantly pointed out that the wide-ruler’s words were as empty as wind? Something in his tone, however, must have impressed Agamemnon, who resembled some great ox or cart-horse that was much simpler in mind than a cat or a dog, for he began to treat the thing as a joke, laughed loudly in a boisterous and friendly manner, and retracted all his allegations.

But the ponderous king surpassed himself further still in folly when he came to Diomed: or did he perhaps only pretend to think that such a stalwart as Diomed, the son of Tydeus, could possibly be cowering and cringing? Did the great man simply feel that it was the duty of a stirrer-up of the emotions of battle to go about accusing, in the hearing of all, the most intrepid warriors of gross cowardice?

But Diomed was the kind of character who might easily accuse himself of almost any sort of weakness. Heroic as he was, he was subject to all manner of doubts and qualms and panic-spasms and crazy manias and wild jets of fantastic apprehensions. He was never one to weigh in the balance his own emotions, not to speak of the emotions of others. No doubt there had been, and again would be, moments in Diomed's life when he experienced, whether he yielded to them or not, paroxysms of desperate fear. And though it was in accordance with his gross animal instincts that the great king accused the son of Tydeus of yielding to such emotions, when he ought to have been straightening his shoulders and buckling on his armour, it was only just what any super-crafty Odysseus might have done when he launched out upon a prolonged description of the wondrous slaughterings achieved by Diomed's own father!

But when the great monarch turned to Stheneleus, the friend of Diomed and the son of Capaneus, he brought about a very interesting and curious situation. The son of Capaneus told him to his face that he was a blasted liar; at which the son of Tydeus, who was at once the most modest as well as the most formidable of all the Greek fighters except Ajax, the son of Telamon, turned on his friend and explained to him that it was natural for Agamemnon to make these provocative and violent speeches throughout the host; since, short of being killed or maimed for life, he was the one among them all who would gain most from their victory, and the one among them all, except his brother Menelaus, who would suffer most from their defeat if Helen was left behind in a victorious Troy when they fled in their ships.

While Agamemnon was relating in fuller detail than the situation demanded his long-winded story about his meeting with Tydeus, and how Tydeus dealt with the son of Cadmus when they tried to ambush him, Diomed had felt a wave of tenderness for this deep-throated, simple-minded admirer of the father he himself could only just remember, and it shocked him to hear his companion denouncing as a liar this old-fashioned teller of heroic tales. But in a flash Diomed now put all emotions, his anger with his friend, his feelings for his father, his attitude to Agamemnon, into the background, and, leaping from his chariot with his armour clanging about him, he tossed aside all these foolish quarrels among friends, and fast and furious he floundered forward, following the foremost into the fray. As when upon the resounding pebbles of the beach, driven on by the West Wind, break the great curving crests of one huge wave after another, as the sea hurls itself against the headlands, spitting forth the wild spray of its salt foam, so did the Greek ranks rush on, the men themselves keeping silence as they went, their chiefs cheering them forward.

With the Trojans it was different; for among them there were fighters from so many far-off lands that there was a wild and confused hubbub of whirling voices, and a complicated mingling of varied tongues. So bewildering was the clamour that it reminded many of the Greeks, who were now beginning to engage them in combat, of certain great farms in their own homeland, where they could scarcely hear each other speak because of the bleating of the sheep that had got separated from their lambs and of the crying of the lambs that had lost their mothers.

The Greeks were stirred on by gleaming-eyed Pallas Athene, but there were two terrifying Phantoms, demonic spirits called Terror and Panic, who kept gliding in and out of the battle. But an apparition of worse horror, far more alarming than either of these two, showed itself now in the person of Eris, a being of a perfectly appalling appearance, concerning whom no man alive knows whence she comes or whither she goes or who were her parents or if there is any abyss in Tartarus familiar with her. There are those who call her Mad Rivalry; but what most people say is that she is a companion of man-slaying Ares, and that those among us who have seen the worst of her declare that, until the desperateness of the struggle reaches its climax, her terrible head is lifted only a little above the rest, but that when the madness of conflict attains its culmination, the whole bulk of her becomes visible, her head towering up into the sky, her feet firmly planted upon the earth.

Now at this moment were heard both the groans and the moans of the wounded and dying and the fearful yells of the slayers; while the earth beneath them all flowed with blood. Even as two winter torrents pouring down the side of a mountain mingle their streams in a narrow gorge between high boulders, and from far away over the hills the shepherd hears their thundering roar, so, as the Greeks and Trojans contended, the clamour of it and the toil of it filled the air for miles around and rose up to the mountains.

It was then that Telamonian Ajax drove his bronze spear through the chest of that strapping youth, young Simoeisius, to whom his mother had given birth when she was following her parents down from Ida so that she might see their flocks of sheep. Clear through his body went the spear and he crashed down to the ground. Like a beautiful poplar he fell, that has grown in the earth in the midst of a great marsh, a poplar with a perfectly smooth stem but with finely spreading branches near the top, a poplar that no wind has blown down, but that some clever wagon-maker has deliberately felled, so as to make the wheels for his wagons. And thus was slain, not only the youthful Simoeisius, but many another young hero on both sides, the Trojans being driven on with furious encouragement by Apollo as he looked down from Pergamus; while the Greeks, more favoured still, had Athene herself right in the midst of them, helping one hero and then another hero, and warding off many deadly spear-thrusts and many murderous arrow-hits.

BOOK V

NO STAR CAN shine brighter than Sirius, especially when this particular star rises at midsummer out of the very depths of the ocean; and it was soon clear to both sides in this terrific struggle that Pallas Athene had determined that at any cost Diomed, the son of Tydeus, was to surpass them all and shine as brightly as Sirius fresh from his bath in the sea.

Now the oldest and most devoted of all the priests in the Temple of Hephaestus in Troy was a priest called Dares, and both his sons, Phegeus and Idaeus, in their own special chariot, made up their minds that together they would either finish Diomed or perish themselves.

“Surely,” they said to each other, “with a chariot such as ours, and two of us together, we can do for him!”

It was the elder one, Phegeus, who first flung his spear; but it passed over Diomed’s left shoulder without touching him. Then Diomed himself flung his weapon, and it struck Phegeus clean between the nipples and brought him crashing down, out of his chariot and down upon the ground. His brother’s collapse so horrified Idaeus that he was seized with panic, and leaving his brother where he fell, he leapt from the chariot and fled. But even then Diomed, who was on foot, would most certainly have followed him if Hephaestus himself had not come to the man’s aid, covered him with a cloud as Aphrodite had done with Paris, and carried him to safety.

It was a cruel and pitiable spectacle to the Trojans to see one brother in flight and the other by the now motionless chariot dead on the ground; for it hadn’t taken Diomed long to detach the horses and hand them over to his friends. And it was at this very moment that Athene, wisely foreseeing that, if Ares roused the spirit of vengeance among the Trojans to a mad heat, the tide of battle might turn again and the ships again be in peril, herself went straight up to the terrible god of war and seized him by the hand. So powerful was the personality of Athene, and so dominant her spirit and so irresistible her persuasion, that the violent and passionate war-god could think of nothing to answer and of no way to resist her. In fact all he could do was to yield to her wish whatever it might be.

“Ares, Ares!” she murmured in his ear, “thou bane of mortals, thou bloody capturer of impregnable bastions, let us two now leave these Trojans and Achaeans to fight it out among themselves, and find out for themselves to which side Father Zeus has made up his mind to give the victory. As for you and me, you from one side and I from the other, let us clear off and leave this thing to Zeus, lest we ourselves incur his anger by our interference.”

So speaking, and holding the blood-stained lover of slaughter firmly by the hand, she led him forth from the battle, and she made him sit down by her side on the sandy bank of the river Scamander. Over the windy plain of Troy stared these two, thinking their own strangely different thoughts.

Pallas Athene said to herself: “O what a comfort it will be to me when this obstinate and dangerous city of Troy is laid in the dust forever! I’ve always suspected from the first foundation that it would come under the power of those I hate and who hate me. But I never thought that this bloody-souled Ares here, the enemy of the human race, would join with Apollo, to whose music the stars in their courses dance, and with Aphrodite, who cares for nothing but luring us all into the prison of love, to struggle against me! O that I could find one single city upon earth whose palaces, temples, streets and houses — yea! and the very rooms within those houses, with all their furniture, walls, floors, ceilings, kitchens and weaving-looms — are really worthy of the world of reason which I am forever struggling to create for these unhappy mortals!”

But Ares thought, “Shall I never be able to destroy these wretched tribes of mortal men that are such blots and stains upon the eternal peace of earth and water and air? I know well that the Son of Cronos has a sort of ‘Fatherly love’, as he calls it, for us all, but when we say ‘Fatherly’ we use the right word; for don’t we know how furious fathers get with their children; sometimes even to the point of swallowing them? O how I hate and loathe and despise these tribes of men! If only I could enlarge this Greek and Trojan contest into a contest that included all the nations and cities of the world, how wonderful it would be! To just look on while these vicious bipeds finished one another off completely! O what heavenly deliciousness that would be! What a mysterious ecstasy it is, this feeling I get, mounting up, up, up, up, like the consummation of love between two lovers who have been waiting and waiting and waiting for this exquisite abandonment for a score of years, to see this good red blood gushing out! Who was it who said it was the lust and cruelty in me? O how wrong, how totally wrong, that word was! It isn’t cruelty at all, this bloodlust of mine. If it were, I’d want it prolonged. I’d want it to hurt, hurt, hurt them. I don’t want anything of the kind. I want the blood to pour out in streams, to gush out in fountains, to burst forth in pulsating spouts. I want it to come in extraordinary throbs like lava from a volcano, whirling forth in jets like red fumes from the heart of a burning mountain! It’s not the pain of these miserable insects I want to see, it’s their utter destruction, it’s the end of them all for good and all! I get no pleasure in their pain. If I could only kill them all at one go, how happily I would do it! It’s blood for blood’s sake I love. And why do I love it? Because it’s only when the veins and arteries and hearts of these wretches have been thoroughly pumped dry of blood, blood, blood, blood, blood, that all these arms and legs and fingers and toes and mouths and eyes and ears and lungs and tongues will stop their kicking and flicking and catching and snatching and glaring and staring and pitching and switching and aping and raping and just lie quiet as the motionless rocks, calm as the waves of the ocean after a storm, and level as the snow on the top of a towering mountain. O shall I ever live to look out across the wide expanse of Gaia the Earth, and know that no wretch of a man, woman or child will ever again, with their accursed activities and greeds and loves and hates, destroy the everlasting patience of that which feels not, hears not, sees not, tastes not, nor evermore can be disturbed in its own eternal peace!"

But it was not destined for Athene, taking the side of the Greeks, or for Ares, taking the side of the Trojans, to abide long in quiet on the banks of the river Scamander. Cries to the immortals for help began to reach them too pitifully.

Diomed had become like a man absolutely besotted with slaughter. He was behaving so wildly that some of his best friends began to think that he had lost his wits and would soon be taking them for Trojans. He still was rushing about on foot; and at last he came towards the spot where Pandarus was waiting with his curved bow.

This shrewd marksman now said to himself: "By Olympian Zeus, if I don't finish this man off I'm no marksman at all!" So he took aim and let an arrow fly. Nor had he boasted in vain. Clean into Diomed's right shoulder flew that stinging barb. The son of Tydeus stumbled and fell with the arrow sticking out of his body. Up to him ran the excited Pandarus and began shouting at the top of his voice, "He's had it, he's had it! I've done for him! Zeus must have meant this glory to be mine when he brought me here out of Lycia!"

But he counted without his man. Diomed slowly, though with great difficulty, heaved himself up: and you can believe that before he was on his feet Pandarus and his bow were lost to sight in the crowd. But Diomed staggered through the mélée till he found Sthenelus, the son of Capaneus, in his chariot drawn by two horses. Right in front of the horses he stopped, and begged Sthenelus to jump down and pull out the arrow from his shoulder. This the latter did in a jiffy, and as the blood gushed out through the ringed hole in his body-jacket, Diomed prayed passionately to Pallas Athene that he might pursue this Pandarus who had shot him and finish him off.

And she heard him from where she was and she rushed to his side.

"Cheer up, Diomed!" she cried. "I have now put into you the spirit of your father Tydeus who was the bravest fighter I've ever known. And more than this. I now give you the power of recognizing an Immortal under any disguise. But listen to me, my friend. Don't 'ee fight with any of us except Aphrodite, daughter of Zeus. Her you may smite. And I hope you'll have the chance. If you do, hit her hard!"

Meanwhile as Aeneas, whose father was Anchises and his mother Aphrodite, was driving his two-horsed chariot against the Greeks, he stopped at the side of Pandarus to ask him who this Greek was who was rushing about on foot so desperately and slaughtering so many Trojans. Pandarus burst out into a torrent of angry self-reproaches.

"Don't you or anybody else praise my damnable bow and blasted quiver any more. I only want to break them both across my knee and fight with sword and shield instead. Twice, I tell you, you son of Anchises, have I hit a leader of these Greeks. Once Menelaus himself; and now, very now, this devlish Diomed, and I've drawn blood I tell you, Aeneas, from both of them! But to what purpose? My arrows draw blood and the men fall. But a few minutes later there they are, rushing about and striking at us, just as they were before! I tell you, my friend, I wish I'd never brought this confounded bow and quiver from home! My father had lots of chariots and horses. Why, in the name of Aidoneus, didn't I bring a chariot and horses instead of this curst bow!"

But Aeneas spoke plainly and bluntly to him.

"You are quite wrong, my good Pandarus, to talk in this crazy manner. You are too wrought up. Here! Mount by my side and take the reins. And let me be the one to jump out and fight! Or let me be the driver; and you be the fighter! I don't care which you choose, as long as we drive straight after this raging son of Tydeus."

Pandarus obeyed him; and slinging his bow over one shoulder and his quiver of arrows over the other, he showed his companion that he did possess a spear, and told him that he'd be the one to jump out and fight. "You know your horses," he said, "and they know you, and if the devil-inspired Diomed is too much for me, they'll carry you off safe to the city."

Now Sthenelus marked all this from afar off, and he drove up straight to Diomed and warned him.

"Why not," he said, "let me drive you back to our lines? These two men are dead-bent on killing you and they'll do it if it can be done."

At this the son of Tydeus glowered at him with the glare of an angry dragon.

"Do you suppose that I'd ever turn tail on those two? But listen my friend. If Athene does give me the power to slay both of these fellows, this is what I beg you to do. Tie these horses of your own to this chariot so that they cannot move it and leave them for a space. Then, get hold of the chariot that Aeneas has been driving and yourself drive it, together with his horses, through our ranks, into our camp. You may not know it, but these horses of Aeneas are of that rare breed that Zeus gave to Tros in exchange for his son, Ganymede, for they are the best of all horses between the dawn and the sun. If we could capture those two horses we should indeed have won something."

It was at this very moment that these same two precious horses, driven by Aeneas, with Pandarus brandishing a spear at his side, pulled up in front of Diomed!

"You survived my arrow, you son of Tydeus, now see if you can survive my spear!"

And, while Aeneas held back the foaming and rearing steeds, Pandarus hurled his spear.

And so trained was the man's eye by his constant aiming with arrows that his thrown spear went straight to its mark. It went through Diomed's shield and through his corselet and through his tunic; and because Diomed staggered beneath the shock of it, Pandarus supposed he was done for and began to shout in exultant triumph. "You are hit, you are hit, you are hit!" he cried; "and all the glory is mine!"

"Not yet, my good sir, not quite yet," retorted Diomed. "You have hit my shield, you have hit my corselet, you have hit my shirt, but you haven't hit me. Now take this in return!"

So saying, Diomed hurled his spear at Pandarus; and Athene, already on the scene, took a certain personal satisfaction in so guiding her friend's spear-head that it pierced their enemy's nose close to his eye, and after crashing through his white teeth and cutting out his tongue at the very root and grazing the back of his palate, it emerged into the air from behind his chin. The spear itself at this moment felt a satisfaction not very different from what Diomed and Athene were feeling; and out of the chariot and crashing down to the ground clattered the body of the great archer, already in the convulsions of death.

Down beside him sprang Aeneas, and set to work at once unharnessing the horses from the front of the chariot and fastening them by their bridles as firmly as he could to its brazen rear. Then he moved to where Pandarus lay outstretched on the ground, and he bestrode the corpse, protecting both it and himself with an enveloping shield, and while not only brandishing his long spear, but protecting his friend's body with his shield, he lifted up his voice and uttered a series of threatening cries so that any Greek who approached them might feel it was safer to move elsewhere.

But Diomed, having disposed of one of his two enemies, resolved at any cost to destroy the other: and he did now what only a warrior in the wildest rush of the most desperate fighting would ever have dared to attempt. He looked round him with a grim smile, as he heard the threatening yells Aeneas was uttering to anyone who approached; and it wasn't long before he found what he wanted. He was about a spear's cast away from where Aeneas was bestriding the corpse of Pandarus, and throwing into these defiant yells, to every Greek who came near, the bitter shame he felt that he hadn't forced the archer to be the driver, while he himself was the one to fight and take the risk of being killed.

But what Diomed, the son of Tydeus, found at this moment was an enormous stone as large as a footstool. Deliberately laying on the ground his spear and small round shield, he heaved up this huge stone, and lifting it high above his head with both his hands, hurled it at Aeneas, drawing, as he did so, the deepest breath from the bottom of his lungs that he had ever drawn since he was a new-born babe. The great stone flew through the air as if propelled down a precipice under the pressure of an avalanche.

The great stone didn't miss its mark and it struck Aeneas upon the hip-bone just at the place where the thigh turns in what we call the cup-bone, and the stone crushed this cup-bone and wrenched apart the sinews at that place and tore off the skin. Down on his knees Aeneas sank and with one outstretched hand began clutching the earth. Then he rolled over and lost consciousness.

Grimly towards his two defeated foes, one dead and the other unconscious, Diomed now strode, drawing the knife from his belt to cut the still living man’s throat. But there were other heavenly powers concerned in this world-battle beside Pallas Athene; and before Diomed had taken many steps, a thick mist fell between him and his two helpless enemies. Where was their chariot? and their unharnessed horses? Diomed could see nothing. All around him was this accursed cloud of mist. And he could hear nothing either. What, in the name of his father Tydeus, was happening to him? Had the strain of heaving up and hurling the stone blinded him? He began to experience a panic such as he had never undergone in his life before. Finally, since there was nothing else he could do, he fell on his knees and prayed desperately to Pallas Athene.

But the truth was that another great goddess, as immortal as Athene herself, had now appeared on the scene and had summoned this cloud of mist. She was none other than Aphrodite, the mother of Aeneas, whose father, Anchises, had embraced her when she met him with his flocks on the hillside. With one arm she was now supporting the head of her son Aeneas, while with the other she was making of her gleaming veil a dazzling shield, so that spears and arrows would be prevented from coming near. Then lifting Aeneas from off the earth she bore him away.

But meanwhile the prayers of Diomed to Athene had been answered, and into his soul had been poured more rage and more force than had ever inspired any warrior since the beginning of the world. So Diomed now, filled with wild emotion, followed after Aphrodite as she sought to bear away her son’s unconscious body to safety.

“To smite an immortal goddess with my mortal weapon,” the son of Tydeus cried in his wildly excited heart, “O give me, O give me, great Athene, the power to do this, and I care not how soon a thunderbolt shall take away my life!”

And thus inspired, and possessed by abnormal excitement, Diomed overtook the beautiful goddess and her unconscious offspring. With a mad cry he rushed upon her and smote her with his spear. The point pierced the inside of her wrist just below the palm of her hand and the lovely creature shivered and shook, while the blood of the immortals, which is so totally different from human blood that it is called ichor, poured forth over her body and over her raiment and wetted the earth. Out of her arms fell her son. But Aeneas had a second divine helper and the moment his mother dropped him he was caught up by Phoebus Apollo, not this time in a glittering cloud, as his mother’s veil had been, but in a dark cloud, which also hid him quite as completely from the eyes of mortals. But hiding her eyes with both her lovely hands and thinking in her heart, “O how little it has served me to be the most beautiful of all the immortals!” the Goddess of Love was doomed to hear, resounding above her cowering form, the insulting and brutal exultation of the son of Tydeus.

“You keep clear away, you pretty weakling, from the contests and battles of strong men! You’ve been calling for a lesson, and now I’ve given you a lesson; and I can see you won’t forget it! Let your little game from now on be the beguiling of girls as weak as you are, though I admit not nearly as fair. Yes, you adorable creature, you’ve had your lesson; and I’m glad I’ve been the one to give it to you! Henceforth, I warrant, you’ll shiver and shake if you hear a rumour, however far away it may be, of a war going on!”

At this he departed without even looking back once; for he said to himself, “If I turn round she’ll know well why, and, by Zeus, she shan’t see me do it!”

But it was not of him the wounded goddess thought as she struggled to her feet.

“O why was I fated to be what I am?” she cried to herself. “And why should this accursed power we call Anangkee, this blind, stupid, silly, meaningless force, this force that drives earth and heaven and men and gods whither it pleases, as sheep-dogs drive dumb sheep, always make our ecstasy of love end in pain? First the pain of giving birth, and then the pain of saving the life of our child?”

But it was not long before she forgot everything but her own pain; for Diomed’s spear had gone deep into her wrist and cruel throbs had begun to pulse up and down her arm and to quiver through her whole body, while the ichor, pouring forth out of this unholy slit in her flesh, was soaking her shining garments. Desperately she looked about her. Desperately she made her way amid the living and dead. Hardly knowing what she did, she instinctively rendered herself invisible to the warriors on both sides. They all felt a strange emotional thrill as she passed, and every youth thought of the one he loved and imagined himself embracing her.

But at last the messenger of Zeus, Iris, whose feet were like the wind, found her; found her wandering blindly and helplessly and completely lost among the living and dead. And Iris was horrified to see what pain she was suffering, and took her gently by the hand and led her to where her ferocious Ares was resting exhausted near his immortal horses and his golden chariot, with his spear flung down upon a cloud at his side. Iris saw at once that those two Olympian horses were chafing to get back to their Olympian stables, and she saw also that the cloud to which Ares had entrusted his spear had held it so long that, while the blood on the spear had completely vanished, the stain of red in its cradle of cloud was more suggestive now of sunset than of slaughter.

By the side of Ares the wounded goddess sank on her knees.

“Please, O please, I implore you, my precious brother, lend me your chariot and horses that I may be carried to Olympus! Iris has saved me from the battle and she will drive me to our heavenly home. I am in sore pain from a wound given me by Diomed, the son of Tydeus, who is so mad with battle-frenzy that, on my soul, he’d be ready to fight with Father Zeus himself!”

Ares agreed at once; Aphrodite, still moaning with pain and almost delirious in her speech, was driven by wind-sandal’d Iris up, up, up, to her Olympian home. Once safely there, leaving Iris to unharness the horses and take them to their stable and give them ambrosial food, Aphrodite staggered into her palace and flung herself on the knees of her dear mother Dione.

“Heavens! My sweet child!” cried Dione in horror, when she saw her daughter’s slashed wrist. “Who, in the name of Zeus, has been treating you so shamefully? It looks as if some tremendous immortal had been punishing you for some wrong you’ve done! I can’t bear to see it. Who has done this to you, my darling child?”

Quieter and happier, now that she was with her mother and able to talk freely, Aphrodite told her everything.

“It was this furious fighter, Diomed, the son of Tydeus, who did it, Mother darling, and he did it when I was carrying my son Aeneas, the only man I really and truly love in the whole world, to save him from the battle where he had been sorely wounded by this same son of Tydeus, who crushed his hip with a huge stone. If it hadn’t been for Phoebus Apollo, to whom I shall be grateful for ever and ever, Aeneas would have been left to perish where he was smitten."

And Dione, her mother, perceiving the deep hurt the beautiful one had received in her mind, as well as in her body, pondered awhile and then spoke to her quietly and at length.

"Bear up, my sweet, in spite of your suffering! I tell you you are not the only one of us immortals who have suffered like this. Alas! And do I not know it? And do not we all know it? Anangkee, Necessity! Yes, she is the mistress of men and gods and of everything. How often have I heard you, my sweet — yes, you your own self — pray to Father Zeus that he would find some way of propitiating Necessity, or of beguiling Necessity, or of bribing Necessity! But as you know only too well, my precious, that is the one subject upon which Father Zeus remains absolutely silent. He refuses to speak of it. So it must be that he too, the King and Father of us all, is subject to Anangkee."

"But why should Necessity," pleaded almost angrily the most beautiful of all Beings, "why should Necessity have concentrated on me?"

"O child, my child!" cried her mother, "do, for my sake, and for our friend Apollo's sake, remember that you're not the only one of us who has suffered like this. Didn't Ares himself, who lent you his horses just now, lie in chains in one of those great pits made of bronze for over a year? And didn't Heracles wound Hera herself in the right breast with an arrow that had three points? I think both of these, especially Hera, suffered more than you have suffered, my precious child." These wise words of her mother did indeed greatly soothe the outraged spirit of the beautiful Cyprian.

But, while his mother and grandmother were thus conversing among the Olympians, Aeneas himself, twisted and contorted under Apollo's shield, was once more set upon by the blood-crazed Diomed, who completely disregarded the fact that Apollo was protecting him. No less than four times did Diomed leap upon the two of them and try desperately to thrust aside Apollo's shield and finish the destruction of the already hip-broken son of Aphrodite. But at his fourth attempt Apollo warned him off in a terrible voice.

"Don't you understand, you double-dyed idiot," the far-shooting deity roared at him, "that the race of mortals in this world of ours is totally different from the race of immortals?"

At this rebuke, scared at last, but puzzled in his overheated brain why the angry god — whose far-darting arrows, bringing pestilence and death to both beasts and men, had compelled Agamemnon to send back the daughter of Chryses — didn't strike him dead rather than just scold him like this, Diomed rushed off to find new victims of his frenzy. But Apollo, with the utmost speed, fearful lest other Greeks might recognise Aeneas and try to make sure of his destruction, conveyed the son of Aphrodite, still concealed in a dark cloud, to the great temple at Pergamus.

"At least," the god thought, "I shall find my own mother, Leto, there; and she will know how to cure this man's crushed hip-bone."

Thinking so, the great god couldn't help smiling to himself at the instinctive way he had turned at once to his mother, just as it had been the mother of Aeneas who had rescued her son.

"Mortals and immortals," he said to himself, as he carried Aeneas into the temple, "are not, after all, quite as different as I told that ruffian just now! It still seems that when manly force gives out and we lack the wit to deal with the situation, back we creep to the breasts that suckled us!"

He soon found himself rewarded for obeying, god though he was, this natural instinct of all living things, by finding in the great Pergamus Temple not only Leto, his mother, but his sister, Artemis; and at once he knew that he could leave his burden with complete safety in their protective hands. So down he sat upon the summit of the hill above the great temple and gave himself up, after all this agitation, to the comfort in which both immortals and mortals can find relief, namely the comfort of gazing in peace and quiet at a wide-stretching landscape.

But when, a little later, he turned his attention to the battle going on at the foot of the hill and saw that Diomed was once more making havoc of his Trojan friends, he rushed down to put fresh spirit into the indomitable Hector. And out of the depths of the sky above him there now plunged down to aid him in this his war-loving friend, the blood-thirsty goddess Enyo, holding in her hands that terrible instrument of uproar called Kudoimos. And when these two, on either side of Hector, were urging him on, and all the Trojans in a new fury of battle were raging after them, it can be imagined how Diomed, the son of Tydeus, felt. He felt like a man who in crossing an apparently smooth plain suddenly encounters a rushing torrent that is whirling and foaming towards the ocean. And turning to the ranks of his fellow Achaeans he shouted to them to keep their faces to the enemy but to retreat slowly.

“It’s no good,” he shouted to them, “to fight against the gods!” To himself, as he did his best to retreat with dignity, he couldn’t resist muttering, with a savage chuckle: “I’ve learnt my lesson for the moment anyway. But you wait, my lord Hector! You wait, my resurrected Aeneas! The ways of Father Zeus may be slow, but they are sure. And I’ve heard Calchas say over and over again that in those visions of the night when the spirit of prophecy descends upon him, he has seen Troy going up in smoke and our ships sailing home with Helen. You wait, my lord Hector! You wait, my resurrected Aeneas!”

So cried in his heart the indignant Diomed. But what was Father Zeus himself feeling? The mysterious sequence of events driven on by Anangkee, Necessity, wasn't by any means a cause of joy to Zeus himself. A tragic example of this was the personal combat which suddenly and unexpectedly began between a son and a grandson of his own. Flying among us or walking among us by night or by day, over the wide surface of the earth, is an evasive and indescribable Being whom we call Moira or destiny. What activates or motivates this implacable creature no one on earth seems able to say, although every living thing would at once, if questioned, hasten to associate her with a righteous duty we all personally feel — namely the duty of avenging ourselves upon some particular person against whom we cherish some special grievance. It is true that Hades, the brother of Zeus, did once suggest to him that it would be wise to enquire if any augur or prophet had ever said that, if we forgave our enemies, we should be ourselves forgiven; but so far Zeus, the son of crooked-counselling Cronos, had postponed this interesting investigation.

But there is clear evidence in Heaven that it was Moira who put it into the head of the grandson of Zeus, Tlepolemus, the son of Heracles, to rush upon Sarpedon, the son of Zeus, who was a chief among the Lycians and a strong ally of the Trojans. Tlepolemus defied this formidable chieftain with a torrent of gross abuse, accusing him of cowardice and shirking and indicating that, had Heracles beheld such a worthless enemy, he would have tossed him among the farmyard fowls to be pecked to death. Sarpedon answered by lifting up his spear; and they threw their spears simultaneously; and while Sarpedon's passed clear through Tlepolemus's neck and slew him at a stroke, the other's spear struck Sarpedon in the thigh and remained there in the place where it had pierced him. The corpse of the son of Heracles was speedily carried by a couple of faithful companions safe home to camp, but on the other side the still living Sarpedon, though nobody thought of removing the spear, was carried by his Lycian followers towards the city; but he soon ordered them to set him down and they, indignant at this, left him for good and all. To his immense relief, however, he soon beheld from where he lay, with the long spear still protruding from his side, the tremendous Hector himself approaching him.

"O help me, help me, Hector!" he prayed; "take this spear out of my side so that I can get home to the city and either die there or live there!"

But the great war-man, Hector, took not the slightest notice of his appeal and rushed past him without stopping for a second. Sarpedon's faithful Lycian friend, Pelagon, had by this time returned to his side, and the two of them together succeeded, though with pain and grief to both of them, in extracting this terrible spear — which, like all Trojan spears, had been cut from the branch of an ash-tree — clean out of Sarpedon's thigh. As soon as it was out, and not a little red blood along with it, it was almost as if the ash-tree branch from which it had been cut pointed them to a little clearing among the dead stumps and tangled bushes, where there was an airy mound dominated by a sturdy oak, and Pelagon had just time to help his bleeding friend to this open space, and to prop him up with his back against the trunk of the oak, when Sarpedon fainted and for a minute or two remained totally unconscious. Pelagon looked at him with horror as he saw the red blood forming a little pool between two of the roots of this tree, and noted how one large-leafed plant, against which the extracted spear was now swaying in the wind, kept pointing at one beat of the man's pulse towards the thigh that was wounded and at the next towards the unwounded one.

"Can he possibly live?" thought Pelagon, and then and there he prayed desperately to Father Zeus.

Nor was his prayer unanswered. Promptly and precipitously the divine breath of Boreas, the North Wind, blew upon them in that exposed place and behold! Sarpedon opened his eyes; and after this recovery of his consciousness nothing interfered with his friend's success in getting him to his feet and supporting him as they slowly walked city-ward till at last they were safely within the walls. But the power for triumphant fighting which Zeus had given Hector endowed that son of Priam with such force that he began slaying one after another of the Greek warriors, so that it looked as if nothing could stop him and as if the Greeks were destined never to reach home.

Watching all this from Olympus, Hera thought in her heart: "I must stop this man. O how lucky I am to have one sure, faithful, steadfast friend, on whose loyalty I can depend as long as earth and heaven last!"

Feeling thus, and with far more emotion in her voice than was wont to ruffle the stately flow of her speech, Hera addressed Athene.

"O thou unwearied daughter of Aegis-bearing Zeus, thou whom nothing can exhaust, didn't we swear to Menelaus that he should destroy Troy and sail back safe home with Helen? What are we doing to let this man-hating Ares go on raging like this? Come, my friend, let you and me be the ones now to show a real fiery spirit!"

Having thus spoken, and while Pallas Athene was putting on her own terrific armour, who but Hera, the Queen of Heaven and consort of Zeus, was the one to deal with the most important labour of all that lay before them, namely the harnessing of the horses to the chariot and the careful adjusting of all the parts of the chariot, which were of such precious metal that many of them were preserved separately in the chariot shed? In the handling of these wheel-hubs and wheel-spokes and wheel-circles and axle-trees, and of the gold and silver thongs that rounded off the body of the chariot, and of the glittering cross-pieces that formed the yoke for the horses along with their golden breast-straps, Hera was supreme; and where another pair of skilful hands became necessary Hebe was ready to help her. And as for the horses, they were as eager for the rush and excitement of battle as was their immortal driver.

Meanwhile Pallas Athene was occupied in a task much more self-centred. She was busy arming herself; and as she herself was the supreme artist among all the gods, and indeed, save for Hephaestus and Deucalion, the supreme artist among all the mortals and immortals of the universe, she combined in preparing herself for battle the technical skill of an expert armourer with the exquisite taste of an experienced old maid. She went straight into the dressing room of her father Zeus and deliberately proceeded to take all those liberties which a favourite daughter might take with her father's most intimate belongings. She stripped herself of the delicate robe which her own hands had embroidered, and let it fall as carelessly as any child might have done on the floor of her father's chamber. Then, for she was as tall as her father, she pulled his tunic round her body, and about her shoulders she threw that unique and consecrated horror, the Aegis, a woven breast-shield hung all round with those appalling Tassels, or thusanoi, which have a secret magic more deadly in war than any other object in the world.

This Aegis of Zeus carried, woven into its very substance, symbols that were more than symbols, for the living essence of each of these was in some mysterious way embodied in this woven horror. There was Rout; there was Massacre; there was Desperation; there was mad Onset; and along with these there was the head of that terrifying monster, the Gorgon, a teras, or sign, hung in the sky as a Portent of Disaster by Zeus himself.

Then upon her head Athene fixed her helmet, which had two great horns and four golden bosses and, crowned with this, she grasped her tremendous and massive spear and, thus prepared, she stepped beside Hera into the chariot. And at once Hera touched the horses with the whip, and behold! the great portals of Heaven, guarded by the Hours, rolled open of their own volition! But ere she left Heaven, Hera made a final appeal to Zeus who sat quite apart from them all on the topmost summit of Olympus.

“Art not thou wrathful with Ares for all this slaughter? It is Aphrodite from Cyprus and her friend Apollo who have set him on to work this havoc; and now they are lazily lolling at their leisure while the Greeks are perishing! Wilt thou be angry with me if I smite Ares and drive him out of the battle?”

Then to her made answer cloud-gathering Zeus: “Let Athene go after him, for she, above all others, is the one who can make him flee howling from the fight.”

So spoke the Father; and Hera drove her divine horses between earth and the starry heaven at such a speed that she made them cover at a single bound as much space as there would be between a man on a high cliff gazing at the wine-dark sea and the horizon at which he gazed. Hera landed her horses and chariot at a perfect spot to leave them in safety; namely where the rivers Simoïs and Scamander meet and join their streams. Here Hera loosed her horses, threw a thick mist over both them and the chariot and made Simoïs to grow among her rich grasses a feast of ambrosia for those immortal steeds.

Nor could these two sensitive rivers, as they revelled in mixing their waters as they always did, refrain from embracing each other’s flowing streams with an added ecstasy when they were suddenly inspired with the power of producing ambrosia among the wet stalks of their flood-watered banks.

"How quaint it is," said Simoïs to Scamander, "to see those two great goddesses go tripping off like a pair of timid doves!"

"Women are women, my dear friend," replied Scamander, "whether they are mortal or immortal. And it is impossible for them, unless they are Amazons, and as I've never seen an Amazon I can't be sure that even they are different from the rest, to stride about their day's business with the steady, monotonous assurance of men. Women are born to trip, to dance, to glide, to swing, to skip, to float, to fly; whereas men are born to march, to race, to rush to victory or from defeat, or to plod heavily behind the ploughshare of daily work."

"I totally disagree with you," said Simoi's to Scamander; "it is women, whether mortal or immortal, who do the real drudgery of life; whereas men, whether they are farming or contending with each other at racing or throwing a discus or boxing or wrestling, or whether they are fighting for their king and country, are doing what they do because they like doing it and because they have chosen to do it, and because they win glory and riches and fame by doing it."

It was then that one of Hera's horses lifted its head from enjoying that rich wet grass mingled with ambrosia and told those two famous streams a few facts about human life of which they were so obviously ignorant.

"You must realise, most foolish of all Rivers," said the Horse, "and I think you are both equally silly, and so does my mate here, only I am always the speaker for both of us. Don't you understand, you pair of silly Rivers, that a great many women are very like men, and a great many men are very like women? You two have nothing to do but to rise from your primal sources or springs or fountains, and just flow; yes, just flow, flow, flow, flow, as drops of rain from a roof drip, drip, drip, drip, drip, drip, whereas we horses have to whirl through the air, gallop over mountains, race across sandy deserts, driven by the Queen of Heaven! And does that great goddess have an easy time? I should say not! And my comrade here would wholly agree with me. Does Father Zeus himself have an easy time? Ask Pallas Athene, who was born out of his brain! She'll soon tell you of her Father's daily labours: and so would Heracles and Hephaestus! Gods and men, goddesses and women, I tell you, you lazy Rivers, doing nothing but flow, flow, flow, nothing but flow from your mountain birth to your sea death, immortal divinity and mortal humanity, they're both forever at it, male and female alike, while Simoi's and Scamander, famous for nothing but being Simoi's and Scamander, just flow happily along from birth to death."

"Shall I answer them?" said Simoi's to Scamander, "or shall I leave it to the air and the water and the earth and the fire to answer them?"

"Leave it till we reach the sea," replied Scamander; and in silence they listened to the heavenly horses munching grass mixed with ambrosia.

Meanwhile Hera and Pallas Athene had followed each her own separate tactics for stirring up the hearts of the Greeks. Hera took the form of Stentor, whose voice was as resounding as if fifty men were crying aloud with one cry, and in Stentor's voice she stirred up her beloved Greeks.

"Shame on you, shame on you, Argives! While Achilles was still fighting, these Trojan bandits dared not leave their city gates! But here these wretches are, slaughtering you at your own ships!"

But while the wife of the Father of the Gods was using the throat of Stentor like a colossal trumpet up and down the ranks, Pallas Athene was having a secret dialogue in her own shape with Diomed, the son of Tydeus. He was still bleeding rather badly; though he was staunching his own blood with his own clothes as he leant heavily against the side of his chariot, from which his faithful friend Sthenelus was sadly looking down upon him as he held the reins of their horses.

“You did warn me, didn’t you, great goddess,” Diomed was soon murmuring, “not to fight with any of you Olympians save only Aphrodite? And now, obeying your words, I have to wait in miserable quiescence watching this bloody Ares murdering our best men!”

“I know it,” replied Athene. “Ares fights first on our side against the Trojans and then in a moment he changes and fights with the Trojans against us. He doesn’t care for whom or against whom he fights as long as he can kill somebody or something. He is what I call an alla-pros-allon, a wretched turn-coat. By Zeus, you shall smite him!”

Thus speaking she made a sign to Sthenelus to descend, a sign which he obeyed with delighted awe. Athene then seized the reins and the whip, handing to the wounded Diomed her own terrific spear, while Sthenelus with a sigh of infinite relief watched them whirl into the heart of the battle.

They hadn’t to search long. There was the blood-thirsty Ares, having already slain the mighty Periphas, viciously stripping off the man’s armour as the giant lay on the ground in a pool of blood. By this time the wise Athene, who had been born from the brain of Zeus, had taken good care to replace her own helmet by the dark cap of Hades, a cap that renders the wearer completely invisible both to gods and men. And so when the savage God of War saw the horses of Diomed’s chariot charging straight at him, and Diomed aiming the goddess’s massive spear directly at his navel, he rose to his full height and struck at Diomed with his own spear over the backs of the horses and over the front of the chariot, not realising that his antagonist had the daughter of Zeus at his side. Swifter than sound or sight are the thoughts of mortal men able to fly; but swifter still fly the thoughts of the immortal gods. Thus faster than the speed with which he rose from the ground where he was stripping his victim did the thoughts of the God of War rush through his god-like skull.

"O how I hate," he thought, "this creation of fate and necessity that calls itself the human race! Everything to do with this wretched humanity I hate. If I don't wade and wallow in their blood, if I don't soak the sweet-breathing earth in their loathsome blood, may the depths of Hades possess me for ever!"

Thus thinking, he dashed forward with his great spear, and it needed all the rapid movement of the immortal lady at Diomed's side to ward off that deadly weapon. But ward it off she did, though only just in time, and she sent it whirling on its harmless way into the woundless, bodiless air. At that moment it was that Diomed plunged his spear of bronze deep into Ares' flesh just below his navel; and then, after a second's pause, drew forth the weapon and laid it down, bright with the god's ambrosial blood, on the forefront of their chariot.

Then Ares let forth such a roar of pain, such a resounding and echoing howl of pain, that anyone a mile away would have thought that nine or ten thousand warriors in some frightful assault were yelling some desperate war-cry. And indeed throughout the ranks of both Greeks and Trojans a sudden spasm of paralysing terror seized every single man-Jack of them and they all let their weapons sink down to the ground, ending for a moment the whole war. Such was the result of the howl of pain made by the bloody-minded God of War when he was hurt himself. And now straight up into the sky to Diomed's astonished vision, just as if he were watching one of those weird black vapours that, when the weather has become unbearably hot, a sudden wild wind rising out of nowhere drives from the heart of the clouds and whirls off into space, lo! there was the figure of the War God, still clothed in his brazen armour, ascending into the broad heavens! It can well be believed in how short a time he was to be found crouching by the side of Zeus, the son of Cronos, sobbing with big sobs and wailing to his heavenly Father and displaying to him the deep wound in his navel out of which the ambrosial blood still trickled.

"Father, Father!" he sobbed. "Hast thou no pity, no indignation, no anger on my behalf? It is all the doing of that pestilent virgin who is your own daughter. We other immortals obey thy slightest nod; but this murderous maid, on the strength of being your daughter, thinks she can commit any evil deed! Fancy her daring to set Diomed, the son of Tydeus, upon me, me who am your child as much as she is!"

But Father Zeus thought in his heart: "This is exactly what I have always dreaded, a quarrel to savage wounding and sickening bloodshed between these two!" In vain he strove to control his feelings, but they were too strong. "Don't you come crying and clinging to me the moment you've hurt yourself, you bloodthirsty wretch! Don't I know from whom you inherit all this obstinate, obdurate ferocity, all this savage resistance to reason and justice? From your mother, Queen Hera, boy! Yes! from that troublesome woman your mother, who gave birth to infinite bloodshed when she gave birth to you! Yes, it's from Hera, from Hera, from Hera that you inherit your bloody nature! Nothing I say to her can keep her quiet."

Here the Father of Gods and Men groaned with a deep groan, and for the space of a second closed his eyes, as if this blood trickling down to the golden floor from the flesh of his son was a symbol of all the blood dripping from the wounded flesh of all created creatures from the beginning of the world until this hour. Then with one of the greatest efforts of will he had ever made or was ever destined to make, he swallowed down his anger as if this very anger, now foaming and bubbling within him, were a living creature, a creature whom it was necessary to swallow, if his will in both earth and heaven were to be done.

“No,” he said kindly, laying a tender hand on the arm of the groaning Ares, “I won’t let you suffer any more pain; for after all you are my son.”

And he called for the immortal Paeon, the Olympian doctor, to come and heal him; and without delay Paeon came: nor was it long before this master of the art of healing had worked his magic on the groaning God of War. And then when he was healed Hebe bathed him and clad him in fresh garments and he seated himself by the side of his Father rejoicing and feeling glorious again; while presently Hera and Athene re-entered the palace of them all, having, for that time anyway, compelled the enemy of mankind to cease from his slaughtering.

BOOK VI

MEANWHILE THE TIDE of battle has considerably turned, and the retreating chariots of many Trojan warriors are carrying their drivers at top speed towards the gates of the city. Unfortunately for one of these drivers, Adrastus, his chariot got entangled in a tamarisk, and before the horses could drag it free its driver had fallen out and it was with an empty car that his two magnificent steeds raced home. And then it chanced that of all the Greek warriors it was none other than he who had been most injured by Troy, namely Menelaus himself, who came bolt up against Adrastus as that fallen warrior picked himself up from beneath the tamarisk and wondered whether he could find his way home. All the Trojan nobles knew Menelaus by sight, and what else could poor Adrastus do now, for his fall had left him weaponless, than throw himself down before the husband of Helen, clasp him round the knees and beg him for life, only for life.

"My father, great Sir," he begged, "is a very rich man and he has only to receive a trustworthy message to say I am your captive and he will send you a ransom in gold and silver and precious stones of any value you care to name as long as you keep me alive and do not kill me."

Menelaus, liking the look of the man, didn't hesitate for a moment.

"O damn all these killings and revenges," he thought, "if only I can get my lovely Helen safe back and out of the hands of that devil Paris I'd willingly give the whole lot of them their lives! I don't hate a living soul of them save Paris.

If only I could have killed that beguiling scamp when I had the chance! What a fool I was!"

"Yes, surely, my good man; I'll see that you're escorted straight to our ships. So get up, and—"

But at this moment the great Agamemnon, his brother, who had noted this little scene under the tamarisk, came indignantly to their side.

"What are you doing with this wretch, you little softy?" he cried. "What we've got to do is to send as many as we can of this spawn of thieves straight down to Hades. There: you take that!"

And he dug his heavy brazen spear deep into the prisoner's flanks with so much force that man and spear fell to the ground together. Down above the body of Adrastus bent the gigantic and merciless King of Kings, and as soon as he saw that the point of the spear which he had plunged clean through him was protruding from his back, he knelt with his full weight on the unfortunate man's body, laying hold of this point with both his hands and using all his enormous strength he dragged the whole thing out of him: and following the spear came forth blood and entrails, and with a ghastly sound like the cracking of a river dam the man's life departed.

From end to end of the fighting now it was clear that the Trojans were gradually being driven back: and old Nestor was exerting all his extraordinary power in the work of inspiring tired warriors and exhausted spearmen to go on with their success. Hitherto on the Trojan side the chief inspirer of the wavering spirit of each ordinary warrior had been that "sweet war-man, Hector"; but when Helenus, another son of Priam, to utter whose name was to bring to mind the lovely creature who was the cause of the whole war, came forward as an expert of the art of prediction, especially through the rare and difficult art of augury by the flight of birds, a completely new element entered. His oionistian insight, which was a psychic power separating him entirely from all his family and making him a lonely philosopher, drove him now to take a bold pacific step on the chance that it might have some effect on this bloody struggle. What Helenus in fact now did was to look for Aeneas, and when he found him to take him straight to Hector.

“It has come over me, my dear comrades,” he declared, “that instead of retreating before the invaders as we are doing now, we might make one grand effort to appease these merciless Greeks by appealing to their own special goddess and propitiating her if we can, and calling upon her to bring about peace among mortal men. Why shouldn’t Aeneas and I and the rest of our chieftains and our allies fight desperately now and refuse to retreat a step further, while brother Hector goes home to the city and begs the help of our mother Hecabe and of all the oldest and wisest ladies who attend upon her? We have in our inmost citadel, as you both know well, a tiny little temple to Pallas Athene. Well then, why don’t we call upon some of the oldest and richest of our Trojan ladies, whether wedded or unwedded, whether with children or childless, and let them select among themselves the most beautiful, the most rich, the most royal, the most imaginatively designed and exquisitely woven robe in the whole city? And when they have found the keys of this little temple, even if there are no services or sacrifices to Pallas Athene carried on there since this accursed war began, let them lay this surpassingly splendid robe on the knees of the goddess Athene and vow to her that we will make such sacrifices to her as have never before been made to any god or goddess since Ouranos first embraced Gaia; if she only will hold in check this terrifying fighter, Diomed, and not allow him to rampage among us as he is doing now! Yes! and tell the goddess that we are more afraid of this murderous wretch than we are of Achilles!”

Hector at once obeyed his brother. He leapt from his chariot and rushed up and down the line, calling on the Trojans to fight to the death. It was so unexpected for them all to see him dashing through the front line brandishing a spear in each hand that they took heart with a new zeal. He himself, however, retired to the city, with his huge shield jolting against both his neck and ankles as he hastened home.

Meanwhile, Diomed, as he prepared to continue his slaughterings, found himself confronted by a completely new enemy, a man of enormous power as well as of a most striking appearance. This was none other than Glaucus, the son of Hippolochus. As these two terrific heroes approached each other both the Trojans and the Achaeans drew back, leaving a clear space for their meeting, and all watched the encounter with intense excitement. Both the men instinctively paused as they faced each other, and, as may well be imagined, it was the ferocious Diomed who was the first to speak.

"Who on earth are you, who have the gall to cross my conquering path? And let me tell you this, my good young friend: your parents, if they are human, will soon find out that the unluckiest fate that can possibly befall any child of theirs is to try to oppose me. But please understand this, great sir, if you happen to be more than mortal, I flatly refuse to fight with you. I'm not such a double-dyed fool as to want to imitate Lycurgus, who so terrified Dionysus when he was a child that he plunged into the sea; but once beneath the waves Thetis received him in her bosom; and as for Lycurgus, he soon found out that it is better for mortals to leave immortals alone. But if you, my young sir, are a mortal like myself, the sooner we set to it the sooner it'll all be over for you!"

Having thus spoken, and tightening his hold on his spear, Diomed waited. He would have found it hard to say why he didn't strike the first blow; but most likely the reason was that he was seized by a sudden wave of intense curiosity as to who the parents were of this extraordinarily handsome youth; for of course, when he had killed him, as he was certain he soon would do, he couldn't possibly wait at that critical moment to learn whom he had slain. But it now became clear that this handsome champion of the Trojans was in no greater hurry to come to blows than was his terrifying antagonist.

"Why is it," he answered, bowing most politely, "that you ask me about my ancestors? As are the comings and goings of the leaves of the forest, so are the generations of mortal men. In the autumn of the year the wild winds scatter them over the earth, but when in due season the spring cometh again, lo! once more the trees of the forest bring them to birth. But I am ready to tell you the tale of my people, if it's a story that has any interest for you."

At this point, if a couple of seagulls had happened to be passing over that hushed oasis between the opposing ranks, where each man on both sides was leaning on his spear in absorbed interest in what was happening, such feathered onlookers might well have exchanged their surprise at the contradictions in human minds. Here were a couple of antagonists, for whom the glory of killing an opponent evidently surpassed all other achievements, prepared to stop fighting if instead of death-dealing blows at each other they could exchange personal reminiscences. It is, however, not difficult to imagine how the handsome young Glaucus could enjoy putting off their death-struggle while he explained to Diomed that his grandfather was none other than the famous Bellerophon, whose own grandfather was the Titan Sisyphus, son of Aeolus, God of all the Winds. At this point, in the colloquy between these two, there suddenly arrived a climax that neither of them had dreamed of, and it came with the mention of the word Bellerophon. For it turned out that Diomed's grandfather, Oeneus, had once entertained Bellerophon for twenty days in his own home and had exchanged with him the sort of gifts that only very intimate friends part with to each other. At the discovery of this personal link between their ancestors, both warriors were so overjoyed and excited that they incontinently and with a common impulse gave up all idea of fighting each other. Diomed planted his spear in the earth and they both leapt down from their chariots and, clasping each other's hands, made a pledge that, as their grandsires had been in former days, so they would be today.

In their impetuous rush of sympathy they even went so far as to exchange armour; and I, the Aether, who know so well all the kitchen gossip to which Homer, now almost blind, must have been exposed in the Servants' Hall, cannot resist smiling when I hear the old poet say that Zeus, the son of Cronos, must have turned the head of the handsome young Glaucus to make him exchange his gold for Diomed's brass.

The aged poet could not, however, have read the real thoughts of Glaucus as he initiated and carried through this courteous exchange; for the young man's mind, as he unlaced his golden breast-plate and proceeded to fit on, not without using a certain unseemly violence, for these two great warriors were not of similar structure, his new brazen one, wandered far from them both. All human thoughts, especially when we are putting on or taking off physical coverings, whether of cloth or metal, are apt to fly in strange directions. His now kept playing round that murderous letter, those lugra seemata, the earliest letter recorded in human history, which the jealous King Proetus made Bellerophon take to the great Lord of Lycia, begging that monarch to have the man who brought it put at once to death.

"What would I do," he asked himself, "if I had a letter ordering me to kill the bearer of it? I am not at all sure that I wouldn't behave very much in the same way that the King of Lycia behaved; that is to say, send the bearer off on some risky adventure, but promising myself all the same, knowing, of course, that particular man's descent from Aeolus, that if the winds of fate saved him I would give him, on his return, his dearest wish. What he had done, of course, might not be anything like killing the Chimaera or defeating the Amazons, but it would have been enough to prove his divine descent; and if his dearest wish were to have my daughter and my kingdom, that wish, if I had a daughter and a kingdom, I most surely would give him."

And then, as across places and people roamed the thoughts of Glaucus, the grandson of Bellerophon, as he bent to fasten the clasps of his new brazen greaves, he found himself thinking of Bellerophon's melancholy end. "How would I," he asked himself, "like to perish as he did, without one single friend or helper among all the gods and mortals?" And as he bent down to tighten these brassy things about his shins, he found himself imagining with terrible vividness those long desolate walks all alone across plains and valleys and moors and mountains, "eating out his heart", hon thumon katedon, and avoiding the tracks of men.

Meanwhile Hector hadn't forgotten the wise advice of his brother Helenus, that adept in augury from the flight of birds, and, hurrying to the city, he soon reached the oak-tree outside the Scaean Gate. Here he found himself surrounded by a clamorous crowd of wives and daughters of warriors at the front, imploring him to tell them who was unharmed and who was wounded and who was dead; and he spoke gently to them, each in turn, and told them to pray to the gods; but to some among them, for he was no deceiver, he brought dreadful sorrow. As soon as he entered the great palace of King Priam, his mother Hecabe came hurrying to meet him, holding her loveliest daughter, Laodice, by the hand.

"Well know I, my child," she cried, "that you cannot stay for more than a moment; but please, please, before you go back to the front, let me give you a glass of honey-sweet wine. You shall pour a libation to Zeus and the other immortals first; but when you’ve done that, do please, my dear child, enjoy a good glass of it yourself.”

But Hector answered:

“No, no, most perfect of mothers! It would be wrong to pour a libation with unwashed hands and mine are foul with blood; and to drink anything now, myself, would bring down my power and strength in the fight. But you go yourself, dearest Mother, and choose the most beautiful robe you can find and lay it on the knees of our image of Athene. As for me, I must go and get hold of that wretch Paris, curse his soul! O if only I could see that damned soul of his going down to Hades! If only I could!”

Hecabe waited not for one moment. Straightway she gathered about her a large group of old wives and devoted spinsters; and she took from the depths of her store-house an incredibly beautiful robe, one, ironically enough, that Paris had found in Sidon, on his famous piratical voyage when he’d beguiled and brought to Troy none other than Helen her own self! That there should have been a statue of Pallas Athene at all in any dwelling in the city of Troy must have so shocked some Greek companion of the blind narrator of this tale that, unknown to the bard, he inserted into the text a line to the effect that the goddess, while accepting the beautiful robe, rejected this prayer of its bestowers. If we follow, however, the subtle instinct of that true librarian, Anaxagoras, the line recording this refusal can be left out.

As to that sweet war-man, Hector, what he did next was to go straight into the dwelling of his brother Alexander, otherwise Paris, whom he found sulking by himself in his own private chamber, where, for lack of anything better to do, he was polishing his armour, while Helen, surrounded by a crowd of maidens, was showing them how to finish a particularly complicated and immensely large curtain of embroidered tapestry. Hector began at once denouncing his brother as the shameful cause of all their trouble, and cursing him for not being in the forefront of the battle.

"It's all right, my dear," the crafty Paris replied gently. "Helen was just now urging me, but not unkindly like you, to go quickly to the front. And that is exactly what I am now preparing to do, though in obedience to her more gentle request, and not because of your brutal abuse. You needn't wait! I'll have my armour on in a second, and I'll follow you quickly. I shall know you by that thundering great spear of yours as you go swaggering off to your favourite arena for winning glory."

Hector turned his back upon him with a gesture of infinite contempt; but as he was leaving the house Helen ran to his side, seized his wrist with both hands, and began to pour out all her long-suppressed self-reproach.

"O brother, darling brother," she cried, "none of you have any idea of what I suffer! Why, O why, did I let that man beguile and seduce me? O how wrong I was to let him do it! Menelaus had his faults as a husband: but O Hector, O Hector! those faults seem nothing to me now compared with the ways of this man who has to be dragged back to the front by his own brother! O how I wish that at the moment I was born a great wind had arisen and carried me away with it, and given me to the waves of the all-swallowing sea! How can you bear me near you, O Hector, glory of Ilios? I am a name all over the world of shame and reproach! Yes, yes! That's what I am and that's what I shall be for centuries to come. I shall be known to all as the shamefullest whore that the earth has ever nourished since woman was first created! But O Hector, you are my one support, my one tower of refuge in all my unhappiness, my one consoler in all my shame! So please, please, Hector, my noble brother — for you are, are my brother now, aren't you, now that I am the wife of that man in there? Sit thee down a little while, won’t you, here with me, us two together, for you are the only one in all Troy that I have come really to love!”

Her tears were wetting his bare wrist as she clung to him and she was quivering now from head to foot. But Hector tore himself away.

“I must” — here he hesitated, for he knew well that the last thing an unhappy woman wants to hear from her consoler is the name of another woman— “I must,” he concluded, forcing himself to speak more firmly and quietly than he actually felt at that moment, for Helen’s almost miraculous beauty, together with her heart-felt emotion, affected him more than he would have cared to admit to any living soul... “I must go home for a moment, before I join battle again, to have a word with Andromache and a kiss from my son, for I might — for who can tell what Zeus has got in his mind, or whether, apart from him altogether, Atropos the eldest of the Fates, or crazy Tyche, the incarnation of care-free Chance, may not choose to have me knocked on the head, so that I may not see them, or beautiful you either, ever again!”

His final words were spoken through the closing space between the door-post and the door; and as he emerged into the broad, well-built street with nobly built ancient houses on both sides, and as he strode down the centre of the chariot-way between the opposing pavements, he thought to himself: “God! it’s hard to blame that damned brother of mine for carrying off such a girl as that! No wonder Aphrodite is so fiercely on our side in this war and Pallas Athene so strongly against us! And how queer this is — though it’s the last thing I must tell to Andromache! — but I know I am really much happier and much more my true self when I am in the midst of a desperate fight, any sort of a fight, than when I am loving and being loved by these beautiful wenches!”

Hector's own house was quite near to the Scaean Gate that led out of the city, so that by the time he reached it and rested his huge spear against one of its portals, he could see, three or four hundred yards away, the usual crowd of people collected there, and that other, more stately and dignified group, of aged chieftains surrounding the embossed and deeply engraved stone upon which, on important occasions, King Priam was accustomed to it. The dominant house-lady, in all the ruling households in Troy, apart from the wife of its lord, was the lady who in England is called the "housekeeper", but who with both Greeks and Trojans was called the Tamiee. It was this person, and she was a most active and competent tamiee, who soon pushed her way through the agitated group of maidens and who now greeted their master and explained to him the situation.

"Our lady Andromache," she told him, "has been terribly upset today by the rumours and stories that have drifted into the city with the wounded and dying, and about a quarter of an hour ago she had a fit of convulsive hysterics and, calling upon the nurse to bring the child, she rushed out from among us. As I saw that it only made her worse to try to stop her, I forbade any of the maids to attempt such a thing, and I just let her go; but I have sent certain messengers to bring me news of her and they assure me that she is safe and well, but waiting with the nurse and child on the wall by the Scaean Gate."

Hearing this, Hector hurried at once down the broad street so familiar to him from childhood, and as he strode along with his enormous ashen spear held against his shoulder, he enquired of his heart how it was that he held always deep in the recesses of his being an absolute certainty that he was fighting in vain, and that one day, ere so very long, Troy was doomed to fall and the overwhelmingly beautiful woman from whom he had just parted was destined to be restored to the house of Menelaus.

"Is it the talk of the old soothsayers that I heard in my childhood," he asked himself, "that has lodged this tragic certainty in the depths of my soul? Or am I peradventure something of an unofficial augur my own self?"

When he drew near the Scaean Gate and the ancient wide-ramparted wall from which the Elders used to watch the battle-field, he saw his wife Andromache running towards him, with the nurse-maid at her heels carrying their infant child. Hector felt a wave of unexpected tenderness pass through his heart when he saw his wife and child, a feeling that was quite different from the romantic pity and sympathy he had felt just now for the incomparably beautiful Helen. Before they reached him the youthful nursemaid who carried Scamandrios, or Astyanax, overtook Andromache, and he couldn't help being enchanted by the way the baby responded to his greeting with one of those mysteriously all-knowing smiles that in this world only infants and tiny toddlers are capable of giving.

"It's as if," Hector thought, "they were born into our confused hubbub from some kingdom altogether wiser than ours!"

But Andromache clasped his free hand with both of hers and leaned her body passionately against him.

"O my devilishly precious love!" she cried, "this cursed heroism and fighting spirit of yours will prove, I know it, the doom of us all three! Yes, the doom of our little son and of yourself and me! O my only true love, do for all our sakes, remember that I've got nobody but you in the whole world! This terrifying Achilles killed my father and my seven brothers, and though he took a ransom beyond all measure for my mother and let her go, she only escaped to be slain by the darts of Artemis. Don't you see, Hector darling, you are father and mother and all my brothers too! Do please, please, stay with your baby and me, for one evening anyhow, on this side of these gates and on this royal rampart!"

But Hector shook his head as he stroked her wrist with his left hand, while still keeping a firm clutch with his right upon his massive spear.

"No, darling, I can't, I can't, I can't! And I must tell you also — though I wouldn't tell another living being — that I am convinced at the bottom of my own soul that our great city is going to be destroyed, and that they are going to restore their Helen to her former home. But let me tell you this, sweetheart; and for all our sakes lay it up, as the poets say, in your heart. When this calamity does happen it won't be for Hecabe or for Priam that my heart will hurt me with a grief sharp as the spear of Achilles. It will be entirely for you. It will be for the thought of you carrying wood and drawing water with these delicate arms and tender hands, while the gossips of some damned Spartan town point at you and cry: 'Do you see that weeping girl working there? She was the wife of Hector, ere he and the whole rest of the show went down into Hades!'"

To Andromache's astonishment she now saw big tears in her hero's eyes.

"O my darling," he cried, "I want to be dead! O my only true love! I want to have the earth heaped over me, ere you are crying in foreign bondage!"

They were both silent for a moment. Then Hector leaned his great spear against a buttress of the wall, and stretched out both his hands to the child. But the little boy was frightened by the great horse-hair plume that waved from the top of his father's brazen helmet, and he drew back in terror into his young nurse's bosom. At sight of this, Hector took off his great gleaming helmet and laid it on the ground; and having done so, with a reassuring smile that the baby couldn't resist, he took the infant in both his arms and uttered aloud a solemn prayer.

"May Zeus and the other gods," he prayed, forgetting in that moment all his sorrowful forebodings, "grant that this child of mine may grow up to surpass his father in every possible way; and be wiser, stronger, braver than his father in the eyes of gods and men!”

So saying and so praying, he gave the child back to its mother and she took it to her breast, smiling and weeping at the same moment. And stooping over her, Hector was seized with a great wave of love and pity, and caressed her with his hand and murmured in her ears:

“Don’t ‘ee be too unhappy, my dearest one, for I swear to you there’s no one who can kill me before the moment that Destiny has decided I must go down to Hades. We all have our fate and the day of our doom decided the moment we’re born; and from this there’s no escape, whether we are cowardly or brave. Don’t be too unhappy, my precious one. Go home to our house and to all your work with loom and distaff and handmaids to help. Your work lies there, while mine is in the field of battle. I must fight and you must work. Such is the lot of men and women upon this earth.”

He was silent, and she was silent; and between them passed that strange breath of mutual silence which passes between those who are together forever and yet have to part, he one way, she another way, in order that inscrutable fate may fulfil its hidden purpose.

Hector had not gone far towards the fighting, indeed he had only just left the Scaean Gate and emerged into the plain, when his brother Alexander, or Paris, overtook him. This latter was in such high spirits that Hector, when he turned at his call, was entirely debarred from accusing him of cowardice. The man waved his sword and tossed his head and caracoled with his feet, more as if he were dancing than entering a life-and-death battle.

“Sorry to have kept you waiting,” was Alexander’s greeting to his brother. “I know I ought to have made more haste; but it’s a fault I don’t seem able to cure, this way I have of taking occasions easily and not hurrying over anything! Besides, I wanted to get my armour in its very best trim before setting out."

"O no, you queer fellow," replied Hector, advancing by the younger man's side while his terrific helmet and towering spear looked more menacing than ever compared with the other's golden adornments, "O no, I'm not implying for a moment that you aren't brave. You're brave and valiant enough in all conscience, more so than I am perhaps, in your wild prancings and plungings. When I reproach you, it's never for want of courage. It's hard to express exactly what I mean, but I think it's your easy-goingness, your casualness, your entire lack of seriousness in anything you do. You don't take life as it ought to be taken. You take it as if it were a game of no importance. You don't seem to care who wins or who loses. You don't seem really to care, about anything, except making love and dressing yourself up. But come on now, brother of mine. We'll settle all our misunderstandings presently, if only Zeus will grant us to clear our native Troy-land of these accursed Greeks. O my brother, may the blest day soon come when we can fill to the brim, as a libation to the gods that live for ever, a deep wine-bowl of final and triumphant liberation from the hands of our enemies!"

BOOK VII

When Hector, followed by his gaily caparisoned and deftly caracoling companion, had once plunged into the battle, their rush of onset and their freshness of renewed confidence in themselves made their attack terribly effective and several famous Greek warriors fell to rise no more. Indeed there was such a perceptible surge of victory on the Trojan side that the two Olympians most concerned, Apollo on the side of Hector and Athene on the side of the Greeks, came both of them darting down from their posts of heavenly observation.

They met beneath the oldest and most familiar landmark in front of the city, a very ancient oak-tree of the kind that both Greeks and Trojans called a Pheego, but which later the Romans called a Fagus. Apollo took the initiative at once.

“Haven’t you any pity for a people as noble and a city as beautiful as this? What has come over you and Hera, you immortal goddesses, that you are so bent upon bringing this wonderful city down to the dust? But now do please listen to me. Let us agree upon at least a day’s truce, just to see what may or may not happen as a result of even so brief a pause in the slaughter.”

“Why, O Apollo, thou great far-shooter of deadly arrows,” cried Athene, uttering with perfect assurance what Apollo knew well was a complete falsehood, “that is exactly what I came down here to suggest to you!”

As the far-shooting god looked at his opponent, with that formidable Aegis round her neck with its death-dealing “thusanoi”, or terrible tassels, wherewith their father Zeus, and even he himself now and again, could make armies flee, he couldn’t help thinking to himself: “No wonder Father

Zeus finds it hard, even with my help and Aphrodite's too, to withstand his wife Hera when she has this terrifying Athene to support her! Heavens and Earth! How I would like to start up an insurrection against our Father that would really succeed! The nearest approach to it was when the rebels were defeated by the aid of Briareus the Sea-Monster. But what I've always felt is that there's no real hope of dragging down our cloudgathering Father unless we can get the help, not only of Poseidon and of Hades, but of Cronos, their dethroned father, and of Rhea, their vanished mother! But a time will come, I know it, I feel it, when some absolutely unknown Immortal, descending or rising from some world of Beings hitherto totally unknown, and possessed of a completely different kind of power from that which our present ruler wields, will stand against him. Prometheus tried in vain I know; but he came near it. It's obviously not impossible. It's only by force he keeps us down. So, so, so, if we, if we could somehow, somewhere, find a force stronger than the force he uses, an entirely different kind of force, yes! I refuse to believe it's impossible to overthrow him! And once overthrown, O how lovely, how free, how full of possibilities, the world would be!"

"Well, great Aegis-bearer," Apollo now said to Athene, "let us rouse the spirit of your Greek friends, and call upon them to challenge Hector to a mortal combat with whomever it may be among them who has the courage to stand up against him. And let us advise Hector himself to march at once up and down the front between the two armies, calling upon both sides to sit down on the ground while the Greeks select a champion who will be ready and happy to fight it out with Hector of Troy." To all this Athene cordially agreed. But who was the one to approach Hector on this important matter? It soon turned out that there was no necessity for either of these deities to take any steps in that direction. The wise brother of Hector, whose name was Helenus, understood in his own spiritual way what these two Immortals, one on the Greek side and the other on the Trojan side, were suggesting. Promptly this excellent soothsayer, who was — so the bard implies, and well he may have been — King Priam's favourite son, hurried up to Hector and told him exactly what he had better do. And Hector who, like their father, felt deep respect as well as affection for this man, rushed off at once to obey him in every detail. Holding his great spear by the middle, as a sign that he was a messenger of peace, he ran up and down between friends and enemies, making them all sit on the ground and lay their shields and weapons beside them; and then, when all was quiet, called upon the Greek chiefs to select among themselves some champion with whom he would fight it out to the death. His challenge was followed by such dead silence on the Greek side that Menelaus, angry with his compatriots for their inertia, rushed to Hector, dragging his armour with him, and hurriedly began to put it on.

But King Agamemnon came rushing after him, and seizing him by the arm, dragged him back, crying aloud so that all could hear, that it was absolutely crazy of him, who hadn't the ghost of a chance to win against Hector, to go and act like this. On second thoughts Menelaus consented to retire; and, while Agamemnon was leading him back to his place as an onlooker, Nestor lifted up voice and — skilful old orator as he was — held all the Greeks and most of the front-line Trojans as well in absorbed attention. It was impossible for him to avoid the weakness of an incorrigible orator now grown old; but even his lapses into long-winded romance were so fascinating to them all that he held them under a spell. The most enthralling part of it all was about his fight with Ereuthalion, whose lord, Lycurgus, had left him a dreadful and most unusual sort of weapon, a club made of nothing but iron, so that the boys and girls called the man who fought with it koruneetees or the “mace-brandisher”. Nestor went on to explain in his reverberating voice to both armies how this fellow with the mace was the strongest man he had ever killed, and how when he lay on the ground his vast huge body seemed to stretch out like a mountain, this way, that way, all ways!

Excited by old Nestor’s dramatic oratory, half a dozen famous Greek warriors leapt to their feet to offer themselves, including Diomed, Odysseus, Telamonian Ajax, and the other Ajax, Idomeneus, Meriones, and even King Agamemnon himself. Then once more old Nestor took control and made all these competitors mark their lots, which he bade King Agamemnon place in his great brazen helmet. Then Nestor took the helmet and made a prayer to Zeus and shook it between his two hands. And as he shook it, all the Greeks seated on the ground prayed earnestly in their hearts that the lot of Ajax, son of Telamon, or of Diomed, son of Tydeus, or of King Agamemnon himself, should be the one to fall out. And when the lot fell out, it was given to the herald to carry round to all the greatest warriors, until the one who had marked it with a sign known only to himself claimed it as his. And the herald went up and down the line showing it to the great warriors one by one.

But none claimed it as his until it was brought to Ajax, son of Telamon. He greeted it with a shout of joy and waved it exultantly in the air. Never in his life had a greater thrill of pure simple pleasure quivered through his gigantic frame. And as he buckled on his armour excited gusts of feeling kept bursting from him in broken words.

“I believe I can do for him,” he gasped, “deadly though he is! By the beard of my father and the breasts of my mother, I believe I’ve the power to finish off this rampaging Hector! We shall see. We shall see. We shall see.”

Every man in the front of the Grecian ranks was stirred with renewed spirit as he watched the enormous figure of Ajax, carrying the biggest spear they had ever seen, striding between the ranks straight towards Hector. And the sight of this warrior-giant was as disturbing to the Trojans as it was exciting to their invaders. It must be confessed that even the heart of Hector himself beat faster than usual as he watched this gigantic enemy approaching. Ajax stopped when he was within a spear-cast distance of his foe, and as soon as he stopped he began speaking.

"Now you shall learn, good master Hector, that though Achilles may be sulking in his tent, there are plenty of us who are perfectly ready to stand up to you, and not a few of us, let me tell you, who are as good at this spear-and-shield game as you are yourself. But come on now; you had better have the first fling."

Hector sighed.

"Curse these rollicking, slap-dashing, boisterous fellows! Don't they know anything about civilised warfare? Of course the man who has answered the challenge is the man to begin the battle. But like all these Greeks he doesn't regard fighting as the difficult profession it is. He takes it like hunting or like some crazy game that has no rules at all. But as you ask for it you shall have it, my worthy giant!"

Thus thinking, Hector hurled his great spear full at the centre of the unusually thick shield carried by Ajax. This shield had seven layers of bull's hide in addition to its bronze, and in the seventh layer of bull's hide Hector's spear — for all the force with which it was thrown and for all its perfection of aim — stuck fast. Then it was the turn of Ajax, who, tossing aside his enormous shield with his antagonist's weapon projecting from it, flung his spear; and much nearer did his weapon come to taking his enemy's life. But by a quick turn of his whole body, though the spear tore the tunic next his skin, Hector managed to escape death. Then simultaneously each of them extricated his long spear from the defensive armour of his opponent, and, using these weapons at close quarters, they attacked each other with the fury of a couple of wild beasts. It wasn’t long before the superior massiveness and weight of Ajax began to tell. The Trojan hero kept stabbing at him; but it soon became evident that the giant’s extraordinary shield had turned the point of Hector’s wonderful spear. As a result of this, the first blood to flow was Hector’s; for Ajax, now using his superior weight and height, stabbed at him in such a deadly manner that his blood spurted out.

But Hector wouldn’t submit to defeat. Tossing his spear away he leapt aside and picked up a great black stone from the ground and hurled it straight at the centre of the giant’s huge unbreakable shield. But, though it struck this monstrous defence full in its very centre, it had no effect except making an appalling noise. Then it was the giant’s turn. He imitated his enemy’s proceeding; only what he picked up to throw was much more than a stone. It was a great rock as big as a mill stone. Under the weight of this missile, when it descended upon him, Hector utterly collapsed. He fell upon his back on the ground, and the place where he fell looked as if it would shortly be a pool of blood.

But Apollo was not far off and, although completely invisible to them both, he lifted Hector to his feet, staunched the wound that was bleeding, and put new strength into him. Then would he, with fresh vigour and indestructible resolution, have flung himself upon Ajax, and they both would have had recourse to their murderously sharp short swords, if the heralds, one from each army, had not intervened. These were Talthybius and Idaeus, both of them very wise and cautious men, and they held forth their official staves and, with their heraldic authority, separated the desperate pair.

And it was the wiser and the elder of the two heralds — that is to say, Idaeus — who spoke to them as he separated them.

“Fight no more, dear sons; fight no more. The day is nearly over and darkness is at hand; and all of us, children of mortal men, have to yield to darkness.”

Then Ajax made answer:

“Let Hector be the one to speak; for, since he was the challenger, it’s fitting he should be the proposer of peace.”

And Hector replied at once:

“Yes, indeed, let us cease from fighting. You are the best at this dangerous game in both our armies. And one day I hope to be allowed to fight with you again. But at this moment, since night is coming on, let us both yield to darkness. And now, as on this occasion we part, let us give each other some memorable gift, so that future generations of men may say: ‘None fought more fiercely than those two; but none have parted in more loyal friendship or given each other more exciting gifts.’”

Having thus spoken, he presented Ajax with his silver-studded sword-sheath with its well-cut strap. Ajax on his side, without a moment’s hesitation, hurriedly unbuckled his beautiful belt, which gleamed with purple, and pressed it into Hector’s hands. Holding each of them the gifts received from the other, the two heroes now departed; one towards the city where he was quickly surrounded by crowds who could hardly believe their eyes to see him alive; and the other to the ranks of the Greeks who were exulting in victory.

Indeed so triumphant did the King Agamemnon feel that he sacrificed to Zeus a five-years-old bull and gave all his men a grand feast whereof this beast’s enormous body furnished the chief part. When this good feast enjoyed by all was over, the wise old Nestor rose up and suggested that they should get to sleep now as soon as possible; but that the moment the early “wolf-light” appeared, that first dawn-light which preceded the sun, they should rise up and dress quickly and return to the scene of to-day’s desperate fighting and carry the dead bodies from the field.

“Let us burn them,” he said, “as near the ships as possible, so that we shall be able to take the bones away when we sail for the children of the dead to bury at home. What we cannot carry away let us burn in one great fire; and when that is level with the plain let us build over the place of the funeral pyre a great mound or barrow; and, after we have done that, let us build a lofty wall with gates that can be tightly closed, but through which, of course, we ourselves can go in and out as we please. And let us dig a deep ditch round about all this, so that the Trojans will not be able to drive their chariots near to the ships.”

When wise old Nestor had finished giving them these directions, all the chieftains of the Greeks shouted enthusiastic approval.

Meanwhile on the Trojan side there was a tumultuous gathering by the city-wall at Prian’s Gate; and the first among the elders to address the crowd was Antenor, and he went very far indeed in what he dared to suggest.

“Let us,” he boldly said, “give back Argive Helen and all her treasure to the sons of Atreus to take away. In fighting now we are proving false to our oaths; and I say it’s better to keep faith with the gods rather than win a personal quarrel.”

The moment he had finished, the beautiful Alexander, otherwise the beguiling Paris, leapt to his feet.

"I refuse, I refuse, I refuse," he cried, "to give up my girl! I will give up all her treasure willingly to stop this bloody war, and not only so, but I will add some rich treasure of my very own, yes! some precious treasure that has nothing whatever to do with Helen. But her I refuse, I refuse, I refuse, to give back!"

Then it was that King Priam, son of Dardanus, himself rose from his throne and addressed them like the great monarch he was.

"Go now to your various homes, my people, and have a good and quiet supper each at his own hearth. Then at dawn let Idaeus, the herald, go to the hollow ships and declare the word of Alexander, by whose deed all this fighting has been brought about."

All the Trojan host hearing the words of their King Priam did just what he commanded. And sleep that night was sweeter and more precious to them than it had ever been before in their whole lives.

In the early morning Idaeus went quietly to the place of gathering not far from the ships, where the sons of Atreus and all the other chieftains, including Diomed and Odysseus, were already discussing the situation. Here he announced to them all that Alexander, "the cause of the whole trouble", as the herald had no hesitation in calling him, had offered to give back to them the whole bulk of Helen's possessions, and had also offered to add to this restitution an enormous mass of gold and silver out of his own private treasury, but Helen herself, once the wife of Menelaus and now his own wife, he absolutely refused to give up.

Thus spoke Idaeus the herald. And uprose Diomed with a ringing shout.

"No! No! No! Don't let us take a stiver from this rascally wretch, nor let us take Helen either if he wants to escape destruction by giving her up! I tell you, my friends, the cords of doom are already gathered about these treacherous Trojans!"

The shouts that greeted this speech were so prolonged and so tremendous that an exhausted silence followed. Then uprose the King of men, Agamemnon.

“You have heard what you have heard, Idaeus, and I can tell you my heart and my will are one with Diomed. As to our allowing you to burn your dead before we make a further attack, that however is a completely different matter. We are all agreed, as are all good-hearted and properly-feeling persons, that the luckless dead must be given the consolation and consecration and everlasting liberation that fire alone can give. As to the vows we have made and the vows we have broken, these are things that must be left to Zeus, the Lord of Heaven.”

So he spoke, and gravely and reverently, though very rapidly, both sides now began carrying the corpses of their friends from the trodden grass and blood-soaked ditches of the battle-field, until they reached the high places where funeral pyres were already being prepared.

While all this was happening the sun rose up out of the vast-flowing ocean’s far-off horizon and flung his rays upon the broken bodies and gory faces of the dead. Individual Greeks and Trojans, all searching for the special corpses they loved, crossed and re-crossed one another’s paths; and often they had to carry water to the spot to wash the blood from the faces of their dead so as to be sure they knew them in their ghastly disfigurement. The stoutest hearts were shedding tears as they lifted their dead upon their wagons to carry them to the places of burning. The Trojan mourners were allowed to weep as they followed their wagons to the funeral pyre; but when once they had commenced the actual burning of their dead, King Priam allowed them no more lamentation and they had to fulfil their tragic task in silence, burying their sorrow in the depths of their own hearts, or letting it go up in smoke.

While the Trojans were thus occupied, carrying their dead to the burning, and after the burning moving wearily and sorrowfully through the city gates and still more sadly through the city-streets to their various homes, the Greeks, following, as their inherent nature dictated, a completely different urge, were no longer thinking of those they had lost nor cursing Achilles for sulking in his tent, but were full of a fresh surge of technical energy. This had begun long before the sun rose over the far-off horizon; and it was now going on while the sun was shining down on the bowed heads of the Trojans, as in melancholy order they returned home. But the Greeks were now absorbed by this idea, which old Nestor had started and which now possessed them in common, of raising a lofty embankment and digging a deep trench all the way round the enclosure where the ships had been dragged up upon the shore. Deep as their trench was the feeling of relief and security they experienced when they had finished digging. High as the summit of their towering embankment was the exultation they felt when they thought of their enemies being hurled back, down the slope of this great ridge!

But it was not only of their mortal foes that these daring Greeks should have taken thought. They ought to have remembered that immortal eyes were also looking down upon them and that Troy had allies in heaven. Indeed it was very soon when none other than Poseidon himself, god of the ocean and shaker of the earth, resting at one moment by one side of Zeus the Father of them all, burst out in a rage.

“Look, Father Zeus, look what these confounded Greeks have gone and done! I tell you the news of this performance of theirs will soon be resounding over the whole earth, whereas the much more wonderful wall which Apollo and I erected for Laomedon, the father of King Priam, is now totally forgotten!”

Seldom had cloud-assembling Zeus felt more teased and aggrieved than he felt at this moment.

“Shaker of the earth, is it for you to talk like this? How can you utter such a ridiculous absurdity? Of course your glory goes as far as the light of the morning! Up with you, you old silly! Can’t you see that when these precious Greeks have gone home in their ships, you’ll be free to sweep your great billows over the whole business, bank, rampart, ditch and all, and then when you’ve covered their work with sand from the depths of the ocean, lo! every sign of their tinkerings and clinkerings will be as if it had never been!”

Neither Greeks nor Trojans that night had the faintest notion why, when on both sides there was such a pleasant sound of revelry, there should suddenly have burst out above their heads terrifying rumblings and rollings and rattlings of thunder. The bravest of them turned pale as they listened, and their hands trembled so much that the wine they were drinking fell splashing to the ground. It was indeed not until they had bethought themselves to pour out a supplicatory libation to the Father of all, that they were able to lie down that night in peace of mind and sink quietly to sleep.

BOOK VIII

WHILE, WITH HER delicate crocus-petal light, Dawn was moving slowly across the earth, Father Zeus became uneasily aware of a wide-spread mental revolt against his domination of the world. This revolt, he soon realised, was spreading and rising not only among mortal men but even among the gods themselves.

"I little expected," he said to himself, "that when I flung my crafty old Father Cronos down among the Titans, I should be destined to have the same sort of trouble that he had, he who was not only my Father, but the Father of our whole family, of my brothers, Poseidon and Hades, and of my sister-wife Hera. Certainly it seems as if some mysterious power, quite beyond that old Necessity, Anangkee, and beyond any fatal Moira, yes! and even beyond the Death-Keer with which all lives are born, were sweeping us into an absolutely unpredictable future. Well! Let each entity, mortal or immortal, look after itself! Such is my law. I flung my crafty old Father into the Pit; and though there are people who say he has escaped and gone to some ocean-island beyond my ken, one thing is certain, that he will never cause me any more trouble! He's learnt his lesson, namely that there never has been and never will be any ruler, however wise or however powerful, who cannot be overthrown. Well! I told myself in the night, when I felt all this hatred of my rule passing to and fro between heaven and earth, that if I'm to follow my law of each entity for itself I must give all these curst rebels a plain blunt warning. I don't believe they have the least idea what power I've got!

The real fact is that I myself don't realise its limits, any more than I have the least idea how I came by it. But two things are certain: first, that I feel this amazing power within myself, and second, that I must make it clear to all those who hate this power of mine that they had better beware of showing their feeling in any overt action. It is therefore clear that I must begin by giving all our gods and goddesses, including my obstreperous personal relatives, a decisive warning of the danger they are running in thinking they can challenge me with impunity. To be a god you must create and destroy something. To be the greatest of all gods you must be able to create what you want to create, and destroy what you want to destroy. I couldn't destroy the Titans any more than my Father could, but I could overthrow them as he did, and then I could overthrow him too and hurl him down to dwell eternally with them in the abyss. I must gather all the gods together before dawn has quite become day, so that none will be slipping off. I must make them see that, from myself downwards to the smallest insect or plant or worm, there is only one thing for all living creatures, gods or men, to do, and that is to create and destroy. If we cannot do it outside ourselves we must do it inside ourselves. We must all be forever swallowing things with our throats and making fresh things with our hands: yes! and if we are women we must do it with our wombs as well!"

Such were the thoughts in the head of the great son of Cronos as he gathered the immortals together on the highest peak of many-crested Olympus.

"What I have to tell you," he announced, "is simply this: you must assent with one mind to what I am bringing to pass in this difficult world. If I find any of you, whether gods or goddesses, following some private bent of your own and helping or hindering either Greeks or Trojans apart from and independently of the agreed-upon intention of us all, I shall put an end to your doing such a thing for evermore. Yes, all of you, hear me now, and keep my words in your hearts for your own sakes. If I see any of you acting contrary to my wishes, I'll hurl you into the mists of Tartarus, deep, deep, deep below the earth, Tartarus, whose gates are of iron and its threshold of bronze; yes! into Tartarus, I tell you, which is as far beneath Hades as the earth is beneath heaven!

"Just you defy me if you dare! Make a chain of gold, the whole blasted lot of you, and fling it round me, and see if you can drag me from heaven to earth! Just try it, the lot of you! And shall I tell you what would happen? I would take hold of that rope of gold and draw you all up to me, here in heaven; and not only you, but the earth and the sea with you! And then, on my soul, I'd hang you, and the earth and the sea with you, in empty space!"

Hushed in silence they all were. But after a lapse of time Pallas Athene spoke quietly and wisely.

"We know, O great son of Cronos, how mighty you are and none of us have the faintest thought of daring to contradict your will! But it is in order that your mighty will should be done that we do what we do. But we will refrain, great Father of all, from any further action, in spite of our deep pity for the Argive heroes who have been slaughtered by Hector." Here she hesitated for a moment, watching carefully the countenance of her cloud-compelling parent. And then, after deciding in her mind that the greatest of all Beings had begun to feel a little ashamed of his boastings and blusterings, she added: "But we shall certainly take the liberty of warning our Greek friends to be as careful as we in heaven are careful not to arouse your wrath!"

But her wily Father was more than a match for her, and he overcame her before them all by treating this terrific warrior-goddess like a rather difficult but very sweet and beautiful little girl.

“Don’t ‘ee mind, my darling Tritogeneia!” he said tenderly.

“Those words of mine were nasty and not from the bottom of my heart; and whatever happens I shall always love you.”

These words of his were made more impressive by the abrupt fashion in which he turned from her now, just like a human father leaving a child to its play as he departs upon the hard business of the day. Swiftly he harnessed his horses to his golden chariot; swiftly he clothed his own body in its golden armour; and more swiftly still he drove his golden-maned horses between earth and heaven. To many-fountained Ida he drove them and there he stopped upon the summit of Mount Gargarus, which for thousands of years he had made his chief observation-point. Here he unharnessed his horses and flung over them a thick cloud of mist; while he himself sat down among the topmost peaks of the mountain, exulting in the delicious sensation of being his own omnipotent self.

Meanwhile, down below him, the Trojans within their city and the Greeks near to their ships, partook, each of them, of a hurried breakfast, and then hastily put on their armour and polished their weapons. Of the two hosts the Trojans were the fewest in number, but they were a good deal the more desperate in fighting, because their wives and all their children were within their walls, whereas the wives and children of the Greeks were far away in their own home. But deafening was the uproar as the brazen shields and the bronze weapons clashed against each other; and the noise of the tumult rolled away over the plain and echoed among the rocks at the base of the mountains. All this went on until the sun had reached mid-heaven, and the groans of the victims and the shouts of the victors drowned all other sounds.

Then the Father of all lifted on high his golden balance of twin scales, and in one he placed the fate of the Trojans and in the other the fate of the Greeks. It soon became clear on which side, for that time anyway, the death-fate or Keer-Destiny had determined the doom; for the scale of the Greeks sank down towards the earth, while the scale of the Trojans mounted up towards heaven.

Having thus satisfied himself as to which way, just then, destiny was leaning, the Father of all decided to let the Greeks know what was in the air; so he rolled out volleys of thunder from the summit of Mount Ida and sent down a few forked flashes of lightning among the ranks of the Greeks, all of whom were soon pale with foreboding and trembling with fear.

Then did Hector and all the best of the Trojans rushed forward with such fury that it was a shocking thing to see all the famous Greek warriors, yes! all of them, in shameful flight. The two Ajaxes, along with the King of men, Agamemnon, and the heroic Idomeneus of Crete, fled like frightened deer. Only old Nestor abode; but even he didn't remain because of courage. He remained because Paris had shot such a cruel arrow into the brain of one of his horses that the creature was stamping and rearing and writhing in its death-throes. Nestor got out of his chariot and drawing his sword began cutting the traces; but the old man would certainly have soon been slain himself, for Hector's chariot was driving furiously towards him, if Diomed hadn't seen how things were. He called loudly to Odysseus, who was fleeing with the rest, to pause and help, but Odysseus pretended that he didn't hear and just ran on with the others at top speed towards the ships.

"Son of Laertes!" called Diomed after him, "you ought to be ashamed! A coward, a coward! That's what you are! Do you want to perish with a spear in your back?"

And so, alone of them all, did Diomed, son of Tydeus, stand his ground. And he said to Nestor: "Old man, please, please listen to me! Great fighter though you are, for all our sakes remember your age. Let our two squires look after your horse and do you yourself mount up here by me in my car and let us drive straight at Hector, you holding the reins! Then we'll see what my long spear can do against the fellow!"

Diomed's spear certainly did something, though it was only Hector's charioteer it laid low, not Hector himself. And though Hector was sickened with bitter sorrow at the loss of his friend, he hesitated not to leave him lying where he fell, and picked up to fill his place the youthful Archeptolemus and gave the reins into his hands.

Meanwhile, with old Nestor holding the reins of Diomed's horses, that unconquerable champion, his spear in hand again, prepared for more slaughter. What, however, he didn't count on — and how could he count on such a thing? — was the fact that his desperate actions were being watched from topmost Gargarus by Father Zeus, who, when he saw that Diomed's terrific energy was interfering with the panic-stricken halt he decided to call to the Greek success, proceeded with infinite care to aim one of those terrific thunder-bolts that he was such an adept at hurling exactly at the point where he wished them to fall, straight in front of Diomed's car. As this thunder-bolt hit the ground and lost itself in the ground, it burst with a shattering noise, and there arose from it not only a flame but an overpowering smell of sulphur. The result of this was that the horses, hardly knowing what they did, crouched down in motionless terror beneath the chariot. Nestor at this was struck with awe and the gleaming reins fell from his hands.

"Turn your horses, Diomed," he cried. "It's no good. We can't win today. It's quite clear that Father Zeus has decided that Hector, and not you, shall today be the victor. The Father of all is like that. One day he helps one side and the next day the other. The only thing for us to do now is to obey his sign. We must never oppose the will of the most high."

"Hades and Tartarus!" cried the son of Tydeus in a fury. "But one day this wretch will boast to his Trojan comrades — can't I hear his voice!— 'Hell for leather, I tell you, I saw the back of Diomed as he fled pell-mell in frantic panic towards the ships!' May the earth gape for me when he boasts like that!"

But old Nestor had his answer ready.

"Don't 'ee, O my good son of the wise Tydeus, utter such silly words! Hector may call you coward and weakling as much as he likes, but none of us will believe him; nor, by the gods, will the Trojan women, whose sturdy mates you've beaten into the dust!"

Diomed submitted to his wisdom, and, swinging horses and chariot round, drove off at top speed towards the ships, while they didn't miss the resounding mockery of Hector's triumphant exultation expressed in the most abusive language, calling Diomed first of all a woman, and then, remembering that there were in the world hosts of heroic women, hastening to add the four ribald syllables, kakee gleenee, "you dirty little eye-sore!" But Hector, when he got back to the dense crowds of his fellow citizens, harangued them as they had never been harangued before within the memory of man.

"Victory, victory, is what our Almighty Father the son of Cronos has given us at last! Fools, big baby fools, are these damned Greeks, with their precious ditch and their preposterous dirt-wall! You shall all help me, my friends, in getting our horses down and up this childish ditch and over this ridiculous contraption of a play-ground fence! When we've done that, and we'll do it mighty soon, do you know what we'll do then? We'll carry burning fire; yes! burning fire will be the weapon I shall use; and when we've burnt their ships, and they are all dazed and drugged with the smoke, then we'll kill every mother's son of the dirty dogs!"

Then Hector shouted to the four horses that drew his chariot: “Xanthus, Podargus, Aethon, and noble Lampus! O my splendid horses, repay me now! Aren’t I the husband of Andromache to whom you owe all the honey-hearted wheat she’s given you to eat and all that wine she mixes with your water? After them, after them, after those two with all your speed! I tell you, if I could only once get hold of Nestor’s world-famous shield and rend from the body of Diomed his Hephaestus-made breast-plate, I might make these Greeks this very night embark in their ships for home!”

So vaunted the furious war-man Hector, as his four horses whirled him alone in pursuit; but the divine Father was not the only watcher in the skies, and when his consort Hera heard these boasting words, she trembled with such rage between the ivory arms of her Olympian throne that the very heavens shook. And then in her intense agitation she called Poseidon to her side.

“O widest of all rulers,” she groaned, “O Shaker of the Earth, have you no pity in your heart for our noble Greeks? Have you forgotten all the sacrifices they’ve offered upon your altars in all parts of the world? Come now! What about our gathering all the gods together who feel as we do and doing something desperate about these cursed Trojans and their abominable Hector? How wonderful it would be if we could restrain our son of Cronos, so that he has to sit alone and solitary upon his famous peak of Mount Ida?”

Deeply upset was the spirit of the Earth-Shaker as he answered her.

“Hera, Hera, how can you talk like that? What a wild, mad thing to say! Haven’t you yet learnt that it’s just senseless folly to try to resist our cloud-gathering brother? The last thing I want is to see us all engaged in a grotesque and ridiculous struggle against this thunder-bolt thrower! Haven’t you learnt, my dear, from bitter experience, that it’s simply no good resisting this brother of ours who is now your husband? For all our sakes do give up this madness."

But the wave-riding, earth-shaking Poseidon, whose methods were always direct, did not realise how many quite different strings Hera could pull. She was in fact now desperately absorbed in sending telepathic urgings of spiritual pressure into the mind of the leader of all the Greeks, wide-ruling Agamemnon himself.

"This is terrible," the great King told himself, as he felt this pressure. "Why, I can hear the voice of Hector making them carry torches across that damned ditch we thought would stop them forever. Yes, I'm cursed if I don't see him at the end of our line, urging on his fire-bearers towards the ships, while we are struggling to stop a confused rush of men and horses and chariots down our ditch and across our trench. If they actually do get their fire over that crowded gulley and rampart, we'll have to look out for ourselves! A real fire once burning among the ships might indeed be the end of us! I must see what I can do."

With intense gravity, but also with magnificent rapidity, the heavily-built king, his majestic presence emphasising his impassioned appeal, climbed on to the top of the trench where it was nearest to the immensely tall sides of the great black ship belonging to Odysseus. From this position, if he shouted loudly enough, he could make his voice heard from both ends of the line of ships; that is to say from the ship of Ajax, son of Telamon, to the ship of Achilles, son of Peleus, for the vessels of these two, who were the most formidable of the warriors, were the ones that had been given the most risky position. A really moving speech was the oration of Agamemnon as he stood erect on this eminence, calling on all the Greeks to fight to the death. And indeed before he climbed down, this great Lord of Lords and King of Kings began himself to weep, and with deep sobs made a private personal desperate prayer to Zeus not to allow them to be wiped out by the Trojans: “not altogether wiped out,” he implored, “even if Thou, our Lord, hast decided that we are not to take Troy or recapture Argive Helen.”

Nor was this prayer without effect. Beholding the tears of this majestic monarch, the Almighty Father was moved with pity.

“What shall I do?” he thought in his heart. “If I throw another thunderbolt, this time on the opposite side, all these crazy mortals will think I’m as changeable in my feelings as they are themselves. No! That will never do! No! I must send down one of my Eagles as a sign to them!”

The omnipotent Father’s action followed his thought at once; and down came a colossal eagle, the most prophetic of all birds, carrying in its beak a fawn, the progeny of a deer. This the eagle let fall upon Zeus’s special altar, so that it should be quite clear that it came direct from heaven.

This omen, straight from above, had the desired effect. The strongest and fiercest Greek warriors rushed forth across the earth-wall and the deep trench and flung back the Trojans, killing more than they had been able to kill for many days.

And I, the know-all Aether, took good care, you can bet, to make my thrice-blest old Homer, half-blind as he is, understand that the swiftest and most successful killer on this occasion was not Ajax, but his half-brother, old Telamon’s bastard, Teucer, who killed not with spear or sword but with bow and arrows. O how it did amuse me later, when I found that all three of the learned Alexandrian editors felt it was so improper and unaristocratic for the son of some unknown bitch to perform such great feats that they wanted to cut the passage out, with the excuse that some low and contemptible copyist must have presumptuously inserted it! Let us, on the contrary, in defiance of these courtly Alexandrians, exult in the fact that the great Telamon loved to cherish and caress the little Teucer, nothon per eonta, “in spite of his being a bastard”.

Besides, it was mainly due to the fact that it was from under the protection of his brother’s tremendous shield, which reached nearly to the ground, that Teucer was able to cause the death of so many Trojans. Teucer was constantly shooting at Hector; but Father Zeus, for his own secret purpose, which, as I, the Aether, who see through everybody and everything, have often explained to our aged Homer, was as obstinately eccentric as human purposes frequently are, constantly permitted Apollo to turn aside these deadly arrows. But at last Hector became aware of this hidden shooter and resolved to do for him.

“What would happen to Andromache and my little one,” he asked himself, “if this sneaking sharp-shooter, hiding behind a shield that reaches from chin to ankle, sent one of his damned arrows through my heart?”

Then took place one of the most crucial duels of the whole war. Hector, having seen his charioteer killed by one of Teucer’s arrows, tossed the reins to his brother Cebriones, who was on foot close by, and with his eyes flashing like a Gorgon’s and a shout of fury that went whirling round Ajax and Teucer like the cry of a mad vulture, picked up a great jagged rock and crashed it down upon Teucer’s collar-bone so that he fell to the ground groaning. Then Ajax stood over him ready for anything, but Hector, satisfied with what he had done, leapt into his chariot again and rattled on to slaughter more Greeks, while Mecisteus and Alas tor helped to carry Teucer back to the ships.

But Hera and Pallas Athene failed not to note all this from the summit of Olympus. And it was Hera who spoke first to Athene, suggesting that they should both go down and take the lead against the Trojans; and when Athene replied with all the intensity of wrath that belonged to her passionate nature, it became clear to the other gods and goddesses that there was really danger of war in heaven! Athene seemed to be in a really dangerous mood, a mood in which, unless Hera stopped her with the full strength of their old unbreakable friendship, she might burst out against the All-Father with such rage that to punish her he might sweep them all into Tartarus.

"Does he forget," Athene screamed in her wild fury, "does he forget how I saved his son Heracles when, in those labours for Eurystheus, he had to drag up out of Erebus that dreadful dog Cerberus? He would have been overwhelmed in the waters of the Styx if I hadn't helped him. I'll teach Father Zeus to behave like this! I'll teach him! I'll teach him! You shall see how I'll make him cuddle me as he used to do and call me his gleaming-eyed treasure! Go, go quickly, Hera my queen, and harness the horses to our chariot while I put on my armour, not forgetting, you may be sure, the deadly-tasselled Aegis of Zeus. We'll soon see how this cursed Hector will like it when he finds himself confronted by you and me!"

Hera, though in a calmer mood, was only too ready to harness the horses, for it always delighted her to do anything that annoyed her lordly husband. No lively chronicler, no bard, no poet, no industrious historian has yet told us what those wonderful Beings, the Hours, though! in their heads or said to each other, as they threw open the great gates of Olympus for the horses and chariot of the Queen of Heaven, she herself holding the reins, while Athene, the daughter of Zeus, wearing the Aegis and brandishing her tremendous spear, sat by her side. Did the Hours whisper: "Will they have time, those two formidable friends, to get down to the plain of Troy and the sandy shore, where the ditch and embankment guard the ships, before the Almighty Thunderer catches sight of them?" Soon enough those watchful

Hours perceived that the Father of the World had seen them! In a flash he sent Iris to bring them to a halt.

"Turn your horses, turn your chariot," cried Iris to them, just as they began to descend through the air. "The Father says he feels much more angry with you, his daughter, than with you, his wife. He says that from his wife he expects contrariety and contradiction; but not from his daughter. And he says if you two were not now obeying him, as he sees you are, you would suffer a punishment beyond your utmost imagination. He is talking now to you, Pallas Athene, not to you, Hera, and he says you would suffer pain from such wounds as you never dreamed could ever befall an immortal Being!"

Later that day, when Father Zeus himself had "driven his own chariot from Ida to Olympus, and had summoned the parliament of all the immortals, it became soon evident that both Hera and Athene were in a very angry mood, though disinclined to express what they were feeling. Hera must have been pondering in her melancholy on the possibility of separating herself from Zeus entirely, and going far away from Olympus and far away from Troy and far away from Argos and Sparta and Athens and every place she knew, perhaps even journeying as far as the entrance to the realm of Hades. With his supernatural power of telepathic reading of both mortal and immortal minds Zeus was quickly made aware of what his wife was thinking.

"It's no use, Hera," he said calmly, "for you to plan an enormous journey to the end of the earth to escape the monotonous sameness of the daily life of us immortals, which I agree is terribly like the daily life of mortals, save that they can perish and we apparently cannot, and they are driven by Moira and Keer and Anangkee and we seem able to escape those stern fates. You can flee in your fury beyond the boundaries of the world, I tell you. You can go to Tartarus, where Iapetus and Cronos are, but you will not change my mind. Hector shall go on killing your Greek heroes, kill! kill! kill! for quite a while yet. But a day will come when the death of Patroclus, his friend of friends, shall rouse Achilles to the fight once more and that will finish it. This is what shall happen. This is my will. This is what the days will bring. And let me tell you this now, once and for all. Nothing that you or Pallas Athene can do will make the faintest difference. I have willed it. And so it will be."

After the All-Father had thus spoken all were silent; and dark night, so prayed for by the Greeks and so dreaded by the Trojans, covered the world. Then in the darkness Hector gathered the Trojans together in an open space near their enemy, and gave them precise directions as to what he wanted them to do.

"We must camp out here this night," he told them. "It will be a warning to these accurst invaders to see our fires burning and smoking so near their huts and their ships. But some of you must go back to the city and to your homes, and bring out here all the food and drink you will need for a fine feast, so that, well fed and drowsed by wine, you will sleep soundly. Tell your ladies to keep their fires alight in your homes, and tell your boy-brothers to guard the walls in case these infernal Greeks try a surprise attack. Then at the first rising of the Suit, we'll rush to the assault again."

It was a memorable night, that night, for both sides. The Greeks, before they slept, saw with many strange thoughts the whole plain along the banks of the river Xanthus alive with flickering fires. But as I, the Aether, looking down with extreme difficulty, and feeling rather than seeing what was happening on earth — for my element is light, not darkness — realised what reception in heaven the prayers and sacrifices of the weary dutiful pious old priests of the Trojans were receiving, how could I allow even the three most learned of all the critical Alexandrians in their later editing to refuse the copyists the right to say that these prayers and offerings were rejected? Although the exact truth is that the gods and goddesses most favourable to the Trojans were too absorbed in their own heavenly disputes to take the least notice of what was going on upon earth. Hera and Athene might be hostile, but Apollo and Aphrodite remained friendly. And thus it was that of all the nights in the experience of those Trojan men, fighting there for their city, their homes, their wives and their children, no night had ever been passed in happier sleep or in more exultant dreams than that night, with all those burning fires and all that upsoaring smoke swaying to and fro between the silent stars and the silent earth.

Yes! Father Zeus might have his own erratic way of arranging the destiny of the tribes of men; but, whatever fate the future held for them, these heroic Trojan fighters, whether they lay in unconscious sleep or in wild dream of exultant expectation, found themselves that night nearer the feeling of ideal warriors, of which they had dreamed since they were children, than they ever did again. What they felt was something far deeper than the triumph of killing off their invaders or of driving them in their hollow, heavily-rigged ships back over the sea to their homes, with their purpose unfulfilled and Argive Helen still a captive in the city of Priam. O! It was much deeper than all that.

Even I, the all-knowing Aether, cannot be quite sure that the crucial words which Hector uttered in his resounding oration repeated themselves in his own mind before his complete physical exhaustion helped him to go to sleep. He may have had his doubts. Was he, he may have said to himself, going too far when he shouted aloud that as sure as he longed to be ageless and immortal, and as sure he longed to be held in honour as were such divine beings as Apollo and Athene, so surely was he certain that this day’s result was a deadly blow to the Argives. ‘All we warriors,” he may have thought, “long to be immortal, but I doubt if I ought to have brought in any deities by their actual names.”

BOOK IX

But while Hector was worrying, till he turned over to sleep, about these lapses in his oration, and while his army, gathered in a half circle round their invaders, was savouring its rest and anticipating its triumph, the Achaeans were passing through an absolutely appalling ordeal. There was little thought of sleep. In fact that particular kind of blind terror that produces a sort of physical numbness began taking hold of many of them; and the worst of it was that this numbness spread from man to man, just as inflammatory rage or heroic initiative can pass from person to person. And against this infectious panic each man's individual spirit fought so desperately that their souls were torn in two directions. It was as when the North Wind flings itself so wildly against the West Wind that huge masses of seaweed from the deepest gulfs of the ocean are tossed up upon the waves.

And then it was that Agamemnon said to himself: "What sort of monarch am I if I lie down when complete disaster threatens us all? If ever in my life I've needed your spirit, O my father Atreus, I need it now — for this is almost more than my heart can bear!"

But he gathered himself together within himself and went among them all. Up and down among their ranks he went calling upon the bravest among them by name and exhorting them to conquer this terrible fear. Finally he got his heralds to help him, though he wouldn't let them raise their voices, and with their aid he gathered most of his chiefs and leaders into an open space among their huts, and there he spoke to them, though, do as he might, he couldn’t help breaking into tears over and over again as he addressed them.

“Well, my dear friends,” he cried, and then began sobbing and letting big tears roll down his cheeks to his chin and drip from his chin to his beard, “we are surely utterly and entirely defeated; and only our lives are left. Let us therefore as soon as dawn appears drag our ships down to the sea and sail away! We shall at least in that manner save our lives, although except for our lives we shall take back nothing!”

With these despairing words the great king from Mycenae sat down in silence, and a universal silence fell upon them all; and the darkness of night grew sadder and deeper. But Diomed leapt to his feet. Against all this depression he leapt up. In defiance of the heart-wrung tears of the great king he rose; in defiance of the darkness of night he rose; and to the cloud of despair that was weighing them all down he shouted his reckless challenge.

“Strange king!” he cried, “if you want to flee, flee! There are your ships, and there are the ships that followed you! But, as far as I am concerned, I am going to stay and fight till Troy is laid low!”

Diomed spoke so defiantly, and looked about him so unconquerably, that a great shout arose from half the warriors present; and it became clear that a crowd of them were ready to follow him to the death. Others, however, who felt less heroic, and were thinking doubtless of seeing their wives and children again, murmured their dissent and gazed anxiously at Agamemnon.

It was then that wise old Nestor rose up.

“Let us, my friends, let us, my dear sons, cease this discussion now. Night is upon us and we are all weary and with minds affected by weariness. Let us sleep now. And if our chieftains and leaders are so disposed, let our great leader, Agamemnon, bring forth the wine from his well-filled store, and call them to gather at his hut and drink their fill, so that they may sleep with peaceful minds. When dawn comes we shall all feel fresh and strong again, and that will be a better moment than now to decide whether to fight or to flee.”

Nestor’s sensible words settled it, and the rank and file of the Achaeans laid them down to sleep inside or outside their huts, while Agamemnon took the old man’s advice and had the wine brought to his biggest shelter, where he gathered the chieftains and satisfied their troubled souls with meat and drink. Before he repaired thither himself, however, Nestor took care to direct his young son, Thrasymachus, who was proud to undertake such a task, to collect a group of youthful sons of chieftains equally eager to serve in this way and to arrange that each of them should be followed by a band of patriotic retainers, as eager and spirited as themselves, to act as sentinels, all along the wall above the trench, from which point of vantage they could make sure that no-one came near any of the ships drawn up upon the sand.

When the feast provided by Agamemnon was nearly over, Nestor rose up among them and uttered some very serious words to the King of Kings.

“My suggestion now is, my lord, that to undo the harm to us all which you know you did by taking Briseïs away from Achilles, you do something that will really appease him and assuage his wrath. I know we are all agreed that, if he went forth, this terrifying Hector would soon be done for, or at least be in full retreat, and the whole tide of battle would be flowing the other way. I would therefore, O King, beseech you to send Phoenix and Ajax and Odysseus to the tent of Achilles and offer him some really tempting reward, some reward great enough and precious enough to change the heart and alter the intention of this man — yes! even of this man, to whom Zeus has given such power of eye and hand and foot that no mortal among us can stand up against him.”

To this sagacious suggestion the great Agamemnon gave his consent at once, and gave it in words so moving that all who heard him were touched to the heart.

“Old sir,” he cried to Nestor, “you are absolutely right in what you say! Blind — that’s what I was, miserably blind in my passion! But, as you most truly put it, the thing for us to do at this fatal crisis is to try and melt the heart of Achilles. Yes, let these men go, as you say, and offer him everything you can think of! Since I acted so blindly and yielded to my disgraceful emotion, the whole of my nature now longs to pay to this man a lavish return, yes, by Zeus! a startling requital. O for the sake of all the gods, let our friends who go to his tent say I’m ready to give him seven tripods, ten talents of gold, twenty cauldrons, twelve horses, winners of many races, seven Lesbian women, skilled in every sort of weaving and embroidery; yes! and, more than all, I will return Briseïs to him with an oath before the Son of Cronos that I’ve never slept with her or dallied with her since she came to my tent! Yes! and by every god in Olympus, if with his help we do destroy the City of Priam, I swear to him before you all that he shall chose twenty from the loveliest women of Troy only surpassed by Argive Helen; and finally, when we reach our home, tell him I will give him in marriage whichever of my own three beautiful daughters he wishes to take. Yes! and, moreover, when he has married one of my daughters I will give him seven crowded cities, all of them on the sea-coast!”

Every one of the chieftains present at this moving scene showed unbounded satisfaction at these heroically repentant words; and in a short time, for Phoenix, being much older, had started some while before the rest, Ajax and Odysseus, accompanied by the heralds, set out along the edge of the poluphloisboio thalassees, the myriad-voiced sea, praying to earth-shaking Poseidon as they went, that they might be able to soften the heart of the grandson of Aeacus.

When they reached the huts and the ships of the Myrmidons, they found Achilles, the son of Peleus, playing on a lyre while his devoted friend, Patroclus, listened in rapt silence. The lyre Achilles used was part of his booty when he sacked the city of King Eëtion, and its melodious strings were stretched between supports of the purest silver. As he played he sang the words of an old song about the warriors of the past, and to the words of this song Patroclus listened with even more emotion than he did to the exquisite notes of his friend's lyre. As Odysseus preceded Ajax into the tent, he noted the absence of the aged Phoenix.

"The old man," he told himself, "must be lying down in their bedroom, exhausted by the long walk along the beach."

Achilles rose at once to greet them as they entered; and both Odysseus and Ajax were amazed by his gracious manner.

"Well!" he said, "so you two have come — and great must be the necessity you are all in to make you do so — but though the deep hurt in my soul still remains, you mustn't think I've forgotten the long ties of friendship that bind us three together."

Then he led them in and made them sit on seats covered with soft cushions and purple rugs; and he bade his friend Patroclus fill his biggest bowl with doubly rich wine; and when this had been done and they had each been given cups, he called for his charioteer Automedon, and bade him bring meat, so that they might all have a supper worthy of such guests. And Automedon brought a sheep's back and a goat's back and the chine of a fat hog and laid them on a wide tray upon the floor before the fire. Achilles cut up all this meat with very great skill, slicing each piece with the utmost care, while Patroclus helped him to spit it upon skewers; and Automedon, having first made the fire blaze, proceeded to scatter the embers, and when the meat was roasted, laid it on several andirons and sprinkled it with salt. Then Achilles helped them all to a share of the meat and himself sat down to their meal opposite Odysseus, while Patroclus, after placing bread in baskets for all of them, cast a burnt offering into the fire as a sacrifice to the gods.

By this time old man Phoenix had slipped silently into their circle, and they all began eating and drinking with absorbed satisfaction. As soon, however, as they had really put from them the desire for food and wine, Odysseus caught Ajax and Phoenix exchanging a rapid glance; and he knew at once what that meant. It was the moment for him to disclose Agamemnon's tremendous offer of repentance and requital, including his willingness to return Briseïs, along with his oath before the Son of Cronos, that he had not touched her.

"I know as well as you do, O great Achilles," Odysseus began, rising to his feet and lifting high his wine-cup, "what your father Peleus said to you when you came hither with us all. He told you to restrain the hot-headedness of your violent spirit. He told you that in this tumultuous world philophrosunee, or "kindly temper", is what we all ought to cultivate, else the end of it will be that we shall all destroy each other, till none be left alive. By the most high Son of Cronos and by his brothers, Poseidon and Hades, I beseech you, O great son of Peleus, to remember that, because in your wrath you still hate Agamemnon and will never forgive him, that is no reason for your condemning the rest of us to death at the hands of this furious Hector. Go on if you must, noble sir, hating and despising Agamemnon. Go on with that till your dying day, or until you have avenged yourself upon him! I don't quarrel with that mood of yours. But is this wrath of yours with Agamemnon, however righteous it may be, a reason for making all of us, of us who worship you short of idolatry, fall victims to Hector, who, as you know perfectly well, and as he knows himself, is stronger than the whole lot of us unless you are ready to face him?"

In deep silence did that group of men, Odysseus, Ajax and Phoenix, together with Patroclus and Automedon, wait for the answer of the son of Peleus. And he soon gave it, straight from the shoulder.

"Do these sons of Atreus," he cried in a voice trembling with irrepressible anger, "imagine that they are the only people in the world who love their wives? I love Briseïs as if she were my wife; and my wife she is and will be ever, just as Argive Helen will always be the wife of Menelaus, however fondly this seducer Paris may cling to her! No! No! Every honest and true man who has a beautiful girl of his own choice, loveth her and cherisheth her, even though he has made her his captive with his spear as I did Briseïs. As for these gifts of his, I tell you I don't give a damn for them or for his lies about not touching my Briseïs! Let him have her! Let him have her! now he's taken her from me! And now that I see you all before me here I will tell you what I am going to do — I am going to set sail early tomorrow morning for my home. No! No! No! No daughter of this great swaggering cowardly bully Agamemnon will I ever wed! My old man Peleus will soon find a wife for me. But listen to this, all of you here present." His words were now serious and slow. "My mother told me, that if I stayed to conquer Troy and to slay Troy's man-destroying Hector, I should win immortal renown and become a name to resound for all the generations hereafter, but — are you listening? — I should meet my doom and perish! Whereas if I left the city of old Priam with its rampaging Hector and gave no more thought to the fate of Helen, but just sailed for home across the Hellespont, my Immortal Mother predicted that my Keer or 'Death-Doom' would be put off indefinitely; in fact that I might well live to an extreme old age. One thing more I must say, since if I set sail tomorrow it is important that you should all know it, and that is that I intend to take our old Phoenix here along with me in my ship; nor do I fancy that he'll come unwillingly; eh, Phoenix, old friend?"

His reverberating voice now subsided, and he picked up his lyre whose notes still hovered in the air above them, caressed the strings with a sad flicker of his hand and laid it thoughtfully down again. It was then that they all gazed upon the old man Phoenix, wondering what he would say and what he was thinking. The old man was evidently deeply disturbed in his mind. The silence in that high-roofed shelter seemed to weigh suddenly upon him as heavily as a similar silence had once done in the halls of his father when, by reason of his mother's piteous imploring, he had enjoyed his father's concubine and made the girl detest the embraces of the older man, who in his wrath exiled his son from home and called down upon him the fearful curse of the Erinyes. But as Phoenix struggled against this weight upon his heart, he was suddenly aware of an inexplicable relief. "Centuries upon centuries hence," the earth-mother Gaia herself seemed to be telling him, "you will be born again in the shape of an earth-nourished teller of tales in the west of an island beyond the pillars of Heracles where you will make all men ponder on your tales until the end of time."

And it was then that Achilles laid his hand with a gesture of such deep affection upon the knee of the old man at his side that Phoenix could restrain himself no longer; and, as old men are only too apt to do, he fell into that strain of heart-deep memorizing which young men find so wearisome; for they are living intensely now in the buoyant freshness of the sensations about which, half a century later, they will themselves be murmuring with dreamy satisfaction and sentimental pride.

“When we drank wine in your Father’s halls, I used to hold you on my knees and when you spluttered and dribbled and when you ejected the wine from your throat, it used to stain my tunic. You were a son to me, Achilles; you were a son to me; in spite of the curse of the Erinyes with which my father cursed me so that I should beget no offspring for myself forever.”

He was silent for a moment; but when he saw that not only was Achilles listening to him with full attention, but that Odysseus and Ajax were also struck by his words, the old man was unable to resist the supreme temptation of his age, and proceeded, without any preface save a hint that to bring back the heroic Past was a much happier thing for everybody than to try to mould the Future to our particular taste, to tell them the story of Calydon and Meleager and the wise boar. It was certainly an exciting story about the Curetes and the Aetolians and the unhappy mother who wailed like a halcyon-bird, and about Marpessa’s being allowed by Zeus to choose between her lover Idas and the great god Apollo himself, who was trying to carry her off, and how she chose Idas rather than Apollo.

Out of the atmosphere of this story Achilles was evidently puzzled as to how to get rid of his visitors without being impolite; but with his accustomed quick wit he finally thought of an excellent plan; and, rising to his feet, he begged Patroclus to prepare a bed for Phoenix in this very room. This was indeed necessary if the old man was to stay the night and sail off with the Myrmidons, if they did sail, that very next day. Patroclus began preparing this bed at once, a bed that must have made the old man feel sleep already coming upon him at the sight of such sheets, such blankets, and such a coverlet over it all! It was then that Achilles gave them their final answer; and fair and square he gave it, that if Agamemnon wanted to take Troy and get Helen home again, he must do it without help from him.

So Odysseus and Ajax departed to tell the son of Atreus that, whether Achilles sailed tomorrow or not, no help from him would he get against Troy or Hector. As may well be believed, when the two chieftains did finally get back to the huts and ships of the sons of Atreus, the last word upon that evening's whole business was spoken by Diomed, the son of Tydeus, and it was on the strength of that defiant word that they all, except the great King himself, lay down and fell into a sound sleep.

And it was the same in the double-roomed hut of Achilles. Leaving the old man Phoenix alone and at rest in his newly made-up bed in the front room, Achilles and Patroclus slept on opposite sides of their large inner chamber. Nor did either of them lack a girl with whom to sleep. Both their lovely companions were captives from towns despoiled on their voyage thither. The bed-fellow of Achilles was an exquisite Lesbian, while Patroclus slept with a beautiful girl whom Achilles had apportioned to him on the day they sacked the fortress of Scyros.

BOOK X

DEEP WAS THE sleep that night of all the warriors of the Grecian host as they laid them down in their various huts, as near as was possible to the elaborate ditch and rampart they had dug and erected around their ships. If Achilles with his Lesbian, and Patroclus with his captive from Scyros, and the old man Phoenix in his luxurious bed, were all sleeping the sleep of the just, so were all the Grecian leaders in this strange war; all except the two sons of Atreus. These two brothers could not rest. Harassed and unhappy they lay in their beds, tossing from side to side as they thought of the failure of their whole expedition and of the triumph of the City of Troy and of Paris, the son of Priam, who had stolen Helen away for ever.

The soul of Agamemnon for half that awful night was torn by a conflict within itself as to what desperate last measures it might be possible to take to ward off this shameful disaster. He felt as if a power was labouring in his breast deeper than his own deepest feelings. He felt as if there were stirring within him that abysmal compulsion which Zeus must feel when he sends forth the lightning that is the herald of tempestuous torrents of down-pouring rain, or of multitudinous hail, or of that shuddering pause in the pulse-beat of time that is the gaping mouth of annihilating battle. He looked at the burning fires of the hosts of Hector; and he realised that the Trojans were not by any means all asleep. He could hear the sound of pipes and flutes! They must be feeling that Zeus was with them, as indeed he seemed to be! No! He couldn’t stand it. He tore off his bedclothes and knelt down on the floor, and in black desperation, since he had only himself to blame, and only himself to sacrifice, he began with excruciating throbs of pain tearing out wisps of hair from his head as he prayed with heart-rending groans to the Son of Cronos to help him.

A voice within him seemed to say at that crucial moment, “Go to old Nestor, the son of Neleus. He’s the only one who can give you the help you want.”

With this in his mind he rose to his feet and began preparing to leave his hut. He put on his tunic and his sandals and then, in a sudden movement of his wild feelings, he dragged down from where it hung a great lion’s skin which, when he flung it about him, reached down to his very feet! Then, seizing his spear, he was preparing to go forth into the night, when lo! a quick sound of approaching steps, and there at the door of his hut was his brother Menelaus! Yes, Menelaus likewise was dressed for battle. Over his shoulders he wore a leopard’s skin, the black spots of which stood out grandly across his chest in the flickering lights of his brother’s hut, and in his hand was an especially massive spear. Together they decided to go separately at once throughout the whole camp and wake up all their chiefs. Thus it wasn’t very long before old Nestor, who was lying in his night-attire with the door of his hut ajar and his armour by his side, and who, just like the sons of Atreus, had been unable to sleep, saw Agamemnon approaching. The old man called out to him, and as soon as he got a reply, began to dress likewise, throwing round him a thick, double-dyed purple cloak, which, though it looked less war-like, was probably warmer than any wild beast’s skin, and promptly went forth with Agamemnon to rouse their best friends.

The first they reached was Odysseus, who soon heard their voices and was quickly at their side. Then they went to the tent of Diomed, whom they found sleeping heavily on the open ground with a thick carpet under his head and an ox-skin over him. To wake this sleeper was not too easy a task, and old Nestor finally did not hesitate to use his foot to rouse him.

“Ye gods!” he cried, when on awakening he saw who had roused him, “you sure are, old sir, a wonderful toiler!”

“Well, my son, if you will let me call you so tonight, if you are so struck by my age, I’ll tell you what you can do for me. You can go round and rouse Ajax the swift and Meges, the son of Phyleus, and say that we’ll all meet in the open space where the sentinels are.”

Diomed now gathered about his body the skin of a terrific lion, larger and fiercer than any that even old Nestor had seen before. So enormous in fact was it that it reached down to the man’s feet. When finally the various chieftains — and they had been put into good heart by the liveliness and high spirits of the young men who had volunteered as sentinels — gathered together where Nestor had suggested they should meet, that indefatigable old patriarch had a bold and unexpected suggestion for their consideration.

“What we need most to know now,” he said, “is obviously what plans the enemy have; whether, for instance, they intend at sunrise to make a desperate life-and-death struggle to reach our ships and burn every one of them; or whether they hope to be able to surround us here and starve us out, as if our ditch and rampart were the walls of a besieged city. Now in order to find out what they’re going to do, there is nothing that I can think of save to send spies among their ranks, spies who will go stealthily and quietly as close to their fires as is possible without being caught. What I suggest is a very risky thing for those of us who are brave enough to undertake it, but I am sure we are all agreed that some drastic action must be taken to avoid any repetition of our defeat yesterday by Hector. Whoever among us is brave enough to undertake this dangerous adventure, he may be sure that if he comes back alive his name will be famous among us for all time; and I can answer for what we shall feel for him by what I shall feel myself. We shall want, yes! each man among us, rich or poor, to give him a black ewe-sheep with a lamb under her, which is the best of all possible gifts!"

He was silent, and they all for a moment were silent. Then Diomed leapt to his feet.

"I'll go! I'll go! I'll go!" he cried: then stopped and looked round. "I admit, however," he added slowly, evidently thinking hard and calling up before his mental vision the terrible possibilities of what he was undertaking, "I admit that it would be much better if two of us were to go together. It is so easy," he hesitated for a moment to catch the right word to convey what was in his mind, "so easy to do wild and impulsive and crazy things when alone, while with another at our side such foolish actions become impossible!"

The son of Tydeus was silent. And there arose at once a startling number of chieftains who lifted up their hands and offered themselves as his companion in this life-and-death spy-venture. Thrasymedes, the son of Nestor, rushed forward to offer himself. So did both the two Ajaxes, and so did Meriones, and so did the sagacious Odysseus.

And then it was that the great emotional heart of Agamemnon was torn with pain and doubt. There would have been doubt, if not pain, also in the heart of my Homer if I, the allknowing Aether, overcoming my natural reluctance to work in darkness, had not dived deep into the soul of Agamemnon and discovered the fact that the great King was seriously troubled lest Diomed should select Menelaus, yet felt that it was contrary to his conscience to allow this dread to prevent him from giving Diomed an absolutely free choice. This freedom of choice he insisted upon all the more strongly just because it cost him such a cruel effort to utter words that might have led Diomed to select the very man whose selection would have caused his brother-loving heart so much pain.

That the great King was wise in giving Diomed his choice was proved by the choice he made. Who could have been more perfectly adapted for such a risky and tricky undertaking than Odysseus of many devices? The description of the way the two men armed themselves for their great adventure is fascinating to all youthful listeners to this poem. The headdress which formidable Diomed put on was nothing more than a simple cap! What Odysseus wore on his head was, however, more elaborate. It was a head-dress supplied for him by that competent warrior and kind-hearted friend, Meriones. This astonishing head-dress, supremely suitable to a scouting spy, was a tight-fitting skull-cap of bull's hide, like the one put on by Diomed; but its peculiarity was that it had rows of boars' teeth cunningly fixed round the outer edge while its inner lining was made of adhesive felt which clung tightly to the head it covered. Meriones had evidently greatly cherished this singular head-dress. In his dreaming moods of "long, long thoughts", he must often have regarded it, as it hung on the walls of his dwelling, as an enthralling link with the past; just as if the feelings and experiences and all the desperate occasions through which it had pressed against the bony brain-covering of so many fatal decisions still clung to it and formed a vibrant atmosphere about it, which was curiously inspiriting and might even at a crisis prove imperative.

That Diomed's choice of Odysseus was the best he could have made was proved by the latter's hurried rejection of any discussion, whether for or against this personal point, and his insistence, since there was only a third of the night still available, that they should start at once. Not, however, without the utterance from each of them of a most special and personal entreaty to Pallas Athene did they start. She heard them and sent a heron to tell them so, and though the night was too dark for them to see this bird, Odysseus heard its cry on their right as they went, and knowing that the goddess had sent it, felt strong at heart and made Diomed feel the same.

Meanwhile on the Trojan side Hector was as much alive to the necessity of discovering the enemy's intentions as was Agamemnon; and having collected the chief warriors about him, he swore an oath by the gods that he would give to anyone who would spy for him no less reward, when the Greek ships were destroyed or were in full flight, than Achilles' horses and chariot! Whether because the Trojans were all so happily relaxed in the sleepy consciousness of being the conquerors, and were imagining in their dreamy satisfaction that the first thing they would behold when the sun rose would be the whole fleet of Greek ships in full flight, or because they regarded the task of spying on a defeated enemy as unworthy of their metal, it so happened that for several minutes none of them answered Hector's appeal, or seemed tempted in the least by the idea of receiving the chariot and horses of Achilles. But finally there did rise up from among them the son of one of their heralds, a man of the name of Dolon. This man had gazed round him in amazement when nobody answered the call of their heroic leader.

"Can it really be," his heart cried to his heart in unspeakable excitement, "that this is the grand opportunity of my whole life? Can it really be that I, the wretched Dolon, the nondescript Dolon, unregarded Dolon, the utterly negligible Dolon, the beneath-contempt Dolon, Dolon the laughingstock of the whole Trojan army, should be given this supreme chance at last, the chance of being one of the actual heroes of the war to defend Troy; the war to keep Helen, the war to drive back the sons of Atreus as well as the son of Peleus? Can this thing really and truly be going to prove true that I, Dolon of the ugly phiz, I, Dolon, the only brother among five sisters, am to be chosen out of all my heroic compeers to bring about the salvation of Troy?"

Such were Dolon’s thoughts as he lifted up his hand and raised his voice, and called upon Hector to swear a mighty oath that to him and to none other should be given the horses and the chariot of Achilles. The moment Hector had sworn this oath, Dolon arrayed himself at once for his solitary adventure in the skin of a grey wolf; and placing upon his head a cap of ferret skin, hurried off towards the Grecian ships.

Hard of heart must these hearers be of the rhythmic war-pictures chanted by Homer who do not feel a twinge of pity when they read of the lamentable end of Dolon. Diomed and Odysseus hid themselves when they saw him approaching; but when he had passed them a little distance they pursued him. The poor simple fool thought at first that they were messengers from Hector telling him to return; but, when he realised they were enemies, he fled for his life. But they soon caught him and, having extracted details as to how the Trojan army had been arranged for this night’s sleep, they relentlessly killed him.

The most important news they had obtained from him was that Priam’s Thracian allies, led by King Rhesus, the son of Eïoneus, who had the finest chariot and the swiftest horses in all the Trojan host, were not far away from the very spot where they were now standing and that they occupied a spot, these Thracians, quite distinct from the other allies of Troy. Having raised a great heap of reeds and tamarisk boughs so as to mark the spot where the wolf-skin attire and ferret-skin cap had been stripped from Dolon’s bleeding body, Diomed and Odysseus quickly crossed the strip of wild country which divided them from the camp of the Thracians, and stealthily stealing through this camp, where everyone was lying on the ground fast asleep, they had no difficulty in finding, after Dolon’s description, the wonderful chariot of King Rhesus with its famous horses as fast asleep as the monarch himself and his charioteer. The wily Odysseus directed Diomed to do the killing with silent blows, while he himself noiselessly harnessed the poor sleepy beasts to their heavy chariot, weighed down with gold and silver, and pulled the bodies out of the way. Diomed, in dead silence, and without waking a soul, disposed of the twelve stalwart Thracians who slept round Rhesus and his precious chariot; and oh, how like a ghastly dream it was for King Rhesus when, just before the death-stroke, he opened his eyes and saw, but uttered no sound, his killer standing over him!

BOOK XI

A NEW EVENT occurred when the goddess of Dawn rose from the bed of Laomedon's son, Tithonus, of whom I, the all-knowing Aether, have resolved that three thousand years hence in a far-off Western Isle, a great Bard shall be inspired to chant a memorable dirge. This Bard shall make plain from the human side what the immortal horses of Achilles knew from their side, what an appalling tragedy it is for a mortal to be linked with an immortal and thus to be imbued with something which deprives him of the greatest of all blessings that mortal men enjoy, their inalienable right, when the end of their time comes, to lie down and die.

The event which occurred at this moment, and which the weary Tithonus, as well as his Dawn-Goddess, had now to contemplate, was indeed startling. The great Son of Cronos, himself an ancestor of Tithonus, sent down to Earth the dreadful Eris, the terrifying Goddess of Strife. Eris calmly stood on the ramparts the Greeks had made with such huge labour just opposite the ship of the crafty Odysseus, which was in the centre, midway between the ship of Ajax, at one end of the line, and of Achilles at the other end; for the Achaeans had arranged their ships so that at either end of the line there should be the ship of one of their fiercest fighters. From this centre-point it was, therefore, that this terrible goddess Eris uttered a shout so world-piercing that it made every man who heard it shiver from head to foot.

This shout put fresh heart into the defeated host of the Greeks. The great King Agamemnon at once began putting on his armour. What first he put on were the greaves for his legs, each fitted with silver ankle-pieces. Next he put on his breast-plate, which was a notable thing indeed. It had come from the historic island of Cyprus and it had been made by the cleverest of Cyprians who worked in enamel. Cinyras, as the ruler of Cyprus, gave it to him as a guest-gift. It had ten bands of blue enamel, twelve bands of pure gold, and twenty bands of tin. Thus protected in his front and in his legs, the next thing the great monarch did was to take up his shield. This shield was really the most tremendous defence that the human race had ever beheld since prehistoric warriors first invented this history-making bodily protection. It was so large and so curved and came down so low that it guarded the man who used it from every kind of blow, save only a blow that struck the centre of his back from the nape of his neck downward. It possessed ten circles of bronze, twenty gleaming white bosses of tin, and in the midst of it was a circle of cyanus, made of steel and of a dark blue colour. Within this circle the Head of the Gorgon could be seen, and on each side of the Gorgon were the figures of two appalling beings. These are they who are wont to come down to earth to try to drive all easily-scared mortals into the terror that leads to madness. These two beings, Deimos and Phobos, are indeed so unspeakably horrible that mortal men may cry out to every power in heaven to deliver them from them. Nor was this all, for round the silver strap that hung from the shield was twisted a blue serpent with three heads, each looking a different way and all three growing out of one neck. Glorious was the helmet the great King then put on, for it had two horns and a terrific horse-hair plume above them. But it was when Agamemnon grasped a couple of enormous spears, pointed with gleaming bronze, and brandished them, one in each hand, till their brightness ascended to Heaven, that Hera and Pallas Athene felt so proud of him that they thundered down their approval.

What I, the all-knowing Aether, must get into my Homer's head, is that although the element immediately around men and women is their own bodily flesh and blood, just as it is with birds and fishes and reptiles, around all these living things are the elements of Earth, Air, Fire and Water, and of the Sun and of the Moon and of the planets and of the remotest stars and also, on exceptional occasions, of those weird appearances that some call Comets. When therefore I inspire Homer to suddenly bring Eris and Deimos and Phobos and the Gorgon's head into his verse, it is silly to try and waft them all away like autumn gnats by using one pedantic expression "personifications". They are real. Something has created them. Around certain definite spots on the earth's surface the mortal victims of Terror and Panic will find certain permanent whirlpools among the elements. These whirlpools abide. They are elemental ghosts', and they are more lasting than human ghosts. And when we mortals pass such places on the Earth, we catch, out of the air, an intimation of nameless horror.

Zeus must have indeed been anxious that there should be many more souls hurled into the realm of Hades before the war was over, for he now poured down from Olympus a heavy thin rain stained with blood. It was indeed clear to all that, quite apart from any interference, the son of Cronos was resolved to grant a temporary victory to the Greeks. Like a man drunk with blood-lust, the great King Agamemnon led his wild and desperate warriors past the tomb of the ancestral Ilos, the son of Dardanus, King of Troy, past the Scaean Gate and the oak-tree; and the further they went the more Trojans they slew, and the more they slew the higher leapt up the battle-madness in the hearts of them all.

I, the all-knowing one, could, however, clearly detect that the son of Cronos, who by this time had descended from Olympus to the peak of Mount Ida so as to be nearer to the bloodshed, was unwilling that the Greeks should have it all their own way. He therefore sent Iris down into the ranks of war to take a special message to Hector. And Iris obeyed him, and, flying to Hector's side, delivered to him, unseen by any, the message from the Heavenly Father. And the message was this: that as long as Agamemnon was fighting at the head of the Greeks, he, Hector, must keep in the background and husband his strength and quell the fiercest impulse of his spirit until Agamemnon should retire wounded; and then, the moment he saw the great King being carried off in his chariot in undoubted retreat, he should rush forward and lead the Trojans in one tremendous attack straight towards the ships.

The first victims of Hector's withdrawal and of the gigantic fury of the towering king of kings were the two sons of Hector's brother Antenor. The first of these to fall under the might of Agamemnon was Iphidamas, and he was soon followed into Hades by Coon, whom the great king decapitated as he was trying to drag his brother's body out of the mélée, so that the unconscious head of the one rested upon the motionless corpse of the other. But it was only then that the victorious Agamemnon realized that before he had cut off the head of the brother of Iphidamas the man had smitten him through his arm with the point of his spear, and that there were now atrociously sharp pains running through his whole body. Coon's spear must have passed clean through his arm, and the pangs from the wound it caused now began to shoot through him from shoulder to shoulder.

The spirits of the sons of Antenor were now descending together into the kingdom of Hades, and it crossed the great king's mind to wonder whether the spirit of Coon was even now telling the spirit of Iphidamas, as the two of them crossed that dark threshold, that it might easily be that their great enemy's spirit would be following them as soon as the point of that spear took effect.

“Father of Heaven,” thought Agamemnon, as he prepared to leave the battle, “I must be feeling as women feel in childbirth when those pitiless goddesses, the Euleithyiae, send their pains through them.”

Most mortals can well imagine Hector’s exultation when he saw the back of Agamemnon retreating to the ships. He became half mad with warlike fury. His fighting rage simply knew no bounds. In a few minutes he had killed Asaeus and Autonous and Opites and Dolops, son of Clytius, and Opheltius and Agelaus and Aesymnus and Orus and Hipponous, all of them formidable warriors. He went on in a wild frenzy of slaughter, as when the West Wind scatters the clouds of the rapid South Wind, smiting them with a deeply rolling blast and sweeping them over the swollen waves till the white spray is flung sky-ward, and this madly wandering wind carries everything before it and away!

Then indeed would ruin have come to the Greeks had not Odysseus called unto Diomed: “What has come over us, old friend, that we have forgotten our furious valour? Come, son of Tydeus, come hither, good friend, take your stand by my side; for shame will it be for all of us if this fire-crested Hector reaches our ships!”

In a second Diomed was by his side, looking desperately round for a chariot to carry them both against Hector. A certain irresponsible indifference to the whole business which he noted in the owner of a particular chariot, and also in its driver, which passed them at that moment, must have set Diomed’s impulsive spirit into a whirl of anger, for, without giving the man any warning, he struck Thymbraeus with the butt of his spear, knocking him to the ground; while Odysseus, recognizing that there wasn’t a moment to be lost, struck the chariot’s driver Molion, who was a fine figure of a good retainer, an equally paralysing blow. Then the two of them mounted the chariot and left both these worthy men lying on the ground — these men who doubtless had been dallying with the hope that Agamemnon might decide after all to give up this crazy war for the sake of one beautiful girl, and be powerful enough to compel a desperado like Diomed and a cunning intellectual like Odysseus to realise that the moment had come to sail for home with their whole fleet of ships. But leaving these men still stunned and unconscious, Diomed and Odysseus, two well-balanced friends, one representing impulse and force, the other wisdom and caution, whirled off in their stolen chariot to oppose the mad rage of Hector.

At first they had it all their own way; but ere long Hector observed what was happening, and saw why it was that his well-organised rush towards the newly-dug ditch, the rampart and the ships was being, in spite of the wounding of the great King, so fatally retarded. Straight at the pair of them in their borrowed chariot, of which Odysseus just then had taken the reins, Hector drove headlong. At sight of him, as Homer confesses, the tempestuous and impulsive Diomed was seized with panic. From head to foot he shuddered and trembled. But the older Odysseus remained perfectly calm.

"Come, my friend," he said quietly, "we must stand up to him, now we're here."

Filled with fresh courage by the absolute calm of his friend, Diomed, leaving the other to deal with their horses, raised his spear, measured the distance quickly with his eye, and the moment Hector came within range flung this terrible weapon with all his strength. The spear was well-aimed. It struck Hector full in the middle of his helmet, a helmet that had been given to him by none other than Phoebus Apollo himself. Thus, though the point of the spear was of fine bronze, it was bronze it now encountered, and it was this three-fold crested bronze that turned the spear's point before it touched the man's skull. The shock of the blow, however, knocked Hector completely off his feet, and indeed flung him a good many paces through the air; and when he was on the ground he knelt there on one knee for a minute, and then sank heavily to the earth in complete unconsciousness. But contact with the earth for some reason revived him; for although shocked and stunned he was unwounded, and he was able to listen to Diomed's torrent of ribald abuse.

"You've escaped me till now, you dog! But make no mistake! I'll get you! I'll get you!"

These were the words that rang about Hector's ears whichever way he turned. But into his chariot, dazed as he was, he managed to clamber, and once in the driver's seat he felt better. Touching the horses with his whip he made straight for the ships, and as he went the rush of air against his face drove his dizziness completely away.

While all this was happening, Hector's brother, Paris, the present lord of fair-haired Helen, and the same crafty, beguiling, frivolous wanton he had always been, was watching and waiting for an opportunity to kill some of the leaders of the Greeks, and of course if possible Menelaus himself, with his bow and arrows. He could hardly have found a better position from which to enjoy what to him was in reality not so much a deadly feud as a glamorous and exciting sport; although for those whom his arrows hit it was a swift pain-piercing end of everything. He was leaning against a pillar that had been raised to mark the tumulus of Ilus, son of Dardanus, one of the most famous of the royal house of Troy. And it was from this position that he saw his grand chance.

"Ye gods!" he cried in his heart, "if I could only do for Diomed, none of the rest of them, now Achilles is sulking, can match our Hector!"

When the chance finally was given to him, he didn't miss it. Clear through the centre of Diomed's foot went the arrow, pinning the man to the ground. With a lively peal of mischievous jubilation, Paris came dancing down the slope:

"You're hit! you're hit! you're hit!" he cried. "But I wish I'd hit you through your middle so that you'd have to stop being like a lion among a herd of goats!"

But Diomed lifted up his foot in spite of the arrow.

"You dancing bowman! You pretty curly-locks! You mincing lady-killer! I reck no more of your arrow in my foot than if an angry girl had slapped my cheek or a baby had hit me with its tiny fist! Don't you understand, you little dancing idiot, that, if you're a weakling and a man of nought in yourself, nothing you do can have any real effect?"

It was then that Odysseus came to his side; and Diomed, sitting down behind him, pulled the arrow out of his foot. But though he got rid of the arrow, a most horribly sharp pain quivered through him. "No, I can't stand this," he said to himself, and, leaping into his chariot, he bade his charioteer drive fast to the ships.

Then was Odysseus left absolutely alone; and dark and desperate became his sensations.

"Is this to be the end of me?" he said to himself as he watched one after another of his bravest companions bolt headlong past him, panic-stricken, for the ships. "Am I going to be as scared as these are?" he thought; "or am I just going to stand stockstill and, in fear of being a coward and in terror of finding myself running away, be sent passively, helplessly, impotently and unprotestingly straight down to Hades?"

Fighting almost mechanically and automatically, so deeply was his unusual mind weighing the whole question of death against life and life against death, Odysseus suddenly found himself shouting with a tremendous voice. "Why did I shout like that?" he asked himself. "The pure instinct of selfprotection, I suppose.” But it was lucky he did shout, and it was lucky that this unpredictable impulse made his voice heard so far. For Menelaus, who happened to be at that second within reach of Ajax Telamon, cried aloud to that terrific warrior: “Isn’t that the voice of Odysseus? He must be in great danger. He would never cry out like that if he weren’t at a perilous pass. Come, my friend, let us rush to his aid!”

And indeed Odysseus was in extreme danger. There suddenly came up quite close to him one of the most powerful of all the Trojan champions, namely Socus, the son of Hippasus and brother of Charops; and this Socus struck him such an overpowering blow with his spear at these close quarters that it pierced through his shield and shore away his skin clean down his side. But Odysseus could feel that, though he was bleeding freely, he had not been hit in any vital place. It was lucky that this situation into which, for all his wisdom and cunning, the philosophic Odysseus had been led by some weird whimsy of fate, had drawn forth from him, in spite of the fact that his fear of being killed was balanced so evenly by his double fear of appearing a coward and being by his own conscience condemned as a coward, that far-echoing cry for help. For lo and behold! Here was the great Ajax himself at his side! Had Ajax found himself alone among enemies like this he would have acted spontaneously and not gone through the faintest self-analysis of his motives. But a philosopher can’t help philosophizing, much as he may desire to avoid it, and Odysseus couldn’t help smiling to himself as he wondered what he would have been thinking about in his last moments if Nature hadn’t squeezed out of him that desperate shout.

What Ajax and Menelaus found when they reached him resembled the sort of scene in the near-by mountain forests that the exploring gulls from the sea must have chanced upon many a time. It was as if a horned stag with a hunter’s arrow lodged in its body and lodged in a fatal enough place but not a place where any deadly result would immediately occur, had sought a moment’s rest under the shadow of a rock. For no sooner would the stag lie down, after its wild rush to escape from a second arrow, than it would find itself surrounded by bloodthirsty jackals resolved upon devouring it. But lo! at that fatal moment what must the lord of all mortal destinies do but bring upon the scene a rapacious lion, at whose approach the jackals scatter and leave the wounded stag as a feast for the lion! Thus it was with the situation on this spot at this moment. Many famous Trojans gathering around him attacked Odysseus the wise and crafty-minded; for they felt that they really had got him at last, completely at their mercy. But Ajax now drew near and planted his great shield between Odysseus and his enemies, that shield that had the weight and dimension and massive strength of a city-wall. And seeing their prey thus defended, the Trojans scattered in all directions, while Menelaus led Odysseus forth by the hand till his chariot and charioteer drove up, and then took him back to the hut near his ship. Meanwhile Ajax, seized with battle-madness, rushed hither and thither, up and down the ranks, slaughtering all among the Trojans who had the spirit to stand up to him.

But not for long did Ajax triumph in this manner; for at the other end of the battle Hector was already carrying all before him and driving the Greeks to flight as he swept towards the ditch and the rampart. At length the issue of the struggle appeared so wavering and uncertain that Achilles, leaning against the high black hull of his own great ship, was amazed to see the charioteer of old Nestor, the wise counsellor of them all, driving rapidly towards the part of the rampart and ditch behind which were drawn up those wonderful ships of Pylos, whose value had been already well tested, for they had been constructed and collected by Neleus, old Nestor’s father.

The chariot of Nestor passed so rapidly along the line that Achilles was uncertain what wounded man it was whom Nestor was conveying to his tent. But at a quick glance the man certainly resembled the most important of all their Greek comrades, none other than Machaon, the son of the great physician Asclepius who had learnt the art of healing from Cheiron the Centaur. So Achilles hurriedly called to his friend Patroclus: “Run, run, my dear, quick, quick, quick, along the ships till you get to the tent of old Nestor! And when you see him ask the old man from me whether it really was Machaon the Healer whom he was conveying in his chariot, wounded, I’m afraid, towards his tent.”

Like a shot from a bow Patroclus was off in a second, and it was in an incredibly short time that he found himself standing at the entrance to old Nestor’s spacious tent. After leaving Machaon, the wounded doctor, in the care of the beautiful Hecamede, who was acting as housekeeper for old Nestor, Nestor himself and Eurymedon, his charioteer, bathed the sweat from their bodies in the salt sea and dried themselves carefully, so that when once they were inside they could sit down comfortably to their meal. Nor did their arrival with the wounded son of Asclepius disturb the beautiful lady who looked after old Nestor, and who indeed had been selected by him very specially when Achilles sacked the little island of Tenedos that had been her home. She placed before them a lovely table with feet of cyanus and a carefully prepared onion to give the meal its proper tang, and yellow honey, and beautifully ground barley-meal, and a perfect basket made of bronze and full of dainties, and on the table this beautiful girl, Hecamede, whose hair was so exquisite in colour that it was a feast for anyone’s eyes just to look at her, placed the mighty drinking cup whose two handles were adorned with doves with extended wings, which when it was full of wine few but old Nestor could lift to their lips. And then this beautiful girl, who was like a goddess herself in every gesture, poured out for them a specially delicious potion she had concocted herself made of Pramnian wine and grated cheese of goat's milk and very delicate white barley-meal. Nestor and Eurymedon, happy after such a good meal, soon began telling each other stories.

Then, lo and behold! there was Patroclus at the tent's entrance! Up jumped old Nestor and took him by the hand and drew him in and begged him to be seated. But Patroclus refused to sit down.

"I must go back to Achilles," he said. "You know what he is. It doesn't do to keep him waiting! And I have found out what he wanted me to find out. I mean I now know for a surety that it was you, Machaon, he saw being driven in great Nestor's chariot, oldest and wisest of us all, as we all agree, my lord Nestor, that you most surely are."

The thoughts of Patroclus, as he uttered these words and as he leant against one of the tent-poles and watched with increasing desire the delicious repast that the lovely Hecamede was still replenishing, were troubled thoughts.

"Does the son of Peleus really love me to the extent with which I love him? Of course I know we don't love each other as Father Zeus loves Ganymede, or as they say the girls of Lesbos love the girls in Paphos. We love each other with a love far stronger than that sort of love! Our love is the real true love of passionate friendship. It is love in its essence. It is pure love. It is love entirely free from sex. When I am embracing a girl and he is embracing a girl, our passion for each other is absolutely unaffected by what we are feeling for our girls. But of course since he is Achilles and I am Patroclus, he commands and I obey. O how I wish I were safely back in his tent now, very now! I cannot bear to think of all the things that might happen before I see him again!"

When old Nestor had remained silent as long as he could bear seeing his beautiful Hecamede’s repast thus despised, and as long as he could endure watching the obvious desire of Patroclus to get away, he must burst out and have his revenge on this guest who was no guest, by abusing Achilles.

“What does he think we are?” he cried in the shrill tone of an old man in a real rage. “Does he think we must just quietly and tamely accept the fact that by his not helping us our best warriors one by one are being wounded? Is it nothing to his confounded arrogance that Diomed is wounded, that Odysseus is wounded, that Agamemnon is wounded, and that Euryphylus has been hit by an arrow that has pierced his thigh? Is the man so puffed up with his own conceit that he has no place left in his narrow soul for any pity at all, not one drop of pity left for all his Achaean comrades? Will he see us all wounded and limping to our graves while Hector brings fire to burn our ships? What’s the matter with him? Is he half-crazed by the idea of his own greatness?”

The old man paused and took a deep breath; and it was then that Machaon, watching him closely, and being the wise physician that he was, sent up in his heart a desperate prayer to Father Zeus that the silence of Patroclus, who was still leaning against the same tent-pole, should not set the old man off on reminiscences of his heroic deeds when he was a young man. Zeus must have heard this frantic prayer; but Zeus must have thought to himself: “If I stop this old hero from telling me his tale his pride may break out in some startling action that might upset all my plans. He might even be inspired in his mounting pride by an impulse to settle the breach between Agamemnon and Achilles, and not only so, but be able to do it, too, for there is no doubt he’s the wisest of the whole lot of them; but this is not at all what I want just at present. No, it’s really important to me that the success of Hector should continue for a while. What these impudent mortals don’t understand is that the universe existed long before they were born and that I have to deal not only with my old tricky father Cronos but, worse still, with his enemy, Gaia’s brutal ravisher, Ouranos, and even beyond him, with all the stars in their courses and the revolving constellations!”

Thus it was that unrestrained by Zeus, in spite of Machaon’s prayer, old Nestor went on telling them how, though his father held him too young to fight, he saved all the people of Pylos from the Epeians who would have overwhelmed them if it had not been for him.

“I sprang upon them” — and the old man’s voice made the table rattle and made all that was on it ring and ting, “like a black tempest; and fifty chariots I took and from each of them two warriors bit the ground, quelled by my spear!”

It became more and more difficult for Patroclus to escape as the old man went on; for what must the cunning old warrior in his subtle wisdom do now, but seek to create a crack, however small, between the heart of Patroclus and the heart of his adored friend Achilles. To do this he described a scene, doubtless real up to a point but probably a good deal exaggerated, in which Menoetius, the son of Actor, talks tenderly to his child Patroclus telling him that, though in birth and in strength Achilles is his superior, he must remember that he is the older and consequently the more cautious; and that it will always be his duty to steer and direct his excitable friend in the way he should go, not only for his own benefit but for the benefit of everybody.

“It might easily be,” the crafty old man continued, “that you could persuade him to let you wear his armour, so that thus attired you might appear at a distance to be his very self, which would have such an effect upon our foes that they would cease to follow Hector and would scamper in mad panic back to their city walls!”

These words had the desired effect upon Patroclus and without a word, but his heart beating with excitement, he started running back all the way along the line to their tent. But there was in Heaven one far more cunning than old Nestor, namely Father Zeus himself, and he took an easy way to make sure that Patroclus didn't arrive all freshly inspired with this new idea; for he shook the dice, or sortes, of destiny just a little, not very much, but just sufficient to bring it about that he should meet on his way, near the tent of Odysseus, none other than the badly wounded Eurypylus who, with an arrow in his thigh, was dragging himself along, faint from loss of blood and sick with pain, towards his own tent. At the sight of him Patroclus could not restrain his tears.

"Is there a chance for us?" he asked the wounded man. "Is there a chance for us?"

"None, none, none," groaned Eurypylus. "But since we've met I will be very grateful if you'll help me to my tent. Whatever is going to happen to all of us in the future, I implore you, help me to reach my black ship and if it's possible cut this arrow from my thigh and wash away the blood from it with warm water, and if you have learnt from Achilles what ointment to use and perhaps even carry such ointment with you, for Achilles was taught by the Centaur Cheiron, please do it for me."

And the squire of Eurypylus saw them coming and left the ship and spread a great mat of ox-skins upon the ground, and there Patroclus laid the wounded man and with a knife cut out the arrow and washed the wound; and he plucked a certain root from the ground which he saw amid the reeds and rubbed it between his own fingers till he had extracted its sap, and with this he anointed the wound and the blood was staunched and the pain ceased.

BOOK XII

JUST AS AMONG mortals it is rare for men and women to view events and persons in the same manner, so it is also among immortals. It was therefore natural if not inevitable that the wall and the trench which the Greeks had erected and dug to protect their ships should have aroused very little interest in the breasts of the two goddesses who were their staunchest champions. The building of ramparts and the digging of ditches are jobs for men, not for women, and it is easy to understand this lack of interest which both Hera and Pallas Athene displayed in this terrific ditch and this wonderful rampart, in spite of the encouragement they were always giving to those who brought them into existence. But it was naturally the other way with the two formidable gods who had always favoured the Trojans. Apollo and Poseidon hated this great ditch and this great wall more than they hated any particular fighter.

But I, the divine Aether, take a view about what these hardworking Greek warriors did to that portion of the Trojan land I love to look down upon that is different from both the feminine and the masculine view among mortals and immortals. I feel very strongly with my whole being that it is a monstrous and wicked act to spoil the beauty of any grand and sublime landscape that from the beginning has roused the spirit of awe and reverence in the hearts of both gods and men. And feeling as strongly as I do about such sacrilege, and recognizing as I do that this hideous ditch and this arrogant rampart are entirely spoiling the beauty of that portion of the coast upon which I have poured forth the light of my immortal soul for thousands upon thousands of years, I have decided to use both Poseidon and Apollo. Yes, and if I can persuade him so far, even our Father in Heaven himself, to sweep these montrosities away and leave land and sea as beautiful as they were before these things were thrust upon them.

But since I, the eternal Aether, can detach myself from both gods and men; yes, and detach myself also from the thing called Time, which is only, of course, something invented by clever mortals with the help of cleverer immortals, I am fully aware that this great healing process which I desire to apply to the cruel wounds and scars that these ditch-and-rampart diggers have inflicted on the sensitive flesh of the great mother of us all, must await its appropriate hour: for I clearly see that it would require a far more troublesome effort to heal these wounds while the fighting was still going on than after Troy had been destroyed. But I shall surely see to it, when the Greeks have all sailed for home with Helen, that this accursed ditch and rampart with all their filthy mass of pestilencespreading litter and wreckage shall be swept into the sea, and there sink down to invisible depths. Yes, I will make Poseidon and Apollo bring together all the rivers from Ida — Rhesus and Heptaporus and Caresus and Rhodius and Granicus and Aesepus and divine Scamander and Simoïs, by the banks whereof innumerable shields and helms have fallen, and by the floods whereof the broken bones and skulls of many heroes have been swept seaward. And I will make Poseidon himself, the Shaker of the Earth, holding his trident in his hand, sweep into the depths of the sea all these boards and stones and metal with which the Greeks have laboured, until once more the original sands and pebbles and shells shall cover the great curving beach as they did before these men were born and as they will when Troy has become no more than a name.

Such, I, the divine Aether, decided should be Poseidon's and Apollo's work when the Trojan War was over. But then war and the tumult of war roared up and down that deep ditch and round that well-built rampart, and the timber of the towers re-echoed as if under repeated blows; while the Greeks, scourged by the lash of Zeus, were hemmed in around their hollow ships and hounded and hunted by Hector, who still, like some appalling creator of panic, raged around them with the force of a tornado.

The fury with which Hector attacked them was exactly like that of a wild-boar or lion, face to face with a long line of hunters and hounds. Spears and javelins are cast at him, hounds leap at his throat, but, first at one weak spot among them, then at another, he rushes savagely against them, revelling in his strength, defying the whole lot of them, heedless of the fact that in the end he is destined to perish though now, at each spot where he falls upon them, both hunter and hounds give way. So fought Hector, calling on his comrades to attempt what he himself strove in vain to do, that is to say to make their horses cross that deep ditch and mount its opposing rampart. Yes, Hector's own horses stopped abruptly, aghast at what they saw before them. On the brink of that ditch they stopped dead, neighing loudly from sheer terror: for not only was the ditch deep but its opposite bank was staked all along with sharp spikes. So at that point all the Trojan horsemen came to a halt, though the warriors on foot were prepared to risk it and advance. And it was then that the wise Polydamas came to Hector's side and gave him some very sagacious advice.

"For heaven's sake, Hector, and you other warriors, don't try to drive your horses into that appalling ditch! Don't you see what terrible spikes there are along the top of the opposite bank? If we risk such things in our madness none of us will get back to the city alive. No, no! Let us dismount and leave our squires to hold our horses and guard our chariots, while we ourselves climb down this confounded ditch, cross carefully that spikey bank, and sweep these wretches to the sterns of their damned ships; and, when we’ve got them there, kill the best of them, and then — O glorious moment! — burn their curst ships with fire!”

So spoke Polydamas; and Hector, accepting his advice without a second’s hesitation, called loudly to the Trojans to follow him, and scrambled hurriedly down into the ditch and, along with the wise Polydamas and the bravest of their friends, was soon, after having carefully avoided the spikes, climbing to the top of the rampart and, once there, was rushing boldly towards the ships. This first group was followed by many others; and it soon became evident that it was in the mind of the heavenly Father to give, on that day at least, the glory of victory to Hector.

But matters were suddenly intensified by a weird and striking incident that concerned the flight of birds, indeed of an enormous bird, no less than one of Zeus’s pet eagles. This eagle was carrying a huge serpent in its beak, a serpent that was very much alive and was writhing and twisting desperately. It was also biting at the great bird that carried it, and there finally came a moment in the terrible struggle between them when, by twisting its head round, the serpent was able to bite the eagle in the neck. This ended the struggle, for in a rush of pain the great bird dropped the snake so that it fell straight down among the ranks of the advancing Trojans.

Then there ensued a very interesting dispute between the furious Hector and the wise Polydamas. This latter — and even I, the Aetheric searcher of hearts, must confess that his attitude baffled me — expressed strongly to Hector what he called the importance and necessity of withdrawing from battle.

“We all saw that great eagle just now, clearly a bird of omen sent to warn us by the Heavenly Father, and how it dropped that living serpent amongst us. Well, my friend, what does that mean? It means that Zeus warns us to draw back all our chariots and all our footmen and retire within our city’s walls. Do you not see, Hector, that under the force of such a sight the majority of our men are staring at you in awe, only waiting for you to give the sign of retreat? The Heavenly Father doesn't wish us all to be slaughtered so as to give glory to Hector. If we obey this bird-omen, sent down to us especially by Zeus, we no doubt — at least that is how I, the greatest bird-omenist of our time, interpret it — shall see these accursed Greeks sailing away to their home without Helen and leaving us the winners of this bitter strife. Don't you see, Hector, that, as this eagle dropped just now that serpent among us instead of carrying it to its nest to feed its little ones, so will these damnable invaders sail away to their homes if we retreat at this moment, leaving us the winners of this bitter game? Don't forget, my friend, that I am the greatest reader of omens in all our city, and that for you to disregard what I tell you at this juncture is just sheer insanity on your part."

Then answered Hector of the fiery helm: "What do I care whether birds fly to the right, to the dawn and the sun, or fly to the left, to the heart of darkness? To Hell with all omens at this great moment! The only omen in which I believe is to fight for king and country! Come on, all of you! Come on! Let us burn these ships of theirs and send their crews to Hades or else drive them bootless home over the waters to tell their wives and children that they have achieved nothing!"

So Hector rushed forward, and the Trojans and their bravest allies followed him; and the walls and battlements were covered with the blood of both sides. For the Greeks were not dismayed, nor were put to rout, but they desperately held their ground and the thing became an equal struggle. As a careful woman who is working with both hands at spinning keeps the balance even with exquisite nicety, raising the wool in one hand and the weight in the other, making them level with infinite trouble, and thus with her toil and skill earns a pittance for her children, so did this battle between Greeks and Trojans remain equal.

“Up with ye, horse-taming Trojans!” rose the sky-piercing shout of Hector, as he hurled himself against the final barrier to the ships.

Here there was a huge double-doored gate with two high posts on each side and fastened from within by a couple of massive cross-bars. But lo! before Hector’s eyes and just outside the gate there lay upon the ground a vast stone, a stone that was broad at one end and sharp at the other, a stone such as would have taken at least two very powerful men in ordinary time to hoist up upon a wagon. But this stone Hector lifted up; and, coming close to the gate, he stood with his feet apart, and hurled it straight against the gate’s centre. Down the whole thing crashed, both the doors yielding to the terrific weight of the stone which broke them off from their hinges, and the crossbars fell with a resounding clang.

And Hector leapt within, his face as terrific as a sudden descent of night, his body blazing with bronze, and a spear in each hand. Once inside he was beyond every barrier between him and the ships and he rushed forward in triumph, shouting wildly to his men to follow him. Eagerly the Trojans obeyed. Some climbed over the wall and a crowd followed him where he had destroyed the gate; and the Greeks were driven in rout among the hollow ships, and the wild sound of the frightful struggle mounted up into the quiet heaven.

BOOK XIII

IT WAS WHEN Hector was nearest to complete triumph, to the slaughter of the bravest of the Greeks and to the burning of their ships, that I, the immortal Aether, decided to intervene. I saw that Zeus for some whimsical reason of his own had turned his shining eyes, those far-sighted orbs whose chief pleasure is to contemplate the maddest acts and most fantastic follies of the crazy human race, away from both Trojans and Greeks and fixed them upon the land of the Thracians, and upon the land of the Hippomolgi, who live upon the milk of mares, and upon the land of the Abii, who are the most righteous of all mortals.

Leaving the Heavenly Father, therefore, to enjoy his scrutiny of the ways of a race that prefer mares' milk to cows' milk, I decided I would make use of Poseidon, God of the Sea, son of Cronos, brother of Zeus and of Hera and of Hades and of Demeter! Who would serve my purpose better than he? Enraptured by my new scheme, however, though I was, I wisely waited till this great Being had left the sea and was resting on the topmost eminence of the island of Samos, inhabited by Thracians, whence he could see all the ridges of Mount Ida and the whole city of Troy and the long line of Greek ships along the coast. Silently and invincibly I descended upon him, emphasizing, with an irresistible though inaudible whisper, the danger to the ships if Hector's slaughtering were not checked. Poseidon got the idea in a flash and, rising to his full height, he began striding down to the water. It only took him four colossal strides to reach the sea; and once there he entered his ocean palace of Aegae. Here he caused his ocean-servants to harness his horses, and entering his chariot he drove through the towering waves with such force that the foam scarcely wetted his armour, while the huge sea-beasts, such as walruses and seals, rose up from the depths and played and gambolled in front of him, for right well they knew their lord and king.

There is a vast cave in the ocean between Tenedos and rocky Imbros; and in this cave he loosed his horses from the chariot and fastened them up carefully, turning the sea-weed there into heavenly ambrosia so that they might feast to their hearts' content. When he issued forth from the sea himself he assumed the well-known form and voice of Calchas, the oracular sage; and thus disguised he hastened through the ranks of the Greeks exciting them to stand firm, and, when he came at last to the place where the two Ajaxes were, he addressed to both of them a quite special warlike exhortation. Of those two it was the son of Oïleus, Ajax the less, who divined from the speed with which the legs of the pretended Calchas moved, that the man was in reality a god in disguise.

"I certainly feel a longing to fight," he told his half-brother, "such as I've never felt before."

And the greater Ajax turned to him with an excited look: "By Olympus yes! I feel just the same. For heaven's sake let's face this bloody Hector and see if we can't finish him off, you and I!"

Meanwhile Hector rushed on, like a great rocky boulder that has been a long while loosened by constant rain till at length it breaks loose and comes thundering down, a vast fragment of a mountain, and it leaps as it rolls and the woods resound beneath it and nothing stops it till it reaches the level plain. There, despite its eagerness, it has to rest.

BOOK XIV

MEANWHILE OLD NESTOR and his wounded doctor-guest Machaon were enjoying some perfect wine after a perfect supper, both of which had been prepared for them by the beautiful Hecamede. But it was not long before the desperate and terrible struggle that was going on where Hector had crossed the ditch and the rampart and was approaching the ships reached the ears of the old man and his wounded guest. Nestor rose to his feet.

"You stay where you are," he told Machaon, "and, when you've finished the wine, our beautiful Hecamede will heat for you a warm bath and will wash all the blood and dirt from your body. But I must go and see what is happening."

Thus speaking, he picked up the nearest weapon he could lay his hand on, a fairly well-sharpened spear, and along with it his son's shield which was hanging on the wall, and, closing the tent's entrance, he walked up a neighbouring incline from which he could see and hear a lot. And the old man was horrified at what he heard. For it became clear to him at once that at the point where Hector was struggling towards the ships, the Greeks were giving way before him.

Old Nestor stood for a moment or two hesitating. He felt at that moment as if he were himself a wave of the sea, a wave that has suddenly and soundlessly risen up from the abysmal depths without knowing why, and which now, gathered to its full height, pauses in solitary elemental hesitation, waiting for the gale that is coming to decide in what direction it shall roll.

Thus did Nestor hesitate. Should he, with this second-rate spear of his own and his son's second-rate shield, betake himself as fast as his feet could carry him into this resounding fight, which might prove, for all he knew, the final death-struggle of the Greeks. Or should he go at once to announce to the leaders of their side, to Agamemnon and Menelaus and Odysseus and Diomed, what was happening? Each of these great specialists in war had been — at least that is what he had heard — wounded in some way, but not perhaps wounded so badly as to put an end to their fighting again. So hesitated old Nestor, like the crest of a wave that awaited some definite rush of the wind. Naturally enough, directed no doubt, in spite of his courage, by the burden of his years, he decided to go and seek the two sons of Atreus and, if possible, Odysseus and Diomed as well. Following this decision he went, and luckily enough found them all together. He was in fact met outside their tents by Agamemnon the son of Atreus, Odysseus the son of Laertes, and Diomed the son of Tydeus, all of whom had been wounded. Each of them was leaning heavily upon his spear and they were all able to see in the distance the desperate battle that was going on.

Agamemnon spoke at once.

"Well," he said, "we seem to be defeated in this war. Hector swore he would not return to the City till he had set fire to our ships and slain us all; and it looks as if his words were being fulfilled."

But Nestor answered, looking from one to another of them as he spoke: "What we've got to do now, we leaders of the rest, is to consider every available possibility still offered by this dangerous situation. We four are not by any means devoid of brains, and it is quite possible that, if we use our liveliest intelligence, we may yet devise some way out of this infernal crisis."

But Agamemnon, the greatest king among them, had evidently given up all hope.

"Come," he cried. "What we'd better do is this, and you must all obey me. Let us drag the ships out into the water before the night has fallen. Then let us moor them with stone at the ends of ropes, so as to keep them in place till dawn. And then, before our enemies have been roused from sleep, hoist our sails and, by our sails if there's wind, or by our oars if there's no wind, depart straight away to our dear native land! Better flee from ruin and escape than be caught and die!"

Then it was that with his massive brow furrowed with indignation, Odysseus, rich in wisdom, retorted:

"Son of Atreus! Aren't you ashamed to let such words pass the barred door of your teeth? O you accursed coward! Would to heaven you were the head of some unworthy rabble, rather than our king. Dare you actually suggest that we should ignominiously leave Troy unharmed, for the destruction of which your comrades have already endured so much? Hush, man, hush! No honest decent fellow ought to utter such words, far less a king like you, to whom we have so long done honour. Be silent! You should be ashamed of yourself!"

Then to him made answer Agamemnon, king of men:

"O Odysseus, Odysseus, you have indeed, and I confess it, stung my heart to the quick with your fully justified rebuke. O how I wish there were some man who would utter really wise counsel, whether he be old or young, that would be better than mine and that would really assist us at this juncture."

Then up spake Diomed.

"Right near you is that man! In fact I am that man: and I beg you two great ones not to be vexed or wroth with me if I speak up, though of course

I am far the youngest. But my father Tydeus—”

It was at this moment, while Diomed was beginning to say what he wanted to say, that I, the all-seeing Aether, felt impelled to intervene. I could so clearly see that this was one of those opportunities that a spirited young man like Diomed feels he must leap at: an opportunity to tell his formidable, famous, elderly companions all about his father Tydeus. Do not let anyone suppose that I, the divine Aether, am lacking in sympathy for a man’s devotion to his parents. It only is that, at this ticklish moment, when every second was of importance, I felt I simply couldn’t bear to listen to a filial rhapsody on the excellent Tydeus, whom, as his son reminded these two great rulers, the heaped-up earth now covered in Thebes. So what I, the undying Aether, proceeded to do, was to compress the speech of Diomed to these two great rulers into a very brief and very sensible adjuration.

“Let us all three,” I made him say, “wounded though we are, plunge straight into the battle! We can easily retire later so as to avoid more wounds, for wounds on wounds are certainly to be avoided. But at this particular moment to plunge into the struggle, wounds and all, ought to encourage our friends more than anything else we could do.”

Thus did I make the son of Tydeus speak; and the three of them hurried off, led by King Agamemnon. As I withdrew heavenward it rejoiced me to see that none other than the great Lord of all the oceans of the world had rushed up to them and seized Agamemnon by the hand.

“O King of Kings,” he cried, using words that were as cunning as they were inspiring, “now doth the wicked heart of Achilles rejoice as he beholdeth the slaughter and rout of the Greeks. But I swear to you, great King, you shall see them fleeing from the ships and the huts towards the city in wild terror. You shall see it, Great King!”

Saying this, the Shaker of the Earth shouted aloud. Not nine, no! not even ten thousand warriors could have raised such a cry had they all shouted together: and the sound of it put fresh heart into the Greeks. Now all these things did Hera, the wife and sister of Zeus and the sister of Poseidon the Earth-Shaker, behold from Olympus, and she felt a thrill of love for Poseidon and a spasm of hatred for her husband Zeus who was seated upon Mount Ida.

Then all of a sudden she made up her mind what to do. There was no need for me, the divine Aether, to put it into her head. It was indeed the sort of decision that only a woman, whether mortal or immortal, can make. She said to herself: “I will visit him at his seat on Mount Ida when I have made myself so lovely that he’ll want to make love to me at once. Then, when he is finally satisfied, I will leave him in so delicious and deep a sleep that he won’t know what’s going on for hours and hours.”

So she went to her own special chamber in Olympus, a chamber that had been so carefully constructed for her by her son Hephaestus, with doors that could be bolted so securely when once she was inside that nobody else, whether a god or goddess, or man or woman, could possibly enter. With ambrosia she cleansed her lovely body, and anointed herself with such exquisite perfume that its fragrance, by the time she moved across the brazen threshold of Zeus, would be inhaled through the air from Earth to Heaven. Then she combed her hair and arranged its shining tresses in perfect plaits about her head, and in her well-pierced ears she hung three jewelled ear-rings. Then she came forth from her chamber and called to her side Aphrodite, the daughter of Zeus.

“Will you do something for me, sweet child?” she pleaded. “Or are you too angry with me because we take opposite sides in this confounded war?”

"Tell me what it is," replied Aphrodite. "Yes, tell me, great daughter of Cronos! Speak what is in your mind; for my heart bids me fulfil it, if it is something that really can be fulfilled!"

Deep was the crafty cunning with which Queen Hera supplicated her.

"Give me now love and desire wherewith thou dost subdue all mortals and immortals; for I am going to visit the uttermost limit of the earth in order that I may see Oceanus, from whom the gods are sprung, and mother Tethys, even those two who lovingly nursed and cherished me in their halls when they had taken me from Rhea, when Zeus, whose voice goes everywhere, flung Cronos into the world below, to dwell deep down under the earth and far beneath the never-quiet sea. My purpose is to reconcile those two divided ones and to bring them together again to their marriage-bed, in the mutual love which moved in them at the beginning, before anger and wrath with each other rent their hearts apart. You can imagine, my dear child, how, if I really could join them together in love again, I should win their reverence and respect for ever and ever."

And laughter-loving Aphrodite answered her at once: "How can I refuse such a request from you, who sleep in the arms of the Lord of us all?"

Thus speaking, she took the infinitely powerful keston himanta, or enchanted girdle, which she wore round her waist and into which were woven the mystic threads of the innermost secrets of beguiling love; and this she handed to Hera; and this, with a smile of unspeakable satisfaction, that royal ox-eyed lady concealed beneath her breasts. Then Hera left Olympus and darted down through the yielding air to Pieria; then on across the snowy mountains and topmost peaks of Thrace, and from thence to Athos and across the waves of the sea, until she came to Lemnos. Here she met Sleep himself, Sleep the brother of Death, and, clasping him by the hand, she addressed him with imploring words.

"O Sleep, most powerful of all Beings known either to gods or men, if you will only lull great Zeus to sleep, when I have got him lying by my side in love, I will give you a golden throne wrought by my son, Hephaestus, a throne imperishable with a golden footstool for your feet, so that you can lie back at rest when you want to drink your wine at your ease. Will you, O divine Sleep, will you do this for me?"

Then Sleep made answer:

"Hera, daughter of great Cronos, had it been any other immortal god save Zeus, I would willingly accept your offer and lull him to sleep. But your husband, no! I cannot bring myself to do it! I would even do it to the great river Oceanus himself, the father of all of us immortal gods, yes, to Oceanus, with his innumerable streams that brought us all into existence. But to Zeus, no! On a similar occasion, when I did so, he began in a fury, when he awoke, throwing the gods about, from one end of Olympus to the other, and he would have thrown me into space if Night had not saved me, Night who in all ultimate issues dominates both gods and men."

Then queenly ox-eyed Hera plied him with a second offer. "Come, come, come! If you will do what I ask shall I tell you what I will do for you? I will give you one of the youthful Graces to wed; yes! to be your wife, namely Pasithea, for whom you have been secretly longing all your days."

At this offer the shock of ecstasy was so intense that Sleep was nearly paralysed. And as I, the immortal Aether, saw the two of them, standing together there, I knew I had been right to breathe the syllables "Pasithea" into the exquisitely moulded skull of my poor old half-blind Homer. No doubt left to himself he would have thought of another good offer for the great goddess to make, but I doubt if he could have thought of Pasithea, because the craving for this youngest of the Graces had been hidden in the depths of Sleep's many corridored soul for ages beyond computation. Of course when this idea had been breathed into Homer's head by me, and he had whispered it to Hera, the wise goddess knew in a flash that she'd got the key to the heart of the matter. And Sleep accordingly called upon her to swear by the waters of the Styx, and to lay one hand upon the Earth and the other upon the Sea, and to invoke all the Powers that are below with Cronos to be witness of the contract between them. And the great goddess Hera obeyed him and called by name upon every Titan below Tartarus to bear witness to her oath.

Then the two of them left Lemnos and Imbros, and clothed in mist went forth on their way. And they came to many-fountained Ida, the mother of wild beasts, and they swept across the forest-covered ridges till Sleep decided that he had better go no further for fear Zeus might perceive him. Having left Hera's side therefore, he climbed to the top of a pine, a pine so tall that its branch reached above the mist. Here he took to himself the likeness of a clear-voiced mountain bird, a bird that the gods call Chalcis and mortal men Cymindis.

But Hera went on to the top of Gargarus, where Zeus was seated. And behold! the moment his eyes rested upon her he loved her as he had not done since they first slept together, their dear parents knowing nothing of it.

"Hera, Hera!" he cried. "What are you doing? Where are your chariot and horses?"

With cunning artfulness the goddess answered: "They are at the foot of the mountains waiting for me. I am going to the ends of the Earth to visit the great River, the River Oceanus, our universal parent, and Mother Tethys, who together so lovingly nursed me and cherished me in their halls. I am thinking of bringing those two together again, for they used to love each other, and now they hate each other; and I have a sure instinct that I could reconcile them; and, if I did, you can depend upon it they would bless me forever."

"All right, Hera," murmured Zeus, quivering with longing to embrace her, "hereafter you can go to them and do just as you say; but at this moment, please, please, let us lie down in love together, here, here, just where we are! I tell you I've never loved anyone with the love I feel for you at this moment; no! not when I loved the wife of Ixion who gave birth to Perithous, equal to any of us in his wisdom; not when I loved Danaë, daughter of Acrisius, who gave birth to Perseus; no! not even, I swear it, when I loved the daughter of Phoenix who bare to me Minos and godlike Rhadamanthys! O no! O no! not even when I begat Heracles upon Alcmene, or Dionysus upon Semele! No! I swear to it, my enrapturing one, not when I loved Demeter or Leto; and let me tell you this too, not even when I first loved you, your own self, did I feel such an ecstasy of desire flood my whole being as I feel now at this minute."

Hera gazed at him.

"But do you think I would agree to our lying down together on the summit of this mountain in view of everyone?" Then he cried to her: "Fear not, O fear not, Precious One, lest any see us! I will cast over us such a thick golden cloud that it will hide us completely! No! not even Helios himself will be able to see us, though he has the most piercing sight of all!"

Then did the son of Cronos clasp her in his arms and beneath them the Earth caused fresh grasses to spring up and dewy lotus and crocus and hyacinth, as thick as they were tender, which separated them from the ground. Thus did the Father of us all, on topmost Gargarus, take his fill of love and its sweet ensuing slumber with his wife clasped in his arms.

But Sleep himself left them lying there and hastened down to the Greek ships to take word to the Enfolder and Shaker of the Earth. To him he spoke briefly and quickly.

“Hasten, O great Poseidon, with a free mind; for now you can, for a time anyway, give glory to the Greeks; since I have shed deep slumber upon our Heavenly Father, sated with delicious love.”

And Poseidon rejoiced at this good news and rushed forward with terrific shouts and still more terrific spear against Hector and the Trojans. The noise that went up from the battle now was beyond all imagination. It was more than the North Wind hurling itself against the raging waves, more than a blazing fire among the forest trees, more than a storm howling amid the oaks of a mountain. With the inspiration of Poseidon urging him on, Ajax, the great son of Telamon, rushed against Hector, and Hector hurled his huge spear full at his breast. To Hector’s dismay the spear point, although it smote the man above the heart, smote him where he was doubly protected by two layers of armour. Shocked by his weapon being thus miserably deflected from its purpose, Hector hastily drew back to avoid the return blow and escape his own fate; but it was not with a spear at all that Ajax retorted, but with a great stone picked up from the ground. With this he struck him full on the neck above the rim of his shield and made him spin round like a top. When finally great Hector fell to the earth, it can be easily believed how the Greeks rushed upon him, hoping to drag him away or wound him to death. But all the best of his Trojan friends rushed forward to guard him, Polydamas and Aeneas and Sarpedon and Glaucus. It was a group of these men who lifted him in their arms and carried him to his chariot, groaning heavily, and bore him away towards the city.

When they were come to the ford of Xanthus, that river which immortal Zeus himself begat, they lifted him from the chariot to the ground and poured water upon him. At this he opened his eyes and revived for a moment and kneeling down vomited, and what he vomited was black blood.

Then again he sank to the ground and his eyes closed and his consciousness was lost in darkness.

Hector’s withdrawal meant, for that day and night at least, the defeat of the Trojans; but the Greek who killed the greatest number of them then was not Ajax the son of Telamon, who had thrown that stone, but Ajax the son of Oïleus, who was the swiftest of them all on foot in the absence of Achilles and especially skilled in pursuing and killing those who fled.

BOOK XV

IT WAS NOT until Hector had been carried as far as the river Xanthus and had knelt there upon the earth vomiting dark blood that Zeus, the All-Father, awoke from where he lay on the summit of Ida by Hera's side.

Hastily he stood up and in one quick glance realised what was happening. In wild panic the Trojans were being chased from the ships across the palisades, and out of the ditch, and away towards the city. In a flash he perceived that Hera had been fooling him and he burst out furiously at her.

"Hera, you are a difficult creature to deal with! Don't you remember when I hung you from heaven with an anvil fastened to each of your feet? Vain was it for the gods to pity you and protest. Those that made such a stir — don't you remember it all? — I flung straight down from heaven to earth. And have you forgotten how, with the aid of the North Wind, you fooled the heroic Heracles, until he had involved himself in all those terrible labours? But listen to me now! If you are really now in a mood to do what I want done, go and call Iris to come here. Yes, and tell Apollo too that I desire to speak to him. Tell Iris that I shall bid her to go straight to Poseidon and make him cease from this war-business, and withdraw for a while to his own place. And tell Apollo that I shall make him restore Hector to his full health again and fill him with his former strength, so that he can drive the Greeks back to their ships just as he was doing when he was hit by that heavy stone. No doubt you will be glad to know, here and now, my full intention, nor is there any reason why I should conceal it from you, for I can see now that I have reminded you of my power over you and over all the rest, and that you will not dare to reveal it to a living soul. Hear therefore my purpose as to the climax and the end of this terrific war, and I think the secret knowledge within your heart of what I am going to bring to pass will give you that hidden feeling of superiority to other women, whether mortal or immortal, which is the greatest happiness a woman can know. In the end Patroclus shall slay my own son, Sarpedon, and Hector shall slay none other than Achilles' friend, Patroclus, with the result you can well imagine. Yes, the loss of the person he loves best in the entire world will do what all the entreaties of kings like Agamemnon, of gigantic heroes like Ajax the son of Telamon, of crafty philosophers like Odysseus the son of Laertes, could not do, that is to say, bring Achilles back into the battle. Here, as you can imagine, will be fought the grand determining duel of the whole war, and Achilles, after pursuing Hector round the walls of the city, of which he is the one irreplaceable champion, will finally kill him. After that, let me tell you, by nothing less than a crafty device of my incomparable daughter, Pallas Athene, the whole city will be destroyed, and with Helen restored to her husband, my divine predestination will be entirely fulfilled, and the oath fully kept which I made when I bowed my head in answer to the entreaties of Thetis."

Hearing this, Hera departed from the summit of Mount Ida; and fast as moves the mind of a man who has travelled over far lands and who thinks, "O would I were there, or there, or there!" so fast did she move, till she reached the summit of Mount Olympus.

The gods were preparing for a banquet when she arrived, and Themis ran to greet her, but was shocked by her obvious agitation.

"Hera!" she cried, "what in heaven's name is the matter?

You look absolutely dazed. The son of Cronos has frightened you, though he is your husband."

“You know, dear immortal Themis,” Hera replied, “what he is like, and what an implacable tyrant he is. I’ll tell you when you’ve all sat down what wicked things he’s going to do. It won’t please any of you, least of all any mortals who may by chance be among you, to hear these things; but I will tell you frankly.” Thus speaking, she smiled with her lips, but her forehead was knitted with inward wrath. “It’s no use,” she went on, “being angry with him, for he is stronger than the lot of us and he sits apart from us. All that we’ve got to do is to content ourselves with the particular evil thing he throws upon each of us. For instance, he’s quite recently sent a terrible sorrow upon Ares, whose son, Ascalaphus, has perished in battle.”

When he heard this, great Ares smote his thighs and cried out:

“Blame me not, but I swear I’ll start off at once down to the ships to avenge my son’s death! And I don’t care if Zeus does strike me with his thunderbolt and I lie in blood and dust among the dead!”

Crying thus, he bade his attendants, who were Deimos, or Terror, and Phobos, or Wild Flight, harness his horses, and he fiercely clamped upon his own body his golden armour and rushed out. But in a moment the wise Pallas Athene, foreseeing all the tumult in heaven that would ensue from this, darted after him and snatched the helm from his head and the shield from his shoulders and the great bronze spear from his hand.

“Madman!” she cried. “Are your wits gone altogether? Are you beside yourself? Don’t you realise that the Heavenly Father will come and lay hands on us all, one by one, innocent and guilty alike?” Then, when she had made Ares relax upon his throne, she called upon Apollo and Iris. “Go, you two,” she bade them; “go straight to the peak of Gargarus, upon Mount Ida, and when you get there do exactly what the Father of Heaven bids you to do.”

Apollo and Iris promptly obeyed, and at the sight of them the wrath of Zeus ebbed away.

“Go you to Poseidon,” he told Iris, “and command him from me to cease from battle and either join the other gods of Olympus or go back into the glittering sea. Tell him that if he doesn’t obey my words he shall soon learn which of us two is the elder.”

Fast as hail or snow driven by the North Wind, Iris sped down and sought and found the Shaker of the Earth, and gave him the message from Zeus. But I, the immortal Aether, was also there, for I have always been very partial to Iris, and I wanted her to realise, as it would help her in her work as the Messenger of Zeus, what exactly the position was between these two brothers. So I shot one of my pure white-light flashes into the heart of Poseidon to make him burst out, as he accordingly did.

“O popoi!” he cried.

Now this particular cry I, the deathless Aether, always regard as the cry of all the simplest and least human intelligences in the world. It strikes me as the eternal tragic protest of what we call the Inanimate. I imagine it to be the sad, wise, helpless refrain of rocks and stones and pebbles, when they contemplate the excited goings-on of men and animals and birds and fishes and reptiles. “O popoi!” they cry, “when will this mad gala-play, under the direction” — as I will find a poet to tell the world some day— “of the ‘vast formless things that move the scenery to and fro and flap from out their condor-wings invisible woe’, come to its everlasting finale?”

“Three brothers are we,” roared the wrathful god of the ocean, “yes! three brothers, begotten by Cronos and born of Rhea, namely Zeus, myself and Hades, lord of the dead below. When the lots were shaken I won for my share the grey sea to be my dwelling forever. Hades won the enormous and terrible darkness below everything. And Zeus won the boundless sky with its air and clouds and rain and thunder. Let him keep his threats," roared the ruler of the ocean, "with his winds and his blasts and his thunderbolts, for his own children! Let him order them about and frighten them! Tell him from me that I will not be bullied by him who is, after all, only my brother and my equal sharer in the Cosmos."

Then, as all the world can imagine, I, the divine Aether, put into the mind of my pupil Iris the right answer to all this foam.

"Do you really, O Earth-Enfolder, you god with hair dark as the depths of the sea, suppose that I'm going to carry back to the Father of us all a defiant message like this? Come, come, come! change your mind, as the best of us can, my good sir! I know you are his brother, but do not the terrible judges of us all, the unanswerable Erinyes, always support the elder among us?"

Thus Iris, with my help, won entirely in this dispute, and Poseidon admitted it.

"O goddess Iris," he sighed, "you are the wise one. What a great thing it is when a Messenger has real understanding. Well, so be it. For the present time I yield to my elder brother. But listen to me, Iris. If in spite of me and of Athene and of Hera and of Hermes and of Hephaestus, he spare Ilios, let him know this, that between us two there will be anger that nothing, I say nothing, can ever take away."

Having thus spoken as his deepest heart bade him speak at the challenge of Iris, who was at that moment completely under the power of myself, the everlasting Aether, Poseidon plunged into the sea and vanished, leaving Apollo standing alone before his father Zeus.

And Zeus laid upon him two tasks to fulfil. What he had first to do was to shake against the Greeks that most deadly of all threats, nothing less than Zeus's aigida thussanoessan or "tasselled Aegis." And the second thing he had to do was to put fresh strength into Hector, in fact to breathe such power into him as he had never possessed before.

It did not take long for Phoebus Apollo to accomplish both these things. Soon were the Greeks, or, as Homer prefers to call them, the Achaeans, trembling with apprehension, and soon was Hector rushing against them, across the great ditch, over the great barricade, and before him went the fiery cloud that Apollo had wrapped round himself as he brandished the All-Father's Aegis with its appalling tassels. Hector's rush forward was like that of an impetuous stallion that has broken out of its stall and away from its manger and, with its huge mane floating in the wind above its head, is charging desperately to the pastures of the quiet mares. It was not so very long before Hector was close to the ships. He had to turn once as he advanced to utter reverberating threats and curses upon those of his followers who, greedy for gold and silver, had stopped to strip the dead they had slain. Finally, Hector himself actually reached the ships, and when he had done so he laid his hand on the upright sign at the stern of one of the finest of them, in fact the very one that had brought Protesilaus to Troy but was not destined to carry him back again. Meanwhile, that heroic and majestic warrior, Ajax the son of Telamon, was pacing up and down in front of the ships and sometimes, even, when the ships were close, from ship to ship.

And he kept imploring his brother Teucer to aim one of his deadly never-failing arrows at Hector; but at last Teucer had to confess to him what Apollo had done. Teucer did not know what god had done it, but was forced in honesty to admit to his brother that some deity had so mangled his bow-string as to render it useless. It was then that Ajax invented for himself a perfect weapon for the job he had undertaken, namely a long pike over twenty cubits in length, and with this he kept jumping from ship to ship and driving off the Trojans as they tried to set fire to the vessels’ hulls, and he now implored Teucer to throw down the bow in the interior of his hut and to arm himself with helm, spear and shield. Meanwhile the Trojans, led by both Hector and Apollo, were steadily advancing, and as to what was left of the rampart between the ditch and the ships, Apollo seemed to be treating it very much as children treat a fortress they have made of sand on the sands of the sea, which they enjoy destroying even more than they enjoy erecting!

“Be men, be men, for the sake of our homes and our wives and children!” cried Ajax, spearing with his long spike one Trojan after another who came with a torch close to any of the ships. In the end there were no less than twelve men who were wounded too badly for them to fight any more by that twenty-cubits-long pike of his.

BOOK XVI

In the midst of all this tumult Patroclus came up to Achilles shedding such a torrent of tears that it was like a flood of dark water pouring down from an overhanging cliff.

"O Patroclus," Achilles cried, "why are you crying like a little girl, a tiny toddler, who runs at her mother's side and begs her to take her up and clutches at her gown and hinders her steps and fearfully looks up at her till her mother takes her up? Have you something to tell our Myrmidons or me, or has some bad news come to you from Phthia, something that you alone have heard? Or are you sorrowing for the Argives who are being slain by their own foolishness? Out with it! Hide not from me."

Then did Patroclus answer:

"O Achilles, son of Peleus, mightiest of us all, do not be wroth with me, but I cannot bear it any longer! Smitten is the son of Tydeus, that great fighter Diomed; wounded are Odysseus and Agamemnon, and wounded too is Eurypylus with an arrow in his thigh. Pitiless one, thy father wasn't Peleus, nor was Thetis thy mother, but the grey sea bare thee to the over-shadowing cliffs! How can you hold in your heart such anger? hold it until your very valour has become a curse to us all? But listen to me now; if so be you are fearing some oracle, or some augury that your mother has brought to you from Zeus, let me, your worshipper, me your adoring friend, me who know all about the wrong you suffered, put on your armour now and rush into the fight in all your habiliments! For if I am arrayed in your things, things that all the hosts of friends and enemies know well to be yours, I feel assured that the rank and file on both sides will take me for you.

And this I know for certain would so hearten us Argives that we should all hurl ourselves into battle with a sort of rapture, each saying in his heart, Achilles has joined us! Achilles is leading us! Achilles has overcome his wrath!"

So did Patroclus cry to his friend with tears still running down his cheeks; and I, the immortal Aether, who had put this idea into his head purely to ease his grief, was shocked when I saw that Achilles was going to grant him his desire. Fool that Patroclus was! But it was too late now to give him any presentiment that this madness was the prologue to his death! And so I left Achilles to give his friend leave to wear his armour, this armour which all the fighters on both sides would recognise at once, though the face of the man wearing it would be hidden under the helm. But I hovered about the pair of them for a while, hoping that the mysterious goddess Tyche, or Chance, would intervene in some unexpected way before it was too late. And I confess I was surprised by the unworthy thoughts that I saw plainly, as I threw my searching white light of infallible insight upon that proud heart, flickering across the consciousness of Achilles the son of Peleus, and I did what I could to let people realise the honesty and goodness of Patroclus compared with the vanity, the malignant vengeance, the unscrupulous arrogance that filled the other's breast. What Achilles now said would certainly have revealed all this to anybody less innocent and simple-minded than Patroclus.

"When you have driven them away from the ships, don't fail to come back straight to me. Don't follow them further. Don't drive them to the city walls. No, no! Come back straight here; for if you go on fighting near the city, someone may possibly recognise you and, if they did, I should of course lose something, not much but something, from my full account of glory."

I cannot tell what the simple-minded Patroclus felt when he heard these words, but I took good care to report them to my bard Homer, so that posterity would know that, though Achilles was the fastest runner and far the most formidable fighter of all the Greeks, he was not to be compared with his friend Patroclus in honesty and goodness of heart.

So Patroclus clothed himself from head to foot in the armour of Achilles; but one thing he did not take, simply because he lacked the strength to use it, namely the great ashen spear that the Centaur Cheiron had given to Peleus and which had come from the peak of Pelion. But Automedon was ordered to yoke the mortal horse Pedasus with the two immortal horses whose mother was the Harpy, Podarge, and their father Zephyrus, the West Wind. And then, once in the chariot of Achilles and driving the unearthly horses of Achilles, Patroclus slaughtered the Trojans in heaps upon heaps. Patroclus kept encircling them and sweeping them this way and that, like a tempest in harvest time when Zeus pours down his rain and rolls down his floods in his wrath against the false courts of law that give crooked and tricky and unfair judgments in the places of assembly.

But when Sarpedon the son of Zeus saw with horror the havoc that Patroclus was making, for Sarpedon was an ally of the Trojans, he leapt from his chariot to challenge him. And Patroclus, the moment he saw him, did the same. And as two vultures on a towering rock use their beaks and claws against each other, so did Patroclus and Sarpedon meet.

And Zeus, beholding this encounter, cried aloud to his wife Hera: “O woe! woe! woe! Why, O why, is it fated that my son Sarpedon, the one and only man in the whole universe whom I really love, should be killed by Patroclus?” And as he cried in the misery of his heart, Zeus thought to himself: “What use is it, what advantage is it, to be the ruler of gods and men, if I cannot save my own son, my own darling son, when a cruel destiny, an implacable keer, condemns him to death? What is this hidden force? Is it ‘Moira’, Fate? is it ‘Anangkee’, Necessity? What is this hidden, secret, baleful power that dominates gods as well as men? I almost wish I could ask my father, deep-plotting Cronos, about this power. I warrant he would know! But there it is! I have flung him into Tartarus along with those very giants from which he saved our mother Rhea when he cut out the testicles of Ouranos! O woe! O woe! O woe! How can I save my darling son from this cruel Fate, this pitiless keer, that is going to fling him into the kingdom of Hades?”

Then did Hera, the wife of Zeus, make an effort to soothe her husband’s anguish.

“Remember, O Ruler of all,” she pleaded, “that your son Sarpedon is a mortal man, long ago sentenced to death by destiny, and if you go out of your way to save him, I tell you, Almighty One, and don’t forget my words, there’ll be many another among us immortals with an offspring in this bloody war who’ll start at once trying to save his child from death. Father of all, I tell you this: if you start meddling with everlasting Fate, something may happen that none of us dream of. No! No! But listen; when his soul has left him, send painless Sleep and peaceful Death to bear his body away to Lycia, where his kinsfolk can bury him nobly with Mound and Pillar, as is due to the dead.”

So spoke Hera, and the Father of all failed not to obey. But he did allow himself to send down upon earth a shower of bloody raindrops to express his feeling for his dead son.

Before Patroclus slew him, however, Sarpedon slew Pedasus, the mortal horse, the third horse pulling the chariot which Patroclus was driving. Sarpedon’s spear went through Pedasus’ right shoulder, and the horse groaned piteously, breathing its last, while it crashed down in the dust and its spirit left its body. Patroclus might have been in a serious plight after Pedasus was dead, for the other two horses were plunging and rearing and entangling the reins between them and pulling in contrary directions. But Automedon had the sense to draw his sword, and with the aid of its blade he severed the reins that had guided Pedasus and succeeded in extricating the other two horses from the knot in which they were getting fatally entangled. Driving on then in his high spirits, Patroclus reached the wall of Troy, and the thought must have throbbed in his mind that it was his destiny in the armour of Achilles to break into the city. But he soon encountered the great god Apollo himself, who was as much the son of Zeus as was Sarpedon, and Apollo with his own immortal hands turned him back.

And at that moment it was that Hector came driving towards him with Cebriones, a bastard son of King Priam, acting as his charioteer. Face to face at last with Hector, it suddenly came into the mind of Patroclus what he would do, and he leapt out of his chariot to the ground. Once on the ground, Patroclus picked up a jagged stone that happened to be lying there and with his feet firmly planted on the earth he flung it at Hector's advancing chariot driven by the bastard son of Priam, the grave Cebriones. The stone struck Cebriones on the forehead so near to his eyes that both his eyes fell to the ground and, like a diver, he took a "header" after them and was dead the second he touched earth.

I, the immortal Aether, was, as you may imagine, watching these events with intense interest, and, knowing how near to his own end Patroclus was, I decided to awake in him an unbecoming, unworthy, vulgar vein of jocular facetiousness; and it was in this mood that he shouted aloud: "Look at the fellow diving! How well, O look how well, this man can dive, just as if he were after oysters at the bottom of the sea! See how good at diving these Trojans are!"

Hector, hearing this ugly vaunt, leapt out of his chariot too, and, clasping the corpse of Cebriones by the head, tried to pull him away. Patroclus, however, clung tightly to the feet of the dead man; and both of them tugged like mad, one against the other.

It was the Trojan Euphorbus, a terrible expert with the spear, who now struck Patroclus; and Patroclus drew hastily back, avoiding fate. But in a second Hector was after him and soon had him, helpless and gasping for breath, under his feet. And as Patroclus lay dying at his feet Hector taunted him ruthlessly.

“Vultures are the ones who will enjoy thee, little master! I warrant Achilles told you not to return till you had reddened my tunic with my heart’s blood! I wager that’s just what he said to you, little man! And now see what has happened as the result of his persuading you to face me, silly idiot that you are!”

But the dying Patroclus answered him with his last breath: “Boast away, Hector! Boast away, to your heart’s content! It wasn’t you, it was Apollo, who knocked off the helm of Achilles from my head. Yes, it was first Apollo and then Euphorbus who slew me. You are only the third. So there is nothing very much in my death for you to boast about. And another thing I will tell you, and keep it in your heart, O mighty boaster! — you yourself won’t be living much longer. For Achilles will, before very long, finish you off.”

He had only just stopped speaking when his soul, lamenting its fate at leaving life while still so young, fled down into Hades. Then Hector murmured to himself: “Ah, but who can tell? Perhaps after all it will be Achilles himself, the son of Thetis, who will perish beneath my spear!”

BOOK XVII

IT WAS NOT long after the death of Patroclus, and while his body, stripped of the armour of Achilles, was still the centre of this desperate struggle, that Hector decided what he would do. He halted a group of Trojans who were carrying this precious armour to Troy, and hurriedly clothed himself in it, letting his comrades carry his own armour back to his own house. Having done that, Hector became more terrifying than ever and seemed able to slay every Danaan warrior he approached; while Ajax, son of Telamon, and Menelaus, son of Atreus, did what they could to save the body of Patroclus from being mutilated by the Trojans or dragged off to the city to be devoured by dogs. Hector had indeed become like one obsessed by some Enyalian demonism of murderous slaughter. Zeus, the Almighty Director of all the chief events, could not bring himself to let down Hector's glory in any way at all.

"Poor wretch!" the Father of us all murmured tenderly to his own heart. "How little he knows how soon he will be sent down to Hades by the invincible son of Peleus!"

And then the great god of all gods was moved by something that stirred him to compassion more than anything else that had yet happened in this terrible war — namely, by the heart-breaking sorrow of the two immortal horses given to Achilles by his father, Peleus, who had received them from Zeus himself. And now Zeus beheld these two immortal steeds weeping dark torrents of tears because of the death of Patroclus. And such streams of tears did these immortal creatures shed that their beautiful manes got entangled with their harness and their heads drooped so low that it seemed as though they were both crouching on the earth.

You can believe that I, the immortal Aether, missed nothing of all this, and indeed I was especially careful that my darling bard should not fail to record it, because I had already decided that in the far future I should inspire a particular poet in a remote island of the West to celebrate the tragedy of a mortal man being loved and forbidden to die by an immortal goddess. I speak, as you may guess, of Tithonus, wedded to the sacred Dawn. The truth is that I, the immortal Aether, alone know that the most tragical thing that can happen in the whole cosmos is this union of mortality with immortality. Therefore, as you can imagine, nothing pleased me more than when Zeus himself put new strength and life and spirit into these two horses, so that they rushed through the Trojan ranks home, home, home, towards the huts and the ships, dragging the chariot after them and driven by Automedon.

Then it was that Ajax and Menelaus discussed together the best way of getting the naked body of Patroclus back to the ships, and they decided that Menelaus and his friend Meriones should carry the corpse home, while Ajax, son of Telamon, and his half-brother, Ajax, son of Oïleus, should follow just behind them driving off all the Trojans who sought to touch the sacred body they carried. It was into the mind of Ajax that the thought first came that they must send some fleetfooted companion to carry the news of the death of Patroclus to Achilles. But just then it was so terribly dark that it was impossible to see anything, and the great Ajax prayed desperately to Zeus to clear the sky. The Father of all did not fail to notice that as he prayed Ajax wept, and a real pity for the great man entered his heart and he promptly answered his prayer, making all the horizons clear of mist.

Then it was that Menelaus left them to go upon that difficult task of finding just the right messenger to hasten on foot to Achilles with the news that his best friend, his only intimate friend, was dead and that his own precious armour was in the hands of that terrible war-man Hector. He soon discovered the man he wanted, Antilochus, the son of Nestor, and after startling and shocking him with the awful news and watching him depart at an incredibly swift run, he returned to help Meriones carry the body to the ships.

BOOK XVIII

ACHILLES WAS STANDING alone close to his favourite ship, pondering sadly in his mind when Antilochus, the son of Nestor, reached him. I, the immortal Aether, had restrained myself from giving him the least hint of what was coming, because I was very anxious to watch just how Antilochus would tell him the terrible news and just how Achilles would receive it from him. Well, I must confess that my mania for watching heart-rending emotions was more than satisfied on this occasion. I think, however, that, as sometimes happens, some inkling of the tragic blow he was going to receive had reached Achilles through the air, for the blackness of the vessel's side against which he stood, and the harsh noise of the fighting, and the broken, desperate gulfs of the lurid clouds, seemed to the mind of the son of Peleus only the dark, outstretched arm of an unutterable horror.

Antilochus told him the news in a voice broken with sobs; and no sooner had he heard it than Achilles flung himself on the ground and began furiously clutching at the sand, which had been blackened by the ships' black paint, and pressing it against his head with both his fists. When in addition to this he began tearing out his blackened hair, Antilochus could bear it no longer and, kneeling down at this side, he clasped both his hands, pressing them into the sand behind the head they had defiled.

Then Achilles began moaning and groaning in so appalling a way that his mother Thetis heard him from her beautiful cave at the bottom of the sea. Antilochus still held desperately to the man's hands, for he feared he would suddenly draw a knife from his belt and cut his own throat. And so must his mother have feared, for she shrieked aloud so piteously that all her

Nereid sisters, daughters like herself of Nereus, the Old Man of the Sea, gathered hurriedly round her. Quickly came Glauce and Thaleia and Cymodoce, Nesaea and Speio and Thoë and ox-eyed Halië and Cymothoë and famous Galatea, and many other Nereids that lived at the bottom of the sea. And they all beat their breasts while their sister Thetis uttered her lamentation.

"Woe, woe, woe!" she cried, "all is sorrow and woe! I bore him, this precious child! I reared him with exquisite care! I let him sail to Ilios in a grand ship with a beautiful prow curved like a perfect horn of ivory! And now he is miserable, sobbing on the ground with woe unspeakable! Well! I'll go straight to him! That's all I can do. But that much I will do, O at once! at once!"

And with her, as she left the sea, went all her sister Nereids, from ox-eyed Halië to renowned Galatea. And when Thetis came to the side of her son Achilles, as he lay moaning and groaning on the ground, she clasped his head with a shrill wail.

"O what is it? Tell me, tell me! Hide it not from your Mother. Your great wish has been brought to pass, hasn't it? Hasn't it? That the sons of the Achaeans should do you the greatest honour by being huddled up in ignominious shame at the sterns of their ships because you wouldn't help them?"

And Achilles groaned in answer, "But what do I get from that now, Mother? For my dearest comrade is dead, even Patroclus, whom I honoured above all, even as my own self. And not only so, but Hector is now wearing the perfect armour given to me by the gods themselves. And now you yourself, my Mother, will suffer woe immeasurably, for I swear to you I will not live a day till I have first slain Hector!"

But his mother answered with floods of tears: “But doomed to a speedy death you are anyway, my precious child, for as you know by a decree of that keer with which you were born, that primal destiny which all mortals must accept, when once Hector is dead, your own death will not be far off.”

Then, stirred to the depths of his being by bitter emotion, Achilles cried aloud: “May I die! May I die since I was not at his side to aid him before he was slain! Far from his native land he fell, and I was not at his side to help him! What am I now, my dear Mother, but a profitless burden upon the earth?”

“But you forget, my dear,” pleaded silver-footed Thetis, “that your enemy Hector has got your precious armour which the gods gave to Peleus, your father. Now listen to me, my sweet child. Don’t go into the battle again today. But tomorrow, at the rising of the Sun, I will return to you and bring fresh armour for you from the lord Hephaestus in Olympus.”

Thus speaking she turned away from him.

“Back, back,” she cried to her sister Nereids, “to our palace-cave in the deep! And, O sisters of mine!” she cried, “tell the whole story to our own dear father, the Old Man of the Sea!”

Thus speaking silver-footed Thetis flew upwards to the peak of Olympus.

But meanwhile a terrible struggle was going on above the body of Patroclus. Hector had now got hold of the head of the dead man, while the two Ajaxes held his feet. It had become very hard for the two Ajaxes to continue this frantic struggle, because the crowd of Trojan spearmen had thickened around them, and the moment seemed not far off when Hector and his friends would win, and drag the body back to Troy to be devoured by dogs.

Seeing the nearness of this danger, I, the immortal Aether, put into the head of Hera to send down, unknown to Zeus, the messenger Iris straight to Achilles.

“I have come,” said Iris to him, “at the request of Hera and Pallas Athene. Zeus knows nothing about it. But those two goddesses want you to know that if you don’t act at once before night falls, Hector will carry the corpse of Patroclus into the city for them to mutilate and dishonour at their pleasure.”

“How shall I act?” asked Achilles, in a desperately troubled voice.

“The two goddesses told me to tell you,” replied Iris, “that if you go to the trench and defy the Trojans, shouting in your lordliest tones, they will extemporize for you such startling and fiery armour that it will make your enemies retreat in a panic and the body of your friend will be carried to the ships and laid at your feet.”

Achilles obeyed like lightning, and over his shoulder he bound the Aegis, with all its deadly tassels flapping in the twilight, and from his head he felt a fiery cloud was burning so high that it seemed to be mounting up to heaven! And as he shouted his terrific threats against the Trojans, his voice seemed to roll in such terrible reverberations that even Hector dropped the head of Patroclus and fell back in sudden retreat. Three times across the trench Achilles shouted, while Athene’s Aegis gleamed from his shoulders and the fiery crest of his imaginary helmet ascended into the sky. Naturally alarmed by this terrible shout, to which Athene herself contributed the wide-echoing tones of her own voice, and appalled by the illusion of fire mounting up from a helmet that had no real existence, Hector and all his companions retreated; and the corpse of Patroclus was safely carried to Achilles’ feet.

Meanwhile the Trojans held a great conference outside the city’s walls, and the wise Polydamas, the son of Panthous, strongly advised them to rest in their gathering place for that night, as darkness was not far off.

“Let us,” he implored them, “draw back now and take our rest. I tell you, my friends, this appalling son of Peleus is far too masterful to stay near his ships, content with fighting us there. It is for our city he will fight and for our wives! So let us tonight keep all our warriors within this camp, for our city is guarded by its mighty walls and well-barred gates; but when morning dawns, let us enter the city and take our stand upon the walls.”

Furiously did Hector retort to the words of his friend, who was born the same day as he was: “Enter the city, do you say? Stand on the walls, do you say? No! No! No! A thousand times no! Tomorrow we will rush again at their accursed ships! And as to Achilles, by the gods, I will stand up to him face to face. And perhaps I shall be the winner and not he! Alike to all is Ares, when in his Enyalian mood he is only absorbed in killing killers!”

Thus spoke Hector and all the Trojans applauded — fools that they were! Pallas Athene must have turned them into idiots, to go on praising Hector, who was talking nonsense, and to pay no regard to Polydamas, who was giving them really wise advice!

Meanwhile the body of Patroclus was brought into the tent of Achilles.

“There shall be no burial for you, my friend,” swore the son of Peleus, “until I have brought here the head and the armour of Hector, yea! and have cut the throats before the funeral pyre of twelve of their best warriors in my wrath at your being dead.”

So speaking, godlike Achilles bade his comrades put a huge tripod on the fire so that they might wash from Patroclus all his blood stains. And they put the tripod on the fire and filled it with water and added more and more wood beneath it. Then, when the water boiled, they washed him and anointed him with oil, filling his wounds with ointment. And all night long the Myrmidons made lamentation for Patroclus. Nor by this time was Zeus ignorant of what was happening.

"You've had your way, ox-eyed Hera! Anyone would suppose that all these long-haired Achaeans were your own children!"

And Hera answered: "What a thing to say! Why, any mortal man does what he can for another man; then how wouldn't I, the wife of the greatest of the gods, do something against these Trojans?"

Meanwhile Thetis arrived at the astonishing house of Hephaestus, made by him for himself entirely of bronze. He was very busy when she arrived, and sweating hard as he worked with all his bellows. For he was making tripods that had golden wheels beneath them that they might of themselves enter any gathering of the immortals and then return as he chose to bid them, an absolute miracle to see! What I, the immortal Aether, never failed to note about each of these inventions of Hephaestus, in fact about every object in his house, was that it was endowed with a curious sort of consciousness and personality of its own. And I have often wondered how far this strange personality of inanimate things extends. No mortal, no immortal, can conceal his or her inmost thoughts and feelings from me. But I often confess to myself, though to nobody else, that the question as to how far individual objects of common use and handled daily by both gods and men acquire as time goes on, or perhaps possess from the moment when they are first made, a conscious personality of their own, comparable, though in a different degree, with what we ourselves possess as persons, is a recurrent riddle.

All speculation in the mind of Thetis, as she entered this extraordinary dwelling where such astounding creatures were being made, must have soon ceased to be speculation, for the personal life in these inanimate objects was so enhanced by the genius of Hephaestus that from illusion it became reality, and the thing in question, from being an object, became an entity. When she entered this unique abode she was at once greeted by the lovely wife of Hephaestus, Charis, who always wore about her shoulders a gleaming white veil.

"Wherefore," she cried, clasping her by the hand, "art thou come to our house, an honoured and welcome guest? This is most unusual, for you have not been wont to come. Follow me this way, that I may entertain you properly." Thetis followed her, and very soon Charis placed her in a silver-studded chair, beautifully carved, and with a lovely footstool for her feet. With a clear voice then did Charis call for her lord: "Come! Come! Quickly come, Hephaestus! Here is Thetis! Thetis has need of thee."

And from the midst of his anvils and bellows and bronze and silver creations, Hephaestus called back: "I will come at once! I will come at once! It was Thetis and Eurynome, daughter of backward-flowing Oceanus, who let me live with them for nine years, when my mother was ashamed of me because of my lame foot. With them, in those nine years, I made brooches and arm-bands and necklaces and ornaments of every kind, safely protected in that cave with the murmur and the foam of Oceanus always around me, a flood unspeakable." Thus speaking, he gathered all his tools together and put them away carefully in a silver chest. Then he sponged his sweating forehead and hairy chest and put on a tunic and came limping with his heavy body and thin legs to where Thetis was seated. As he came stumbling towards her, she noticed he was supported by tall, girlish figures made entirely of gold. These figures he had created to be his maidens and he so made them that they possessed, as everything seemed to do in this extraordinary abode, lively intelligence and capacity. When he reached Thetis he clasped her by the hand, just as Charis had done, and begged her to say what he could do for her.

“Speak what is in your mind. My heart bids me fulfil it, if fulfil it I can, and if it be a thing that can be fulfilled?”

And Thetis couldn’t help bursting into tears as she answered him, for his voice had real kindness in it though his figure was so absurdly grotesque.

“O Hephaestus, Hephaestus!” she sobbed, “I tell you there’s no goddess in Olympus who has had to bear all the miseries and sorrows that the son of Cronos has thrust on me! It was wholly against my will that I had to endure being ravished by Peleus. I tell you I couldn’t bear it, a goddess of the foaming deep and a daughter of the Old Man of the Sea, to have to be ravished in the bed of a mortal man! The only girl my son ever loved was taken away from him, and now his only really devoted friend has been killed by Hector, who is now wearing my son’s armour which he had lent to this dead friend. In any case the keer, or death-fate, of my darling son dooms him to perish shortly. The day of his doom is to follow the death of Hector, who just now is glorying in his strength and in the slaughter of the Achaeans. That is why, O great Hephaestus, I have come to you. Yes, I have come to beg you to make for my dear child such armour as neither side in this wretched war has ever seen or will ever see! Yes, that is what I have come to beg and implore you, O great Hephaestus, to make for him tonight, so that I may dart down to him with them tomorrow morning at sunrise, helmet, shield and all the rest, which things, when he puts them on, will cause every Trojan now bringing fire to the ships to take flight to the city!”

Then the god with the strongest and most creative arms this world has ever seen, or will ever see, answered her at once.

“Cheer up! cheer up, dear silver-footed one! I will go to work at once, and such armour will you take to your son as the world has never yet seen, and never will see, until the end of time!”

So saying, he left her where Charis had placed her, and returned to his smithy. And he set his bellows, twenty in all, working at the fire. And on the fire he put bronze and tin and gold and silver, and he took in one hand a huge hammer and in the other the tongs. The first thing he set to work at was the shield. Upon this he depicted the Earth and the Sea and the Sun and the Moon and the Pleiades and the Hyades and mighty Orion and the Bear or the Wain that circles ever in his place and watches Orion and alone has no part in the baths of ocean. And upon the shield he also made two cities, each of them worthy to be described as, one day after three thousand years have passed, I, the immortal Aether, will inspire a poet, deeply influenced by my Homer, to describe them to all those mortals in those after-days who read his poetry. One city was partly full of dancers and flute-players and bridal feasts, with women watching the sport from their front doors, and partly absorbed in a desperate court-trial wherein the decision of the judges about the blood price of a murdered man was dividing the people into two opposing mobs. The other city was the scene of a great siege, both gods and men contending on both sides. To guard the walls of the besieged city were the dear wives and little children and old men too weak to fight, while the warriors of the city laid an ambush for the besiegers. But no ambush could stop the battle; for first on one side and then on the other three terrible beings were contending, namely Eris, or Strife, Kudoimos, or Tumult, and Keer, or the final Destiny of Death.

Then round the outskirts of the second city thus engraved and embossed on this enormous shield, Hephaestus allowed himself his full fling as a pictorial creator and described a perfect harvest scene with some farm-workers cutting the wheat with sharp sickles in their hands, and others binding what had been cut into bundles, while the King of the place stood in silent satisfaction, his sceptre in his hand, watching how one after another the sheaves were arranged in order. Meanwhile, beneath a neighbouring oak, the heralds were busy preparing a mid-day feast for the workers with the body of a newly sacrificed ox. Nearby he carved upon this huge shield a magnificent vineyard with its grapes already in heavy clusters, while in the midst of a group of young dancers and of maidens carrying the fruit in baskets there was one beautiful boy-singer whose privilege it was to sing the Linos Song, that beautiful lament for the death of the young god of Spring. Then, further afield, the great artist Hephaestus depicted herdsmen defending their flocks from a pair of murderous lions who had just dragged down an enormous bull who was mightily bellowing under the sharp claws of the savage beasts. Finally, round the whole rim of the shield, this perfect artist fashioned a mighty dancing floor like the one Daedalus once made for Ariadne. And here this great designer carved a lovely company of dancers, youths in exquisite tunics and maidens in white linen, beautiful chaplets on their heads, while the youths had golden daggers hanging from silver belts. And to make the dance more exciting, Hephaestus created two tumblers who whirled to and fro in the midst of them. And when the great shield was completed, he wrought for Achilles greaves for his shins of flexible tin and a splendid helmet with a crest of gold that shone as brightly as fire.

And all this Hephaestus laid before the feet of Thetis, and she without delaying a second longer in the House of the Lame Deity, flew down from snowy Olympus carrying all this precious armour in her arms.

BOOK XIX

DAWN WAS RISING crocus-yellow that morning from the streams of ocean when Thetis brought to her son this incomparable armour. She took her son's hand in her own.

"O my sweet child," she cried, "we must leave this man now to go the way of all flesh. But since you are alive and strong, look, look, look, I implore you, at the armour Hephaestus has made for you! For never in the history of man has such armour been seen; and never will the like of it be seen again."

And sure, when he saw these things and caressed them with his fingers, the eyes of Achilles blazed again with that terrible war-fury which before this had obsessed him. But when he answered his mother, he very quickly explained to her the thoughts that were now tormenting him. They were thoughts concerning what would happen to this body of Patroclus in the natural process of corruption.

"Flies," he cried to Thetis, "flies will gather round his dear precious wounds and give birth there to horrible worms that will feed upon my darling friend's corrupting flesh."

"Hush, hush, my dearest child!" said his mother calmly. "I swear to you I will myself see to it that though he lies dead for a whole year his precious flesh shall remain solid and whole — even better than it is at this moment! Behold now what I can do!"

Thus speaking, she injected through the nostrils of Patroclus ambrosia and red nectar, so that henceforth nothing could corrupt that beautiful flesh. Then did Achilles rush along the open space between the rampart and the ships, shouting in a terrific voice. And all the Achaeans heard him and an unbelievable strength and spirit swept through their veins. Even the pilots and stewards and oarsmen left the decks of the ships and followed him. And towards him came all the famous wounded leaders, limping and leaning upon their spears as if on crutches. Diomed came; and finally the great king Agamemnon himself came. And behold when they gathered about him, Achilles addressed them all in a thundering speech.

"O son of Atreus," he cried, concentrating upon Agamemnon, "can you and I feel any more that we were right to quarrel so furiously over this girl Briseïs, whom, captive of my spear though she was, I loved as if she were my wife? Would that amid the ships Artemis had slain her with an arrow, so that our quarrel had never happened!"

But Briseïs now came rushing to the side of the dead Patroclus; and when she saw how mangled and mutilated his body was, she uttered a series of wild shrieks and flung herself down beside him on the ground and began tearing at her own breasts and lovely neck and exquisite face.

"O Patroclus," she cried, "dearest of all to my unhappy heart! Thus for me doth evil ever follow hard upon evil! O I'll cry and cry and cry for thee and never cease; for thou wast ever so kind!"

This natural emotion of Briseïs made the great crowd of Achaean warriors who had gathered about them shudder, and the terrible tension of that moment none of them ever forgot; for there, in the eyes of all, Achilles was buckling on his blazing armour freshly brought him by his mother from heaven, and Agamemnon's heralds were dragging forth all the amazing offerings of gold and silver and bronze which the great king had sworn he would offer, along with his solemn and deadly oath, sworn by the very Styx itself, that he had not so much as touched Briseïs, far less ravished her. No sooner had Achilles buckled on his new armour and grasped the terrific spear of ash from the summit of Pelion, which Cheiron had given to his father Peleus and which he alone could wield, than Automedon, his charioteer, harnessed the immortal horses, Balius and Xanthus. Terribly did Achilles warn these two horses of his father not to return without him as they had returned without Patroclus. And then it was that Xanthus turned his neck, bowing his head so that his mane touched the ground.

“This time we will save you,” murmured the immortal horse, “but the day of your doom is nigh. It was not our fault that Patroclus was slain. It was Apollo, the son of Leto, who slew him, to give the glory to Hector.”

At that point the Erinyes made Xanthus’ voice to cease; while from a heart terribly stored Achilles answered him: “Why do you prophesy my death? I know well of myself that I shall never see my dear father and mother again. All the same for that, I’ll give these curst Trojans their fill of war!”

Loudly he shouted and drove those single-hooved horses forward.

BOOK XX

Speaking for myself, I, the divine Aether, soon found myself murmuring to myself within myself, “I have never liked the Goddess Themis. Whenever I talk about her with my only intimate male gossip, Notus, the South Wind, I am always able to convert him to feeling about her just as I do. She simply lives for councils, meetings, gatherings, committees, organisations, and so forth. We always find — and Notus agrees with me entirely in this — that whenever the Almighty Father wants a little help in making some difficult and delicate decision, instead of advising him to go to Athene if he wants to decide some fine point concerning the Achaeans or Danaans, or to Aphrodite if he wants to deal with some subtle issue with regard to the family of Priam, Themis will at once treat it as if it were incumbent upon her to give the god of all gods an elaborate lecture on order and arrangement and decency and carefulness and consideration when all he wants is a sensible woman’s lead in a certain direction.”

Well, on this occasion Themis decided that it was very important to gather together under the columns and pillars and colonnades and wide-reaching domes of heaven every remotest specimen of godhead and deity that could be found. She decided that there must be Nereids and Nymphs and Sylphs and Sylphids, and representatives of every fountain and stream and river and forest and cave in the whole world. On this occasion it was Poseidon, the Shaker of the Earth and the brother of both Zeus and Hera his wife and sister, who had the spirit to enquire why in the name of all the gods in the world had this gathering been summoned.

And Zeus answered without hesitation: “It is only that I was anxious to see, and am still anxious to see, what will happen if all you gods and immortal powers, whether male or female, plunge boldly into the fight down there, helping such as you want to help and destroying such as you want to destroy among the short-lived sons and daughters of mortal men. Meanwhile I shall remain up here in some pleasant mountain nook and delight my soul with watching all that happens.”

As he had encouraged them to do, so all the gods did, and terrific was the tumult. Nor did the divine Father remain in any way a passive spectator in a peaceful nook above them all. He thundered terrifically from above, while Poseidon, who had rushed down to the depths of the sea, caused appalling earthquakes to rock the earth and to shake the roots of all the peaks of many-fountained Ida. And even in Tartarus, in the depths below all depths, King Aidoneus leapt up in terror from the throne, for he feared lest these earthquakes should reveal to all the world the abominable and loathsome secrets of his dark and horrible kingdom.

Achilles had not been long fighting in his old desperate manner in the bloodiest part of the field when Apollo hurried up to Aeneas in a manner that was totally unworthy of the occasion and of both these renowned combatants. He compared their immortal mothers.

“Your mother,” he reminded Aeneas, “is Aphrodite, the daughter of Zeus himself, while his is only a Nereïd, Thetis, the daughter of the Old Man of the Sea.”

But when Aeneas found his way to the front of the battle and placed himself in the path of Achilles, there ensued quite a dignified exchange of words between them. But this soon ended in a desperate flinging of both their gigantic spears at each other’s tremendous shields. But Poseidon had his eye on this sublime encounter and he appealed to Hera and Athene. But they refused to do anything about it.

“Whether you,” said Hera, “decide to save Aeneas or to let him be slain by Achilles must remain your own affair. Pallas Athene and I are not going to have anything to do with it.”

So Poseidon decided to save Aeneas alone by himself. This he accomplished very surprisingly and in a most unusual manner. He began by shedding a mist upon the eyes of Achilles. Then he extracted the great Pelian spear from the shield of Aeneas, where it stuck fast in the layer of gold. Then he planted the spear before the feet of Achilles, so that he would see it the moment the mist had gone from his eyes. Then he seized Aeneas in both hands, whirled him round his head and flung him high into the air, and not only high but a very considerable distance. In fact he flung him so far that when he came to earth and was on his feet again, Aeneas found himself clean out of the fight and in the camp of the Caucones, who had not yet finished putting on their armour to prepare for battle. Then it was that Apollo drew nigh to Hector and commanded him, with a voice that Hector recognised at once, to draw back and not to rush forward and face Achilles; and Hector, knowing full well who it was that was speaking, experienced a spasm of natural fear and did what the god suggested. But I, the immortal Aether, watching very carefully all these events, could clearly see from my insight into the future that it would not be long before the “sweet war-man”, Hector, as well as the mighty Achilles himself, would follow Patroclus into Hades.

But when Hector realised that what Achilles was now doing was pursuing Polydorus, the youngest son of Priam and Priam’s favourite among them all, he felt that he could not restrain himself from intervening. Priam would never allow Polydorus to enter any fight; but Polydorus was the quickest runner and lightest on his feet of everyone of the family, and he had a boyish delight in showing off his speed in running: so that now, though he was not armed, he couldn't resist tantalising and teasing the Achaeans by running at top speed up and down the ranks and in and out of the battle. He was doing this when Achilles caught up with him, for Achilles was as swift on his feet as he was, and flung his spear at his back as he went dancing past and hit him in the waist where the clasps of his belt were fastened. This did for the boy. All his bowels came pouring out and, clasping them with both his hands, the luckless youth fell moaning and groaning to the ground.

When Hector saw his young brother perishing thus with his bowels clutched against his body, he naturally could not refrain from defying the killer. His defiance was exactly what Achilles had desired beyond all else.

"There, there, there you are!" Achilles shouted; "you, you, you, who slew the noblest heart that ever breathed upon earth! O I rejoice to see you! For now you shall learn your life's lesson! Draw near, draw near, that you may know what death and destruction mean!"

Quietly, and wisely, and calmly, Hector replied to this angry challenge.

"Son of Peleus, I am not a child to be frightened by shoutings and threats and grand words. I know well of myself how to utter threatening abuse when called for, and also how to utter decent and proper talk. I know very well that you are valiant and I know very well that I am weaker than you. Yet the issue of all this lies on the knees of the gods whether I, albeit weaker, shall rob you of life with a cast of my spear."

It was at this moment that I, the divine Aether, intently watching what would happen, saw Athene turn back the spear Hector had thrown; and saw Apollo snatch up Hector and shroud him in thick mist. Into this thick cloud of mist I saw Achilles make four deadly stabs. And when he saw how futile his blows were he cried out in a terrible voice: “You dog! You dog! You’ve escaped me this time! But wait a little and you’ll see!”

Then there occurred an event in which I, the all-seeing Aether, longed to play a part. Not often do I feel any pity for these strutting and boasting young warriors, killing and being killed. But on this occasion there was something about the way in which young Tros, the son of Alastor, flung down his shield and spear, and kneeling before Achilles with his slender boyish arms round the other’s knees, implored him to spare his life, since, so the young man declared, they were about the same age — something, I confess, in this scene, which made me long to use one divine shaft of Olympian light and strike the proud son of Peleus through the heart. Tragic little fool this young warrior certainly was. Couldn’t he see that this famous Being towering above him, gloating in his power of killing him, was as totally devoid of natural human feeling or remorse or pity or any sort of magnanimity, as the stony gravel beneath the feet of the one and the knees of the other?

The painful scene did not, however, last very long. Whether the killer knew anything about our physical interior I don’t know, but I could have sworn he thought that what would make the death of his victim especially unpleasant for him would be if he could disembowel him as he had done recently with the swift-footed Polydorus. He succeeded almost as well with this young warrior supplicating for mercy, for he smote him not with his spear but with his sword. And he must have given this weapon such a clever little twist as he delivered the blow that out came the victim’s liver, and the dark blood oozing from his liver was the last thing Tros felt before he perished.

It was not any lust for witnessing bloodshed that led me on to follow Achilles when the hour arrived at which I generally return to my home in the sky. It was a desire to see if this extraordinary person had any humanity in him at all. It was also a desire to discover, if I could, the actual motive that drove him on and on and on, though by this time Hector had been saved from him by Apollo and all the Trojans were fleeing from the ships towards the city. Was his motive simply to kill as many of the enemies of the Danaans as he could, so that when the final struggle came, as everybody knew it would have to come if Helen was to be taken home, the capture and sacking of the city could be accomplished more easily if the number of its defenders had been materially lessened beforehand? The ferocity with which Achilles fought, now that Hector for a time had escaped him, was unprecedented in this war, though it certainly had its parallel in our psychic calendar of horror.

But I, the immortal Aether, would hesitate to say that Agamemnon, or Ajax Telamon, or Odysseus, or even Diomed himself, ever fought with quite the same murderousness. But of course we must remember that these others were much older than Achilles, nor had they anything approaching him in speed of foot and rapidity of movement. One blow of the sword by Achilles was enough to finish off quite a stalwart fighter. When, for instance, he hit Echeclus, the son of Agenor, on the head with his sword, we should pause to consider for a moment the difference between what such a weapon would encounter in a person's skull to what it would come upon in the interior of a man's guts. In this particular case all the blade grew warm with the man's blood while upon his eyes fell black death and irresistible fate. And again, in the case of Deucalion, there is incredible ferocity in the exaltation with which Achilles cut off the man's head and sent it whirling into the air. I, the divine Aether, witnessed this myself and I shall never forget the sight of it.

Few of us, I reckon, have ever seen a man's head cut off at a stroke and sent spinning for many a yard! It really became at last almost unbearable. I tried to make Homer think of some comparison: it was as if some whole mountain-side had grown so parched by the lack of rain that it had waxed inflammable as tinder-wood, and then when a spark from somewhere set it ablaze and an eddying wind whirled, the flame burst in one direction and then in another and the whole side of the mountain was transformed into a burning city. To see these luckless Trojans fall under the ferocity of Achilles was like looking at white barley on a threshing floor being trodden by bulls. By this time not only all the tracks where he had driven were soaked in blood but the axle of his chariot and every rim and plate belonging to it was bloody too.

And I, the immortal Aether, had found out what I sought, for I now knew that the sole motive that made this man cake his hands with blood was his insane love of glory. Yes, although I, the immortal Aether, have known human brutality, meanness of mind and hardness of heart for millions of years, I have never known any human being less kind, less considerate, less philosophical, less indulgent, than this pride-besotted son of Peleus. His secret thoughts are much more easy to read than those of Agamemnon or Ajax or Diomed, and twenty times easier than those of Odysseus. And why? Simply because, at bottom, this man is unbelievably stupid.

The wild grief of Briseïs over the corpse of Patroclus was a real revelation to me. With a woman's subtle instinct she divined at once that Achilles' feeling for her was just pure unmitigated masculine lust; whereas a thousand subtile magnetic currents indicated to her what an extraordinarily happy life any intelligent and discerning girl could have had with Patroclus. I saw it all in a flash when I saw her wailing and moaning and rending and tearing her own flesh by the side of that unconscious form. Briseïs was deeply in love with Patroclus.

What a tedious and uninteresting life the wife of Achilles would have led! The sole purpose of his existence was to win glory for himself. He was not interested in science like Hephaestus. He was not interested in the government of men like his father. He was not interested in all the magical secrets and under-sea mysteries familiar to all the Nereids in the caves of the Old Man of the Sea. To be known by everybody a hundred thousand years hence as the swiftest runner and strongest spearman who ever lived, that was all he wanted! Glory, glory, glory! And to gain this he was ready to soak himself in blood.

BOOK XXI

With what delight did I, the immortal Aether, watch the mad attempt this proud and stupid son of Peleus now began to make to win a successful fight with the River Scamander. I knew he was a fool but I never dreamt his folly could go so far as to think that with his precious sword and picture-graven shield he could scare a great rushing foaming river to submit to him! What naturally especially interested me, who am an Elemental Being myself, was the attitude of the great River to the desperate struggle that ensued between them. The River whirled furiously along, sweeping out of every cranny of its depths with one huge rushing wave after another, all the dead bodies of the men Achilles had been slaughtering. But I noted with such joy and pride, for it showed how much more kind and considerate we Elemental Beings are than a crude, stupid, glory-maniac like this man, that the great River rescued every living person it could find and hid him among its estuaries where this slaughterer couldn't find him. It was the speed of Achilles' legs and feet, rather than the strength of his arms or the might of his sword or spear, that now saved his life. The River Scamander grew more and more furious with this man, who was as fast-footed as its streams were fast-flooded, and suddenly raising itself up in a towering wave it shouted splashingly to its brother, Simois: "Dear brother, let us stop the rush of this inconceivable fellow. If we don't do something soon he'll lay waste the city of the Trojans altogether! Come, brother, help me now with real help. Fill your streams with water from your springs. Arouse all your torrents! Raise such a terrific wave and such a wild rush of tree trunks and rocks and stones that it will sweep the man away. I swear to you, brother, that if we join our streams together we can yet outmatch this blasted wretch. I don’t believe his strength can sustain itself against the rush of our waters, nor his beauty against all we fling in his face, and I can now see that amazing armour of his lying beneath our streams and covered over with slime; yes, and his body will I wrap round in sand and shingle; nor shall they know where to find his bones, such a welter of silt will pour over them. Here, here, here shall be his funeral! Nor through all the centuries to come shall a heaped-up mound cover his remains!”

But Hera, seeing this from Olympus, was seized with fear lest the great river, with the help of its brother-river, should sweep the son of Peleus to his death. And so she cried out to her son Hephaestus, the God of Fire, the only great elemental force in the cosmos — unless the endangered one should appeal to me, the everlasting Aether — capable of dealing face to face with all the rivers in the world except Oceanus, that more than river who is the grandfather of us all!

“Hephaestus! O Hephaestus, my darling clubfooted child, so lame, but yet so wise and scientific! Come quick to the rescue. Come to save our great Achilles from being drowned and buried and lost for ever in the sand and shingle at the brink of this sea!”

So spoke Hera, his mother, and Hephaestus did exactly what she bade him do. Very soon all the slopes at the foot of the mountains were blazing with fire. The whole forest was blazing. The whole mountainside was burning. And all the reeds and rushes near the river, along with the elms and willows and tamarisks that grew by the little eddies and muddy estuaries where wriggled the eels and swam the small fish, were all smouldering with fire. It was then that Ares could no longer endure to see such a sight, and he rushed at Pallas Athene with his spear and actually dared to strike with his spear at the tasselled Aegis which she wore upon her breast. Lightly laughed Athene and promptly seized with her mighty hand a huge black jagged stone that must have been a mark at the end of one neighbour’s land and the beginning of the next. With this stone she smote furious Ares on the neck and loosed his limbs, so that he fell back and lay upon the ground the length of seven roods and his hair was befouled with mud. But Aphrodite rushed to his aid and lifted him up and tenderly began to lead him forth from the battle.

It was then that Hera from Heaven cried aloud to Athene: “Don’t you see that this dog-fly is leading our enemy, Ares, out of the fray? After her! After her! After her! And let her feel your strength!”

So she spoke, and Athene was delighted at heart to obey. And she smote Aphrodite between the breasts with her mighty hand, so that the goddess of beauty and love fell helplessly down to the ground beside the massive body of Ares, the God of War. And then, over the forms of both of them, as they lay there upon the earth side by side, the exultant Athene chanted a paean of victory. “If it hadn’t been for this ridiculous helping of Trojans,” she chanted, “long ere this we should have ceased from war, having laid Ilios, the well-built city, level with the dust!”

It was then that Apollo and Poseidon began to discuss, lightly, carelessly, indifferently, cynically, the question whether they would gain any real advantage by setting out upon a long battle with each other. Poseidon it was who called upon Apollo to begin the fight, since he was the younger.

“Don’t you remember,” Poseidon demanded of him, “how you and I were sent by Zeus to serve Laomedon, King of Troy, and how, when we had done everything for him and had built that mighty wall complete round the city of Troy, the liar Laomedon defrauded us of our wages? For a whole year, O far-shooting Apollo, were we ordered by Zeus to serve the princely Laomedon; and while you built him a wall round Troy I looked after his flocks and herds on the rocky and woody slopes of Mount Ida. And when we asked for our wages he threatened to bind our hands and feet, and to sell us, thus bound, to the rulers of unknown islands on the far-off margins of the world.”

Then answered him Apollo the far-shooter.

“O mighty Shaker of the Earth, I can tell you one thing. You surely would be engaged in a job more natural to your person and your strength if you were guarding cattle on the mountains than if you were warring with me for the sake of these contemptible mortals, pitiful creatures, who, like the leaves, are at one moment full of life and the next are perishing miserably. Nay my friend, let you and me cease from strife with each other and leave these wretches to fight without our aid!”

So saying he turned his back and began moving away. But his sister rushed forward and railed at him.

“Fool,” she cried, “why do you carry a bow and arrow if you daren’t use such weapons? Listen to me — to me, your sister Artemis, queen of the wild woods and the wild beasts. Didn’t you boast in the halls of our Father that you would stand up to Poseidon and have no fear of him?”

But though her brother Apollo answered her no word, she soon found herself answered. The great Queen of Heaven, Hera, her very self, came striding down and faced her, and Artemis sought to flee. But Hera, smiling while she did it, seized both her hands with one of hers and snatched her quiver from her neck and beat her with it about the head, turning her this way and that way, while the swift arrows fell from the quiver to the earth, until Artemis fled weeping, leaving on the ground her bow and all its arrows. Leto, her mother, was soon on the spot, gathering up the discarded bow and scattered arrows, and, as she did so, she found herself confronted by clear-shining Hermes. But he soon told her that he had not the faintest intention of fighting with her, so all she did was to pick up her daughter’s bow and arrows and carry them away.

Meanwhile the maiden Artemis flew to Heaven and flung herself on the knees of her Father Zeus, while, as she clung to him crying pitifully, her fragrant robe rippled above the spasms of her trembling frame. The great son of Cronos clasped her to him, smiling tenderly at her agitation.

“Who, my dear child, has hurt and upset you to this tune?”

“Your own wife,” she sobbed, “even white-armed Hera, from whom is always arising the worst strife from which we suffer!”

But Achilles was now slaughtering the Trojans and driving them before him in flight, till both he and they came near to the city walls. Then King Priam, who was watching all this, came down from the city wall and bade them open the city gates, so that the great flood of fugitives, fleeing from Achilles’ blooddripping spear, might enter the city. Parched with thirst were all these fleeing Trojan warriors and soiled with dust; and Achilles as he pursued them exulted more and more in his heart, thinking of nothing except the glory he was winning and of the exquisite delight he found in slaughtering men who dared not stand up to him, but whom, swift-footed as he was, he could easily overtake as they fled in their wild panic.

With the gates wide open by Priam’s order, Achilles might at that moment have anticipated the future and, rushing into the city, have taken possession of it. But it was then that an unexpected event occurred. Phoebus Apollo suddenly became aware of the presence of Agenor, the son of Antenor, who was leaning against the trunk of the oak-tree that was not far from the Scaean Gate. Apollo, who had veiled himself in thick mist, came close up to him, anxious to see what he would do. The far-shooting god couldn’t himself read his thoughts, nor could he influence the course of those thoughts. But he had a vague instinct that his presence, being as sympathetic as he was to the Trojans, might put courage into him as they both watched this pitiful flood of fugitives followed by the exultant spear of Achilles thirsty for this wholesale slaughter to continue till there was not a man of them left. And the mind of Agenor, son of Antenor, swung to and fro in indecision: “If I flee with the rest, Achilles will probably overtake me and slay me in my cowardly flight. But if I fly now in a totally different direction, should I not be able to hide in one of those thickets or glens or gorges of Mount Ida? But suppose he notices as I turn thus from the city towards the plain? Will he not pursue me, and, being as swift-footed as he is, will he not overtake me? If he does I certainly shall not escape death and the fates, for is he not the mightiest of all the sons of men? Well then, what if I boldly confront him, with spear and sword? His flesh is not the flesh of a god. It can be pierced by an ordinary spear of bronze. And why should it not prove to be my destiny to slay him rather than to be slain by him? Who can tell in advance what fate will cause to happen?”

So Agenor, the son of Antenor, refused to flee, but he held before him a perfectly balanced shield, and pointing his spear at Achilles he challenged him boldly and defiantly.

“So you think you are going to take and destroy the city of the Trojans? Here are we that shall guard Ilios. It is you yourself, yes, you and no other, who shall now meet your doom, terrific warrior though you are!”

Shouting this defiance, he hurled his spear at Achilles. The spear missed him not, but struck him on the shin below the knee, and the greave of newly wrought tin that Thetis had brought from the workshop of Hephaestus rang sharply with a shrill noise under the blow. And then, on his side, Achilles raised his spear, went furiously at Agenor, and no doubt would have slain him if Apollo had not intervened. Apollo covered Agenor with thick mist, while he himself in the likeness of the man fled across the plain towards the foot-hills of Ida. Fiercely did Achilles, the sure-footed, pursue him; but Apollo, in the likeness of Agenor, was so crafty that he ran unevenly, giving Achilles the idea every few minutes that he was bound to overtake him.

And while those two were running thus towards Ida, the fleeing crowds of Trojans entered the Scaean Gate, which King Priam had caused to be opened wide.

BOOK XXII

IT WAS NOT long before Apollo decided that he had fooled Achilles far enough. So he turned upon him and in a few words made it clear to his pursuer that, swift as he might be on his feet, he could not expect to overtake an immortal god. Furiously then did Achilles turn upon Apollo and abuse him: "And so you've beguiled me again, have you, you trickster in heights and depths! Now have you robbed me of great glory.

O how I'd love to avenge myself on you, if only I could!"

With this he left him and rushed back wildly towards the walls of Troy. And Priam, the old king, saw him approaching, as anyone can see the star we call the Dog of Orion gleaming in the darkness of night. And the old man groaned and beat upon his head with his hands; and when he saw that his son Hector was standing waiting outside the gate leaning upon his spear, he stretched forth his arms towards him in a piteous appeal, beseeching him not abide the coming of the son of Peleus.

"Have pity on me, my son, my son, and enter the gate! If this man — and he's as cruel as he is mighty — takes your life, what shall I do, your aged father? It's all very well for young men to give their lives for their home, but when it comes to dogs devouring the bleeding bodies of old ones like me, dogs that may well belong to my own kennels, there's something horrible and ghastly in it, something unnatural and shocking.

I tell you the nakedness of an old man left to the dogs on his own floor is a horrible thing to see!"

As he pleaded thus with his son, he began clutching at his own white hairs and pulling them, in his frantic emotion, out of his head. And out of the gate to their side came Hecabe also, wailing and pleading.

"O my son! my son! my son!" she cried, and as she cried she actually tore aside the robe from her body and showed her breasts to Hector.

But neither the prayers of his mother nor the beseeching and passionate tears of his father could move Hector to change his mind.

"There he comes, this cruel devil," he said to himself, "with the one fixed desire in his whole nature, in his body, in his mind and in his soul, to get glory by slaughter. No, no! Why should I turn away from him and not face him? Not the wisest prophet among us really and truly knows what is going to happen. Perhaps I shall kill him rather than he kill me!"

Thus he thought in his heart, but so terrifying did Achilles look as he came rushing towards him that, in spite of his courage, his imagination turned this simple-minded brutal killer, with nothing in his brain but a frantic lust for getting glory through slaughter, into a figure of superhuman greatness and of gigantic superhuman power. A fit of mad terror seized him; and there, straight away, in the presence of Hecabe and Priam and of his dearest comrades, he took flight round the city walls. Achilles was after him in a second, and round and round the walls the two of them ran, Achilles gaining by the natural-born swiftness of his legs and feet what he lost by the demonic spasm of panic fear in his rival's soul. Four times they encircled, those two, the walls of Troy, with not only the victim's parents watching this appalling contest, but a large group of Hector's Trojan comrades. Past all the familiar landmarks that had made a background for the historic encounters of a thousand years those men ran.

But they ran in a race whose prize was anything but the same for both. For the one it was the supreme clutch of the special kind of glory he longed for most in the world. For the other it was the more simple matter of life and death. Did any of the landmarks they passed realise what this race meant? Did the ancient fig-tree with its leaves blowing in the wind have any notion of what was happening? Did the two springs of the eddying Scamander, one with water so warm as it gushed from the earth that a misty steam rose from it, and the other so ice-cold that it might have been crossing snow, realise what was happening?

This life and death race was not only watched by Hector's parents and dearest friends. It was also watched by the gods above. Zeus himself, the Father of the immortals, looked down upon it with a pity he could not repress.

"Let us take counsel together," he cried, "and think if there is any way we can save Hector's life."

"What are you saying, great lord of darkness and light?" cried Pallas Athene. "Are you thinking of rescuing a mortal man like this, doomed long since by Moira and Keer? Yes, fated, as he knows, and as we all know, to a destiny as irrevocable as that night should follow day? All we gods, I tell you, great Being though you are, will oppose such a mad action as this!"

The Father of them all yielded with a smile and a jest to these solemn words: "So be it, Tritogeneia, dear child. Have it your own way. I was only expressing my feelings of the moment."

Hearing this, Athene plunged hurriedly down to earth.

While the two were running this deadly race it suddenly entered the head of Achilles that some Achaean warrior — for by this time quite a few Greeks had reached the great gates of the city — might throw a spear at Hector as he ran past and snatch, at this last minute, this precious glory, which was the one thing for which he cared most in the world, especially now that Patroclus was gone — snatch it away from him just at the second it was his. So as he ran he made a warning gesture to these compatriots commanding them to hold back.

Meanwhile Athene made Achilles pause in his pursuit.

“Stand where you are,” she bade him, “and I will see to it that the man stops and faces you.” Taking therefore the form of his brother, Deïphobus, Athene laid her hand on Hector. “Stop, my dear, and you and I together will face this terrible man.”

And Hector stopped as he was bade, and spoke gently to him.

“Deïphobus, my dear, you have always been my best-loved brother of all the sons of Hecabe and Priam; but never have I felt for you what I feel now, as, refusing to enter the gates, you are ready to stand up with me against this man.”

And thus, when Achilles came near, Hector boldly addressed him in the following words.

“No longer, Achilles, will I flee from thee. My spirit bids me face thee, whether thou art destined to slay me or I thee. But come hither; let us call the gods to witness our covenant that our fighting shall be fair and square, free from all tricks and devices. I will do unto thee no foul despite, if Zeus grant me strength to take thy life. But when I have stripped from thee thy glorious armour, I will give thy body back to the Achaeans, and so do thou give my body back to Priam and Hecabe.”

But Achilles, as I, the divine Aether, knew all along, for I have read his inmost feelings from the beginning of his life, and I know well that a less generous, less kind-hearted, more mean and malicious soul than his no warrior on either side possessed, in spite of his being the swiftest and strongest of them all... but Achilles, as I say, out solely to get the glory of killing Hector, answered just as I knew he would.

“Talk not to me, Hector, thou madman, of covenants! As between lions and men there are no oaths, nor do lambs and wolves make covenants. No more is there any escape for thee. Now shalt thou pay back all I have felt for the comrades of mine that thou hast slain."

He spake and hurled his spear. But Hector, looking straight at him, avoided it so that it sank into the earth. But Pallas Athene pulled it out of the ground and, quite unseen by Hector, gave it back to Achilles. And Hector spoke in fearless defiance: "Now, in your turn, boastful one, see if you can dodge my spear. Would all of it were in your flesh, for war would be much lighter for us Trojans if you were dead and cold!"

But his spear, when he threw it, rebounded uselessly from the Hephaestus-made shield of Achilles. Then did Hector stand baffled, for he had no second spear.

"O Deïphobus," he cried in a wild, pitiful voice, "lend me your spear!"

But he soon realised that the great city gates were closed and that his brother had withdrawn within the city walls, and it came over him like a flood that he was done for and that this was the end.

"But let me die like a man!" he cried. "Let me die in a way so memorable that my death shall come to the hearing of men as yet unborn!"

As I, the immortal Aether, heard these words, I could not help thinking how a couple of thousand years later I should hear the voice of a great poet who lived in that far-off western island, chanting tenderly of Hector and calling him "that sweet war-man". For there was in Hector, though not nearly as much as there had been in Patroclus, a vein of kindly human nature such as Achilles had never known and would never know. And O how hard I tried to make him remember all the blows in attack and all the motions in defence that go with the handling of a sword. And he did get them from me to an unexpected extent, as he now suddenly and violently drew from his side a sharp sword and rushed upon Achilles. But though he had been encouraged by his brother, and was even now being watched from the great wall above him by his parents, this final desperation of gallantry availed him nothing. He had no immortal goddess, as Achilles had, to help him when he was in danger of making a mistake.

"Could I, ought I, might I," I, the immortal Aether, thought in my heart, "save this unhappy man? O how dearly would I love to defy all the Powers he has against him! I would love to defy Hera and Athene who hate him so. I would love to defy every single one of these damned Greeks making cruel war on ground that is not theirs — and why? Simply because Helen, the most beautiful woman who has ever lived, decided that she had the right to choose, and entire justification in choosing, at her own free will, the man with whom she wanted to live. O how I would like to show up to all heaven and all earth what a mean, grasping, vicious, selfish, cruel nature this son of Peleus has! There is not a drop of kindness or mercy or pity in him! I know this unfortunate Hector through and through, and he has real love for Andromache and real love for his child Astyanax; but Achilles has never had a flicker of tenderness for anyone."

Thus did the immortal Aether ponder as Achilles and Hector met for the last time.

Achilles held off Hector's sword by aid of his round shield, while, moving the point of his spear to and fro, he wondered where in the flesh of his enemy was the most sensitive spot. Quickly enough he decided that it was his victim's neck that lent itself best to his spear; and so into the man's neck he savagely drove his weapon. He managed his blow so skilfully, however, that he did not pierce his victim's windpipe, so that though the man fell with a mortal gasp into the dust he could still speak.

"Hector," cried Achilles, exulting over him, "you did not think, did you, you bloody fool, that when you put on the armour of which you stripped Patroclus, you would still be liable to this death-blow which I rejoice to give you. Dogs and birds shall tear your flesh to fragments, but to Patroclus whom you slew all we Achaeans will now give a seemly burial."

Then spake to him Hector with his last breath.

"I beg and entreat thee, by thy life and thy knees and thy parents, that thou givest not my body to be devoured by dogs, but give it back to my home that the wives of the Trojans may burn it properly."

Then, bending over him in exultant fury, Achilles answered; and I, the immortal Aether, knew well, for I could read every feeling and every thought he had, what savage delight was convulsing his whole being:

"Implore me not, dog, by knees or parents! What I would like best to do would be to carve thy flesh myself and eat it raw! O no! dogs and birds shall devour thee utterly!"

Then, as he lay dying, Hector murmured: "I knew it, I foresaw it, for the heart in thy breast is of iron. But your day will come, boaster! At the Scaean Gate it will come; when Paris helped by Apollo will kill thee." Even as he spoke the spirit of Hector left his body and was wafted to Hades, leaving behind all it meant to be a hero in the prime of his youthfulness.

"Lie thou dead!" was his epitaph from Achilles. "My fate will I accept, when Zeus and the other immortal gods cause it to happen."

Then from the corpse he pulled oft' the shining armour stained with blood, and left the naked body on the ground; and one after another every Greek, who had come to stare at the dead, gave that naked form a prod with his spear.

And now must I, yes, I, the immortal Aether, make a serious confession; for though I have often sworn to the whole world that in the heart of Achilles I have never found one single flicker of human feeling, yet his speech now did indeed confound me; for I, who know all that goes on in people’s souls, did catch — yes, I confess it! — a genuine quiver of emotion as he uttered these words about Patroclus.

Thus did I, the immortal Aether, follow gesture by gesture, word by word, this history Homer was telling. I have never from the beginning done more to my precious Homer than inspire him and help him with all the insight I have by nature into the minds of mortals and immortals and of men and of women. It is Homer, not I, who is chanting this true history, event after event. But it is I, and I am proud that it is I, who can make him see the difference between a man like Hector and a man like Achilles, though he describes the deeds of both of them to perfection. What I, the immortal Aether, am now thinking about is what Achilles did to Hector after he was dead. Was all this just honest anger at the death of the excellent Patroclus, who clearly was, as our hearers have learnt from the emotion of Briseïs on his behalf, a far nobler man than either Hector or Achilles?

Listen, my friends, to the words of Homer, and judge whether my view of the character of Achilles is an exaggerated one. The son of Peleus invented a peculiarly foul trick on the body of his enemy. He cut the tendons of both Hector’s feet from heel to ankle and strung leather thongs through them which he fastened to the back of his chariot. Then he mounted the chariot and seizing the whip set the horses off at a gallop towards the ships. Not that the horses needed any lashing, for they were themselves extremely eager to get back to their stalls. But the purpose in the devilishly cruel mind of Achilles was well realized. The dust rose on each side of Hector as he was dragged along, and his dark hair swept the earth, and every kind of mud and rubble clung to it as it was jerked over the uneven ground. Hector’s father, King Priam, fell into a frenzy and struggled with his courtiers like a madman, so wildly did he want to follow Hector’s trailing corpse to the Greek huts. As for poor Hecabe, his mother, she tore off her gleaming veil and uttered cry after cry so dreadfully loud that her voice could be heard down many of the streets of the city. But unhappiest of all was Andromache, Hector's wife. She fell to the ground fainting, her head plunged in a swirl of terrible thoughts, of which the thought of her child being an orphan lasted long after her swoon was over.

As a born piercer of human hearts, and therefore as a born understander of human sorrows, I, the divine Aether, feel that my precious Homer has described the feelings of Andromache better than I could have done. He followed his own instinct entirely. I was anxious to see if a man could comprehend what feminine souls so intimately know. And he did, he did! He went even further than I could have gone! He has described the fate of a fatherless boy with perfect understanding. Both Greeks and Trojans use the term "orphan" for a child who has lost its father, even though its mother is still alive.

"O Hector, Hector!" cried Andromache, "would to heaven my father had never begotten me! O Hector, thou art now departing to the House of Hades, deep below the earth, and thou wilt be no help to our little son! Even though he escape the rest of this wretched war, it will be no advantage to him to have been thy son. His lot in this world will be labour and sorrow, for others will possess his lands. To be an orphan divideth a child from the friends of his youth. Ever is his head bowed low and his cheeks bathed in tears. Longing for comfort he goes to his father's friends, plucking one by the cloak and another by the tunic, and of them that are touched with pity one holdeth forth his cup for a moment. His lips he wetteth, but his heart he wetteth not. And one whose mother and father yet live thrusteth him from the feast and scoldeth him with abuse: 'Get thee gone, wretched little poppet! No father of thine feasteth in our company!' O my Astyanax, and they called thee by that name in Hector’s honour, and now what art thou and what am I?”

BOOK XXIII

I, THE IMMORTAL Aether, must again confess, much as it goes against the grain to do so, that in Achilles' lament for Patroclus that followed his dragging the mutilated corpse of Hector to the outskirts of the holy spot where lay that sacred body, there was unquestionably real feeling. That there must have been reality in his emotion was proved forever, yes! forever, by the way my incomparable Homer deals with it. He may know less than I do about what goes on in human hearts, but what he knows he treats with an imagination, yes! and by all the gods, with an invention too, that leaves my realistic insight bewildered, confused, frustrated. Could I, could my friend Hephaestus, the God of Fire, could my friend Aeolus, the God of the Winds, have imagined what came into the mind of Homer to describe just here? I refer to the whole night spent by Achilles with the spirit of Patroclus. Only the greatest poet the world has yet known or ever will know, however long what we call Time lasts, could have imagined the scene or composed the words uttered by the spirit of Patroclus when, worn out by the way he had led all the Myrmidons in their wailings, and, even then, refusing to return, as each of the others had done, to his bed to rest, Achilles had lain himself down on the edge of the sea, where the waves broke quite close to the spot where he had stretched himself out to sleep, exhausted by those long hours of lamentation. And it was as he lay thus that the spirit of Patroclus appeared to him.

"You're asleep, Achilles!" the spirit cried out to him; "you're asleep and have forgotten me. Not while I was alive did you forget me: but now that I am dead you can sleep in peace! Bury me, bury me with all speed; that I may pass within the gates of Hades! Pity me, my dear! O pity me! For there are phantoms here that refuse to let me join myself with them beyond the River. Vainly, O vainly, do I wander in and out of the gates of Hades seeking rest and finding none. Give me your hand, I implore you, for nevermore shall I come back out of Hades when once I have been given my due of fire. Never more in life shall you and I sit apart from our friends and take counsel together. For me this accursed fate has opened its abominable mouth, the fate that was predestined for me from the moment of my birth. O! And another thing I must beg of you, if you will listen to me. Lay not my bones apart from thine, Achilles, but let them lie together; even as we were reared in your home, even so let one casket enfold our bones, a golden one with two handles; you know the one of which I'm thinking, the one the goddess your mother gave you!

Then in answer spoke Achilles: "Why, O head, dear to me beyond all others, are you come hither now, telling me just what I must do? But never mind why! I will do exactly as you bid me. But O I implore you, my dearest one, draw nearer so that, even though it be only for a moment, we may clasp our arms round each other and cry our hearts out!" So saying, he stretched out both his arms, but he found nothing to clasp. The soul of Patroclus vanished like a mist and sank beneath the earth with a twittering murmur. Then did Achilles leap to his feet and stride among his Myrmidon comrades, clasping his hands desperately together. And as he came he raised the wail of lamentation once again. And at that moment the fire-red curve of the rising sun came up over the sea; and when he saw it and knew that all his friends and all his Myrmidons were ready for Patroclus' funeral rites, he welcomed Meriones, the assistant of kindly Idomeneus, who hurriedly directed a squadron of mules and wagons and skilled woodsmen with axes, who speedily cut down a number of mighty trees and hewed them into logs.

Down to the seashore these logs were brought; and Achilles at once set to work to plan a great sepulchral mound or tumulus that should serve as the burial-place for Patroclus, and also for himself by Patroclus’ side. When the great logs brought down by the mule-wagons from the forests of Mount Ida had been heaped up near the mound designed by Achilles for both Patroclus and himself, Achilles was suddenly seized by the sort of contest, this way against that way in his heart, to which of all the Greeks he was the least subject. But this tug of emotions, even in his hard and selfish heart, was pretty extreme and very painful to him. The body of his friend was already covered by the beautifully trailing youthful tresses of as many young fighters among the Myrmidon lads as had gathered to share the lamentation. But so far he hadn’t shorn off the golden lock from his own head which, ever since he had left the house of his father, he had cherished with ritualistic care. For his emotional trouble was this; and bitterly did he feel it as he gazed out over the sea while the Myrmidons finished their work of collecting the logs and the branches and brittle kindling ready for the great fire. His father Peleus had sworn, and he in his youthful ardour had sworn with him, that when he returned from taking Troy and bringing Helen home with Menelaus, the mass of golden locks which waved from his forehead should be shorn off and offered to the River Spercheus, their familiar Thessalian home-stream. So, looking desperately over the wine-dark sea and bowing his head with a piteous bow to be forgiven his oath-breaking treason, he shore off the golden lock he had kept for the River Spercheus and placed it in the dead hand of Patroclus; and as they saw this all the Myrmidons gathered about the two of them, lifted up their voices and wept. But Achilles walked up to the side of Agamemnon and begged him to disperse the people to their several huts, all except those who were nearest and dearest to the dead.

"Nobody but you," he said to the King, "can make a crowd of watchers like this obey; but you can, and from my heart I implore you so to do." And what Achilles had begged of him Agamemnon did.

Then they heaped up the wood and made a pyre, a hundred feet this way and that way, and on the top of it they placed the dead man. And round him Achilles piled up the fat of many sheep and cattle, and he laid against the bier two-handled jars of honey and oil; and four horses he cast upon the pyre and with them the bodies of two favourite dogs. And this having been done he slew twelve Trojan prisoners who had been kept alive for this purpose. Then at length, when all was prepared, Achilles set light to the great mass, that the iron might of fire might range at large in it. And I, the immortal Aether, looking down on this terrible scene from the calm spaces of the sky, saw how the mad lust for glory in this son of Peleus mingled, like air and water, with the black smoke that swirled about the pyre he had built.

"Hail, Patroclus," he cried, "even in the House of Hades. For now I am bringing all to pass which formerly I promised thee. Twelve among the bravest Trojans shall this fire along with thee devour; but as to Hector, son of Priam, him I will not, no, never, never, give to the fire to devour! Him I will give to dogs!"

So he spoke in his insane pride: but Aphrodite, the daughter of Zeus, kept the dogs from Hector by day and by night, and with oil, ambrosial and rose-sweet, she anointed him, and over him Phoebus Apollo drew a dark cloud from heaven and covered the place where the body of Hector lay, so that the heat of the sun as it shone upon him should not injure that helpless form.

But meanwhile the enormous pyre built so high for Patroclus could not be persuaded to burn. Going apart from the rest Achilles prayed a desperate prayer to the North Wind and the West Wind. Beautiful Iris, the messenger of the immortals, heard him praying and she hurried to the palace of the West Wind, wherein the North Wind and the children of all the winds were feasting. The second they saw Iris enter they all rose up and each one of them prayed her to sit down at their feast. But she refused to sit down, and lifting up her voice she earnestly uttered that familiar falsehood which Hera herself had made use of before now, namely that she had to go at once to the stream of Oceanus in the land of the Ethiopians where they were sacrificing hecatombs to the immortals; but she implored them to go to the help of Achilles, who could not make the great fire of Patroclus burn with the hoped-for blaze. But when she had departed they arose tumultuously and did exactly what she had implored them to do. They whirled the sea up into tumultuous waves, and with a terrific rush of a swirling tempest they fell upon that enormous Patroclean pyre with such force that the flames went roaring upwards as if they were going to lick the sky.

And all night long Achilles poured wine upon the earth as he went lamenting round the pyre of his dead friend. But at the moment when the morning star appeared as herald of our crocus-coloured dawn the flames grew faint and finally died down. And although, as the winds returned to their home over the Thracian sea, they made the waves roar again as they had done at their coming, exhaustion seized upon Achilles and he lay down on the ground and in a second was fast asleep. But as fate willed it, he was not destined to sleep long. Soon the excited conversation eddying round and round the two sons of Atreus, Agamemnon and Menelaus, roused him and he sat up.

“What we’ve got to do now, my good friends,” he cried, “is to collect the bones of Patroclus so as to be certain they are not mixed up with those of the other bodies there. Since, however, his were in the centre, we shall, I hope, have no difficulty in separating them. There’ll be no need to round off the tumulus now. Let us just leave it of moderate size, and then, when I am gone, you can finish it off and make it larger and seemly enough for both of us.”

But when the sun was high in the heavens Achilles announced solemnly to King Agamemnon and the rest of the leaders of the Achaeans that he intended to offer valuable prizes, including beautiful women skilled in exquisite handiwork, for all the winners in every sort of competition from chariot-racing to wrestling and throwing the “solon”, a meteoric stone composed of a mass of time-fused iron.

I, the immortal Aether, gleaming between Ouranos, the upper sky, and the Aeer or air, which like an atmosphere surrounds the earth and which seems, when compared with me, to be a sort of mist or fog or gloom, now decided that I would leave my darling Homer to describe these games in honour of the burning of the body of Patroclus, and the raising of his Tumulus or Mound or Barrow, after his own manner, totally uninterfered with by me. What I did not of course realise was what a large part in the real spectacle of races and every kind of competition is played by those onlookers who are watching the scene. Our Achaean and Danaan onlookers had as many contests in angry words among themselves as the competitors were having in their desperate struggles to win the prizes. This was especially the case in the chariot races, for several distinguished onlookers were really competing as hotly among themselves as to what they could see from their point of observation as the competitors. For instance, there was very soon a most angry battle of words between Ajax, son of Oileus, and Idomeneus of Crete, an argument concerning what pair of horses they could see leading the rest in the great chariot race.

"Idomeneus," shouted Ajax, son of Oïleus, "how can you be such a shameless boaster? Can't you see better than that? Can't you see that the same mares of Eumelus are in the lead now as were leading when the race started? Here you are boasting loudly when there are much better eyes than yours watching this race!"

What made the chariot-race particularly exciting and liable to arouse these angry altercations in those who were watching it was the well-selected turning-point round which the chariots had to turn when they were at the height of the race. It was this turning-point which old Nestor described so carefully to his son Antilochus. Being able, as I, the everlasting Aether, am able, to survey the hearts of men and their competitions and pastimes as they were in the days of old and as they will be in the days to come, I took a good deal of interest in Nestor's lesson to his son, who had inherited no small amount of his father's wisdom and who listened intently, as indeed I did myself, to what old Nestor was saying. He began by describing the turning-point itself. This, he explained to Antilochus, is made up of a thick tree-stump which rises to the height of about a fathom above the ground. This tree-stump is either an oak or a pine, but whichever it is it has within it an unconquerable resistance to rain, and no amount of rain can make it rot. Two large white stones have been carefully induced to lean against it, and since it is the turning-point of the race there is quite a wide space of ground, beautifully smooth for driven chariots, all round about it. It may have been a monument to a man long ago dead. Or it may have been the turning-point of a chariot-race for some tribe of men centuries upon centuries ago, a tribe that is now entirely forgotten.

"Whatever its origin," old Nestor went on, talking to his son Antilochus, "when you reach it, as you drive your two horses in your chariot, lean a little yourself to the left of the horses, and to the off horse give the goad calling to him with a shout, and give him rein from your hand. But let the near horse draw close to the turning-point consisting of that tree-stump and those white stones, and let your chariot wheel pass it very very closely, but without quite touching it. And O remember, my dear son, if you can only manage to get round the turning-point before any of the others, there will not be a single chariot, however swift its horses and skilful its driver, that will reach home before yours."

The competitors in this chariot-race were Antilochus and Eumelus and Menelaus and Meriones and Diomed, the son of Tydeus. And it was Diomed who arrived first, and after him Antilochus, and after him Menelaus, and after him Meriones. But Eumelus, the son of Admetus, finished last. He came in to the starting place dragging his chariot after him and driving his horses before him. And at this forlorn sight, I, the divine Aether, quickly perceived that even the hard heart of Achilles was affected with pity.

"Lo! in the last place," he cried aloud so that all might hear, "comes our best man, driving his horses before him! But come, let us give him a prize, as is meet: the second prize, for of course the son of Tydeus has won the first!"

But when, after thus addressing them, Achilles suggested that the mare of six years old with a foal in her womb, which he had offered as second prize, should be given to Eumelus, this was more than Antilochus could bear, though the Achaean crowd, swayed by pity for the loser, applauded it.

"No! No!" cried Antilochus, "the mare I absolutely refuse to give up! Let any man who tries to take her from me fight with me sword to sword and hand to hand!"

At that moment of excitement in every heart and of unusual agitation in the crowd, always sensitive to emotion, it certainly impressed me, the immortal Aether, to see how wisely and how calmly Achilles took this rebuff. He only smiled in the most genial way, and told Antilochus that it was quite all right for him to keep the mare; and then he turned to his friend, Automedon, and asked him to bring the corselet that he, Achilles, had taken from Asteropaeus; and when Automedon brought it, he handed to it Eumelus who received it gladly. But at that point Menelaus burst in, and in a fierce temper was he. And I, the eternal Aether, can well understand his wrath, for after all it was only by the subtle advice of his old father Nestor that Antilochus had rounded the turning-point with such extraordinary skill and speed that it was before Menelaus could catch up with him, though by the power of Aethe he would have overtaken him, had the race been a minute or two prolonged. What had really won the race was the wisdom of old Nestor and his exact and precise advice to his son as to getting round the turning-point.

But the anger of Menelaus scared them all, and it was a comfort to everybody when the gracious young winner of the second prize took the mare by her bridle and, leading her up to Menelaus, handed her over to him. And the heart of Menelaus was as glad as the ears of corn when a lovely dew is ripening them; and he spoke gently and warmly to Antilochus.

"I will cease from my anger against you," he said, "and I will give you the mare with the foal in her womb, which you won: and I do want you to know, and all the people here to know, that my heart is never over-haughty, never hard and overbearing."

With these words, he handed over the mare and himself took the shining cauldron. And Meriones took up the two talents of gold as the winner of the fourth place. But the fifth prize was left unclaimed, namely the two-handled urn. This prize Achilles himself carried through the crowd till he reached Nestor, and to him he gave it, saying: "Take this now, old sire, and let it be to thee a memorial of the burial of Patroclus; for thou wilt never see again, among the rest of us Argives, his dear face. I give thee this prize, unwon bywrestling or by javelin-throwing or racing, for grievous old age weighs upon thee."

So saying he placed the urn in his arms; and Nestor received it gladly.

It may be believed how gladly I, the everlasting Aether, welcomed Achilles' announcement that there would now be a boxing match, for nothing but a completely new competition could stop old Nestor's unending history of his triumphant winnings when he was young. But the boxing match was, now that it came, by no means so exciting as the chariot-race. Achilles introduced it by tethering before them all a six-year-old mule that was unbroken, which is the one beast, above all others, that is the hardest to break in. He also laid down before them as a gift to the defeated boxer a fine two-handled cup. No wonder there was a gift for the defeated as well as for the winner, for never have I, the divine Aether, listened to such terrifying boasting as was uttered by Epeius, son of Panopeus, as he held himself on high and looked round on everyone from beside the unbroken mule.

"I'll rend the flesh, I'll crush the bones," he boasted, "of the person who dares to box with me! Let his nearest relatives be at hand so that they can carry him off when I have pounded him to bits!"

So he spoke; and there was a deep silence. Then, alone of all the men present, Euryalus uprose to face him. Euryalus was a noble-looking man, whose grandfather, Talaus, had been to Thebes for the burial of Oedipus; and, when there, had worsted all the sons of Cadmus. So those twain stept into the midst of the place of gathering and fell to, their hands clashing in heavy blows. And the final blow, when it was delivered, was terrible to see. One absolutely deadly blow did Epeius give his adversary, and it was full upon the man's cheek. No more did Euryalus stand upright after that. As when, beneath the rush of the North Wind, a fish leapeth up upon the seaweed-strewn sand of a shallow estuary and the black wave hideth it, even so leapt up Euryalus when he was smitten. But the great-hearted Epeius lifted him up and set him upon his feet: and all his friends crowded round him and led him away, spitting out clotted blood and with his head hanging to one side and all confused and wandering in his wits.

Then Achilles made preparations for a yet more terrific contest, namely a wrestling-bout. For the winner in this he ordained that an enormous tripod to stand upon the fire should be got ready, a tripod worth twelve oxen. And for him that should be worsted he set in the midst a woman of manifold skill in handiwork; and she was prized at the worth of four oxen, just a third of the value of the tripod.

"Up now," cried the son of Peleus, "whatever twain ye may be, who wish to wrestle together!"

Then did the huge and powerful Ajax, son of Telamon, come forward, and along with him came Odysseus the son of Laertes; and these two tremendous ones, the former the stronger, the latter the more subtle, flung their arms about each other. They gripped each other with such power that it was like the joined rafters of a tall house which some very skilful craftsman has been working at so that he could have a home that really gave him shelter from the force of the winds. Their backs creaked; their sweat poured down; many a bloody weal appeared on their heaving shoulders. Neither could trip up the other and at last this uneventful tugging and straining between these two terrific heroes began to weary the spectators and get on their nerves. The two wrestlers themselves got weary of it: and finally Ajax murmured: “You try to lift me up into the air and I’ll try to lift you, and let Zeus decide between us!”

As he spoke, the great Ajax lifted Odysseus from his feet. But Odysseus had so many artful devices, even in such a downright exertion of strength as this, that he struck with his knee or his foot the under-part of one of Ajax’s knees, the part that the Greeks had learned to call koleeps — a queer word that may have come down from such sports as these, held in that part of the country, in far more ancient days. But from whatever source came the word, this pressure or this blow upon the koleeps of Ajax ended the struggle, for they both fell to the ground, Ajax backwards and Odysseus on his adversary’s chest. From this position the latter soon rolled off, and they lay both together prostrate in the mud. But in spite of this they soon began to get up and evidently were ready to begin all over again. But Achilles wisely came up to them and stopped it.

“You are both in pain,” he told them, “and it is clear to us that neither of you is better than the other. So get up, and you shall each of you have a first prize.”

Then Achilles brought out prizes for a foot-race; and again Odysseus offered himself, and his rivals on this occasion were two, Ajax, the son of Oïleus, and once more Antilochus, the son of Nestor. In a row they stood, these three runners; and the moment they started Ajax, the son of Oïleus, took the lead. His power of running seemed miraculous, so fast he went. Then behind him came Odysseus, and behind him, in the third place, Antilochus. It was soon clear to me, the divine Aether, that the crowd of onlookers wanted Odysseus to win, a desire which, when it was all over, Antilochus himself put into words. Fast, behind Ajax, Odysseus ran, and it must have struck everyone’s mind that, after his terrific wrestling bout with the other Ajax, he showed astonishing spirit to be able to compete in running at all. Nearer and nearer he got to Ajax, till at last his very breath touched the back of the other's neck, so that their rhythmic motion became like that of a beautifully girdled woman as she weaves, when she draws the rods towards her breast so that she can pass the spool with the woof-thread between the threads of the warp as they hang down.

As the three of them, still in the same order in which they started, drew near to the winning post, Odysseus prayed desperately in his heart to Athene to help him to win; and I, the divine Aether, was interested to note that, although his prayer was uttered in his heart in complete silence, Athene heard him and quickly and skilfully answered his prayer. Fate made it easy for her to do this, because at that moment they were passing in their race the place where Achilles had sacrificed and disembowelled several great bulls in honour of Patroclus. Into this foulness the son of Oileus tripped and fell, filling his mouth with filth. Thus it was that Odysseus won, and he took as his prize a silver mixing-bowl, the loveliest in the world, which had been made by the Sidonians, who surpass all in such work.

As for poor Ajax, he was still spitting out the filth as he grasped one of the horns of the great ox that was the second prize. I, the divine Aether, find myself often wondering whether the childish cry that the Achaeans utter when their feelings are hurt has come down to them from an earlier race who lived in Hellas long before them, or whether it was the presence, ruling over them, of a race of benevolent giants that evoked from them this childish little outcry; for certainly this "O popoi!" now uttered by Ajax suggests the protest of an infant. And evidently, as Homer tells us, when Ajax finished by saying that Athene treated Odysseus as a mother treats a child, there was quite a ripple of laughter from the crowd.

Antilochus must have thought within himself: “O popoi*!* Now they’re all in a laughing mood, what in the name of great Zeus can I say? I know it’s only polite to make some little speech, especially as I’m to get such a good last prize as a halftalent of gold.”

So for a moment he pondered, but then the wisdom he had inherited from old Nestor came to his aid, for it suddenly occurred to him that it was the organizer of these games and above all of this foot-racing match, who was the best runner of them all; and so he made a charmingly flattering little speech, pointing out to the laughing crowd that, while Ajax was only a little older than he was himself, Odysseus belonged to an older generation altogether, and it was astounding how vigorous he was considering his years: “so much so that he beats us all at this game, except always, of course, our incomparable Achilles.”

It was, of course, only I, the immortal Aether, who realized the intense delight with which this hard-hearted, incredibly selfish, grotesquely narrow-minded Achilles received this compliment. I feel that such delight as his ought to have made me sympathetic towards him, if only a little, for it certainly did show a positively boyish pride in the fact that there was not a man or a woman among all the citizens of Troy who did not know that this son of Peleus was the fastest runner at that time in the whole western world. His pleasure was shown in his reply to the polite little speech by Antilochus.

“Not in vain,” he cried to that young man, “shall your word of praise be spoken. Nay! I will add to your prize a half-talent of gold!”

This meant, since his prize as the last in the race of those three was already half-a-talent, that Antilochus went off happily with a whole talent of gold.

The next contest devised by Achilles in these dangerous games in honour of the dead Patroclus was one to which the onlookers soon put an end. I, the Aether, know very well, through my gift for reading men's hearts and minds, that Achilles proposed it with a secret hope that one or other of his rivals in arms might be slain or severely wounded in its performance. The reward he offered did indeed suggest what dark thoughts passed through his mind, for it was nothing less than the shield and spear of Sarpedon taken from him by Patroclus, and since Sarpedon was the son of Zeus, the offering of his shield and spear brought Zeus into it as much as the offering of a shield of Hector would have brought Priam into it. The crowd was evidently deeply shocked by what followed, though they interfered in time to prevent either of the spearmen from being hurt. The two spearmen who contested were none other than Telamonian Ajax and Diomed, son of Tydeus — in other words, the most formidable fighters, apart from Achilles himself, of all the Achaeans and Hellenic warriors. In this painful duel, naturally extremely distressing to every man who witnessed it — for here were the best fighters the Greeks had struggling to injure each other — Ajax, possibly not oblivious to the foolishness and indeed the wickedness of such an encounter, deliberately aimed at the other's shield which, with the help of the corselet beneath, resisted the spear. But the son of Tydeus made no attempt to pierce with his spear the great shield of Ajax. Instead of doing this he kept the point of his spear quivering and hovering above the shield, searching for a spot where he could reach his opponent's neck. The two of them had had three clashes already without a drop of blood being spilt, when the spectators felt they had had enough, and rushing forward, put a stop to that whole distressing contest.

The next piece of sport in these less than reverential and worse than lively contests was "throwing the iron", in other words a contest as to who could fling furthest a large block of iron. The curious adjective autochoônos applied to this heavy block of iron-ore, suggests that the thing may have been a meteorite. The words used by Achilles in his praise of this singular object suggest that whoever threw it furthest might keep it, and that, its size being so great, the winner would be able to extract from it iron enough to mend all the implements used on a farm. Polypoetes, Leonteus, Telamonian Ajax, and Epeius, one by one flung this massive meteorite; and the winner, who was Polypoetes, impressed the crowd so much by the distance he could hurl this enormous weight that there was more shouting and more cheering than for any other achievement in that whole sequence of games.

The next competition arranged by Achilles was in archery; and this indeed was a contest in which all human beings, as well as gods and goddesses, of all the tribes on earth, would naturally — and we have only to think of Leto, or Latona, mother by Zeus himself of Apollo and Artemis, to realize this — take a lively interest. For prizes in this game the first prize was no less than ten double axes, and the second prize was no less than ten single axes. The target was fastened to a tall ship’s mast stuck fast in the sand. It was a trembling pigeon tied to this mast by a string which was fastened to its foot. The first prize, Achilles explained to them, would go to him whose arrow struck the trembling pigeon; while the second prize would go to him whose arrow tore apart the string by which the bird was tied to the mast. Teucer and Meriones were the competitors. They took lots and shook them in a bronze helmet, and the first shot fell to the lot of Teucer. He missed the bird but cut the cord by which it was tied, and the bird darted up towards the sky and the cord dangled towards the earth. But the bird was still visible outlined against a cloud and Meriones snatched the bow from Teucer’s hand and with an arrow he had been holding in his own hand while Teucer aimed, he shot at the bird. The arrow struck the pigeon under its wing and fell at his own feet; while the bird, after settling for a second or two on the top of the mast with its head drooping, sank to the earth and died. Something about this event, whether the death of the pigeon who seemed so near escaping, or the rapidity of Meriones bow-shot or the strange fact that his arrow after killing the bird returned of itself to him and entered the ground at his feet, seemed to awe the crowd and they gazed at those two men with wonder.

Then, as the last act of the Games in honour of Patroclus, Achilles brought forth the prizes for javelin-throwing. For this contest there were only two competitors, wide-ruling Agamemnon and Meriones the heroic comrade in arms and esquire of Cretan Idomeneus, the son of Deucalion, the son of Minos. It was at this point that I, the immortal Aether, knew that the folk were weary and that the whole crowd longed for the end of the Games. I therefore felt immense relief when Achilles, who must have suspected what I knew, brought the thing politely to an end by offering Agamemnon one prize, a new cauldron embossed with flowers, and Meriones the other, a long-shadowing spear. And it was under my special inspiration that the exquisite cauldron was finally handed over to Talthybius, the herald.

BOOK XXIV

I CONFESS THAT I, the immortal Aether, was more surprised than I've ever been surprised before over what I now perceived, while the new day's dawn became a portion of my natural insight. I had always known how incalculable was the heart of Achilles, but what I saw now astounded me. I knew he would sorrow for his friend Patroclus; but I, who have pierced the hearts of both mortals and immortals as they never have been pierced before, saw that Achilles' sorrow surpassed any sorrow I have ever seen. Each of his comrades went home to his ship or to his hut to enjoy his supper and to sink into the sweetness of deep sleep. But in vain did Achilles turn as he lay, now upon his side, now upon his back, now upon his face. Sleep would not come. He could only think of his dead friend and of all they had endured and enjoyed together by land and sea. He could only think of him and weep bitter, bitter tears. Then he got up on his feet and walked wildly and desperately up and down the sea-shore. Then he yoked his pair of horses, tied the body of Hector to the back of his chariot and dragged it round and round the great Funeral-Mound, the upraised sign for all posterity. Then he lay down again in his hut, having brought the two sides of his nature, his love for his friend and his savage anger against the man who had killed him, a little closer together.

But never did Apollo desert Hector. He threw his golden aegis round him in such a way as to avert any disfigurement or mutilation or befouling. And Aphrodite, who hadn't forgotten the judgment of Paris when that beguiler of girls chose her in preference to Hera and Pallas Athene, persuaded Hermes Argeiphontes, the clear-shining one, to hide Hector's body. This proceeding was infuriating to the gods on the side of the Greeks, who were only waiting to rejoice at the destruction of the city of Troy. Nothing, however, was done for twelve whole days, and then at last Phoebus Apollo, weary of having to guard Hector's body from the wrath of Achilles, lifted up his voice upon Olympus and protested before all the immortals.

"Shame upon ye, O ye gods. Workers of evil are ye! Hector has always offered huge burnt offerings to you. And now, instead of giving his body back to his wife, you are allowing Achilles to deface and defile it for his cruel revenge! Why do you refuse to give his body back to his wife and his child and his father and his mother? He has always served you well and prayed to you and sacrificed on many altars to you and worshipped you in his heart, and this is how you forget him and let Achilles mutilate his corpse! I am ashamed of you, ye gods! It is the pitiless Achilles, whose heart contains no drop of mercy, whom you are glad to support. Achilles' heart is set on cruelty. He thinks only of eating his enemies. He is like a hungry lion that leaps among a throng of men or a flock of sheep, careless which it be, as long as he has his fill of flesh to devour and of blood to drink!"

Unable to resist the anger she felt, white-armed Hera cried aloud in her indignation: "Do ye dare, ye gods, to give equal honour to Hector and Achilles? Don't you know that, whereas Hector's mother is just an ordinary mortal, who suckled Hector at an ordinary woman's breast, Achilles' mother is the great sea-goddess Thetis, whom I myself fostered and gave to Peleus, whom we all loved, to be his wife. And don't you remember, you faithless one, their wedding feast, to which we all went, and to which you yourself took your lyre to delight them with music?"

It was then that Zeus himself, the cloud-gatherer, lifted up his voice against his wife.

“I am not attempting,” he declared, “to argue that Hecabe, the wife of Priam, is the equal of Thetis, the wife of Peleus. The one is mortal, the other immortal. But all the same, Hector has always been dear to us gods because of the constancy of his prayers to us and of his offerings on our altars. I wish one of you gods would call Thetis to come to me, that I might speak to her a word of wisdom and beg her to persuade Achilles to accept gifts from Priam and restore to him and Hecabe the corpse of their son.”

Taking this hint from the all-powerful Father, storm-footed Iris darted down to the sea, and midway between Samos and Imbros she plunged under the deep waters and entered the hollow cave of Thetis and of her sister-goddesses the Nereids. Iris found her lamenting the fate of her son Achilles, whom she knew to be fated by his keer or death-destiny never to see his home again. And all the other daughters of the Old Man of the Sea were gathered round her weeping too, for the Nereids are happy when one of them is happy and sad when one of them is sad.

“Thetis,” cried Iris to her, “Zeus whose schemes stretch into eternity calls you to him!”

Thetis rose up and looked at Iris as that heavenly messenger stood at the entrance to the cave.

“What,” Thetis cried, “does this terrifying god want with me? I feel too troubled in my heart about my son to want to face all those immortal gods crowded together on Olympus. But there it is! I’d better come if he has sent you for me.”

Thus speaking, she covered herself with the darkest veil that has ever been seen on land or at sea, and with this muffling her slender body she followed Iris forth out of the cave. The waters divided before them and they soon left the sea behind.

Under the guidance of Iris they flew up into the sky, and when they approached the mighty son of Cronos, lo! he was closely surrounded by all the immortals, and Athene moved aside so that Thetis could be seated and Hera, the Queen of Heaven, put a golden cup of rich red wine into her hand and greeted her with cheering words. Then there was silence among them all till Zeus himself spoke.

"I know you have been feeling sad about your son, I know it without your telling me. We have had fierce differences of opinion up here about the body of Hector and your son's treatment of it. Some of the gods are all for sending Hermes Argeiphontes to hide the corpse from the eyes of your mighty swift-footed son. But I myself want to keep for the generations of the future the tradition of man's worship of you and love of you." And then after a serious pause the Father of all and the Lord of all spake to her again. "Go, dear child, straight to your son Achilles and tell him that I am angry with him for keeping the body of Hector by the ships. Tell him that I shall now send Iris to Priam to bid him go with many rich gifts to the ships of the Achaeans so that he may offer to your son a worthy ransom for the corpse of Hector and carry it home to Hector's mother, Hecabe, and to Andromache and Astyanax, Hector's wife and son."

Hearing this from the almighty one, Thetis darted down from the peak of Olympus to her son's hut. Him she found groaning as despairingly as ever while round him his companions were preparing their morning meal, the main portion of which was to be carved from the body of a great shaggy ram which they had just slaughtered. Thetis at once sat down by his side and stroked him with her hand and murmured his name softly and tenderly.

"O my son," she sighed, "how long will you go on devouring your heart with weeping and sorrowing and taking no thought of food or sleep? Better for you would it be to make love to a girl in your bed than to go on like this.

But listen, my precious child, for I bring a message from the Lord of us all to you. And remember, son of my heart, that you yourself are even now drawing close to your own death. Such, as I keep telling you, and you know well yourself, such is your fatal keer, which no mortal born on this earth has ever escaped, nor will escape, until the end of time. But listen now, my precious. Zeus, the Lord of Heaven, has sent me to tell you that he is angry with you for keeping the corpse of Hector at the ships so that in your fury you may ill-use it whenever you feel inclined. The Great Father of us all says that he will cause Priam to come to you here with a rich ransom, in return for which he declares that you must give up to him the body of his son, so that he can take it back to Troy. Therefore, my sweet child, give it up to him and take ransom for the dead."

Then slowly and sadly Achilles answered her: "So be it. Whoever it may be that brings the ransom, he shall take away the dead, if it be true that the Olympian has so decided."

Meanwhile, on Olympus, Zeus called Iris to him and despatched her as his special messenger straight to Ilios, where she was to tell King Priam what he had to do. She found him in the midst of his sons and grandsons, terribly unhappy and with his face and hair and hands all covered with mud from rolling on the ground; and his daughters and his sons' wives were wailing throughout the chambers and halls and passages of his palace. Iris spoke to him in a very gentle voice; yet, in spite of that, a fit of trembling seized upon his limbs.

"Be of good courage," she said to him, "Priam, son of Dardanus, for I come to thee as a messenger of good, not of ill. The Olympian biddeth thee ransom Hector and bear gifts to Achilles that shall make glad his heart. Thou must go alone.

But an herald may attend thee, an elderly man, who shall drive the mule waggon wherein they shall place the body of thy son Hector. Let not death be in thy thoughts, nor any fear. The Olympian will send a great god, none other than Hermes Argeïphontes himself, who shall lead thee until he brings thee into the presence of Achilles. And when he shall have led thee into the hut, neither shall Achilles slay thee nor suffer any other to slay thee; for not without wisdom is he nor entirely hardened in wickedness."

When she had spoken, swift-footed Iris departed. But the king bade his sons prepare the light-running mule waggon, and on the waggon fasten a wicker box to receive Hector's body. And he called in to him Hecabe his wife, and he went in to the vaulted treasure chamber. But Hecabe was shocked and horrified.

"Your heart is of iron," she cried in dismay. "Do you really talk of going alone into their camp and of facing this man who has killed so many of your sons?"

Shrill were the cries Hecabe uttered as thus she spoke to him. But he would not heed.

"Don't you, my dear wife, be a bird of ill omen to me in my own halls," was all he replied. "If he kills me, well and good. I shall at least have clasped our dear son once more in my arms, and all wailing for me will be over."

Thus speaking, he drew forth from the chests in his treasury twelve robes, twelve tunics, twelve cloaks, twelve coverlets, twelve mantles; and he brought forth ten talents of gold, two tripods, four cauldrons and, the best and most wonderful of all, a golden cup which the men of Thrace had given him when he once went there as an ambassador, a very great treasure.

As soon as he came forth to the gate he saw that a crowd of sightseers had collected, full of curiosity. These he angrily drove away with his royal staff. Then he turned indignantly upon his own sons, upon Paris and Helenus and Agathon and Pammon and Antiphonus and Polites, good at the war cry, and Deïphobus and Hippothous and lordly Dius. To these nine their old Father, King Priam, uttered in his grief for Hector words that must have hurt the feelings of these young men not a little. It must be remembered that Priam was very old and that he was already irritated by the lack of sympathy which Hecabe had shown in this venture of his. But certainly his words were unkind.

"Wretched children," he shouted, "would to heaven the whole lot of you had perished rather than my noble Hector. And not only he. I tell you the only brave sons I have among you all are dead. Mestor is dead. Troilus is dead. Yet you nine images of shame are all left alive! Hear me now! Do you see all these things? These things are the greatest treasures Hecabe and I possess! Well! I am going to carry them to the enemy's ships and offer them to this murderer Achilles as a ransom to persuade him to give back the body of Hector. Now what I want is only a mule-waggon with peirintha, and this peirintha, or wicker-case, must be carefully fastened upon its floor and must be large enough to contain the body of my dear, true, heroic son Hector."

Troubled as the nine sons were by their father's words, they obeyed him in every detail. They brought out the light-running mule waggon and the mules to draw it, and they prepared the peirintha, or wicker-case, for the body of the dead and fastened it firmly within the waggon. And the elderly herald, Idaeus, mounted the waggon to drive the mules and behind the waggon came the car and its two horses which the old King Priam was prepared to drive, and a mighty lash it was that he wielded in his hand, to make them keep up their speed. It was at the very moment of their starting that Queen Hecabe came up to them and stood in front of her husband's horses, carrying a golden cup full of rich wine so that he might pour out a libation to the gods. And she implored her husband to pray to Zeus to send down one of his largest eagles and cause it to descend on their right as the mule waggon in front and the king's car behind drove forward.

In obedience to his wise lady, Priam bade the girl-attendant of his Tamiee, or housekeeper, to bring him a basin of water, and standing in the middle of the courtyard he first washed his hands and, after that, he poured out the wine from the golden cup as a libation to Zeus. Then, when Hecabe had carried away the golden cup and the housekeeper's maid had removed the basin, he prayed earnestly to the Divine Father with his face uplifted to heaven. Then, mounting into his car behind his horses, while the mule-waggon was driven ahead by the aged herald, he beheld, as indeed did the whole city of Troy, a gigantic black eagle descend from Mount Ida and sweep down upon the right-hand side of their advance.

As Zeus, the Father of gods and men and the son of Cronos, looked down upon Troy-land and the shore of the Hellespont, he suddenly felt seized with pity when he saw these two very aged men, Idaeus and Priam, driving across the plain while darkness was rapidly covering both land and sea. Feeling thus, the All-Father called to his son Hermes and said to him: "Hermes, my dear child, you know better than any of us how to deal with these difficult mortals. Yes, you know how to treat them as if you were one of them. And you are skilled in guiding them whither they ought to go. You indeed are their true Eriounios, or Helper. Now please go down to the plain of Troy and guide King Priam and his old herald, Idaeus, safely through the Achaean tents unseen by anyone, till you lead him to the hut of Achilles near which the heroic Hector lies dead, his corpse having been preserved from Achilles' mutilations by Apollo."

Hermes Argeiphontes, or Hermes the bright-shining one, put on his golden immortal sandals that would carry him over land and sea, and took with him his magic wand that had the power of making people sleep who were awake and wake who were asleep, and with this in his hand he darted down to the Trojan shore where it stretched along the waves of the Hellespont. Once in the path of the two old men, Priam with his horses and the herald with the mule-cart, Hermes took the likeness of an extremely handsome and very attractive young prince. When first he caught sight of him, King Priam was thoroughly scared, more so, it would seem, than the old herald. But the beautiful youth did not take long in allaying the old man's fears, which he did very artfully, calling himself a Myrmidon, inventing a name for his own father and refusing a valuable bribe which the old monarch offered him. In fact, it wasn't long before he had mounted into Priam's chariot, grasped both whip and reins, and was driving, followed closely by the old herald in the mule-waggon, to that portion of the Greek encampment where stood the unusually large erection which his skilful Myrmidon subjects had built for the son of Peleus. When at last they had got round the Ditch and the Embankment by driving close to the sea's edge, Hermes pulled up the chariot in front of the abode of Achilles and leapt to the ground. Then he spoke to Priam. "I who have come to help thee," he said, "am an immortal god, even Hermes, for the Father sent me to guide thee on thy way. But now I will go back. But go thou in and clasp the knees of the son of Peleus and implore him to grant thy request. Implore him by his father and by his lovely-haired mother and by his son; for an appeal such as that will move his heart."

Hearing these words, old Priam descended from the chariot and left Idaeus, the herald, to look after both the two horses and the two mules. Quite alone the old king went straight into this dwelling which had been built for Achilles by his Myrmidons on the shore, not far from the ships. Within the spacious drinking hall he found Achilles with his charioteers Automedon and Alcimus. Achilles was sitting apart by himself, however, so that old Priam had no difficulty in going straight up to him. Achilles had only just finished a rich supper provided by his two charioteers, and the table was just by his side upon which this good meal had just been served. Unseen by the two squires, Priam hurried straight up to Achilles, fell on his knees at his feet, and, clasping his knees as Hermes had advised him to do, he kissed those murderous hands that had killed his fifty sons.

"O son of Peleus, for the sake of your father and mother have pity on me!" he cried. "Nineteen of my sons had Hecabe for their mother, and the rest were born, during O so many years, of serving girls in our halls. Have pity on me, Achilles, slayer of my sons! No other aged man in the wide world, I swear, has had the experience I have had: first to have begotten so many sons, and then to have lost them, and then, before I can have a fire and a mound for the last and best and dearest of all, to be doomed to kiss the hands of his slayer! O pity me, for the sake of your father, thou son of Peleus!"

Achilles rose and lifted Priam to his feet and led him to a chair. I confess that I, the immortal Aether, when I first saw that the thought of his father and his home, neither of which, as he himself knew well, he would ever see again, had brought on a burst of tears from the depth of Achilles' heart, was unable to suppress my pity for both these men. There was, however, one very dangerous moment between them; for when the old man refused to remain quiet in the chair to which he had been led and began demanding an immediate sight of the body of his dead son, I could see a terrible flash of anger come into the eyes of Achilles, and with my power of reading the inmost thoughts in human souls I knew that the thought had passed through him that he might add to the death of Hector the death of Hector's father! Aloud he cried to Priam: "Provoke me no more, old sir, for I know in my heart some god helped you to get here. But don't you dare, old sir, to stir my heart amidst my sorrows, lest, suppliant though you are, I spare you not!"

So he spoke in his wrath, and jumped up like a lion and rushed out of the house, and with him went his two squires, Automedon and Alcimus, and they brought into the house the old herald and put him into a chair. They left two robes and a beautiful tunic wherein to wrap the dead for his return; and they carried in to the house all the magnificent treasures which Priam had brought as ransom for Hector's corpse. Then Achilles told his female slaves to wash and anoint the body of Hector before Priam saw it, so that the old man should not by displaying indignation make him dangerously angry. When the corpse was prepared and ready to be placed on the waggon, Achilles called upon old Priam to partake of food and wine and then go to sleep in the portico along with the aged herald upon a couple of beds, with purple blankets and coverlets and fleecy cloaks, so that all cold would be kept away from them.

It was when he had lifted the body of Hector upon the waggon that Achilles uttered the deepest groan of his life to the spirit of his friend Patroclus. "Don't be angry with me, Patroclus, if you hear in Hades that I've given back the corpse of Hector to his father. He's brought me a splendid ransom; and you may be sure you'll have your share of it."

Then, when he was once more back in his dwelling, he spoke to Priam very politely. "Your son, old sire, is lying on his bier; and early tomorrow morning you shall take him to his home. But now let both of us think of supper. For even Niobe, when all was over, had something to eat. Twelve children perished in her halls; the six sons by the arrows of Apollo and the six daughters by the arrows of Artemis. This was because Niobe had boasted her superiority to Leto, since Leto had only given birth to Apollo and Artemis, while she had given birth to six sons and six daughters."

I, the immortal Aether, could not help noticing how delighted Achilles was to remind old Priam of every detail of the story of Niobe; and I soon detected what his motive was. It was the matter of the Stones. He knew well how the dominant emotion, instincts, impulse and life-illusion of Priam himself and of all his offspring was to move rapidly from one action to another, from one deed to another. He knew that there was very little philosophic intelligence in the royal family of Troy. He knew they never pondered over their projects with subtle analysis. Thus to them to be turned into stone would be the end they would naturally dread the most. Aeneas, who was the most mentally active of all the warriors on the Trojan side, although descended from the same ancestors as Priam, was totally different from the rest of them in this. He could philosophize, as the pathetically downright Hector never could.

But now between Priam and Achilles the natural and innocent satisfaction of enjoying a good meal made them forget their tragic situation. A simple man-to-man honest friendliness soon gave the tone to the whole atmosphere of that late supper of which they all proceeded now to partake. Achilles killed a sheep. His companions flayed it and cut it into the accustomed portions and roasted it over their hot fire. And then, when the meat was ready, Achilles himself served it as they all sat round the table, and Automedon, his charioteer, divided the bread and placed it on the table at each man's side in delicate baskets, while wine was served to all. It was then, in the free and easy talk which followed, that the notorious entertainer and his aged guest really had time to take in each other's personality. Priam wondered at the extraordinary beauty, both of face and figure, of the killer of his sons, and Achilles for the first time was really made aware of the dignity and grace of the aged monarch of Ilios. When their late supper was entirely over, Priam spoke firmly and gently.

“Let me now lie down if you will and take my rest.”

Achilles courteously obeyed him and bade his two squires and his household maidens to arrange those two beds in the porch for Priam and his aged herald, so that the sea air should not hurt them. He told them to make sure that the two old men were perfectly warm in blankets and coverlets and cloaks of thick sheep’s wool. He explained to Priam that the reason why he and the old herald were to sleep in the portico instead of inside the hall was lest Agamemnon should hear of it and by making a fuss spoil all their mutual arrangements.

“How long,” he politely asked Priam, “would you like me to hold back the battle so that you and your lady can bury your son with all the appropriate ritual?”

Priam explained at once that to bring down the firewood from the mountain and make the accustomed lamentation would take nine days, and then they would have the funeral feast on the tenth day, and on the eleventh raise up the burial mound.

“So if in your great courtesy, Achilles,” he said, “you really can hold back the fighting as long as that, by the time the twelfth day arrives we shall be ready for what comes.”

“In due accordance with your wish, aged Priam,” Achilles gently replied, “I will arrange it so.”

Thus speaking, he clasped the old man’s right hand by the wrist as a token that the covenant between them was completed, and that Priam’s mind might be freed from all apprehension. So in the porch the two aged men, Priam and the herald, lay down to sleep; and Achilles himself slept in the innermost part of the spacious building, and by his side slept lovely Briseïs.

But while both the gods in Heaven and the men and women on earth slept the sleep they needed so sorely, one Being alone, and he was a god, felt too anxious to sleep. This was none other than Hermes the helper. He felt responsible for the safety of Priam, having been the one to bring him here, and he knew too much about the arbitrary ways of Achilles and his Myrmidons to feel quite happy about the old king when confronted, as he would bound to be, by the guards at the gate, unless Achilles played the part of a guide himself, which it was impossible to imagine a man as proud and vain as he was ever condescending to do. So the thoughtful helper, Hermes Argeiphontes, darted down, entirely on his own initiative, and, in the depths of old Priam's heavy sleep in that porch, stood over his bed's head.

"Old sire," he whispered to him, "don't you realise that you are still in danger of your life? Have you forgotten that you are in the midst of deadly enemies? You've ransomed Hector and have paid an exorbitant and incredible price for him; but don't you understand that if Agamemnon finds out that you are here, and I tell you any of these Myrmidons are liable to sneak off to inform him, hoping to get some rich reward, the whole business will be broken up? You may have bribed Achilles with your gifts, but probably he's forgotten by now what you did give him, and he would be pleased to learn that the warders at those great gates, as you tried to pass, had killed both you and your old herald!"

Priam was frightened by Hermes' words and hurriedly awakened the old herald. Then Hermes himself yoked for them both the horses and the mules, and himself drove Priam's chariot through the camp, keeping close contact, as he did so, with the old herald driving the mules. It was not until they reached the ford across the divine River Xanthus that Hermes left them and returned to Olympus. Neither of the two old men could keep back their emotion when, with their sacred burden, they reached the outskirts of the city. But strangely enough no-one heard their murmured dirge, or if they did hear the sound of their wheels and the sound of their ritual chant they did not realise who they were. At last Cassandra, who had ascended the citadel-tower of Ilios, a tower called Pergamus, and who was Priam's most beautiful daughter, did catch sight of them. In a second this lovely girl was uttering piercing shrieks.

"There they are! there they are!" she was crying. "Come, all of you! Come, all of you! Think what this means! This is Hector, our dear brother, himself. He is dead, but he has returned to us! Come, all of you! Come, all of you!"

And out of the gate of the city crowds of men and women poured forth to meet them. Forth came Andromache, Hector's wife, and Hecabe, his mother; and they both flung themselves upon the mule-waggon and clasped with their hands the head of their beloved. Here indeed outside the gate the wailing for Hector might have gone on all day long, had not Priam addressed the people as he stood in his chariot.

"Make room, make room for the mules to pass through! Hereafter shall ye have your fill of wailing when I have taken him to his house."

The people obeyed their King, and when they brought him to his house they laid him in his chamber on a corded bed; and there were the official professional dirge-singers expecting him. And standing around the head of the corpse they chanted at once the ancient long-accustomed death-chant. When they had finished, it was the women's turn, that is to say the women who were the most concerned. And first among them all it was Andromache who addressed the surging crowd. Wisely, calmly, yet with infinite feeling, did Andromache speak before them all.

“O husband of mine,” she said, “thou art dead in thy youth, leaving me a widow in our stately home. Thy son is a babe, born of us two in the midst of all this miserable confusion and, when these invaders take our city, as they are sure to do now you are dead who defended all of us and all our little ones so heroically, what will become of our tiny little child? Will he come to manhood? O I doubt it! I doubt it! For with Hector dead who guarded us all, what will happen now to our noble city and all us women and children? These Achaeans will take me and your babe, my Hector, over the waves to a strange land. If one of them, as we said, doesn’t murder our child because Hector killed his father or his brother, or his son or his grandfather or his grandson when we reach their land, our little boy, O Hector, O sweet husband and heroic war-man, will be put to work at some wretched miserable hard job, wholly unfitted for any boy and a ghastly mockery for your little son! O Hector, my Hector, when you came to die, you couldn’t stretch out your arms to me and utter last words in my ears such as I could ponder on and cry over night by night, as long as I lived.”

Then after Andromache had uttered what she felt, it was Hector’s mother Hecabe’s turn to address the mourners, and Hecabe told them at once without a moment’s hesitation that Hector was by far her favourite child, dearer to her heart than any of the others.

“O let Achilles sell other sons of mine as slaves in the markets of Lemnos, and Imbros, and Samos; you, Hector, at least he cannot sell, for you are here with us tonight, as beautiful and fresh in death as if Apollo had killed you with one of his far-darting arrows!”

It was at this point that I, the immortal Aether, who was watching all this and listening to all this through the wide windows of Hector’s hall, felt within my heart the strange contrariwise thought: How strange, O how weirdly strange it is to think how near we are here to where Argive Helen herself is tending the couch of that very Paris, that crafty brother of Hector, to whose seductive beguilements the whole Trojan war was due, and, if Troy was destined to fall, the downfall of Troy as well, and with it the lamentable death of this sweet war-man Hector who was ready to fight for his native land to the bitter end, and to fight too for this very Helen through the power of whose incredible loveliness his treacherous brother, Paris, had lured so many of both races to utter destruction. All the world can imagine, therefore, what I felt when, lo and behold! here was this very Helen herself come forward to join with the rest in lamenting the death of Hector. Yes, after Andromache and Hecabe here was Helen herself, the third one to address the people and to join in leading the lamentation!

And so in spite of the darkness, in spite of the wailing, in spite of the tragic desolation, in spite of the fact that the palatial hall of Hector and the neighbouring bedchamber where his body now lay were both far from the sky and from the upper part of my celestial kingdom, I was yet able, such is my super-Olympian power, to throw around that whole scene and around all those present a light such as never before was beheld on land or ocean. And Helen, the most beautiful woman the world has ever known, or ever will know, now addressed them with tears pouring down her cheeks.

“O Hector, dearest of all my Paris’s brothers and sisters! When any of the rest — though, like thee, thy father was always gentle — were in the least reproachful, and when I wished myself dead, or even wished that I’d never been born, thy tenderness consoled and comforted me. For thee, O preciousest Hector, I cannot help crying, nor indeed can I help crying for myself; for now that thou art dead I have nobody in all the city and all the land of Troy that is gentle to me or kind: but all men shudder at me.”

It was after Helen had led the lamentation for several minutes that King Priam gave his command to them all as to what must now be done.

“Achilles,” he told them, “has given me his word that he will not meddle with us until the twelfth dawn has come. Take, therefore, oxen and mules and waggons and go to the feet of the mountains and gather an immense quantity of wood. For now we have ten whole days, my friends, to prepare his funeral fire and his death mound.”

Just as Priam bade them, so they did; and when those ten days were over Hector’s funeral was ready. On the top of a staggeringly high pyre of wood his body was placed; and they set fire to this vast mass of wood and burned up the flesh of the sweet war-man Hector. Then they quenched the fire by pouring upon it huge vessels of wine. And when this was done, they gathered Hector’s white bones and placed them in a golden urn, wrapping them up in a purple covering. Then they laid the urn in a hollow grave, and over this grave they placed very large and very close-fitting stones. Then they heaped up the mound, while watchers everywhere round them were carefully scanning all the approaches to the city lest the Achaeans should make an assault. When the great burial-mound was completely finished they returned to the city, where Priam gave them an immemorial funeral feast.

As can be imagined by all who have followed this greatest of all poems with intelligent enjoyment, it was only natural that I, the immortal Aether, should ponder for a while, as I looked down on Hector’s death-mound outside the city-walls, left in solitude while the people were fasting, as to what message or lesson or philosophic truth remained to be handed down to posterity now all was over. And my decision was “None”!

The greatest poem in the world leaves behind no lesson at all. If posterity asks: “How was it that Hector was so loved by everybody?”; or if posterity asks: “How was it that so cruel, so pitiless, so hard a heart as that of Achilles could feel so deeply the death of his friend Patroclus?”; or if, finally, posterity asks: “How can Mercy and undying Vengeance, how can Goodness and everlasting Evil, go on forever side by side?” — the greatest Poet in human history leaves the whole business an unanswered mystery. “Thus,” is all he says, “it was, it is, and it will be! And so we have seen the last of Hector, the tamer of horses.”

BOTH THE NU twins when they first went to School were teased because of their name; but now that they were older this sort of teasing ceased altogether.

John o’ Dreams Nu and Jilly Tewky Nu were now seventeen. Their mother, Maria Tid, before she married Mr. Nezzar Nu, had been so much in love with him that she made up her mind that if she bore him any children she would give them names as romantic and exciting as she regarded his to be. He had insisted, however, because he had always considered the name John to be, both for good and evil, the most exciting name in the world, that their boy should be called John and it was therefore only later, when the boy continually teased them all by insisting, the moment he sat down to breakfast, on telling them the precise details of every dream he had had during the whole night, that Maria Nu added the appendage “o’ Dreams” to the sturdy syllable John.

Jilly’s queer name Tewky had quite a different origin. Jilly had been the name of Maria Tid’s own grandmother, but it was her father-in-law, Grumble Nu, who added Tewky. Old Grumble lived in a room lined with book-cases and books at the top of their house. He was a student of both Greek and Latin, and he had found in Autenrieth’s Homeric Dictionary that the Greek word for something that was capable of doing anything was a word that looked as if it could have no other pronunciation than the word Tewky.

The old gentleman was always being told that his granddaughter, unlike most girls, had a mania for dusting and for using a broom. So he started calling her Jilly Tewky and they all took it up.

Another peculiarity of this original household was the presence among them of Theodora Tid, Maria's elder sister. This lady was always called, by John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky, "Auntie Oh"; and the reason for this was that when their Rector the Reverend Josiah Attic came to call on them, Aunt Theodora would always gravely, respectfully, and in a tone full of reverent awe, keep repeating the syllable "Oh" as often as Mr. Attic made a remark. The father of John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky had himself a rather unusual Christian name, if such a name could be called Christian, for it was nothing less than Nebuchadnezzar; though just why old Grumble Nu's wife, who died thirty years ago, should have called her boy by the name of the king of Babylon was a secret only known to her husband and he was the last person anybody would dare to question on such a subject.

Maria Nu used always to carry upstairs her father-in-law's midday dinner to his room at the top of the house; but he was always present at their substantial tea, which was enjoyed in their dining-room on a big oblong mahogany table at half-past five in the afternoon. It can be well imagined that their house, which was called Morty, needed the constant attention of both Maria and Theodora to keep it clean, not to mention the business of looking after John and Jilly as well as Nezzar, as they all called him, and Nezzar's old dad Grumble; but these two sisters were astonishingly competent and both possessed the same easy-going temper; so that between them they ran the Morty household with dignity and remarkable good sense.

It had been old Grumble who had provided the family's livelihood; and he had done so some twenty years ago by developing a curious vegetable that was completely new to that part of Great Britain and which he had discovered during his travels abroad as a salesman. He had named this vegetable "Gog-Magog", and he had done so because it had been endowed by nature with qualities which gave to its appearance when seen under certain conditions something resembling, although gnome-like in size, the silhouette of a pair of giants embracing. Nezzar Nu had worked hard under his father's direction at planting a lot of fields at the back of their house with this valuable product, whose worth in the market rose higher and higher every year.

The only dwelling within sight of Morty was an ancient building on the top of a hill called Cad Castle, but the Church and Village of Dunnowair were not more than a mile away.

It was on the Fourth of February in the present year of our Christian era that the Nu household enjoyed the liveliest as well as the most controversial tea-party they had had since the year began. They were entertaining at tea their bachelor Rector, the Reverend Josiah Attic, who, led on by Nezzar's interest and by Theodora's respectful ohs, had plunged with more ardour than usual into the most intricate of his theological ideas.

"You mustn't let yourself be horrified, Nezzar, my friend," he soon was saying, "when I tell you that I did get the letter I've been expecting for some while from my good Bishop. I got it this morning. But to my relief it made no reference to what last time he called my 'heresy'. It was entirely about my bell-ringing. What would you advise me to answer, Mrs. Nu? You ladies are often much wiser in delicate practical questions like this than we disputatious men. Would you tell him that Miss Posh is so deaf that she can't hear what I read to her out of the Book of Common Prayer; and if I didn't ring the bell she would skip her only prayers? She herself told me that she never prays except at bell-ringing times. And I ask you would it be right for her Rector as well as her only human companion to deprive such a naturally devout old lady as Miss Posh of her one and only reminder to approach her Maker in prayer?"

"How long has Miss Posh lived with you, Rector?" enquired Mrs. Nu.

“Something like fifty years, my dear lady,” answered his Reverence solemnly, “and when I think of all she has done for me and the parish during those years it seems worse than ungrateful, it seems like an act of Satan, to deprive her of her daily call to prayer.”

“Do you always ring the church-bell at those same hours, Rector?” enquired Mr. Nezzar Nu.

“Yes,” the Reverend gentleman replied: “Always the same on week-days; though on Sundays I ring at a quarter to eleven instead of at twelve and at a quarter to six instead of at six. You see, Nezzar my friend, I don’t have to climb up to the belfry to do it. We have a very good rope at the back of the church, behind the christening font.”

“May I ask you a question, Sir?” broke in John o’ Dreams in an abrupt but nervous tone, as if he had just made what was to him an extremely important move in the agitating chess-game of his young life.

“Certainly, my boy, certainly”, replied the Rector in a friendly tone. “What is it you want to know?”

“Will you please tell us, Sir, what the heresy is that the Bishop accuses you of?”

There was a general hush round the whole table at this; a hush that was broken by Grandpa Grumble rising from his chair and striding with heavy steps to the window. His son Nezzar jumped to his feet.

“What is it, Dad?” he cried in an alarmed tone, hurrying to the window after the old man.

As soon as he’d reached the window out of which the old gentleman was now leaning, Nezzar Nu turned sharply round.

“There’s a light in Cad Castle!” he cried excitedly. “So it must be true what Jilly Tewky heard in the village last night. Yes! There’s a light up there!”

“What did she hear?” asked Grandpa Nu, jerking himself back into the room and violently closing the window.

“What did she hear?” echoed the Reverend Josiah Attic, pushing back his chair a few inches. “Perhaps I oughtn’t to have left Deborah alone when things like these are happening.”

“I don’t think Miss Posh will have heard,” said Maria Nu quietly. “May I tell them, Jilly Tewky, or would you rather tell them yourself?”

It was evident that Jilly did prefer to tell them herself; for she jumped up and ran to her brother’s side. There was a hurried whispered colloquy between them. During this colloquy the rest of the party, including the old gentleman who stood clutching the back of the chair he’d been sitting on with both hands as if at any moment it might be necessary to lift it up and bring it down on somebody’s head, either sat down on the edge of their chairs or stood nervously between them and the edge of the table. It must have been clear to their famous ancestor, Baron Nu of Nil, who calmly surveyed them from above a couple of lighted candles on the sideboard, that they were all not a little agitated. Their guest, the Rector, was the calmest. But even he kept glancing rather nervously at old Grumble Nu and stroking his high forehead with his knuckles, as if to indicate that he could keep his heresies under control without any exterior help. They all watched John o’ Dreams and Jilly Tewky at this moment, as if this boy and girl were the Heavenly Twins themselves that would shortly appear in the sky, not so very far above the mysterious light in Cad Castle which was the source of all this disturbance.

Whether or not due to the presence of their Rector, the somewhat Voltairean cynicism in the eyes of their ancestor found its justification in the fact that most of them were actually in their hearts uttering a prayer, led of course by the Rector’s heart-felt prayer that Deborah Posh wouldn’t hear any rumour of lights having been seen in Cad Castle. Mrs. Nu prayed that the masculine caution of John o' Dreams would prevail over the girlish recklessness of Jilly Tewky; for it was clear to her that they were having a difference of opinion. Nezzar Nu, the twins' Daddy, prayed that something might happen to bring this agitating tea-party to an end, so that he could talk things over with his wife. Aunt Theodora prayed that she'd be able to go to sleep at once that night when she went to bed, and would not dream that the Russians had landed on Foghorn, or that Miss Posh had fallen out of the window.

As a matter of fact, John o' Dreams had, as his mother hoped he would, begged Jilly Tewky not to tell them what she'd heard in the village, or at least not at this moment when they had a visitor with them. But his protest, in their whispered colloquy, had been dissipated by his sister's intense desire to reveal all, and by her spirited arguments justifying such a decision. So up rose the young girl and poured it all forth.

"I was buying some sweets for Mummy," she told them in a high-pitched excited tone, "and some cigarettes for Daddy and some eau-de-Cologne for Auntie, for they sell, as you know, all those things in Slogricky's. And in the shop I found a crowd of people who were only buying little things like soap and cheese and tobacco and matches and cakes and biscuits clearly with the purpose of having a good talk before they went home."

Here the girl hesitated for a second and then laid one hand on her twin brother's shoulder, as though to gain the strength to be bold and frank, evidently completely forgetting that the boldness and frankness was hers and not his. Then she went on, speaking very rapidly, but with the sort of rapidity that indicated a dread at the bottom of her being lest her frankness should be a mistake. But the whole company had now settled down fairly easily in their places, evidently hoping for a long drawn-out story with as many local scandals in it as terrifying surprises.

"It seems," went on Jilly Tewky, "that the owners of Cad Castle are not lost or dead. Mrs. Slogricky said that when she was little her grandmother had told her that a gipsy witch used to live in that tumble-down cottage at Cad's Corner; and she was always telling the people who wouldn't give her money that they'd better look out, as the family who owned Cad Castle were very friendly to gipsies, and when they came back things would be very different in Dunnowair and very different all through Foghorn.

"It was Mrs. Slogricky's niece, Mrs. Scatter, and her brother's child, Tony Scrump, who saw them come. Gideon, the old porter at Gurry's Dock, saw them disembark and hurried home early to tell everybody. He even heard their names as they passed the Customs. He was so startled, for he's a very old man, that he stopped at the "Three Ducklings" on the way back and drank so much that nobody could make out what he was saying, and his daughter had to put him to bed as soon as he got home. But the chief thing seems to be that the new Lord of Cad Castle is an enormous giant."

"What's that?" growled old Grumble Nu, glaring angrily at his granddaughter.

"Which of them said that?" cried Maria Nu.

"It doesn't matter much who said it, my dear," protested Nezzar Nu, "the point is, is it true? Can it be that we really are, in this year of our Lord nineteen hundred and fifty-eight, confronted once again by a Goliath. What we must think about, if it be true, is the discovery of a David to protect us. I somehow can't see our dear John o' Dreams filling that role!"

"Who was it," enquired the Rector of Dunnowair, "who saw this giant?"

"Tell them his name, Jilly Tewky, before you go on further," murmured John o' Dreams from his place beside her.

"His name," went on Jilly Tewky, with a sigh of evident relief, for in her own mind she felt as though the name of this person was doing something dangerous to her as long as it remained inside her without being uttered, "His name," and she repeated the word firmly, loudly and clearly, "is Urk and he is seven feet high."

There was a hush all round the table. Then old Grumble said quietly, "Put on your overcoat, Rector, and come out with me for a moment."

"If I do that," replied the Reverend gentleman, "I must not take it off again. In fact I think I must really be leaving you now."

He took his large gold watch out of his waistcoat pocket and looked at it with an air of nervous apprehension, as if a refusal to accept the decision of the old family clock now ticking so clearly on the mantelpiece and pointing at seven o'clock were not polite but in the present situation unavoidable.

"Oh!" said Auntie Oh, as if he had explained the metaphysical significance of the Holy Ghost in relation to Time.

"Make him wait, Mother," begged John o' Dreams impatiently, "till she's told you the rest!"

Jilly Tewky shook off the hand her twin brother had put on her arm and sat down again by his side.

"There's nothing more to tell," she said as she resumed her seat, "except that Mr. Urk's children are about the age of me and John."

"You should say, 'John and me' not 'me and John'", protested Mrs. Nu.

"Did you find out their names, Jilly Tewky?" enquired her father, rising to his feet, as indeed everybody except the twins had done now.

"O yes! They were Ring and Ting."

"Which was which, my good girl," growled their grandfather, "and is this confounded giant Urk going to provide them with a governess, or will they go to the village school?"

"I don't think," said the Reverend Josiah, who had slipped into the hall to put on his overcoat, "that any self-respecting lady would take a job where there's no mistress of the house, and only a monster like what you describe."

"Oh," responded Aunt Oh gravely, and in her heart she wondered what she would do if Mr. Urk offered her the post of governess at Cad Castle.

"I'll walk with you as far as the drive-gate," growled grandfather Nu.

"Daddy, you needn't go out at all. It's too cold for you," protested Maria Nu. "John o' Dreams, sonny, you go with him."

Her son got up with obvious reluctance. It was clear that he was longing to have a private conversation with his twin-sister, and to hear, not only every detail of her adventurous excursion, but exactly what in her own mind she herself made of it all.

"Nobody need come, my dear friends," cried the Reverend Josiah from the hall-door. "I've had an exciting evening and now I've got to tell Deborah all about it."

"Don't keep poor Miss Posh up too late tonight, Rector!" was his hostess's final word to him as, with John o' Dreams at his side, who had round his head Maria Nu's "household shawl," the clergyman and his escort went out into the February twilight.

"Well, good-night, Maria. Good-night, Nezzar! We shall know more about all this by this time to-morrow!"

And with these words old Grand-Dad Grumble went clump, clump, clump, clump upstairs to his study.

II

THE LORD OF Cad Castle woke up early after his first sleep in his Dunnowair domain.

It had not been till after midnight that all the furniture and all the beds and all the mattresses and sheets and blankets and “corded bales,” as the poet puts it, of the household necessities with which he had landed were finally deposited in the Castle. The moment he had got past the Customs officials at the dock, he had started hiring local help and had found this quite easy to obtain. Nothing gets round more quickly among us mortals than news of good employment when we are unemployed. Urk, as may well be imagined when the reader learns that he had lived among black and yellow and red skins, as well as white folk all his life, was very shrewd in his summings up of people’s characteristics, and now called upon all men who had helped him instal his possessions to receive their pay. He gave them private interviews in a large room with windows looking seaward which he had selected as his own special chamber. He persuaded one of these men to bring up to the Castle his elder sister Laura to do the housework and his younger sister Jessica to do the cooking.

Considering his extravagant size and grotesque ugliness, Urk’s ways with his son Ring and his daughter Ting, and theirs with him, were much more easy and natural than you would have supposed possible. Both the young people were uncommonly good-looking. Ring was seventeen and Ting was fifteen. Their mother had died when they were children and they resembled John o’ Dreams and Jilly Tewky in their close intimacy. Their mother had been a surprisingly beautiful lady but an extremely eccentric one. Her chief delight had always been in climbing trees and kissing with maternal tenderness, as if they had been her own offspring, the mosses and lichens and small toadstools that grew on most of the trees where they lived before they set sail for Foghorn.

The gigantic and hideous Urk had one singular peculiarity. He had a mania for his own ugliness. One piece of bedroom furniture he had brought with him was a circular mirror, whose handle was so formed that it enabled him to stand it upright upon a table close to his bed's head. Then, the moment he was awake, he would stretch out his hand, seize the mirror and gloat over his own countenance, contorting its hideousness to the limit.

The dominant elements of Urk's appalling frightfulness were what might almost be described as the complete absence of forehead, nose and chin. Roughly speaking Urk's eyes, which were unnaturally large and dark, were set so far back in their sockets, and were so close to each other, that it seemed as though they were an integral portion of his mouth and had been placed in such a position as if to enable them to watch every mouthful of living and squirming flesh which he was devouring. Urk's mouth was unnaturally large for a human being. It was the mouth, not so much of a lion or tiger or leopard or panther, as of a dragon who has come up from some abyss below to gorge itself upon every morsel of flesh covering the skull of the last creature alive upon the earth. Holding the glass before him, Urk watched his mouth expanding and his deeply sunk eyes dilating, as he beheld in imagination the bleeding skull of a hairless creature, which at one moment seemed to him the skull of a man and at another moment the skull of a woman, whose whole body, whether male or female, he had already left skeleton bare, and it seemed to him that as he went on his delight was accompanied by a strain of oceanic music that rose up from an unspeakable depth.

It was still only wolf-light, as the original Saxons and Danes called the first light of dawn, so after struggling in vain to get the full and complete feeling of scraping with his teeth everything from a mortal skull except the bare bone, Urk actually struck a match and lit a wax candle in a flat silver candle-plate with a large handle, which he was wont to carry when he left his chamber. But, as fate or chance ordained at this moment, something about the flame of the candle disconcerted and disquieted him. It made his devouring grimaces lack that primordial pre-historic orgiastic zest which had previously accompanied them. He blew out the candle therefore and replaced the flat candlestick on the little table by his bed. Then he shut his eyes tight and jerking his head on his pillow into its normal position he stretched himself out on his back.

"I must sneak downstairs," he thought, "and find out how the place looks before the sun gets up. I ought to see whether there are any prowlers about. Oh yes! And I ought to see whether this Laura is stirring, and whether that young Jessica has gone down yet into the kitchen. One of these days I must hide in that corner-cupboard in the kitchen and see how this precious Jessica does her little job. Yes! Up you get, you old sleepy-head, and do a bit of observation!"

It did not take Urk long to put on his clothes; for he had long ago, in his life among Red Indians and Chinese traders and Hindu magicians, found out that the best clothes you could wear were the clothes you could put on the quickest. He soon discovered, as he stepped cautiously and quietly down the twisting staircase of Cad Castle, that no living soul was yet awake in the whole place but himself. He accepted this with equanimity; for, although under other conditions he might have felt angry, as things were, it made his present movements easier. After letting himself out of the front door and looking up at the Castle above him, he felt a certain satisfaction that nobody was gazing down at him.

"No," he told himself, "they can't be, for I would certainly have heard some sound."

And he pictured to himself the interior of Miss Laura's room and Miss Jessica's room and of the two rooms with only a door between them of his son Ring and his daughter Ting. He had so devoted himself to descending noiselessly that he hadn't paused to say to himself at any landing in the twisting staircase: "Ah! that's where they put Ring and Ting," or "That's Jessica's landing!" or "That's where I told them to take Laura's things!"

"No," he thought now, as he crossed the broad terrace that surrounded Castle Cad and began to descend the halfdozen steps that led down to the drive. "No, it was as grand a stroke of luck that made me so good at hiding behind doors and walls and windows and curtains, and in cupboards and closets and ditches, and under hedges and thickets and the trunks of trees, as the one that made me good at scaring people in the open!"

Having strode about twenty paces down the drive, Urk suddenly stopped. "What the devil was that place called?" he asked himself. What he remembered in one of his last night's eavesdroppings was hearing Laura, his newly appointed housemaid, tell Jessica, his newly appointed cook, that they'd better have a fixed-up rendezvous and a premeditated hour, where they could always be sure of meeting together every day. He had heard Laura suggest a meeting place that sounded — and now it did come back clearly to him— "Yes! that is what it was, Bubble and Squeak!"

The gigantic Urk stood still and looked around him. "O what a fool I was," he thought, "not to have asked one of the men who were carrying our things where this damned silly place was!"

Urk walked on half a dozen more steps. Then he stopped again.

"If," he said to himself, "it were a spot sufficiently well known to be a natural meeting place between a brother and sister like Tom and Laura, it cannot be hidden in the depths of the forest. Perhaps these trees will thin out presently."

He walked on again. In spite of his wise thought that Bubble and Squeak must be a spot fairly well known in the locality, and not far from Cad Castle, he began to feel irritable and uneasy. He perceived that the "wolf-light" period of pre-dawn was already over; and though the actual rising of the sun could not be seen because of the trees, Urk already felt the peculiarly deep sensation of subterranean wrath that all his life he had experienced at the first appearance of the sun. This was the one thing which his beautiful wife, the mother of Ring and Ting, could not abide in him, and her loveliness gave her such power over him that, to hide his feeling if they were together out of doors when the sun rose, he used to kneel down and press his forehead on the earth, pretending to her that he did this in adoration and worship when he really did it in loathing and hatred.

Suddenly he gave a huge gasp of delight. There on his left hand was a narrow little pathway, and pointing down it was a small, strongly dug-in notice, too small to be called a sign-board, but bearing the words very clearly written: "To the Fountain of Bubble and Squeak".

Urk strode down this pathway, which was clearly a very old one and was paved with large flat stones, many of which were covered with moss. He soon reached the spot, which he found to his astonishment lay at the foot of a tall massive cliff. It was not the base of any mountain. It was not even the foot of a steep hill. It was simply the base of an uneven, rugged, treeless mound, like those mounds in certain countries that were erected centuries upon centuries ago to celebrate the dead — in fact like the mound not very far from the ruins of ancient Troy, raised to the memory of an Amazonian Queen, dead hundreds of years before Troy was destroyed!

Urk had an access of the most extraordinary feelings when he reached this spot. There was a small round marble basin there, half full of clear water, at the bottom of which he could see many tiny fish disporting themselves, and even while he gazed at what he saw, a shining little fish rose to the surface, snatched at some insect hovering there, missed the insect altogether, and once more sank down to the bottom of the pool.

But it was neither the pool nor the little fish in the pool that caused Urk to stand there as if turned into a statue, motionless with a strange awe, such as he had never felt since he was a child.

III

WHAT CAUSED HIM this feeling — and he knew the cause or the two causes, to a nicety — were what looked like a fossilized skull on one side of the over-hanging rock, and what looked like a petrified flower-bowl on the other side of the overhanging rock.

But not these objects alone. Oh no! These things by themselves, as he knew well, would have left him calm and unmoved. It was the fact that at regular intervals, lasting only two ticks of a clock, there fell simultaneously little blobs of earth upon the very broad and flat top of the fossilized skull, and drops of water into the middle of the flower bowl, which was already filled with water up to the brim. The top of the fossilized skull was indeed already carrying a pillar of earth.

Urk divined that these little blobs of earth-mould, carried down doubtless by many centuries, were by degrees forming a massive square pillar on the top of the skull, a pillar of earth that had even now come to resemble a thick totem-pole balanced upside down. But as opposed to this slowly developing inverted pole on the right, the perfectly formed bowl on the left, brimming with water, showed not the slightest change from what it must have become, and in what it must have remained, for a thousand years. For some reason it was the inaudible "tick tock" of those two seconds of time — yes, of that Time-mystery which the human race discovered, or perhaps invented, when it first became the human race — that so agitated the monstrous lord of Cad Castle.

This particular "tick tock" intervened between two events. The fall of a tiny blob of earth upon that massive pillar outlined against the face of the rock and resting on what resembled a human skull was one of these events. The other was a drop of water falling into the stone bowl. Each drop of water as it fell made a splash, and each splash created a bubble which rose and burst in the air. But the weird thing about the whole matter was that, simultaneously with the bursting of the bubble, there came from the mouth of the skull a clear, definite and unmistakable squeak. This startling human sound, emerging from the fossilized skull every time a bubble burst, made evident to the Lord of the Castle the antiquity of this spot. He did indeed now stand in the presence of “Bubble and Squeak”.

Urk gazed spell-bound at the Bubble for several of its “tick tocks”. Then, as he turned his attention to the massive pillar, which was only connected with the rock by a thin spine of centuries-hardened earth-mould, he was suddenly seized with a feeling that he could not restrain. He flung himself down on his knees in front of the fossil skull, and lifting his face towards it, with outspread arms and with the palms of his hands pressed against the surface of the rock, he began addressing it as if it were a living head. And then it came to pass — or was, as people say, brought about — that the mechanically-uttered squeaks of the skull became for the intelligence of Urk a stammered and stuttered sequence of spoken words.

“I cannot tell you,” said the Skull, “what my name was; for I cannot remember it myself, but I was the first man who ever got as far into this island as this. I tell myself sometimes that I never had a name. I tell myself that I was one of the original beings on this planet who first became men. Whether I came here across the sea I don’t know. But it was here I was attacked by a monster, who carried off my body to eat at its leisure and left my head because I was uttering words with my mouth that frightened it. It bit my head off with its teeth. Our eyes met while it was doing so, and the expression in them was like the expression in yours at this moment. Are you a man-eater, or do you prefer mushrooms? In any case, I'm afraid there's nothing left that's edible on my skull. Isn't it curious that I can still squeak? Of course, as I squeak to you it's your mind I am using. It took me a thousand years to learn the trick of using other minds. But the only minds I've had the chance of using have been mostly animal ones, and the few that have been human have not been nearly as clever as yours."

The exchange of thought between Urk and the Bubble and Squeak ceased suddenly now; and for four of the mechanical sounds of the one and the automatic burstings of the other a thought-lull descended upon that spot.

Urk withdrew his hands from the rock and bent like a threatening thunder-cloud above the Bubble and the Squeak. A strange expectation or premeditation of suffused catastrophe filled the air round all three of them, an expectation resembling the sort of quivering hush that follows a volcanic eruption or an earthquake when a second shock may come at any moment.

"Tell me no more," cried Urk furiously, and the Skull saw that he was feeling about on the ground for a stone with which to strike at its face. And then it was that suddenly the whole situation was broken up by the wild rush upon the scene of John o' Dreams in a state of mad excitement.

"So I've found you! So I've found you! So I've found you!" he cried; while the Lord of Cad Castle rose up with only a very small stone in his right hand — rose up indeed so quickly that his left shoulder brushed against one of John o' Dreams' waving arms. But, since the excited boy had nothing in his hands and my Lord Urk had only a small stone in one of his, it must have been an amusing sight for the Skull to see how they each tried to brow-beat the other by weaponless gesticulation. Lord Urk was of course a lot taller, but John o' Dreams had a double advantage, the advantage of knowing more about Urk than Urk knew about him, and the advantage of knowing more about the fountain of Bubble and Squeak than he did. The gigantic Urk straightened himself.

"May I be permitted to enquire," he asked, "who you are who are making such a fool of yourself? Does this fountain belong to your grandfather that you dance this ridiculous dance in front of the first stranger you see?"

John o' Dreams controlled himself.

"It's ridiculous," he thought, "to play the braggart with this great ugly ass when neither of us has any weapon. Of course I could go for him. And I know I could, I could, I could, trip him up and squat on his belly! But what good would that do? He'd still be the same tall ugly devil he is now, and what would I feel if he lifted me off him, and slinging me over his shoulder, carried me off to Cad Castle?"

"Thus thinking," as Homer would say, he jumped up quickly and offered his hand politely to Urk to help him to his feet.

"I beg your pardon," he said, looking up at the other's face, which now hung above him, or swung above him, like some monstrous sign at an inn called "The Giant's Head"; "I didn't mean to be rude. I know you now. You are Lord Urk of Cad. I am John o' Dreams, the grandson of Grumble Nu, the well-known grower of Gog-Magogs. We could see from Morty — that's the name of our house — by the lights in your Castle that you were at home; and my sister Jilly Tewky heard in Foghorn that your son Ring and your daughter Ting were with you there. Jilly and I know Jessica your cook and Laura your housekeeper and we would so much like, if you would allow us, to know Ring and Ting too. May we come and see them?"

John o' Dreams hesitated for a second after this bold demand, while a faint squeak came from the Skull and the latest Bubble burst. Then he looked up, unaffrighted and buoyant, at the hideous visage hovering above him.

“Or would you perhaps prefer, my Lord Urk, that Ting and Ring should come and have tea with us at Morty? We are all together then, for Grand-Dad comes down at that meal, and we would all love to have a visit from Ring and Ting.” He hesitated again till another bubble burst and another squeak was heard, and then he said: “Of course, if you, my Lord, would add your presence to our little party, my mother and father would be more honoured still; but I don’t wish to be presumptuous by asking you.”

“Come with me now then, John o’ Dreams,” murmured the hideous mockery of a face above him. “I’m going back to breakfast now, and those children will be interested to see you.”

Actuated by an impulse within him of which, if he’d been questioned about it, he would have been completely unable to give any explanation, John o’ Dreams cried: “One moment, my Lord, and I’ll come!” And he flung himself on his knees in front of the Skull and whispered into one of the orifices that had once been covered by human ears: “Shall I go with him? He won’t kill me and eat me, will he? And, if I do, what weapon would be the best against him? Should I pick up a knife if I catch sight of one, and stick it in up to the hilt in his left side?”

“Not to-day, boy, not to-day,” whispered back the Skull. “You will have plenty of other chances of doing for him. You must hang on to him for a month or two. If you can force yourself to be patient and to wait for your chance, it will come, it will come! But don’t plan anything! Don’t think of any weapon. Just wait, my boy, just wait. If you wait long enough, you’ll get him.”

John o’ Dreams actually kissed the round hole in the Skull out of which this whisper had issued. Then jumping to his feet, he plunged his hand into the bowl at the moment when a bubble was going to burst, so that the impact of his fingers produced a much larger bubble than usual, which dissolved into the air and seemed to derive a special kind of ecstasy from doing so; not what could be called a positive ecstasy, but the extreme limit of a negative ecstasy. And this having been done, he ran after Lord Urk, who was striding off.

IV

HE OVERTOOK THE hideous Lord of Cad; and John o’ Dreams never forgot to the end of his life his complicated feelings, as they walked together towards the Castle drive and then up the drive to the main entrance.

He said to himself: “This, my friend, is the hardest, the most terrifying, the most important moment of your life. You’ve never been tried, tested, weighed in the balance as you are being tried and tested now. Well, my friend,” John went on, thinking to himself, “here are you, the I, the self, a body with a mind, a human creature with its own consciousness, a personal Being unlike all other personal Beings. You are now alive; and it may well happen that in an hour’s time you will be dead. There was once a person called John o’ Dreams, whose father was Nezzar Nu and whose mother was Maria Nu and whose sister was Jilly Tewky Nu. Now there is no such person. If anybody asks somebody about the soul of John o’ Dreams, the best answer would come from his bones, wherever they were, carried on the wind to his sister, wherever she was, namely, as he has often tried to make her believe, but never has succeeded, that the soul dies with its body.”

Every detail of his entrance along with its owner into Cad Castle was stamped, engraved, printed, burnt, into the texture of his consciousness. This was unusual with John o’ Dreams, for he was generally so hell-to-heaven-bent on some scheme or other that the thing he was engaged on became the room or the stairs or the passage he was treading, obliterating from these objects all but its own image. On this occasion, however, he seemed to be compelled to mark the fact that one of the great, round, golden handles was missing from the lofty door through which they passed. He noticed that the mat inside these great doors was of enormous size, quite appropriate to its place, but he could not help noticing that here and there its dingy squares of dusky brown, alternating with yellowish brown, were stained with what looked like red blotches of blood that in the course of time had darkened into a rich purple. “I expect,” he thought, “that the animals who were killed in the forest, and dragged into the house this way, were creatures with more blood than those who were conveyed more discreetly to some door at the back.”

He was now being led up a broad stone staircase, but he could see two passages leading to the back of the Castle on both sides of the front staircase. “These big stairs,” he thought, “will only lead to the first or second floor of the Castle. Then there will only be a narrow, twisting, steep staircase.” He soon found that his surmise was correct. It was after mounting two flights of broad steps that the Lord of Cad Castle came to a halt and began pointing in different directions.

“To my chamber,” he said proudly. “To Ring’s room,” he said brusquely. “To Ting’s room,” he said nervously. And we may ask ourselves why it was that John o’ Dreams as he looked towards Ting’s room, gave way to the most overwhelmingly rapturous feeling he had ever had since he was born.

Both the doors to which Lord Urk had pointed opened simultaneously. Out of one came a grave, silent, reserved, shy, obstinately and stubbornly retiring youth of about John o’ Dreams’ own age and height. Out of the other came the most perfectly lovely young girl of about Jilly Tewky’s age, not only that John o’ Dreams had ever actually seen, but that he had ever imagined himself seeing in his wildest dreams. He contemplated her with his knees knocking together, his arms making queer little jerks of their own, his hands trembling.

“Are you from Morty?” the girl asked him, stepping quickly to his side.

"That's where he's from!" came Urk's voice from above their heads. "He's a noisy one too: Oh yes, you can see what he is at a glance!"

"I am glad to meet you," said the girl to John o' Dreams. "I have often looked at the chimneys of Morty. I can see them from my window."

She offered her hand to John o' Dreams, who clasped it in both of his and began to lift it to his lips; but before he was able to do this a strange and terrible awe came upon him, just as if he had been behaving improperly to a statue of the Virgin.

"Don't be afraid of this bold kid, Sonny Ring!" put in Ring's Dad, making a gesture towards his son, who had always been his favourite, for there was a certain insight about Ting's glance whenever it met his own that rather disconcerted him and sometimes made him feel actually uncomfortable. And yet of course Baron Urk of Cad was such a towering male animal that the shy, withdrawn, self-centred Ring might well seem almost feminine in comparison. But putting the cause of it aside, it certainly remains a fact that, while Urk felt fully at ease with his son, he always felt a little uneasy in the presence of his daughter.

"Well! well! well!" cried Urk now in the almost benevolent tone which the presence of Ring always evoked: "It's time we all sat down to breakfast."

John o' Dreams was so impressed by the hall where they had breakfast, which was right in front on the first floor at the top of the entrance steps, that for a time, as both Ring and Ting waited on him with charming courtesy, his "love-at-first-sight" for Ting, while it pervaded everything, assumed a less overpowering tension. The roof of the hall above them was composed of impressive grooves and hollows interwoven with knots of various kinds of delicately carved foliage, across which the light of morning, too gentle as yet to be called sunshine, spread itself with pale luminosity.

"Did you live in one place, may I ask," John o' Dreams was brave enough to enquire, in a general question addressed to all three of them, "wherever you were before you came here? Or did you move about from place to place?"

"Oh, we moved about quite a lot, didn't we, Daddy?" responded Ting, handing their guest the milk jug and sugar basin which Laura had placed in the centre of the round table at which they sat.

"Not really moved about, Ting, you silly girl!" protested Ring. "I mean it was really just the same place all the time. We only lived in different huts," he went on, giving his father an appreciative smile, as much as to say, "It's these females who think that the only important thing is the roof over your head, while really, of course, as all sensible men know, it's the ground under your feet."

There was no sign of Laura; and instead of leaving the teapot and hot-water jug in front of Ting, she had placed them, before she withdrew, in front of Lord Urk. She must have considered Ting too young and irresponsible for the important duty of pouring out tea; but she had filled all their cups before she retired, and as the tea was very hot and strong, she had evidently felt that the passing round of the milk and sugar could take its time. Whatever Laura may have thought of Ting's capacity to cope with visitors at breakfast, John o' Dreams never for one moment found his plate that morning — till he was completely satisfied — devoid of several pieces of carefully buttered bread, nor his tea-cup devoid of just the amount of hot tea and milk and sugar that his private and personal taste demanded. "How can she," he said to himself, "read my wishes, not so much my thoughts, as to what it’s the habit of my body to want? She’s got some real magic in her, this girl! She knows me through and through without my speaking a word.”

Meanwhile the Lord Urk was thinking deeply of John o’ Dreams. “How could I best,” he asked himself, “make use of this excitable youth to help me in the purpose of my life?” Had this “excitable” daughter removed her attention from the inmost self of their guest to the inmost self of her begetter, she would have perceived in a flash what this “purpose of his life” was — nothing less terrific, in fact, than the destruction of Everything for the benefit of Nothing.

Much more subtle and complicated than his father’s were the thought’s of Urk’s son Ring. “How can Ting devote herself to a young upstart like this, from a dingy house such as Morty in a wretched hamlet like Dunnowair and in a district as forlorn as Foghorn? How can she do it?”

And Ring picked up a bit of bread from his plate, squeezing it between his finger and thumb, and as soon as it was a hard little missile, with his finger pressed against his thumb, he shot it straight at the face of John o’ Dreams. It hit their visitor in the middle of his forehead, but John o’ Dreams, who had been watching him closely all the while and seen what he was up to, shut his eyes at the critical moment and allowed the pellet to fall down between his waistcoat and the edge of the table. Instead of being angry at the failure of his bread-and-butter bullet, all that Ring felt was the peculiar satisfaction of satisfied enquiry. He had wanted to know just how their visitor would take this deliberate shot of his; and now he did know. The fellow was no fool. He saw and he knew more than you’d expect. Ring was pleased to find him like this. He had made his little experiment and had the answer. John o’ Dreams was no fool.

“I must have a long conversation with him as soon as I can. It is not outside the bounds of possibility that he may feel about things as I do.” He pushed his cup towards his sister, who, stretching out her arm in front of their father Urk, filled it with hot tea, two lumps of sugar and a trickle of milk. Well had she known to a nicety, ever since they played doll's house together, exactly how much sugar and milk Ring liked in his tea. "How shall I put it to this lively chap," thought Ring, as he watched John o' Dreams' eyes wander from face to face, from floor to ceiling, from window to window; "shall I just say to him bluntly: 'Don't you agree with me, Master Nu, that the only thing to do is to observe what happens, and analyse, at every mile-stone and watch-tower and light-ship, all that is going on? Don't you agree with me, Master Nu, that the great thing is to take nothing for granted? Don't you agree that what we have to do is to doubt everything, to question everything, to feel that all the religions of the human race, all the ideals of the human race, all the traditions of the human race, all the basic and ultimate assumptions of the human race — such as the assumption that there is such a thing as Time, and such a thing as Space, and such a thing as the Universe and such entities as Master and Spirit, and Body and Soul, and consciousness and unconsciousness, and finally, of course, what people call Life and Death — are quite possibly completely untrue; and that what we've got to do is to arrange our private, secret, personal life to suit our private, secret, personal self, however eccentric, erratic, absurd and crazy, that self may be? Yes, shall I boldly ask this fellow, this Master Nu from Morty, Dunnowair or Foghorn, whether he agrees with me that the only thing to do is to doubt everything, experiment everywhere, and never take any conclusion you come to, or any discovery you make, as final? Shall I ask him if he doesn't agree with me that the only thing to do is to test everything, try everything, test all men, all women, all children, but take no decision you may come to about anything, or about any person, as final and conclusive. Shall I tell this fellow all that and see what he says? He’s no fool. I can see that. O yes! yes! yes! I must go with him this very morning to Bubble and Squeak and see what he says when the Skull squeaks and a Bubble bursts.”

Thus Ring decided to act unless something unforeseen should intervene.

V

WHETHER IT WAS that Ring's decision to make John o' Dreams accompany him on his first visit to the Fountain of Bubble and Squeak the moment breakfast was over exerted some sort of telepathic influence on Laura, or whether it was that this spirited girl had already decided that she would make Jessica accompany her on a daring excursion before anything had been done to the breakfast things, except to remove them into the neighbourhood of the scullery sink, it would be hard to say; but long before my Lord Urk had retired to their castellated privy, which opened on a narrow passage quite close to the dining-room — a privy which Laura, from her experience of many male relatives, though they weren't giants, knew that he would not leave for some five or ten minutes — the new servants of the new master of Urk were out of the Castle and away.

Jessica had already learnt the purpose of this bold expedition upon which her elder sister had taken her. It was to visit Miss Posh. From their earliest childhood they both had heard about this elderly companion of the bachelor Rector, and as they grew up, though their parents were now dead and it was with their married brother they had been living before that worthy relative, knowing well how it would please his wife, suggested that they should serve Lord Urk, they had been familiar with Miss Posh. Both their parents and their married brother were loyal, church-going parishioners, and all Miss Posh's ways and opinions and tastes, though not asserted with quite the infallibility they would have possessed if she had been Mrs. Josiah Attic, had always played a large part in their lives.

Laura Context was born to be much more of a dominant character than Jessica Context. But it was always a puzzle to their brother Tom and his wife Jane how it was that pretty little Jessica had from her girlhood been such an adept at cooking. In their earliest dolls'-house games it had always been little Jessica who decided what their girl-dolls, Dilly, Tilly, Milly and Lily, and their boy-doll, Silley, would like to eat, and Mrs. Jane Context, who had only four children, all boys, knew only too well that, glad as she herself might be to rule her kitchen undisturbed, her boys would be now as cross as the boy-doll Silley used to look, sitting in a tiny chair by himself, waiting for the apple-tart that never came.

"Don't let's go by the drive," said Laura. "And don't let's go anywhere near Bubble and Squeak, for that's where these kids want to go with John o' Dreams. Let's go by Cad's Corner and the Witch's Cottage. It's longer, but that won't matter. The sky's as blue as that chair mother bought in Bobblesby and that father hated so. Do you remember, Jessie, how they used to quarrel about that chair?"

The pretty little girl, light and slender as a dryad, tripping by her side, made no answer. It was clear that she didn't want to think about Mother's blue chair.

"Well," said Laura to herself, "if you don't like talking while we're walking, so let it be." Indeed, by the time they reached the Witch's Cottage, the sun was high above their heads, and the small slope, covered with bushes and all manner of tall grasses, up which they were now climbing to reach Dunnowair Church, as she caught its topmost outline against a grand stretch of rocky country leading away to the open sea, thrilled her so much that she herself was glad enough to remain silent.

"What is there," she thought, "in the feeling I get, when I catch land and sea in one great sweep of their existence, under a sun like this that makes me feel as if I were free of my body altogether, and could merge myself, blend myself, lose myself, like a wide airy mist in the earth I'm looking at and the sky I'm looking at? I feel entirely independent of all my relations and friends, independent of all my duties and cares, independent altogether of being a woman or any other kind of animal. I feel as if I were a being, a consciousness, a spirit, quite equal to the rocks and stones and mould and sand and gravel of the earth, quite equal to that round blaze of rays flung out by the sun, quite equal to that blue highway of water losing itself in that far-off horizon, quite equal to the liquid blue of the sky which doesn't seem to lead anywhere, or move anywhere, or be anywhere, except above, above, and round and round and round everything that is! I don't feel at all as if my spirit was fire or water or air or earth. I feel as if it was something else, something that is the equal of these things, but made of something quite different from all the different things they are made of. How can any girl want to be raped by a man? I can understand being attracted to a man. I am attracted to our Rector. I long to hug him and kiss him when I hear those heavenly sermons of his. But to be raped by him! All the blest gods and all the damned ghosts forbid!"

She called after light-footed Jessica, who was already several steps ahead. "Jessica!"

"Yes, Laura!"

"What is your feeling, as a woman, about being ravished by a man?"

Jessica stopped and waited for her sister to get level with her. They were both brown-haired and brown-eyed, and they both had rather oval faces with full lips and long dark eyelashes. Had John o' Dreams seen them confronting each other then, he would have compared them to a couple of seagulls on a rock, rather agitated by the emergence of a large seal from the depths of the sea.

"But we have to be — to lose our virginity, as they call it — haven't we, before we can have a baby? And I'd rather like to have a baby, you know, Laura my dear! I think babies are delicious little things!"

"Would you like to give suck?"

Jessica instinctively raised one small hand with three fingers extended and touched her green blouse on its left side.

"Yes, certainly! Wouldn't you? That's the one thing, I guess, all men must envy us for! Think of being able out of yourself to satisfy the hunger and thirst of such a little angel as a baby is! Yes! O yes! Even if losing my virginity hurts like the devil, I'd be ready to lose it for the sake of suckling a baby! I love babies and I'd put up with a lot to have one!"

"You know, Jessica darling," said Laura, "I think you and I must be a funny pair; for here we are discussing childbirth and babies without so much as thinking about falling in love! Would you like to fall in love, Jessica?"

Jessica bent down, picked up a stick, and threw it as far as she could. Where it fell, there was no stir of any kind. It just fell and lay still.

"Do you know what I think, Laura old girl?" she said. "I think that all this falling-in-love business is silly. If you want enough to have a baby, get hold of the nearest young man you know, and make him give you one!"

"Why don't one of us get hold of old Josh Attic then?" enquired Laura: "for whatever you say, my dear, of ruling men out, you must admit that both of us are more than thrilled by those poetical sermons of his. O no! I think you're wrong about falling in love. I think when girls fall in love, something happens to them. It has nothing to do with the man or the youth or even the boy! He may, as you say, be in one sense completely discounted. I mean it's just a chance, an accident, who he is; and he may be the biggest fool and the silliest stick-in-the-mud in the world, or he may be a grand, swaggering, handsome cavalier or a haughty, sardonic, retiring knight-at-arms! It doesn't matter a drop in the bucket, my dear child, who he is, as long as he's there; as long, that is to say, as he carries on him, with him, about him, the thing that takes our virginity! He can be an absolute nondescript, with nothing about him to attract anybody's attention, but as long as he can pierce our maiden shield, it doesn't matter a bit what a fool he is! No, no, no, you funny one! Discount the quality of your male as much as you like. Make him the village idiot if you like. But he must be there! What you can discount, and I fully agree with you over that, is your being in love with him. Being given a baby by a male is the great thing. Whether you love him, or whether he loves you, is comparatively unimportant. Ask any child whether Mummy and Daddy love each other, and he'll just stare at you as if you were some inanimate Guy Fawkes of the Fifth of November talking about the Pope. The point is that he's got a Mummy or Daddy, and they've got him or her."

The lively young cook and her wise housemaid sister had very little difficulty in getting in touch with Miss Deborah Posh. They had timed their visit so neatly that they arrived at the Rectory at the same moment in its household routine as they had left Cad Castle. That is to say when the eloquent Rector had retired to his particular privy, which was in quite a different part of the house from the one habitually used by Miss Posh, who was taking off her apron and washing her hands near the kitchen sink not far from the back door, which she opened at once on hearing their approach, before they had time to knock.

"Both of you!" she cried. "Well! that is nice! I haven't had a word with you two together since Christmas Day. How are you getting on up there? The Rector was full of wild tales when he came home last night. He said Lord Urk was a giant! But that was a bit too tall a story for me to believe!

Do tell me about him. What is he really like? And what are his young ones like? Come into my room, my dears, and make yourselves comfortable. I've only just cleared away; but the kettle's boiling and we can have a cup of tea and a hot scone or two. You'll be glad of something after your walk."

Indeed it only took Miss Posh about ten minutes, perhaps less than that, to provide for them one of the cosiest little meals that the pair of sisters had enjoyed in peace for quite a while.

"I wonder if he told them at Morty," said Miss Posh in an almost wistful tone, "about the letter he had from the Bishop."

"I think he must have, don't you, Laura?" replied little Jessica brightly; "because when Lord Urk brought John o' Dreams back to breakfast I could see that Master Ring was bent on getting everything out of him he could, and as they went off together, to visit Bubble and Squeak, I could hear Master Ring ask him something about the Rector; but what it was I couldn't catch."

"It must have been about the Bishop's letter," said Miss Posh sadly, stretching her long arms across the little table in front of her, as she sat in her straight-backed chair opposite her fire, at which Laura and Jessica occupied comfortable chairs on either side. "I don't like it," she went on, "when he gets talking about our private affairs."

Little Jessica gave her a quick, gay, almost naughty glance, while Laura discreetly looked down at her plate. But apparently that was a mistake; for Miss Posh hurriedly gave the little table she had been pulling towards her with both her hands a sideway lift and tilt, and rose to her feet.

"Why, I've forgotten," she cried, "to let you taste my last year's red-currant jelly!" and she darted out of the room.

The sisters smiled at each other as Miss Posh came hurrying back with the red-currant jelly.

"I heard Master Ring tell John o' Dreams as they went out together," said Jessica, "that it was silly to bother our heads about the Bishop's scolding our Rector."

"He didn't scold him!" cried Miss Posh sharply. "It wasn't about his ideas at all," she went on, forgetting in her excitement to limit the red-currant jelly to one side of Jessica's plate; "it was about ringing the Church Bell."

"Come on, Miss Posh," said Laura in a voice that surprised her sister by its gentle persuasiveness. "Do tell us, now that we three old friends are alone together, what exactly are these ideas of the Rector that we hear such a lot of talk about?"

"I can tell you all that very soon," said Miss Posh quietly; "but I think you'd better not mention it. It's only that the Rector doesn't believe in God. He believes in the Holy Ghost and he believes in Jesus Christ; but he doesn't believe in God."

"Then he doesn't believe in the Trinity?" cried Laura.

"Then he's what they call an Atheist?" cried Jessica.

"The Rector worships the Holy Ghost," went on Miss Posh quietly, totally oblivious of the astonished exclamations of her two visitors, "and he worships Jesus Christ. But he thinks nothing of God. I only asked him once about God, and he got quite angry. 'God's nothing!' he said. We won't bring him in!'"

Miss Posh put a teaspoonful of jelly into her mouth as she resumed her seat and once more seized her little table's outer edge with her two hands and pulled it's inner edge against her stomach. Then she spoke in a low voice. "He worships Jesus and he worships the Holy Ghost, but he doesn't like God."

“Why not?” This question came straight from Laura, who was now watching their hostess in this perfect housekeeper’s room with a very searching glance.

“The Rector thinks,” she said gravely, “that there are only Two Persons of the Blessed Trinity, not Three.”

“Then it isn’t a Trinity at all,” interjected Laura.

“It’s a Duality,” suggested Jessica airily, spreading currant jelly upon half a scone.

“The Rector says that Christ is One Person and the Holy Ghost is the other.”

“What is God then?” enquired Laura.

“The Rector,” answered Miss Posh, “believes that God is nothing.”

VI

WHEN JOHN O' Dreams was led by Master Ring out of one of the many side-doors of Cad Castle, he was thinking in his heart: "If only I could get a glimpse of Ting I'd sign to her to follow us, I'd sign to her that I'd soon get rid of Ring, I'd sign to her that she'd only have to keep to the trees, yes! to glide, to flit, to slide, to float from tree to tree, so that if Ring looked round as we went he couldn't possibly see her. Yes, I'd make her know by a quick look that Bubble and Squeak shall hold on to Ring, who has no faintest notion of the power of Bubble to lead us to Nothingness and the power of Squeak to lead us to Everything! O yes! I would sign to her that if only — that if once I could get Ring between Bubble and Squeak — he'd be caught for all the while we wanted. He wouldn't see me leaving him, he wouldn't see you drawing me; and we'd glide, ride, hide, slide till the tide of the sea turns you into me and we'd skim and we'd swim to the world's furthest rim till the wind on the dew turns me into you!"

There must indeed have been an extraordinary link already established between John o' Dreams and Ting. Her natural, simple, ordinary gesture of pushing the sugar-bowl and the milk jug the whole length of the table had its significance. Ting did glance through the window as the two men departed, and by this glance she created a vision of eternity for one of them.

John o' Dreams strongly advised Ring to stand between Bubble and Squeak for a few minutes in absolute silence. "For," said he, "there is magic in this place, which, if you treat it very reverently at the first go, as we say in Foghorn, will heal you and help you and comfort you and sustain you through all the dangers of the next two years. Not longer than that, you understand? But it’s not something to throw away, is it, Master Ring — to be free from all our troubles and dangers for two years?”

Ring was evidently impressed, and so as to do what he was told, he stood completely still, watching steadfastly the bursting of bubble after bubble and clearly fascinated by the way these round rainbow-tinted orbs broke into the air without leaving behind a trace of their brief life.

“From nothing to nothing,” Ring muttered to himself.

Nor did he reveal any reaction to the queer behaviour of his companion. For John o’ Dreams flung himself on his knees before the Skull, and pressing his face against it, murmured a long and rather pitiful supplication.

“O thou first of all men to become a man! Thou who didst come out of the sea and did refuse to take refuge in trees like our cousins the apes, keep this man Ring from following me and meddling with my love for his sister. O skull whose voice has become this faint squeak, summon all the rocks and stones and shells out of their passive resistance to the arrogance of mankind, and render them able to dominate and overcome by the spirit of consciousness, in stones and sand and mould and clay, the comical and ridiculous behaviour of so many fantastic things with legs and claws and fins and scales and bladders and feathers and beaks! Please, please help my true love who is waiting for me behind this Rock to have the strength to climb to the top of it from where she is now and to wait for me at the top. O Skull of the first of the race we call men, enable my true love, the sister of this man standing here who is worshipping you in silence, enable her, I say, to reach that stone on the top of this rock, from which, as thou knowest, and as all we conscious beings who live around here in Foghorn know, grows the mysterious plant called White Grass.”

John o’ Dreams was so agitated after this desperate appeal to the Skull that he found himself listening to the Squeaks it was periodically uttering with scarcely more attention than he gave to the equally periodical bursting of bubbles. Then there suddenly came into his mind a most appalling thought. He had wholly forgotten in his agitation an aspect of the White Grass at the top of the rock that made it out of the question for him to allow Ting to wait for him up there. The legend declared that anyone who kissed the White Grass would instantaneously sink down to the inmost centre of the earth, where a monster far more terrifying than Cerberus, and far more awful to look upon than Typhaeus, had its den in that dreadful darkness.

"I'll leave you for a minute if I may," murmured John o' Dreams now, and gave his companion a quick glance. But Ring remained transfixed where he was. He behaved as if John o' Dreams had less reality for him than a curious shadow, which, thrown by the bubble just before it burst, assumed the likeness of a bodiless head.

John o' Dreams had uttered the words, "I'll leave you," as lightly as if they were words in a game of charades, but it was a lightness of tone as premeditated and considered as if uttered by a player in a seventeenth-century comedy, and as he slipped away and made a half circle round Bubble and Squeak and a complete circle round the rock behind them, he felt more self-conscious, as well as more particularly conscious of every movement of head, arms, hands, legs and feet, than he had ever done in all his days. He began to have a queer feeling that he would have been very puzzled to put into words if he had been questioned about it. Up and up he went, skirting groves of trees and piles of rocks and thickets of bramble and gorse. He longed to cry out at the top of his voice: "Wait for me, Ting! Wait for me. Don't lie down up there, whatever you do!" But of course he knew it would be mad to do that, as Ring's trance of reverential silence before Bubble and Squeak would be torn to shreds by such a shout.

All he did, therefore, was to climb and climb. But the strange feeling increased upon him. The best way he could describe it to himself as he struggled with it was that it was a feeling as if his true love, Ting, for so he felt sure he had reason to regard her, was rapidly changing into somebody else. But how the hell could that possibly be? Ting was Ting and he was he. He would be happy enough for Ting to become him as long as he could become her. But for Ting to change into somebody else, into a different girl altogether, that was unbearable; that was terrible!

All this time, while Ting, as John o' Dreams hoped, was waiting for him, and he, as Ting hoped, was mounting up to her, Laura and Jessica were leaving the Rectory, both a little startled if not shocked by Miss Posh's news that the Rector of their parish didn't believe in God.

"Well!" said elder sister Laura, "we had better hurry, as we've got to cook the master a good mid-day dinner, and wherever Ring and Ting may be now, they'll be as hungry as their big Dad by half-past one."

"I put two large pullets in the oven and I left the fire on," said Jessica, "and I peeled some potatoes and got some greens ready this morning early. I guessed, you know, that we'd have a bit of a rush if we went to the Rectory, but I did so want, just as you did, to have a talk with Miss Posh. Think of the Rector telling her that there was no God!"

"I expect lots of people really think that," said Laura, "but they go to church all the same, because it's nice to feel good and holy, and to think of naughty people wriggling and scriggling while devils prod them with skewers in Hell." They walked on a step or two further in silence. Then Jessica said: "If you don't mind, my dear, I think I'll have a climb up Red-Beak Hill before I come in. I feel kind of skittish now, and I don't feel as if I could stand seeing Ring and Ting putting spoonfuls of bread sauce and gravy into their mouths, while Big Daddy crunches chicken bones, until

I've had a bit of airing! You'll find everything ready; and you can begin laying the table, and all that."

Laura quickened her steps without replying. But she turned, as Jessica skipped off.

"Don't 'ee climb down anywhere, or up anywhere, my dear; I don't want any accidents!"

Jessica blew her a kiss and vanished among the trees; nor was it very many minutes after this when she could see the figure of John o' Dreams mounting the hill in front of her, and the sight of him thrilled her through and through. Of course she had known him well, as everybody in that small town of Dunnowair had done, since his childhood, and she had always felt a special attraction to him quite different from what she had felt for any other boy in the place. And so now as she followed him up that hill, feeling uneasy every minute she lost sight of him, a wild rush of young-girl feelings took possession of her. Up Red-Beak Hill Jessica rushed as fast as her beautiful legs could carry her; and there, in a dense little coppice of birch trees, alder trees and willow trees, she caught him up. In a second, as their hands met in a natural greeting, the gradual awakening of the sex-instinct in her mounted up to an unbearable pitch, and reached the brink of an interior consummation that compelled her to cry aloud, in a pitiful long-drawn quavering voice, the touching words: "Take me! take me!"

The birches, the alders, the willows above their heads trembled under the impact of this vibrant cry, and John o' Dreams looked long and long into her face. He could not, he would not, he dared not kiss her, though he made an involuntary movement with both his hands drawing her towards him. But as he did so there rushed through his whole being the image of Ting. His vivid imagination saw her kneel, without knowing the danger of what she did, by the side of that fatal patch of white grass at the top of the Rock. No! No!

No! He couldn’t betray Ting. This lovely Jessica in his arms might be a born incarnation of Eos the Goddess of the Dawn, and she might bear him a son as beautiful as Phaeton, that daimona dion whom Aphrodite made the eternal guardian of her Temple; but he couldn’t bring himself to betray Ting. So he loosened his hold upon her, and turned away from her, and rushed on, up, up, up to the summit of that great rock, and round about him, as he fled from her, especially when he passed a birch, an alder or a willow, the quivering sound of her cry, “Take me! Take me!” echoed and echoed in the air.

But it died away before he reached the spot where Ting awaited him. But she may have heard that cry, and the stone upon which she awaited him may have heard it; for behind her the tips of a weeping willow whispered and switched and brushed against her. Ting leapt to her feet when he stood before her, and they embraced with a bold and reckless hug. “We love each other!” filled the air around them. One of them must have uttered those words; but neither of them, so absorbed they were in their feelings, could have told which.

As he pressed her to his heart John o’ Dreams realised what the full intention of his whole nature craved, namely to enjoy everything, everything, everything that existed or could possibly exist! Yes, to possess it, as at this moment he possessed Ting. The sky all around them, the sun blazing to the east of them, a great orb of fire too dazzling to look at, the curve of the massive earth beneath them, the curve of the sea’s horizon in front of them, the wind waving the grasses at their feet and making the tresses of her hair, as they blew from her uncovered head, entangle themselves with the ends of his school scarf, which resembled, as they flashed about in all directions, a crude parody of the tassels of an Olympian aegis, all these things, as he was now aware of them, became, as Goethe makes everything become at the end of Faust, signs and symbols to him of Something for which, because of the limitations of the human mind, we have found as yet no name.

They were still holding each other tightly, her arms round his waist and his arms round her shoulders, when the voice of her brother Ring became audible a few hundred yards down the hill. Each instinctively drew back, she with a gasping sigh, he with a muttered curse.

"I'll run down the other way," she whispered to him. "Better tell him we did have a talk; but that I'd promised to help Laura with Father's lunch."

John o' Dreams deliberately avoided watching her disappear. It seemed to him a portion of the part she had told him to play that he should now concentrate his attention solely and entirely on Ring. He even descended a few paces towards him, and the moment they met he said:

"Well! I've just had a word with your sister. She said she couldn't wait, because she'd promised to help Laura. My word! But how lucky your father is to have found the best cook in the village the moment he landed. It's a born gift with Jessie, you know! All the boys in Dunnowair fight to get her to make their sandwiches for them when they go anywhere for a picnic."

"Ting can do everything," panted the young climber, out of breath, but loyal to his sister. "Do you mind if I lie down for a bit?"

John o' Dreams lay down beside him.

"Have you heard," he asked him, "about that white grass up there? Yes, you can see it without moving: it's between those two grey stones. They say that anyone who eats a few blades of that grass runs a risk of sinking down to the centre of the earth. I am too scared of these grasses to go near them, for fear I might slip and get them into my mouth. They look harmless enough, don't they, from down here?"

“To whom does this hill belong?” enquired Ring, thinking in his heart: “Oh dear, oh dear! This aggressive boy has already been making love to Ting! Where else will our old monster of a Dad take us? There’s always drama, drama, drama, wherever we go. Ye gods! But I must force myself to watch, watch, till I really know what the next step of this particular cosmic urge is going to turn out to be. What I must remember is that what these silly simpletons call ‘the Universe’ is only one atomic world among thousands of others, others which, if I can only keep in my mind the real significance of the phrase “other Dimensions,’ are probably so utterly different from our little cosmological drop in the great multiversal bucket that we should have to become totally different beings, different altogether from human beings, to cope with them.”

“This hill, did you say?” replied John o’ Dreams, who, intelligent enough to perceive that, after asking this casual question, Ring had fallen into a deep fit of abstracted meditation, replied as flippantly as he could: “O! to you people, of course. It goes with Cad Castle. That much I do know. For when we were little we used to hear all the villagers say that, if ever any Cad comes back, he’ll have to be told that, if he doesn’t have those white grasses dug up, his children, as they explore their property, might easily swallow one of those things and be carried down to the centre of the earth where is the den of a monster. But may I be impolite enough to ask you a personal question, Master Ring?”

“Certainly,” murmured his companion, pulling up his legs as he lay on his back and clasping his shins with his hands. “Personal questions are the only questions I like.”

“What then is your family surname, Master Ring? I take it the name Urk is your parent’s Christian name. What is his surname? What is your and your sister’s surname?”

"Cad, of course," replied the son of Urk. "My father's name is Urk Cad, and we are Ting Cad and Ring Cad. A professor once told me that Cad was British for a battle. So I suppose our castle is the place where some ancient battle was lost or won. Better perhaps say lost, for that would explain the curious tendency all we Cads seem to have to avoid people like Bishops and Rectors and Generals and Schoolmasters and Admirals and all privileged folk. They say the Cad who lost the battle and built the Castle was the grandson of the couple who were the original Bubble and Squeak — Grand-Bubble Lady Nothing and Grand-Squeak All There Is."

"Do you believe that story, Master Ring?" enquired John o' Dreams, recalling in his mind various conversations he had had with the Skull at the Fountain since he was a child. "Squeak says he came out of the sea before the Flood and before Adam and Eve; but I always tell him that the sea wasn't the Creator of Heaven and Earth."

"What does he say to that?" asked Ring Cad.

"He just obstinately repeats that the sea created him and that the sea is neither Heaven nor Earth."

"Well, my friend," said Ring, jumping to his feet, "the time has come for me to run after your precious Ting and see if I can get home before our queer begetter — if he was our begetter; for I sometimes doubt even that, he's such a weird person — begins to bawl for his lunch. Do you folk at home call your mid-day meal lunch, or do you call it dinner?"

"Dinner, we call it. But we know it's much grander and more upper-class to call it lunch and keep the word dinner for what we would call supper."

"Yes," said Ring meditatively. "Just these differences over the names of your meals show how true it is that you people in these Islands are quite as much dominated by what is called 'class' as are the people of India by what they call 'caste.' Well, our Dad may be a monster, but he's never been one for these social differences. What he hates is the human race as a whole! O how he'd love to destroy it if he could! Well, ta-ta for now, my good John!"

And he was off so fast that John o' Dreams was quite scared lest he should see him fall before he disappeared for good.

VII

"WHAT ON EARTH were you shouting about so in the night, John o' Dreams?" asked old Grumble Nu of his grandson when they sat down to breakfast in Morty the next morning.

"Was I shouting, Grandpa?" asked John o' Dreams with a lively interest in his voice. "Did anybody else hear me?" he added, looking first at his father, then at his mother, then at Auntie Oh.

Nezzar Nu looked at his son and then looked round the table. Then he said to his father, "I expect we were all too fast asleep to hear him, Dad. What did he say in his shouting?"

"As far as I could follow him," replied the old gentleman, "and I think it's a disgrace to us that somebody didn't catch what he was talking about, he was saying that he was going to Bubble and Squeak tomorrow with the Rector to discuss that famous heresy which the Rector's always so worried will reach the Bishop's ears."

"What is his heresy, grand-dad?" enquired Jilly Tewky in her boldest voice.

"As far as I could gather, my girl," Nezzar Nu answered on his father's behalf, "from what our friend Attic said when he was last here, he holds the view that we ought to concentrate on the exact words of Christ as the Holy Spirit interprets them to our hearts, and not bother with all this business of God and the Trinity. The Rector holds that St. Paul invented the Trinity, and all that Jesus did was to say that he felt himself to be one with the Father, and that when he was gone, the Father would send his spirit to earth, who would act as everybody's comforter. The Rector holds that, when Jesus was being crucified, he suddenly came to the conclusion that either there was no God the Father at all, and that he had been deceived all his life into thinking there was such a Being, or that the real God, whose realm was both Heaven and Hell, was as devilishly cruel to those he hated as he was absurdly indulgent to those he loved. The Rector holds that the world was not created by anybody but came into existence of itself, and that we human beings developed into what we now are from creatures who came out of the ocean and adapted themselves to living on earth, first up in the trees, like monkeys and squirrels, and then in caves in the rocks, till they finally learnt to use hammers and chisels and nails and cement, and bows and arrows, and swords and shields and spears, and acquired the art of building houses and attacking their enemies."

"But what is all this, Daddy," cried Jilly Tewky, "that teacher used to tell us at school about monstrous lizards and reptiles and mammoths that walked and crawled and flew across the earth before the days of Noah's Ark?"

"We mustn't expect, my dear child," interrupted her mother, knowing only too well what Nezzar was likely to reply to this, "to find what they teach us at school to be the same as what Mr. Attic tells us. Mr. Attic thinks for himself, whereas our school teachers tell us what they find in the school books. I doubt if you'll find in any of the dictionaries the Rector has in his library the long funny names of any of those weird creatures."

"O Mummy!" cried Jilly Tewky, "but teacher used to draw pictures of them on the blackboard!"

"If our fusty budgy old Bishop," growled the girl's father, almost in the tone his father would have used, "were to decide whether to follow the Rector or the school books, we'd hear more about the Holy Ghost than about the Ichthyosaurus. But I doubt if he'd be able to draw a picture of either of them!"

Jilly Tewky hung her head and used the paper and pencil she was holding on her lap to draw a circle, a triangle, and a square. "How much more sense there is," she told herself, "in lines and curves than in pictures of antediluvian monsters and theological disputes between Rectors and Bishops."

"What is your idea, John o' Dreams, in going with the Rector to Bubble and Squeak?" enquired Auntie Oh. "Those two go on always, day by day, night by night, week by week, year by year, squeaking absolute nonsense and bursting into nothing. If you were going to see if you could catch a perch in the Fountain, or see a squirrel in one of those trees, or a water-rat looking for its mate, or get a glimpse of some rare bird, I could understand it; but just to see Bubble dissolve into air and that silly crack in the stone like a skull's mouth go squeak, squeak, squeak! I can't get the point of it. Besides, the Rector must have been down there, O! hundreds of times more than you have! and he must know a hundred times more than you know about the plants and creatures that are to be found down there. I think it's a stupid thing to do to take a learned man down there who knows so much more than you do about the place."

"But, Auntie Oh," cried Jilly Tewky, whose loyalty to her brother not the biggest event or the smallest event could shake for a second, "don't you see, the Rector's fond of John o' Dreams and John o' Dreams is fond of him. It's an amusing excursion for a couple of friends. They'll both enjoy seeing all that happening down there! Don't you see, Auntie Oh, people don't have to be the same age to enjoy things together, if their minds work in harmony and they're both tickled by the same things!"

By this time old Grumble Nu had pushed back his plate and his chair and had walked to the door.

"I'm never going to look at that damned Bubbler and that confounded Squeaker ever again in all my days! They strike me as, as, as half-human, that blasted pair! I know very well, whatever you may have told us about your shouting last night in your bloody dreams, that it was really about that pair down there you were dreaming. I've brought you all up as my precious wife would have wished me to do; but what would she think if she knew that her eldest grandchild was bringing into the family, as if they were relations, this Bubble bursting with nothing and this Skull squeaking with everything! Yes! What would she think?"

This last question was asked of the entire world as old Grumble Nu arrived at the door, swung round on one heel, and banged the door behind him.

"Well, Daddy, I think, if you and Mummy will excuse me," announced John o' Dreams, getting up on his feet, "I'll soon be off now; and I'll be back in good time for dinner."

Jilly Tewky half-rose from her chair; but after exchanging a quick glance with her brother which both of them understood, she resumed her seat. John o' Dreams knew now that she knew he would not be bringing the Rector back to Morty that day: for the two of them had reached in their astonishing intimacy a sort of secret language of glances by which the negative — let all be as per usual — or the positive — we've got to act about this — was clearly indicated.

When John o' Dreams reached the Church, it struck him that the nearness of the Rectory upper-story to the Church tower was closer than ever.

"Of course really," he told himself, "it can't change. As it was built so it will remain; till one or the other — and no doubt it'll be the Rectory — falls down."

He stood still for a moment, observing with intense curiosity the curious little bridge of a couple of feet long, with wire railings on both sides of it, which led from the top story of the Rectory to the belfry of the Church.

"What shall I do," he thought, "if Miss Posh is out shopping or something? Shall I boldly walk in and go upstairs to the study? Or shall I just open the door and shout, 'Rector! Rector! Rector!' I wish I knew which."

But Miss Posh was in and cheerfully opened to him.

"Come in, my dear John o' Dreams, come in. Yes! He's up there, sure and certain! Some professor in America has sent him a book of philosophy of some country called 'Quail,' where, he tells me — though, of course, I am rather deaf when it comes to philosophy — God is the Devil and the Devil is God."

"May I go straight up?" asked John o' Dreams. "I'd hate to make you go up all those steps on my behalf."

"Yes, of course you may. But wouldn't you like a cup of tea first? I've got the kettle boiling down here."

All his life he had been a pet of Miss Posh, and he knew it would please her if he said yes. So yes it was. And soon in the big armchair on the left side of the fire in her sitting-room lolled John o' Dreams, drinking tea and eating buttered scones, while on the right-hand side of the fire sat Miss Posh, having so carefully adjusted her black skirt over her negligible knees that her visitor found it hard to know which of the four straight legs he could see in front of him belonged to his hostess and which to the chair beneath her. At any rate it was clear that Miss Posh was finishing her breakfast, for on her side of the plate of scones on the hassock between them there was only a little heap of crumbs, a few of which at appropriate intervals Miss Posh took up with her finger and thumb and transferred to the lipless slit between her nose and her chin.

John o' Dreams, after his wont, took in everything. Three years ago he had been accustomed to explain at length to Jilly Tewky that, of all our senses, eating and masticating and swallowing was the essential one.

"We ought," he would tell his sister, who listened intently, although quite unbeknown to dear John she herself put the sense of sex far ahead of eating and drinking, "we ought to get the sensation of eating and digesting from every single thing we look at."

Oh, how often it had been on the tip of Jilly Tewky's tongue to protest. "But what about black beetles, and rats, and what we see in the water-closet before we pull up the plug?" When the Rector of the village of Dunnowair and John o' Dreams of the house called Morty arrived at the Fountain, and walking around it, came face to face with Bubble and Squeak, they were surprised to find the gigantic Urk Cad glowering at these two objects.

The Rector was pleased. He had already been introduced to the new dweller in the Castle, and he was very anxious to get to know Ring and Ting, because he felt sure that these young people, with such an appalling monster as their father, would hasten to shelter under the wing of a new kind of Daddy, a Daddy with consideration and understanding, who knows what magic words of Jesus to use such as can make little flames of inspiration dart into human brains.

"And now as I," so the Rector of Dunnowair said to himself, as he and John o' Dreams approached the disturbing figure of Urk, "now as I face this man in a spot known throughout Foghorn, I must ask him to send Ring and Ting to visit me."

“How do you do, Lord Urk of Cad,” said the Rector boldly, “I am glad to see you, as I have a favour to ask of you.”

“And what may that be?” asked the giant politely.

“A very simple one indeed,” ventured the Reverend Attic, “only that you would tell your children to come and see me at the Rectory.”

“What time would you like them to come?” enquired Lord Urk.

“Well, about three o’clock this very afternoon, if that were possible,” answered the Reverend Attic.

“They shall be with you,” agreed Urk abruptly; “and I fancy they’ll be delighted to come.”

“I was just saying to our friend John o’ Dreams here,” remarked the Reverend Josiah, “that we must use all our senses in a beautiful place like this to grasp as much of the miracle of life as we can. What I was trying to make clear to him was that we must turn all our senses into one sense, so as to be able to quaff up, to suck up, to lap up, to breathe up, to inhale, to imbibe, to embrace all the things we feel, hear and see. And my question is this: which one of our senses had we best make the King-Sense of the rest? Some people would say at once, ‘Our eyes.’ But you must remember that our eyes are already included. They are there all right. No! Our King-Sense, according to my idea, Lord Urk, is our taste, yes! the mouth that bites and masticates, and the throat that swallows! All this whole, wonderful, thrilling, exciting, beautiful and ugly universe, which we see and feel, can best be absorbed through the mouth. The mouth is the vehicle of the King-Sense, not the eyes or ears or nose! That is the reason — don’t you agree with me, John o’ Dreams — that boys and girls kiss each other on the lips?”

Lord Urk of Cad, who had been staring intently, not at both Bubble and Squeak, but only at Bubble, slowly turned round now and contemplated the Rector of Dunnowair.

“You and I,” he announced very solemnly, as if he were a world-judge giving a verdict in favour of universal extermination, “are in complete agreement as to what must be done. Where we differ is as to the result of what we have agreed to do. Take Him and take Him,” and he nodded in the direction first of Bubble and then of Squeak. “He says, ‘when I burst all the world, the whole universe, vanishes away.’ But He says — and he glanced with contemptuous derision at the outline of the Skull, ‘When I squeak I show that nothing can destroy life except the “more life” which takes its place.’”

And it was then that, looking from Urk to Josiah Attic and from Joseph Attic to Urk, John o’ Dreams had a queer experience. It seemed to him that he saw in the air surrounding each of those two men a startling reproduction of what each of them was thinking in his particular and separate mind. He saw these apparitions as hovering creatures, undulating, wavering, enlarging, diminishing, expanding, indrawing. They were devoid of wings, but they moved and acted as though the self or the conscious identity emanating from each of them was struggling to act the part they each had advocated while John o’ Dreams listened to them. The one who represented Urk kept wavering and swerving and billowing and hovering and flapping and diving towards the Bubble, or rather towards the spot where each bubble burst and dissolved in air; while the one that represented the Rector kept bending and cowering and cringing and convoluting above the face of the Skull.

“O forgive us, forgive us, thou mighty sea-born!” cried John o’ Dreams, rushing up to the Skull and pressing both his hands against its head.

He did not kneel. He kept his back to both Urk and the Rector; and he knew, without glancing up, that both these hovering shapes had vanished; but the feeling he had at this moment was a feeling of irresistible strength, and it was as if all the air and earth and water in the whole cosmos had suddenly become the material out of which he, John o' Dreams of Morty, could set about creating a new world.

This feeling subsided soon; but the moment it subsided, he knelt down humbly before the Skull and waited for its next Squeak. But what was his surprise when, after its usual Squeak, the Skull in a very low whisper said to him:

"You are the one I have been waiting for millions of years. You know me for what I am and I know you for what you are. Tomorrow, at about this time, come to meet me here. And then we shall see what happens. I have an obscure hope that we may be able to go off together. Speak to none of this save only to your mother; but tell her that if we do go, there's only one thing we want her to do about this, to tell no one, and I promise her that I will keep you safe till we come back."

VIII

THE MENTAL, MORAL, emotional struggle that John o' Dreams went through in his deepest nature when he woke up next morning can be well imagined. He had never in his life told his mother anything that he concealed from his sister Jilly Tewky. From his father Nezzar Nu often! But from his sister Jilly Tewky never!

"But," he thought, "if I don't hide it from Jilly and only tell Mother, the Squeak will know, for I guess he knows all, and he'll just turn me down and refuse to take me anywhere. And O, how I want to go! Never since I wanted, when we were four, to go alone with Jilly to Bubble and Squeak have I wanted anything so much as this! To be taken on a trip — where, where, where, where? — by Squeak his wone self! Yes! By that Skull I knelt to for ten years! And where? What a question! No, I mustn't tell Jilly. But what will she feel when Mother tells her? I suppose what people say people feel when someone they love gives them away! Betrayed! I shall have betrayed Jilly, whom I love best in the world!"

The curious thing was that, as these thoughts passed through his head, John o' Dreams had the feeling that it had all been decided already. That he should hesitate, as he was doing now and ponder on the worst and most shameful aspect of what he was about to do was, he now felt, only an inevitable aspect of what he was about to do, the aspect namely of what he was bound to feel as he betrayed his twin-sister. But he decided now definitely in his mind that this betrayal of Jilly's confidence in him — and what would he feel if his mother suddenly told him that in a couple of years Jilly Tewky was going to marry the son of that Monster at Cad Castle? — was as inevitable as if after a long walk along the bank of a river he had found that the only way to get home would be to swim across. He suddenly felt that, much as he believed in free will and in his right as an individual person upon earth, to act as he thought best, or, “to be more honest”, as he wanted to, there was in life a certain mysterious stream that had to be obeyed, a stream that bore in its irresistible flood elements of what you wanted, and also elements of what others wanted, and, beyond both these, something else, something that swept the whole destiny of a person’s life along according to the decision of an inscrutable fate.

It was a quaint example of the funny little tricks our pathetic human minds play upon themselves that, no sooner had John o’ Dreams emerged from the bathroom, with his trousers upheld by strong braces and a new green tie round his neck which Jilly Tewky had chosen for him at Mrs. Slogricky’s shop, and had begun to search in his chest of drawers for an especial pair of socks which Auntie Oh had knitted for him, than he remembered that by an unlucky chance that very yester-evening he had returned them to her so that she could make them fit a little tighter, so as not to rumple round his ankles. This was an unlucky chance, for the last thing he wanted to do was to talk about his projected excursion before the whole family at breakfast.

“O damn! damn! damn! damn!” he murmured aloud. And he said to himself, “What a prize fool I am to go on thinking about this mysterious power that is leading me on, and fancying myself yielding to necessity and destiny and all those grand rivers and tides of fate, when all these things can be completely side-tracked and changed and confused and muddled-up by one single tiny accident of pure chance! Is it perhaps after all, just pure chance, little accidents like this about Auntie Oh and my socks, that really rule the flowings and ebbings and advances and retreats and turnings to left and right of the currents of our lives? Will it be pure chance also that will decide what happens to me this morning with Squeak? And what about Bubble? Won't Bubble be desolate without her usual companion?"

He resolved to avoid having to talk to them all about this mad enterprise by not telling his mother till after breakfast. But wouldn't that make it worse for Jilly Tewky? No, I must tell her that I'm off on a crazy expedition that I've sworn not to talk about; but she shall hear all about it at tea. "Don't expect to see anything of me, my dear," I'll say to her, "till tea, or till we are alone together after tea."

Both Maria Nu and Nezzar Nu must have known by one of the strange intimations that parents sometimes have where their children are concerned that John o' Dreams was in a state of unusual nervous excitement that morning as he hurried through his breakfast. But it was only at the end of the meal when they all got up that his mother approached him and murmured quietly, "What is it, my boy?"

"I'm going for a bit of a jaunt today, Mummy, so you mustn't expect me for dinner. I'll be safe back again for tea, so you needn't worry."

He moved away from her and walked quickly up to his sister, who had missed nothing of this mother-and-son encounter.

"I'll tell you about it all, my dear," he whispered, "when we're alone after tea. Say a prayer or two for me until then, Jilly Tewky. O no! Don't be scared. I'll be absolutely all right and you shall hear all about it."

He deliberately started off in an unusual direction, plunging into the wood and avoiding every path that led directly to Bubble and Squeak or to Cad Castle or to the Church or to the village. He stopped in one dense thicket to relieve his bowels and urinate, but when at last he did reach Bubble and Squeak, it was with a deep gasp of relief that he flung himself down before the Skull.

"You understand, of course," murmured the Skull to him, "that we shall not go where I propose to take you with the weight of our material and physical bodies still upon us?"

"How else can we go?" asked John o' Dreams.

"You realise, of course," murmured the Skull, "that we all have an aura, thrown by our personality upon the air around us? Well — it is as this aura that we shall go."

"Do you mean that our mind, our consciousness, dwells in this aura and not in our physical body?"

"Yes, that is exactly what I do mean," said the other. "If you really do decide to come with me, it is by means of our aura that we shall travel."

"What will Bubble feel," asked John o' Dreams, still on his knees, as he heard the familiar dissolution of a globe of water into the air.

"O! the aura of Bubble will come with us." replied the Skull. "We couldn't get on without her. We shall depend on the water supply in her aura to fight the flames."

A spasm of terror convulsed John o' Dreams. "What flames?" he enquired.

"The flames of the Sun," replied the Skull. "It is to the Sun we are going."

Never in his life, as far as he could remember, had John o' Dreams felt so afraid. "What a double-dyed fool I am," he thought, "to go and commit myself to this adventure! Only a perfect ass would have undertaken such a thing!"

"Before we start," said the Skull quietly, "we shall have to add one other person to our little group. In fact we shall have to be Four in number. Not, of course, and you must get that thoroughly fixed in your mind, because Christians, in order to make Christ the Equal of God and of the Holy Spirit, worship a Three-fold Deity, but because it will be by the aid of this Fourth one in our little group that we shall be able to wave aside the flames and heat of the sun and reach its interior, where all is cool and restful and where we shall find the friend of this companion of ours waiting for us." John o' Dreams, who had grown more and more nervous as he listened to all this, began to develop at the bottom of his heart a queer apprehension lest this new companion should turn out to be none other than Lord Urk of Cad Castle. This idea shocked him so much that, rising up on one knee, he boldly enquired of the Skull who this companion of the Three of them in their journey to the sun was to be.

"You have heard, I expect," replied the Skull, not forgetting to make his ritualistic Squeak in answer to the bursting of the Bubble at his side, "of the danger to anyone who dares to swallow any portion of one of those white grasses that grow on the summit of the hill above us?"

"O yes! Many times!" replied John o' Dreams, dropping on both his knees again. "Everybody in Dunnowair and Foghorn has heard that tale. There's a story that — but I won't bother you with stories at this moment —"

"Well, my son," continued the Skull, in a tone as considerate as if he'd been John o' Dreams's great-grandfather, "you and I are going to begin our own journey by chewing a couple of those white grasses and descending — on the strength of that risky action — into the depths of the Earth. You must not," he added sympathetically, "allow yourself to be unnecessarily disturbed by this rather startling beginning of our journey to the Sun. My explanation as to who the Fourth tourist of our little trio will be will, I am sure, make it quite clear, and will also remove all nervous apprehensions."

"But I've always heard," cried John o' Dreams, shuffling awkwardly on both his knees towards his preceptor and feeling a queer shivering sensation go up and down his spine, "that there was an appalling monster in the centre of the earth who came out of his cave the moment any living person came down, besotted by the taste of those white grasses, and tearing off such a person's arms and legs, devoured them then and there, afterwards hauling the person's trunk into its cave and enjoying a rich feast between intervals of well-satisfied sleep."

"What you don't realise, my dear child," said the Skull gently, "is that no monster can satisfy its hunger on a person's aura. Do get into your head, my dear boy, that an aura is not a bodily or a physical form. Nor is it a soul, whether a vegetative soul or a nutritive soul or a rational soul; for the soul is what all of us are born with, before we have had time to project from our older ego an emanation of all the feelings and of all the ideas at the back of such feelings that taken together are a representation of our personality as we have little by little built it up and formulated it — created it, in fact, out of all the different tendencies of our whole inherited nature — yes, our aura, my dear child, is the projection of our whole living personality upon the air, as we use our will and our mind and our imaginations to assert ourselves among those who like us as well as among those who dislike us!" This philosophical discourse by the Skull upon the nature of the personal aura, which it is impossible for any ordinary person not to possess, made a great impression upon John o' Dreams. But none the less he was startled when the Skull's "aura" suddenly rose up and was instantaneously accompanied by the "aura" of the Bubble.

"Come," said the aura of the Skull in one of his familiar Squeaks, "and you come too in your aura," he added to the Bubble. "We must take this lad in his body with us, for I'm going to summon the Cyclops Steropees to come with us to visit the three-headed Titan, Kottos, in his Sun-cave, and it won't do for all of us to be only auras!"

Before John o' Dreams realised what was happening, he found himself on his knees at the top of the hill, plucking leaves of the white grass and chewing them as thoroughly as he could. As he did this, with the aura of Bubble on one side of him and the aura of Squeak on the other, he thought to himself: "I suppose I am the most complete fool ever born in Foghorn. I can see now that these two freakish 'auras' of Bubble and Squeak are simply making use of me! They must have got tired of their eternal reiteration of a skull squeaking and a bubble bursting and have made up their minds to have a bit of sport. And the best sport they could think of was to watch a Cyclopean hurler of lightning attack a monster with three heads in his cavern in the heart of the Sun."

He had to make one of the greatest efforts of his life to feel bold and brave, as the "aura" of Bubble and the "aura" of Squeak followed him down into the centre of the Earth. He didn't care whether he was, or wasn't, bold and brave, as long as he felt so. That was the chief thing he had of late learned for himself. Namely to disregard completely other people's opinions as to morals or ideas or realities, and just simply to force himself to enjoy himself by absorbing with all his senses all the people and things immediately around him. It can be imagined, however, that it wasn't very easy to force himself to enjoy seeing the walls of the chasm into which he was descending, for the misty shapes of Bubble and Squeak were too ethereal to offer much companionship. He could see weird fossilized creatures glaring at him, with eyes like those of octopuses, and at one point he saw what looked like a badger with the scales of a gigantic lizard and the tongue of a serpent hardened into a petrified elongated slug.

"I must force myself to enjoy my life," thought John o' Dreams, as the mysterious gravitation of this appalling chasm, or rather of the cave of Steropees at the bottom of it, dragged him down. "The more there is of life the better, the better! That shall be my motto to the end. Yes, I will help all the creators of life to go on creating more worlds, more stars, more planets, more suns, more Milky Ways, more universes, till Space is crowded to infinity! Create! Create! Create! Enjoy! Enjoy! Enjoy!—"

He was forcing himself to make a sort of interior chant of an ecstatic acceptance of a rapturous creation, when crash! bang! thump! bump! and he with the two "auras", that of Bubble and that of Squeak, had reached the bottom.

The Cyclops Steropees was out of his den in a second. "I will, I will, I will, I will," thought John o' Dreams, "enjoy staring into that great single horrible eye," an eye which filled so much of the Cyclops' face that nose, mouth, chin, ears, forehead, seemed to become a mere casement or frame for that eye's frantic searching. Very faintly came to him now, as the Cyclops drew near, the double murmurs of the two "auras" who were his fellow-travellers.

"He's not for food, Steropees, not for food! He's going to ride with us on your wings to the Sun; and we are going with you, down, down, putting out the Sun's flames, until we reach the unburnt cavern where your friend Kottos, the fourheaded Titan, dwells."

At the mention of Kottos, the whole expression of that terrible Cyclopean eye, upon which John o' Dreams was forcing himself to keep his own human eyes, changed completely.

"To hold Kottos, to have Kottos, to make Kottos my very own, for ever and ever!" And as John o' Dreams watched this excited Cyclops he could not help asking himself: "Is Steropees actually a female monster?"

And then there happened the very last thing that John o' Dreams expected. He had so far regarded the Skull as indisputably the leader and master and organiser of the whole excursion. But suddenly, while the Cyclops went on roaring out his rapture over Kottos, he became aware that the leader of this strange little party of a monster and a young man and two powerful “auras” was the entity Bubble. Yes, it was he who took over and assumed the command. The peculiarity of Bubble’s generalship was that the impact of its force was wholly and entirely invisible. It was felt and not seen. Its nature was composed of two elements only, of water and of air; and its whole being, its purpose, its intention, its will, compounded into one irresistible rush of energy, was directed against everything that existed.

The Sun was at his noonday heat when, led by Bubble, they set out; one monster, one person, and two terrific “auras.” They were out of the centre of the Earth in less than a second, and from the Earth they passed through the Space that separated the Earth from the Sun in just about half an hour. Once in contact with that blazing Lord of Life, John o’ Dreams found himself — along with the Cyclops, who was carrying them all four — in the midst of such a battle as he had never, active as his imagination had been since he was a child, dreamed possible.

The nearer they approached the Sun, the more scorching were the flames of that Lord of Creation and Destruction.

But well did Steropees the Lightning know how to deal with these flames; for she had, along with her lightning, an ineffable supply of rain and hail: and this air-flood she now proceeded, as soon as they reached the body of the Sun, to fling forth on all sides. Once or twice, as she did this, and as these torrents of rain and spoutings of hail struck the huge sun-flames and hurled them back, John o’ Dreams caught a glimpse of the wild, desperate, insane excitement in her huge Cyclopean eye. That eye became the whole of her face. It became the whole of her body. It became all she was. And O, how clearly John o’ Dreams heard, as he watched that eye, the repeated, ecstatic sound of “Kottos! Kottos! Kottos!”

He soon began to long to see Kottos almost as much as Steropees did; and some of the most exciting moments of his life occurred as they descended a tremendous cleft between smouldering rocks that smelt of all the cauldrons of cruelty into which he had been taught in his childhood that the God-Fiend “with names divine who made us,” as someone said, “to torture us” would throw those who didn’t love him and gloat over their screams through all eternity.

IX

The cavernous and more than cathedral-large hall in which they now stood, far bigger than the inside of any building existing on the surface of the Earth, whether in Europe, Asia, Africa or America, struck John o' Dreams as the grandest and most imposing enclosure he had ever entered in his life. There was no need for their Cyclopean friend to pour out her rain and hail, or to fling her gusts of oceanic wind at those impenetrable walls. There was Kottos with more heads on his quivering necks than John o' Dreams could count, rushing across the floor of this incredible place to meet her; and there was Steropees flinging herself upon him! By the time the two of them had vanished down an adamantine corridor of black marble, John o' Dreams found that his two "aura" companions had started off again on one of their millions of years'-old controversies.

"How much better it would be," came the voice of Bubble, "if only everything that exists could be destroyed!"

"How much better it would be," came the voice of Squeak, "if our existing universe could be encouraged to grow larger and larger and larger, until the whole of Space was filled up, and there was no loneliness or emptiness or desolation left anywhere, nothing but a beautiful teeming, blossoming, bread-bearing, rose-scented galaxy of stars, full of exultant living creatures, full of fish, birds, beasts, saurians, reptiles, and men and women, and vast forests of trees and vast oceans of water, and mountains reaching up towards the sky, and all these living things, beasts, birds and fishes and men and women, loving and hating, being born and dying, but feeling, each one of them through it all, the indescribable exultation of being alive; crying all of them to one another, ‘I love you!

I hate you! I will ravish you! I will devour you! But whatever I do to you or whatever you do to me, we’re alive, we’re alive, we’re alive! And nothing can destroy the glory of that avowal or make less than all-embracing that ecstasy of life!’”

Standing in that indescribable heart of the sun, where darkness and light, where death and life, had been swept together in an orgy of consentaneousness, John o’ Dreams flung his arms into the air and cried aloud in a maniacal longing: “Ting! Ting! Ting! Ting! You are the one I love!” As he cried, “Come to me! Come to me, Ting, my own true love,” the feeling of having Ting there with him was so terrific that he kept pressing his arms together as if he were clasping her; and as he did so, standing facing the adamantine corridor of black marble down which Steropees and Kottos had vanished, and feeling about him the empty enormity of this vast interior, which might have had for its walls and roof the pressure of a petrified weight of a foursquare interior, whose extremities were made of blocks of space frozen into black ice, John o’ Dreams suddenly became aware that the aura of Squeak was murmuring something in his ear.

“Yes, Master?” he whispered back. “Please repeat what you said. I am too awed by all this to feel anything but deaf and dumb wonder.”

“Bubble is up to a dreadful trick upon us all,” John o’ Dreams heard Squeak say. “She has prayed to the heart of the Sun, the Sun who sees all things and hears all things, to let us enter his Holy of Holies — that is to say into the heart of the Sun.”

Yes! There, actually before him, around him, about him, was the Heart of the Universe! The Sun’s Heart, before which John o’ Dreams now stood, and his friends the “auras” hovered, was in shape, in size, in appearance, exactly like the heart of an enormous giant. But what made it different from any animal-heart or any human-heart, or any heart a great artist could have imagined for our universe, was the fact that it had a face. Yes! the Heart of the Sun, although shaped like a heart, had the face of a god. It was a man’s face, but it was certainly super-human. It was super-human not only in size, but in expression. Never to the end of his days did John o’ Dreams forget the look the Sun’s Heart fixed upon him! The face, though enormous, was natural enough. Its features were human, though the frame in which they appeared bore the shape of a heart; and they were natural features. After the Cyclopean eye of Steropees and after the besotted eyes, staring from half a dozen twisted necks, of Kottos, the look now fixed upon him by the Heart of the Sun was beautifully, if terrifyingly, human.

John o’ Dreams was still gazing in wonder and terror into the enormous eyes before him when the “aura” of his friend Squeak whispered to him, “Bubble is leaving us for a few minutes. I can read her thoughts. She is going to ask Steropees to help her fetch Lord Urk of Cad. She says Steropees will willingly do it in order to make Kottos jealous!”

John o’ Dreams shivered. “Why that brute?” he enquired of the Skull.

“Because, replied Squeak, “she wants him to eat the Heart of the Sun.”

John o’ Dreams, who had been listening intently to every word his friend Squeak, the Skull, uttered, now turned his head. Yes, the “aura” of Bubble was no longer there.

“I shall go for that brute when he comes,” John o’ Dreams told Squeak. “This Heart of the Sun has a beautiful face.”

They had not long to wait. It was clear that Urk of Cad must have been visiting the Fountain, when with Steropees she found him. Nor did she allow him to waste a moment in that stupendous hall where they had found Kottos waiting to embrace Steropees.

"There's your feast," cried Bubble to Urk. "Gobble him up fast! Turn him into Nothing!" She paused and murmured to herself, but her words were audible to them all: "O how perfect! He will lick up the last fibre of flesh and the last drop of blood of the Heart of the Sun, and then all that depends on him; for there's no other star in space that holds the position he holds in regard to the whole Universe, that is to say all the other stars feel that the Heart of our Sun is the centre of the entire Creation. And now when Urk of Cad has swallowed up that thing staring so complacently at us, all is over and done!"

Urk of Cad certainly didn't delay in doing what Bubble expected of him. Down on all fours he went and buried his flesh-devouring snout in that calm beautiful face beneath him. Not a sound did his victim utter. In fact, as John o' Dreams and the two "auras" looked on, the sound of Urk's munching, chewing, swallowing and belching was the only sound in the diminishing Universe, save the beating of every pulse in the body of John o' Dreams. Fuller and fuller grew the interior receptacles of Urk, and blacker and bleaker grew the face that had been framed by the Heart of the Sun.

John o' Dreams was suddenly seized by a terrific resolution. He resolved to kill Urk. Looking round and feeling round, he came upon a sharp-edged piece of adamant that must have been broken off in the savage embrace between Steropees and Kottos, and got so entangled in his own clothes that it had come down with him to this resting place of the Heart of the Sun. Seizing this tightly in his right hand, he flung himself on his knees upon Urk's long waist and began hammering at the back of his head with this instrument.

The first blow cracked the man's skull; the second drew a trickle of blood and brains; and by the third Urk groaned and rolled over on his side bringing John o' Dreams with a violent jerk to the ground. He was soon up, however, and crouching over Urk, very much in the same position as Urk has assumed when he was devouring the Heart of the Sun, John o' Dreams went on hammering at this human skull with his effective weapon till, before three minutes had elapsed, Urk had become a headless giant, with a bleeding neck ending in a mask of bones and brains and blood.

X

THE EFFECT UPON the two “auras” on either side of him, as John o’ Dreams rose to his feet after killing Urk, was a little surprising to him. He looked quickly at his friend, the “aura” of Squeak, expecting an eager congratulation. But the wavering and hovering Skull seemed too occupied in watching the effect of what had happened upon Bubble to give him any response at all. On the other hand Bubble seemed more radiant with joy than John o’ Dreams could remember ever having seen her before. She kept repeating the precise sound of bubbles of water bursting and losing themselves in the air.

“To Nothing! To Nothing! To Nothing! You’ve sent him off after the Heart! Both gone! Both gone! Both gone! No more Heart of the Sun and no more Urk of Cad! Nothing! Nothing! Nothing!”

So loudly did the Bubble burst into the air with this final cry that John o’ Dreams looked rather anxiously at her, wondering to himself whether the old familiar Bubble and Squeak of the ancient Fountain was at this moment, with two “auras” so far away, repeating its accustomed routine performance, or whether, considering this double death of the Heart of the Sun and the Lord of Cad, some deadly and unseemly silence had descended upon the whole place.

“It becomes hard to believe,” thought John o’ Dreams, “when you are far from your home, that everything is going on as usual there.”

His mind reverted to his Mother and his Aunt. What would Auntie Oh say if he told her he had killed Lord Urk in the Heart of the Sun? He knew at the bottom of his heart very well that these thoughts about Mummy and Auntie Oh were a self-trick of his to prevent himself from thinking about Ting. But she burst through the butterfly-net he had thrown round her.

“What,” he thought, “will Ting feel when her father doesn’t come home? What would she feel if I confessed to her I had deliberately killed him? O Ting, O Ting, you are the only girl I shall ever love! And now I have gone and killed my only girl’s father! But I must confess to her. You can’t hide the truth from the one you love. You can’t. You can’t.”

Suddenly the wild cry of little Jessica when she was alone with him in that willow-bed or alder-swamp rang through his head: “Take me! Take me!” Is all love wild and desperate and tragic like that cry? Surely Ting and he would understand each other, and deal with love as if it were a creature that they had to tame? A stormy petrel? A sea-eagle? The great thing is to understand each other through and through, and if altercations and little disputes arise, to realise their inevitability and accept them for what they are and not over-rate their importance.

John o’ Dreams was certainly a youth who loved facing crises. His nature was, for anyone brought up in a family like that of Maria Nu and Nezzar Nu and Auntie Oh, and with a sister as sympathetic as Jilly Tewky, unusually adventurous. It wasn’t that he was especially nervous or especially highly-strung. But he was like some young hero of one of Sir Walter Scott’s more slowly moving romances, or you might even say he was like a youthful St. George, who wanted to be absolutely sure before making his plunge that the beast confronting him really was the dragon he was after.

He now gazed, as most young men in his situation would have wanted above all to avoid doing, with calm satisfaction at the headless trunk of Urk and the horrible heap of bones and blood and fibrous entanglements, together with what now had become an unpleasant reek of sepulchral mortality. Luckily he did not realise that the "aura" of Bubble was already deciding that in her own good time she would get this corpse to the Foghorn waves.

"I must get back home," John o' Dreams thought. "But how the bloody hell shall I do it?"

It was a comfort to him at that juncture to catch the quivering "aura" of Squeak quite close to his shoulder.

"I want to go home," he repeated with an almost childish peevishness.

"Well, sonny," replied the Skull, answering him at once. "I can tell you how that little journey can be managed; only you must be ready to keep your wits about you. You'll have to catch a falling star and persuade it to convey us all down to your part of the coast of Foghorn."

"But those falling stars are so erratic," protested John o' Dreams. "We might find ourselves landed in the middle of the Sahara Desert or on the coast of the Black Sea."

"If we could get hold of Lalanika by her tossing-gold hair," remarked Squeak, "we could make her carry us down. Only we'd have to bribe her with something; and the question is: with what?"

"If Lalanika could be persuaded to come to me here where we are now, I think I could bribe her: for I've got something I believe she'd like," said John o' Dreams hurriedly.

It was just as if this lovely falling star had been listening to them, hidden behind one of the arching alcoves that surrounded what had been, and in a geographical sense was still, the Heart of the Sun; for here she was in the midst of them, a little slender girl who looked about twelve years old.

"I'm tired," she whispered, leaning back with her head against the brim of the water-cup that was part of the "aura" of Bubble, and her back upon the thin ledge below the mouth of Squeak. "Why doesn't the spirit of Shelley come out of the water where he was drowned and make love to me? He would know — no one else — none but Shelley — what a star as tired as I am really wants?”

“I’ve got something for you, you darting daughter of space, such as you never dreamed of!” cried John o’ Dreams eagerly; and snatching out his watch, which had the peculiarity of being entirely concealed, including its watch-face, by a golden cover, he used his finger-nails with a force that was as surprising to his fingers as it was to the watch, and tore the watch out of its coverings. This done, he replaced the uncovered watch in his waistcoat pocket, leaving the thin gold chain that was fastened to its now empty golden cover dangling from its little circular ring.

“You can twist this, O shining one of Space,” he said, “round your neck or round your arm, and you can keep a gleaming light-beam of your soul’s brightest excrescence within this cover, so that when you move about in the sea or in the sand or in the grass or in the leaves or in the shavings of a shed, you will always have this second self of your inmost being to depend upon.”

Thus speaking, he showed to the recumbent little girl this empty watch-case of gold and this golden chain attached to it. Being down above her on his knees, John o’ Dreams dangled the empty watch-case by its golden chain, and made her see what a completely close-up receptacle the watch-case had become, although easy enough to open, just as if you were opening your watch, only within this beautifully shut little case there was now nothing at all.

And then John o’ Dreams, according to his nature, grew bolder; and without a moment’s hesitation asked the girl, gazing straight into her eyes, where it was that she kept her precious stores of meteoric light.

Smiling a little, and even blushing a little, the girl tapt her right breast with her fingers.

"I shan't mind a bit," she said, "if you suck my breast and see. Only if you get enough meteor-milk from me, hold it carefully in your mouth till you can spit it into your watch-case without losing a drop."

Very gently and delicately John o' Dreams obeyed her. He moved aside the thin fringe of gauze silk from her right breast and pressing his mouth against it, sucked hard at the tiny pink teat. Yes! His mouth was soon full of a delicious-tasting gleaming whiteness. Of this, as she had instructed him, he emptied his mouth into the watch-case, through all the chinks of which this dazzling whiteness shone forth, as if an electric light had been turned on inside the little golden case.

"Will you twist the chain round your neck or round one of your wrists?" he asked her. "I'm afraid the gold case hangs rather awkwardly; but if you twist it tight, there is no danger of your losing it."

Lalanika pulled her transparent fringes of silk over her breast and wound the thin gold chain round her right wrist, from which the watch-case, its edges shining as if it were imprisoning a star erected itself, as he had warned her it would do, rather awkwardly. But Lalanika did seem, as he had predicted she would, very much delighted with this addition to her natural luminosity.

"What puzzles me," cried John o' Dreams suddenly, "is how a little girl like you, Lalanika, is going to carry a heavy man like me from the Heart of the Sun to the shore of Foghorn. Of course Bubble and Squeak in their present form will be quite light. God! I wish I could become an 'aura' instead of a lumbering carcase of an eating and drinking man."

"Don't you worry, my boy!" said Lalanika, smiling. "Only hold on to me tight round the hips! Yes! round my hips, my lad, not my waist, or I might come in half! And where would we be then? But I'm off now!"

"Are you two—" began John o' Dreams in his impulsive simplicity; but he need not have worried about his two "aura" companions; for they were better aware of what was happening than he was.

He had already obeyed his Falling Star! Tight round her hips, as she had instructed him, his arms were flung; and she with him, and the two "auras" hovering round them both, they were soon falling, or so it felt to John o' Dreams, upwards till they reached that vast cathedral-like hall where Steropees and Kottos had seized upon each other and had vanished. Thence — and still, as it seemed to John o' Dreams, falling upwards — they were soon free of the Sun altogether; and then at last the youth realised what was happening to him, according to the actuality of life upon earth, and down, down, down, down fell the Falling Star into the sea off the coast of Foghorn. John o' Dreams caught a glimpse of the vanishing right arm of Lalanika, with his golden watch-case shedding dazzling gleams from what was in it, as the girl's body vanished in the surf, and he climbed up the steep bank of pebbles.

"What is she doing now?" he asked himself, as he watched that unmistakable gleam among the waves; and it seemed to him that she must be swimming slowly along the coast towards the landing stage, where the now dead Urk had landed, and where there was a small customs office frequented by a solitary official.

"Will she let that man have a glimpse of her?" thought John o' Dreams; and a curious throb of jealousy passed through him.

But he felt ashamed of himself when he thought of Ting. "What an amorous fellow I am!" he told himself. "Are all men like this?" And then after a moment's thought, looking north and south along the coast, "When," he said to himself, "shall I dare tell Ting that I have killed her father?"

Turning his back to the beach, he began walking with rapid strides straight towards his home. But suddenly, to his absolute amazement, he felt a hand catch hold of his sleeve, and there was Lalanika by his side!

“Will you show me, my dear boy,” she said, “where I can get a room for the night?”

John o’ Dreams’ response to this appeal was as inevitable as had been his savage attack on Urk of Cad.

“Of course, Shining One, of course,” he said, “my mother will let you sleep with us at Morty. Only we’d better be quite honest with her as to who you are, and how you and I have come to be together. Though perhaps” — he added this more hesitatingly— “we’d better not mention the death of Lord Urk of Cad.”

Home at last they all got; and long was the intimate talk that evening after tea between John o’ Dreams and Jilly Tewky. These twins had never concealed anything from each other, and it can be believed how much there had to be exchanged between them that evening! But the warm south wind brought night at last and both of them slept sound.

Not so slept their hard-worked father Nezzar Nu. From her first appearance under his roof, Lalanika the Fallen Star had disturbed him dreadfully: and in the middle of that night just about when the Reverend Josiah Attic, a mile away, was ringing his church bell to remind Miss Posh that certain prayers from her were still due to the overhanging emptiness of infinite Space, poor over-worked Nezzar, who had spent almost the whole of the day digging round the long lines of Gog-Magogs in his sun-baked fields, found himself slipping softly out of his wife Maria’s bed and advancing on tip-toe with bare feet towards the door of the small cupboard bedroom at the top of the stairs, where this disturbing visitor was sleeping.

More quietly, more furtively, than any door in Morty had even been opened before, Nezzar Nu turned the handle.

Yes, there lay Lalanika the Fallen Star! She was asleep on her side, one of her cheeks hidden and her bare right arm, round which the closed watch-case without the watch threw its sacred radiance, resting prettily against her bottom, the whole of which was charmingly bare, because of the rumpling of a night-dress a good deal too large for her and evidently borrowed from Jilly Tewky.

Nezzar Nu simply longed to take her in his arms, just as she was! There was something about that pretty little bottom of hers that excited him to a fever-point. He hadn't made love to his wife Maria for something like ten years, or to any other feminine creature either, but for some reason beyond his understanding Lalanika's little bottom excited more amorous desire in him than the breasts or the wombs or the necks or the legs of any females he had ever seen, or was able to imagine ever seeing.

How difficult it is to find the real explanation of the psychic play of "auras" and "occult vibrations" and spiritual shocks and mystical emanations and incredible revelations and visions of dimensions utterly different from ours, which seem to be going on all the time! We can force ourselves to regard it all from the most materialistic and atheistic standpoint, but it goes on all the same, and is constantly breaking up our solid framework of decent common sense. It becomes in fact more and more evident that, however gravely and logically we look at things, there remains in life an element of pure bedlam.

Whatever help that middle-of-the-night church bell may have been to Miss Posh, it was the opposite of helpful to Auntie Oh. Poor Auntie couldn't let herself respond as she always did to the words of her Rector, for it was the sound of his church bell, not the sound of his voice, that reached the bedrooms of Morty, hushed in blessed silence for the night. But "all the same for that," as Homer would say, the church bell woke Auntie from her sleep and gave her the feeling that somewhere, somehow, and in some manner, the church at that moment — quite apart from Miss Posh — needed support. So Auntie Oh rose from her bed, put on her dressing gown, a garment of dark purple with a black waist-belt, and came downstairs to her sister's floor, where was the cupboard-bed occupied by Lalanika.

It was her destiny to arrive at the critical moment: the very moment when her brother-in-law, Nezzar Nu, was standing gazing in infatuated attraction at the sleeping girl. Auntie Oh had come down so quietly, that she was standing behind Nezzar Nu at the foot of Lalanika's bed before he was aware of her presence. In fact it was the Fallen Star herself who was the one to become aware of Auntie Oh. She woke up with a cry, and seeing not only her middle-aged host, but her hostess's elderly sister, standing staring down at her, she had the explosive shock that ended her.

Perhaps she would have had it in any case. Few Falling Stars survive their fall, though we often find their broken meteoric remains. But the moment the sound of the church bell awoke her, Lalanika leapt up from the bed, uttered a shriek that awoke everyone in Morty, tore from her body Jilly Tewky's night-dress, and burst into a white flame. The gleaming juice that filled her veins in place of blood shot free of Morty through every aperture in the place. Long before that strange white light had floated away past the tower of the church and the turrets of Cad Castle and the tide-washed breakwater of Dunnowair Landing at the extremity of Foghorn, Lalanika was dead, and all the consciousness she had had was lost for ever.

The striking thing about it was the loss of every shred and scrap of her identity. Not a trace of her body, not a lock of her hair, was ever found in any corner of Morty or any curve of that coast. Many of us mortals have short lives, but none of us can boast a life as short as Lalanika’s. Even the memory of her, mixed with a mockery of remorse in the minds of Nezzar Nu and John o’ Dreams, soon became something unreal. So faintly she was, that when she was not, the difference between being and not being seemed to vanish away.

XI

IT WAS TO Nezzar Nu himself — when, about four o'clock in the early morning, after the violent disappearance of Lalanika, the Fallen Star, he found himself unable to sleep — that the ghost of Lord Urk appeared.

That Nezzar Nu went to sleep again so quickly after the ghost's visit showed that Lord Urk had appeared in his natural form and not as a headless corpse. Besides, it is likely enough that what really happened was that a telepathic communication from one of the two "auras," before they retired to rest in their dwelling at the Fountain, informed Nezzar of Urk's death. In whatever way the news reached Nezzar, the startling information brought to them all when they met at breakfast was confirmed by John o' Dreams, who, without revealing anything of his visit to the Sun, indicated that he was able to corroborate and confirm what had been announced by his father.

Auntie Oh had never been more tactful in her life than when she confirmed to her sister before them all, what Maria had already learnt from her husband, about a mysterious outburst of milk-white fire in which the meteorite in the shape of a beautiful young girl had vanished from that cupboard-bed. What Ring and Ting knew of their father's death remained a complete mystery to all the inhabitants of Morty. Neither of them, when they both appeared at the end of breakfast, seemed to feel the least consternation or the least desire to minimise the importance to them of what had happened.

"Ring, of course," Ting told them, with proud satisfaction, in her voice, "will be Lord of Cad now. My father left a most careful will, which Laura found very quickly among his papers, explaining exactly how much money we're to expect regularly from Singapore, where the rents of his Malay estate are kept by the bank."

"You will, of course," said Auntie Oh quickly, "keep both Laura and Jessica?"

"O yes!" cried Ting: "We'd never be able to get on without Laura. And Laura would never be able to get on without Jessica. O yes! Of course we shall keep them both! Now that Laura's found that will of daddy's with all it says about the money coming over regularly from the bank in Singapore, we can feel quite happy about our future. O yes! and Laura found daddy's cash-box too, and made us open it and count how much there was! And, would you believe it, there was nearly a hundred pounds! So we're well fixed up for the present anyway."

"But be sure you let us know, my dear children, if you get into any money difficulties," broke in Nezzar Nu. "For we certainly would — wouldn't we, Maria? wouldn't we, Dad? — want to help if that ever happened."

"Don't you worry, sonny," growled old Gammer Nu. "These kids in Cad will die richer than you, and richer than any of your children."

It can be imagined what a lot John o' Dreams had to tell his twin-sister Jilly Tewky that morning as they walked out together. "Let's go to the Fountain," John o' Dreams cried. "You don't mind, do you? Only I do want to see how they've survived their fall from the Sun!"

And Jilly Tewky said: "I wish that Star — what did you call her? — hadn't blown up."

"So do I, my dear. So indeed do I! O, you would have liked her so! She was a darling! I almost hope I shall never find that watch-case of mine. I can’t bear to think of that brave girl being anything any more but what she was when I last saw her!”

When they reached the Fountain, John o’ Dreams flung himself down beneath the Skull and pressed his forehead against its strange outline. Poor Jilly Tewky had no wish to do the same before the bowl of the Bubble, so she crept as close to John o’ Dreams as she could, and laid her hand on his shoulder.

“I’m going to build and build and build and build and build!” cried John o’ Dreams passionately, “till I have so filled Space with my work, that there’s no more room for the smallest star to fall! For all Space will be filled — filled, I tell you — by my work!”

He jumped to his feet, and Jilly Tewky drew back. And they now, both of them, stared with astonishment at the hollow stone cup from which the bubbles were being dissolved in air. Nor did they stare without good reason. Never before had either of them known anything like what they now beheld. For the bursting Bubbles, before they burst and were lost in air, assumed the appearance of a creature’s face — and what a creature!

It was the face of a World-Swallower! It was mostly mouth. It had eyes and ears, but these were so obviously occupied with one purpose only, the catching of something to swallow, that short of that purpose they were nothing. The same applied — yes, applied even more so — to the nose. “O Swallower, I smell a speck of something.”

Our two twins, John o’ Dreams and Jilly Tewky, stared with a puzzled incredulity at these human-featured Bubbles bursting, each one in its appropriate time, exactly parallel with the Squeaks of the Skull. But their wonder changed to awe when, before the Bubble lost its mortal countenance, they distinctly heard it uttering the following rhapsody.

“Nobody in Heaven or Earth is stronger than Nothing,” the Twins heard it murmur. “Space is Nothing; in spite of all this nonsense you hear about it being full of molecules of matter. Space is a Void. I, Bubble, who burst into it and become part of it, know well the truth of what I say. And in the end, let me tell you — and every galaxy of stars is listening now to my voice — all the worlds and suns and stars that are supposed to stretch out into infinite space shall perish.

Yea! every single one of them shall dissolve into empty Space, and be no more heard or seen! Dissolved they shall be, every one of them, dissolved and lost in empty Space! Thus shall it be, as I say unto you now. All the Stars, all the suns, all the worlds, shall vanish and disappear. All the Universes, and all the materials for universes, shall cease to exist; and Nothingness, I say unto you, Nothingness shall swallow all. Nothing shall be infinity, and infinity shall be Nothingness, and thus shall it be for evermore.”

John o’ Dreams and Jilly Tewky felt as if they had been listening to everything they had believed in, and to everything they had taken for granted, perishing there and then, all about them, as they stood together, watching Bubble and listening to Bubble. And yet Squeak was retorting. Over and over again, in response to all that Bubble so sweepingly annihilated and so implacably condemned to annihilation, came the simple, intrepid, impervious commentary of Squeak’s inveterate squeak.

“Doesn’t it sound,” said Jilly Tewky, as she led her brother away, “just as if Mummy were answering all that Daddy’s always telling us about the craziness of the Rector ringing the church bell for Miss Posh? I mean the Bubble talks like Daddy, and Squeak answers like Mummy.”

“O no! no!” retorted John o’ Dreams. “It’s the other way round. It’s Mummy who talks like Bubble; and Daddy who answers like Squeak. But the truth is, my dear, both Bubble and Squeak are so like what all the nations on earth are like, contradicting each other and accusing each other, without leaving any room for the sort of compromise that might lead to a new step forward in our history!"

"Do we ever have steps forward in our history?"

"Of course we do, my dear. Just think! It was only about a hundred years ago when they used to chain mad people up in Bedlam and flog them cruelly; whereas now if mental homes don't treat crazy people so that their mad ways can be very carefully studied with a view to helping them to recover their sanity, the matrons and nurses in those homes, and sometimes even the doctors who visit them, are easily liable to prosecution by the relatives of their patients."

"Do you think, John," Jilly asked, as they made their way in the direction of the Witch's Cottage, before reaching which there was a path through the wood to Morty that avoided any contact with the village of Dunnowair, "that Ring and Ting will be able to get on by themselves in that Castle?"

"Of course they will, my dear," John o' Dreams replied hurriedly. "With Laura to look after them, any kids could get on. But my trouble isn't worrying how Ring and Ting will get on without Lord Urk; but whether I ought to confess to Ting that I killed her father."

"Was Ting fond of him?" Jilly asked.

"Oh no!" her brother replied hastily. "Neither of them were fond of him. They couldn't be. How could anyone be? They just took him for granted. He'd never been rough or unkind to them. But I don't think there was any intimacy between them and him. It's hard to see how there could be."

"But, John my dear," murmured Jilly, "size isn't everything."

"O, it wasn't his size! There was something else. The fellow wasn't like an ordinary human being at all. You only had to be near him, only to watch him, to notice that. It was like watching the ways of a giraffe or an elephant. I should feel quite different about having killed him if he'd been, even a little bit, more human. I only feel as if I'd killed a rhinoceros or a whale or a sea-serpent."

"But what did Ring and Ting feel about him, John? I wonder what Ting would feel if you confessed to her about it all. Of course that Being in the Sun that they called the Heart of the Sun was completely different from us. But he was a friendly creature; and nobody could call Lord Urk exactly that."

"Besides, my dear, I should feel myself, surely, some remorse about killing him, if he'd anything human about him? No, Lord Urk was an inhuman monster. And the Heart of the Sun certainly wasn't that! I know, for I have been there. But the great question for me, Jilly old girl, is whether or not to confess everything to Ting."

"You're in love with Ting, John?"

"Yes, I guess I am. I certainly can't imagine living with any other girl, except you, of course; and as to marrying any other girl, I just couldn't endure it!"

John o' Dreams made up his mind, while he was walking home that day with Jilly, that what he would like now to do of all things would be to visit a stellar system quite different from our own. But what system would he like most to visit? He boldly plunged his mind into this exciting subject before he let his twin sister go. They were in sight of Morty now and he knew well that, when he did let her go, she would enter the house by the back entrance and hurry to the help of their mother in the kitchen, while he would be expected to offer his father, Nezzar, some little assistance with their Gog-Magog fields.

"What stellar system, different from ours, would you like to visit, Jilly, if you had the chance?"

Jilly looked straight into his eyes. "The 'Milky Way'," she answered; and then, tearing herself from him, for he had his arm round her, she flew to the back of the house.

The sort of work he had now to do, weeding and breaking up the soil round those tediously familiar rows of Gog-Magogs, suddenly struck him as repugnant. He paused, kicked at the root of a rowan-tree and cursed his fate. He had never so much as heard of Nietzsche; so that that great philosopher's motto, Amor Fati, had never crossed his mind as a clue to life. But, like so many of us in so many lives, John o' Dreams, by the necessity of existence on this planet, had forgotten the element of chance.

And it now happened by pure chance that old Grandpa Grumble, feeling a little in want of air in his upper chamber, opened his window and leant out. At the moment he did this the figure of John o' Dreams happened to be obscured by a clothes-line upon which hung a few of grand-dad's shirts that were just then flapping in the wind. Grand-dad could, however, perceive that something was moving beneath this clothes-line, and as he looked down his vision was so much blurred by the book he had been reading that he took this something to be an animal.

"Out, out, out!" he shouted, thinking that the yard gate must have been left open, and afraid lest one of his shirts might be carried to the barn on the horns of a cow.

When, however, the cow showed no sign of departure, he looked hurriedly round for something to fling at it, but all that met his hand was the book he had been reading. This book happened to be the first volume of an ancient and rather heavy edition of Catterduck's History of the Roman Invasion of Britain. With the unbridled violence of an extremely old student interrupted in his studies, Grumble Nu flung this heavy volume, which had metal clasps, at what he supposed to be an intrusive animal.

XII

THE BOOK HIT our friend John o’ Dreams full on the head. Fortunately, it did not hit him with its metal clasps. Indeed its rush through the air opened it wide; and it struck him with the peculiar effectiveness which can be imagined best if we think of a powerful clergyman bringing down on the head of a boy in his choir the great Bible he was reading in his pulpit.

John o’ Dreams fell to the ground; while his grandfather, up aloft, closed his window and resumed his seat in his armchair with the next volume of Catterduck’s History. But though his skull was quite intact, John o’ Dreams was half-stunned, and altogether dazed by the weight of this great book. So dazed indeed he was, that he did not feel any surprise when he found himself being helped to his feet by a man whom he had not seen approaching him.

“You’re not hurt, I hope,” murmured the man, “not hurt but a little dazed,” and these words the man kept murmuring while, with the most exquisite and delicate care, he examined Catterduck’s famous volume, and after smoothing its ruffled pages, placed it under his arm.

After a moment’s consideration of the book under the man’s arm, John o’ Dreams sighed heavily. He began to experience the most extraordinary sensation he had ever felt since he played with his sister as a child under this same clothes-line, where hung the work of his mother and Auntie Oh. He had the feeling that he had turned into somebody else. He tried to say “I am I,” with the certainty and assurance that had become a habit with him ever since a certain emotional shock when he was very little, and when, after he had been telling them all about his dreams, his grand-dad had said to his mother: “Why do you let the boy go on in this silly way? Anyone would think he wasn’t himself. Anyone would think he was crazy.”

He now began looking carefully at the man who had helped him to his feet and was now standing beside him. He had never seen him before. He was about his own height; but his appearance puzzled John o’ Dreams. There was nothing about him that it would be possible to describe, however hard he tried; no, not even to Jilly Tewky. The fellow had a large head covered by delicately cropped straight hair of a greyish-greenish tint. His features were small; eyes, nose, mouth, ears, all so small and so neat, and so entirely unexpressive of any character at all, that it was as if somebody had bought them in a shop for human-sized dolls and then smoothed out the skin of his forehead and cheeks to fit them into their appropriate places.

John o’ Dreams felt angry. “May I,” he enquired rudely, “ask who you are?”

The stranger smiled.

“May I ask you on my side,” he enquired, “if I heard your sister correctly, when she said she would like to go to the Via Lactea, or, as you call it in Foghorn, the Milky Way?” John o’ Dreams, with one of the greatest efforts of selfcontrol he had ever made, restrained himself from knocking this impertinent eavesdropper to the very ground from which he had just helped him to rise. How dared he presume to hear what Jilly and he were privately discussing together?

“I asked you,” murmured his interlocutor quietly, “because I happen to be going to the Milky Way today, and I would take both of you with me.”

John o’ Dreams told himself that he was talking to a madman. “But I must be damned careful to help Jilly out of this,” he thought, “for she’s so terribly impulsive with strangers that you can’t tell what mightn’t—”

He was interrupted by the appearance in her own person of the girl in question.

“You were talking about me?” she said. “I heard the words, ‘Milky Way!’”

“I was just telling your brother,” replied the stranger, “that I’m now off to that very place, and I wondered if you two would care to go there with me.”

“How are you going?” Jilly asked at once. “By air-plane?”

And she looked round, evidently expecting to see some small plane between the kitchen-garden and the tennis-lawn.

“No,” said the stranger. “I do not need air-planes. I can travel through the air whither, when, and where I please.”

Instinctively the twins seized each other’s hand; and the sort of look passed between them as had passed when they were born. They were so agitated they could not speak. It crossed John o’ Dreams’ mind that he could wish the mysterious fellow a polite good-night, and enter their house, leaving him under the clothes-line. It crossed Jilly Tewky’s mind that they must beg the stranger to spend the night with them, and talk it over with their parents.

“I think it would be well,” said the stranger, looking quietly from one to the other, “if I told you who I am; for that, more than anything, might help you to decide whether or not you would like to accompany me. Let me show you, first of all, exactly where I shall be taking you.”

The twins, clutching each other’s hand still more tightly, looked up at the outer edge of the Milky Way or Via Lactea, at which the stranger was now pointing with both outstretched arm and outstretched finger.

“You see that tiny one,” he said, “at the Way’s extreme border?”

“Yes, O yes!” cried the twins simultaneously.

"Well," he went on, "that little world is called Vindex. That's the name the Romans gave it when I first took them there. They must have felt it to be their Protector and Liberator and Avenger, after all they had suffered at the hands of Fate; and though we used to call it Llychyn*,* which means a speck of dust, we decided that the Roman name was a better one. Don't you think so, you two, soon to be citizens of Vindex?"

The twins, however, were staring now, not at Vindex, but at the person before them.

"Is he a madman, escaped from an asylum?" thought John o' Dreams.

"Are we both asleep," thought Jilly Tewky, "and dreaming the same dream?"

"Well, children," said the mysterious stranger, "I will tell you now who I am. You might not think so from my appearance, but I am the Arch-Druid. This book, which your grandfather threw down, is the Roman account of how they slaughtered us in Mona, the Mother of Wales. We will take this book with us. It shall have a prominent place in our National Library at Vindex, which, I may now tell you, is a Republic of Druids. Well, children, are you ready to start?"

The twins were too awed by the transformation that was taking place before them to do anything but acquiesce in silence; for, before moving from where they stood, the impersonal individual before them changed, even as they watched, into a majestic figure, clothed and adorned in the well-known druidic raiment, and wearing an especially striking kind of prehistoric mitre upon his imposing head. He was not bearded; but his long dark locks hung down each side of his shaven face, which in its statuesque dignity suggested the Pontifex Maximus of Rome, while its quick eye-glances indicated the experienced sagacity of an alert spiritual ruler. And it seemed to them both, as the Arch-Druid carefully arranged the massive book, now firmly held in his left hand, under his magisterial mantle, and grasped with a portentous authority the free hand of Jilly Tewky, that they were indeed destined by a necessity impossible to resist to make this unprecedented voyage.

"Off we go, then," cried this Druid of infinite space, fixing his eyes so intently on the tiny speck of light, which was their goal, that these eyes of his seemed to magnetize it nearer: and indeed off they were!

The Arch-Druid kept a very firm grip upon Jilly Tewky's hand; and Jilly Tewky kept a very tight hold of her twin-brother's hand: and thus all three of them, two men and one girl, shot up, as if out of some electrical cannon's mouth, straight for the Milky Way. It struck both the twins, as they went, that they passed many extremely disturbing changes of atmosphere, some of which almost took their breath away, while others gave them more breath than they were able to cope with; and once or twice they had the extremely unusual sensation of feeling that it was necessary for them to suck up air as bees suck honey from flowers.

When at last they began to be aware of all the innumerable stars, and in many cases larger stars than Vindex, which were now around them, they both felt surprise that they had not realised while on earth that the starry worlds which they now beheld, worlds above them, worlds below them, worlds on all sides of them, were as large as their old sun and their old moon; and not only so, but, as they ascended among them all, they were as far away from the space-path along which the Druid was guiding them as were their old companions, the Sun and Moon, from their familiar Earth. In fact, as now seen in the light of their approach to Vindex, a light that struck them one minute as sunlight and the next minute as moonlight, the Via Lactea, or Milky Way, displayed itself not as a congeries, or vast cluster of little stars — for the vast majority of them now began to vanish in far-off space — but very much as the stars in our own sky look when at home upon the earth, only a good deal more widely and evenly dispersed. And finally, to complete the resemblance, as they came close to Vindex, it began to grow dark.

XIII

DARK INDEED IT was when the three of them landed. It was clear to both our friends that the Arch-Druid had selected their landing place with the most artful and consummate skill. It was into an empty moss-covered amphitheatre that they descended, with no buildings near and nobody in sight. There was no mist and no rain; there were no birds and no beasts. It might have been the old Roman amphitheatre at Foghorn, which was very familiar to both John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky, except only that, instead of the grass to which they were accustomed at home, the verdure under their feet was an exceptionally soft kind of moss varied by a sort of delicately-leafed lichen, which, however, instead of being grey like most kinds of lichen with us, was richly coloured, only it was too dark now to see its colour.

"You will both of you," such were the wise and kindly words with which their guide welcomed them to Vindex, "wish to relieve yourselves of a little urine and possibly of a little excrement. I therefore suggest that we all three go different ways across this encircling bank; and then, when we are quite comfortable, let us return here again; and after that I will escort you to your dwelling for the night."

Thus speaking, and without once looking round, the ArchDruid climbed up the embankment nearest to him and disappeared over the top. The twins smiled at each other and still holding hands climbed over the bank in the opposite direction. Once on the other side they hugged each other and Jilly said:

"Well, my dear, we sure are in for it! But as long as they leave us together, I don't mind, do you? Well, let's do as he told us like good kids; and then we'll be ready for anything."

They found themselves among some very queer-looking shrubs, about twice as tall as they were themselves, shrubs with enormous heart-shaped leaves and with queer featherlike excrescences at the top, which were waving just then in a faint wind. Secluding themselves for a minute or two from one another behind these curious growths, they both did what their guide had told them to do, and were soon, hand in hand again, descending into the amphitheatre. Here they found the Arch-Druid waiting for them; and under his escort, but no longer holding his hand, they passed out of the amphitheatre into a carefully kept avenue, on both sides of which grew those same remarkable shrubs with their big leaves and feathery tops.

"How," enquired Jilly Tewky, "do the people of Vindex live? Do they eat cattle and sheep and lambs and pigs and fish and birds? Or do they live on bread and butter and cheese and fruit?"

"I expect you will soon tell us, Sir," said John o' Dreams, "of some wonderful things to eat, such as we have never heard of in our old world!"

The stately avenue, along which they were being led, had now begun to widen a little; and, after a few steps further, they came upon such a wonderful sight that neither of the twins wanted their guide and master to tell them anything about the food of the Vindex population. Before them stretched an enormous level plain; and from the plain rose up such a city as neither of the two visitors had ever dreamed could exist in the universe. They both instinctively stopped to stare at what they beheld in awe and amazement.

"O my Lord, what a sight!" cried Jilly.

"Holy Jesus, what a scene!" cried John.

What struck them most was the fact that the pavement under the city was composed of dazzling white marble, from the surface of which the buildings rose tall and erect, while from all the windows in these buildings blazing lights of every possible colour, yellow, red, blue, black, grey, purple, fell upon this white marble surface, and as they fell, revealed the fact that the walls of the buildings were of a pure emerald green. After a few seconds of gasping silence Jilly Tewky demanded in a whisper of their guide what name the inhabitants of Vindex bestowed on their city.

“Asteropetes, thrower of lightning,” was the reply.

Slowly both the twins repeated the name of the marvellous Vindician city at which they were gazing in bewildered wonder. “Asteropetes, thrower of lightning! Thrower of lightning, Asteropetes!”

“Have you any enemies here, master? Has Asteropetes ever been attacked?” enquired John o’ Dreams.

“Only once, my dear son, only once. And then it was conquered.”

The twins stared for a moment at the astounding spectacle before them without any comment. At last John o’ Dreams murmured: “Conquered? It seems impossible! Conquered by whom?”

“By us Druids,” was the staggering answer.

They both took their eyes from Asteropetes and stared in astonishment at their guide. The Arch-Druid made a sign to them to sit down on the fallen trunk of one of those strange trees by the side of the road. As they obeyed him they both, as they would instinctively have done in Foghorn, looked up at the darkening sky above them, that bent down, like the shoulders of the giant Atlas, over all the blaze of Asteropetes.

“Yes,” the Arch-Druid continued quietly, “Vindex was conquered by people from Perosus — a star you can see over there, that big one, which is the last of the bunch stretching away to the north. Perosus means a people with an unusual power of hatred. There were only a few of the original natives left in Vindex when the Perosians came. Where these few natives came from, I haven’t the least idea. Perhaps they developed from the land and water that has always been in this place. I once discovered a cave here where four of these original natives lived, a male and female with a male child and a female child. In appearance they only resembled us a very little — yes, scarcely at all! They had no head and no neck. Their faces protruded from the centre of their breasts, which were very large and covered with fine white silky hairs. Where we have our heads and necks, they had a circular base, as if designed to carry a column or pillar. But there was nothing on it, and the natives, when I asked what they called it, replied cornicer, meaning Horner. Yes, they carried on this substitute for a head a colossal horn. This horn was connected with their mouth by a hollow reed. I became quite familiar with these four creatures, who had very short legs and arms. I soon learnt their language, which was entirely composed of signs and gestures and the use of about a dozen monosyllables, which I quickly got to know by heart. ‘Blog’ meant ‘Yes’ and ‘Wog’ meant ‘no’ and ‘Bogly-Wogly’ meant ‘wait and see.’ I missed them greatly when they perished. They were eaten by a dragon, whose dead body I found soon after. It had died of eating them.

“It was easy for me,” the Arch-Druid continued, “to conquer the haters from Perosus. They had invented enough airships to carry about a thousand of them from their world to ours. But the particular Perosian who did the inventing died from overwork soon after he got here, or perhaps the climate of our world didn’t suit him. Climate is the most important of all the elemental influences that preserve or destroy the human race. And no man can possibly tell, till he has tried it for at least twelve months, whether a particular climate is curative to him or destructive to him. Being the Head of all the Druids still surviving in the west of the Earth — and there are many more of us than people realize, for we don't give ourselves away — it was easy for me to bring over to Vindex in the course of half my life-time a great number of Druids, and once over here, it was easy to make the population of Haters our obedient slaves. Yes, it was the Perosians who built this city; but they built it under our direction; for we very quickly were able to make them madly scared of us. You know, my dear son and daughter, that every Druid still surviving on our old planet Earth has more power at his disposal than all the Witches and all the Wizards that have ever lived from the Witch of Endor to the present day. The Perosians, just because they were, and still are, such haters, make the best slaves in the world. So we soon had them completely at our disposal."

The Arch-Druid stopped speaking: and Jilly Tewky down at the bottom of her heart thought to herself: "So you imagine, you old fool, but I know better!"

"Here," announced the Arch-Druid, "is your dwelling — at least for the present."

They had stopped before a long flight of steep steps leading to an iron door in a high straight wall.

"I will stay here," he continued, "till old Plangy has opened the door to let you in."

John o' Dreams followed Jilly Tewky up the steps. She waited till he was beside her and then the two of them tapped with their knuckles determinedly upon the iron door just above its small brass handle. After that they both remained staring at the door, allowing the Arch-Druid at the foot of the steps behind them to disappear completely from their excited and a little frightened minds.

After about two minutes' pause, during which they heard no steps nor any sound at all, the black iron door opened, admitted them in silence, and was closed behind them. They were confronted by the biggest lady they had ever seen in their lives.

"Follow me, my children," she said; and they followed her obediently up a flight of heavily-carpeted stairs. The carpet was of the same purple colour as was the curious lichen they had seen growing in places where in Foghorn grass would have grown. Arrived at last at a large landing, the lady threw open the door of a spacious chamber. The windows of this chamber were very big and high and were on the same side of the room and each of them opened upon a wide, park-like expanse which apparently formed a sort of verdurous circle all the way round the city. Close to each of the windows, which obviously could be very easily opened and shut, was a small four-poster bed, and round these beds were low wickerwork screens, covered in each case by daintily brocaded silk.

"I was led to understand," said the lady, "that you are brother and sister; and it struck me that, being complete strangers here, you would prefer not to be separated at night. Sit down for a moment, my dears," she went on, "and let us ask each other a few questions. Oh yes! But first let me tell you that there is a room containing a bath and a warm-water tap and also a water closet — yes, all in the same room — on this floor of my house. So you two will have all you need, by night as well as day, except, of course, food and drink, but we can talk of that later."

Facing the high windows and the two beds, there was a big fire-place with a warm log fire that had evidently been burning all day, and close to its fender three comfortable armchairs. Into one of these their hostess now subsided, and Jilly Tewky and John o' Dreams sank down happily into the others. On each side of the fireplace hung an extremely large mirror, so that in one or other of these mirrors all three of them could see their own and each other's faces clearly reflected.

"I must begin, my dears," said their hostess, "by telling you my name. It is Plangy. They all here — I speak of us natives, of course, not of our masters — call me Pummy Plangy. You may be surprised that I can talk your language. But that is the one really good thing our rulers, the Druids, have done for me. They have taken me back and forth so often to your planet, and always — for I fancy this one, the one who brought you here, must in former days have lived where you live — to Foghorn, isn't it? They were the original owners of your land, weren't they, until the Romans killed most of them? Anyway, they've taken me — this one's taken me — so often to your planet and to your shore that I've grown quite used to your tongue. I expect that's why he brought you here and told me how to prepare for you. You two, I know, aren't Druids. I suppose, like us, Perosians from Perosus, you were conquered by them. But don't let's talk about that. It's not a nice subject."

"Is Pummy," enquired Jilly Tewky, "the same as our word Mummy?"

But the lady didn't answer that question. She had lowered her voice and had begun to gaze at them, first at one and then at the other, with an expression of quite startling authority. Her face was the whitest face they had ever seen in their lives, and it was the largest face. Compared with the face of Pummy Plangy, the Arch-Druid's face, as the twins now thought of it, seemed small and wrinkled and withered, for all the majesty of its imposing beard. Both the twins thought of that slender, retiring, slippery, sly, unassertive person who had conveyed them through space to the star Vindex.

"He must have shaved his beard off," said John o' Dreams to himself.

"He must have transformed his whole personality to fool us," said Jilly Tewky to herself.

Then they both stared at the face of Pummy Plangy, while Pummy Plangy kept looking first at her girl-guest and then at her boy-guest. What she saw in them they never knew; but what struck them most about her was the easy, idle, careless, almost frivolous way she looked at them! It was the sort of look with which the mother of a dozen children might have watched her son playing at being Robin Hood and her daughter playing at Maid Marian; or at her daughter playing at Juliet and her son at Romeo!

The woman got up.

"Stay where you are for a moment, my dears," she said, "and I'll get you some lemonade."

"For heaven's sake sweetheart," whispered John o' Dreams as soon as she was out of sight, "let's be careful with this bitch! Do you think she's an old maid, or do you think she's the mother of ten and the grandmother of twenty?"

Before Jilly Tewky could answer his whispers, Pummy Plangy was with them again, carrying a rough tray that looked as if it was made of lead, with two earthenware mugs on it and a transparent glass jug full of a pale yellowish liquid.

"Oh! it's so delicious, Mrs. Plangy!" cried Jilly Tewky, emptying half her mug down her throat. "It tastes of oranges!"

John o' Dreams lifted his mug to his lips and sipped.

"My sister's quite right," he said. "It's like oranges!"

The lady took her seat before the fire again.

"It is oranges," she said. "I forgot I hadn't any lemons left!"

The difference in taste between oranges and lemons soon led Pummy Plangy to the ticklish subject of the difference between our two different races in this scattered universe. This topic of anciently different races, each with its own traditions and legends going back thousands upon thousands of centuries, was evidently of all subjects of discussion the one which interested Mother Plangy the most.

"I can see clearly," she now announced, settling her powerful and well-filled-out frame in a sort of relaxed preparation for a tremendous leap upon some particular enemy, "that neither of you have the faintest connection with this Druidic autocracy that has been dominating our little world for the last hundred years. I was myself a child when this Druidic tyranny took its present form; I mean when they all began submitting to a little inner group of powerful Druids, who all obeyed the Arch-Druid. The present Arch-Druid is the best we have had so far. Some of them have been real devils. I could tell you things about the one before this one that would make you shiver and shake. It is probably this very fact of the abominable cruelty of his predecessor that accounts for the milder behaviour of this one. And now I am going to reveal to you a great secret, a secret unknown to the majority of my own Perosian compatriots, and I confess without shame that one of my motives in revealing it to you is that by implication you will, of necessity, be confronted by the alternative of becoming one of us, or of betraying us to your friend the Arch-Druid. I say your friend the Arch-Druid purely out of politeness, because I know only too well that no Druid has a friend in the world who isn't a Druid. They're like that. They've always been like that. O, I do hate them so! But I must repress my feelings if I am really going to be brave enough to tell you the great secret."

At this point Mummy Plangy lowered her voice, and taking hold with both her strong hands of the chair beneath her, she made it hop forward a few feet so as to be closer to her guests.

"You must understand, my dears," she now said in a low voice, looking first into John o' Dreams' face and then into Jilly Tewky's, and then glancing hurriedly round the room, "that we, the conquerors of Vindex, reached this star, or as you would probably say, 'this world,' by means of a fleet of flying vessels. Well, my dears," and with a still further hop of her chair she approached so close that, as she leaned forward, her big aquiline nose and heavily breathing mouth hovered over the arms of her guests' two chairs like an overshadowing moth, "the secret I have to tell you is this, that wholly unknown by our terrible masters from your world, the natives of Vindex, who were conquered by us Perosians, still exist. Yes! they exist among us still! We have hidden them throughout our whole world, and by degrees we shall be able to arm them with formidable weapons. Then suddenly we shall release them like a wild host of demons and command them to utterly destroy every Druid in Vindex."

Having thus spoken, Mummy Plangy relaxed once more into her armchair, while her two hearers did the same into theirs. But it can be imagined how John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky looked at each other. After a minute of silent pondering, Jilly Tewky, seconded by a nod from her brother, boldly spoke out, and related to their hostess the whole story about the two Horners and their two children found by the Druid in a cave, and not long after discovered in the belly of a dead dragon. Mummy Plangy was clearly staggered by this news. She clasped the arms of her chair with both hands till her knuckles grew white.

"It is true there are dragons in Vindex," she said slowly and solemnly, "but few people ever see them. They only come out in the dark; and they are frightened and hurry off if anyone catches sight of them. They are cowardly creatures, dragons are, in spite of their scales and claws. But I must tell you two — for in my own way I have more insight, more magical insight, than any Druid, and I know, as no damned Druid ever could know, how good and honest and reliable you two are — exactly what I have persuaded our people to do. I started it all. Yes! I started it. But I was young then, for it was twenty years ago and I am over forty now. But what we did, and it took us twenty years to do it, was to dig an underground cavern under the whole of our great city. We had to do this little by little, and O so carefully! But I can see from what you tell me that our accursed and hateful masters haven't found out! So he thought, did he, that that family of Horners, father and mother and brother and sister, was a rare discovery of his own! But O how wisely those Horners must have acted! How wisely, if, after being able to boast, as he did to you, of knowing them so well and of learning those words of their language, and of gaining their entire confidence, he still believed that they were a rare and special case of the original natives of this particular world, living in a cave such as only a very wise and clever Druid like himself would be able to discover. They paid the penalty for their wisdom and patriotism by losing their lives, the dear things, for if they hadn't been propitiating and fooling your friend the Arch-Druid, they never would have fallen victims to that alligator-creature. No! a thousand times no! They were not a rare and special case! They were the first heroic victims of my twenty-years' plan for the extermination of these hateful Druidic lords of ours! Not for nothing are we Perosians, that is to say the race in the Universe who have the best cause for hating!"

The twins, who had listened awe-struck and wondering, gazed at each other with their heads working at top speed. He was thinking, "After all we should never have seen this amazing city of Asteropetes in Vindex if it had not been for the Arch-Druid; and he must have known perfectly well that we haven't a drop of Druidic blood in us." She was thinking: "The best thing we could do would be to fill a couple of bags or baskets with food to last us a long time, and walk off to some completely different part of this Vindex-world, where, if there are any natives, they won't take us for Perosians or Druids or crocodiles, and where we can find, when our food is finished, something or other to eat and drink." And he finally decided: "I'll tell her what I think before we go to sleep." Meanwhile she thought: "Perhaps it would be best to write down my plan for John o' Dreams to read on a piece of paper. For this woman may have ways of understanding every word people speak if it is spoken within a hundred yards of her."

The Mummy Plangy lady rose slowly now to her feet, moved to the door, and made a curious obeisance, resembling a bow, though it could not be called a bow, for what she did was to extend her elbows as if she were pretending to be developing wings, and then to make a gesture with her hands as if she were washing them of all responsibility for everything on Vindex, whether past or to come. She made this gesture towards each of the twins in turn. Then she went out backwards, closing the door behind her.

"The best thing we can do," John o' Dreams said, "is first to have a good sleep; and then, when morning, if you can call it morning, comes — for it seems to me that in this confounded world morning and night are going to be so alike that we shan't know one from the other — we can decide what to do. But the first thing is to have a good long sleep. I suggest we leave this blasted city altogether tomorrow, and set out on our feet to what at home we would call the country."

Thus speaking John took off his outer clothes, kissed his hand to his sister, and slipping into one of the two beds, shut his eyes tight and was soon fast asleep. Jilly did the same and got into her bed; the only difference was that she found it impossible to sleep for at least an hour.

XIV

John o’ Dreams and Jilly Tewky did exactly what they had decided to do before they slept. The only exception to their decision was they were so scared of being caught that, at the last moment, they lacked the courage to explore this big house of Mother Plangy so as to find some food to put into their satchel, which they carried by turns over their left shoulder.

It was only when they were well clear of the house and the city and the avenue and the amphitheatre that Jilly burst out to John, “My dear, aren’t you hungry? I’m terribly hungry and mighty thirsty too! What an unhospitable land this must be, when neither that old Plangy nor the Arch-Druid thought of giving us supper or any kind of meal before we went to bed!”

“Well, Jilly darling,” said John, taking their satchel from her and hanging its leather strap round his own left shoulder, “I guess we’ll have to plunder or steal a meal from the first out of the way cottage we find!”

“But you’ve got your purse in your pocket, haven’t you?” said Jilly. “You always do have a purse,” she added, “in your trouser pocket; for I’ve only got half-a-crown at the bottom of the satchel. If I’d known that they don’t even give their visitors milk in the Milky Way, I never would have let that rascal carry us here!”

“Well, my dear,” said John o’ Dreams, “we’ve got to find a house that’s got something to eat in it. Let’s see what I have got in my purse!”

So saying he extracted this dilapidated object from his trouser pocket and emptied its contents into his left hand.

"Three sixpences, two half-a-crowns, four pennies, four halfpennies, and half a quid. That's the bloody lot!"

He poured the money back into his purse and pocketed it again.

"We've not had a sight yet of any of their money, Jilly. Shall we be able to use ours, if theirs is too weird and peculiar for us to understand its variations in value? Suppose their money is entirely in stones and pebbles? Or suppose it's human hair they use for their money? Can't you imagine, Jilly darling, pretty little bunches of girls' and boys' hair tied up with exquisitely delicate ribbons, yellow hair, brown hair, black hair? And perhaps tiny little scraps of white hair from old people's heads would be farthings, while bunches of yours would be a pound each!"

Jilly laughed gaily. Then she said gravely, "Don't I see a thin pillar of smoke going up, John, behind that hill over there?"

"By God, you're right, Jilly! It is smoke! Come on, my dear!"

Side by side they rushed to the foot of the little hill; and then boldly mounted it. There were no bushes or trees of any kind, and the ground was of dull whitish tint, speckled here and there with purplish sprigs of lichen. They instinctively clasped each other's hands as they neared the top.

"I wish I'd had my stick," murmured John o' Dreams, "when he carried us up to this weird world!"

Yes! There right before them was a massive erection, built of white stone, with a roof, the wide eaves of which stretched out to all four quarters of the air. The building itself was foursquare, erected on a kind of platform of the same material, the base of which was three feet high and three feet broad, offering convenient seats for quite a lot of defenders if the building were attacked by armed enemies. As it happened, by a stroke of excellent good luck, at the very place where the twins approached this formidable erection, they were confronted by its entrance. There was a circular arch with a complicated symbolic carving, a carving such as an imaginative student of heraldry might have regarded as the coat of arms of some monstrous being in the Mesozoic Era, a hundred and thirty million years ago. The door itself, beneath this stone carving and the stone expanse of the roof, was evidently made of wood, and on one side of it was a large silver handle.

Both the twins felt so hungry and thirsty that, if this fortress had been the home of the great giant Atlas who held up the sky, they would have knocked at this door.

There was no knocker, so Jilly bent down, picked up a stone, showed it to John, so that he might see it had a fossil in it, and then knocked with all her strength at the wooden door. For more than a couple of minutes they waited, listening intently for some answering sound. Then John o’ Dreams cried, “Give the blasted fossil to me!”

Jilly gave it to him, and using all his strength he struck the door so savagely that Jilly was scared. “How do we know,” she thought, “that some appalling monster won’t come and make a meal of us, and lap up our blood instead of giving us tea?”

“You shouldn’t have hit the door quite so hard,” she said to John. “You see we know nothing about this country — perhaps they only eat earth and only drink rain!”

“Hush! Listen!” muttered John.

There was a sound inside and a most extraordinary sound. It was as if a large yard-broom — or rather a mop of long, sharp thorny spikes — was approaching; and, as the door opened, these spikes presented themselves and were directed towards their faces. It was then — by one of those happenings that the more we think about them, the more we become convinced that they are neither occasioned by pure chance nor by an act of God, but have behind them a quite natural, though entirely psychic, sequence of causation — that John uttered some very queer words. In the doorway, at the handle of the broom thus thrust at the twins' faces, was a semi-human form. It bore the base of a pillar upon its neck between its shoulders and on this base a large horn. The Thing's face had the features of a human being, but this face and its features emerged from the creature's chest or breast.

"Bogly-Wogly," cried John o' Dreams loudly when, though very faintly in the darkness of the entrance, he saw this face. The words had come to him with their original meaning, "Wait and see!" from the story of that family of four aboriginals with whom the Druid had managed to make friends. It was the painful shock of the bristles of that broom, followed by the staggering appearance at the back of it of that figure with a human face where a man's chest or a woman's breast usually is, that brought back to John o' Dreams those nonsensical syllables, which the Druid had told them meant in the language of the aboriginals of Vindex the sagacious advice, "Wait and see."

The words, silly as they sounded to the twins, had the effect they desired. The bristling broom was lowered, and the being holding it, who was clearly a female — for her breasts were apparent although a little nearer her waist than they are with us — signed to the twins to enter. The lady had never seen human beings before, so that their two heads, decorated not with a horn but with hair, were as staggering to her as her own Horner's head, if head it would be called, was to them. It is wonderful, however, what signs and tokens can do; and John o' Dreams's behaviour at this crucial moment — as Jilly Tewky told him later on — was really quite inspired.

They found themselves in a large square chamber, with a big fire burning in a big hearth; but, save for the fire, everything in the room was black, not so much “black as coal” or “black as ink,” as “black as night.” The floor was covered by an enormous black rug, and from the ceiling above hung from a black chandelier things that looked very like black wax candles, a few of which were alight. John o’ Dreams at once knelt down before the lady, and with both his hands began an extravagant pantomime of a hungry and thirsty person eating and drinking. Jilly stood by his side quite motionless, with their satchel over her shoulder. The lady of the house evidently understood John o’ Dreams’s performance, for when it was over, she made a sign for them both to sit down on a long sofa covered with a black rug, and went out through a door at the further end of this great black hall. The twins seated themselves side by side on the black sofa, which faced the fire, though it was a good distance from it, and looked with humorous helplessness at each other.

“Well, my dear,” murmured John, “we must hope she brings us something which isn’t too repulsive to eat! I think she will. There was an intelligent look in her eyes, and I think she is a friendly creature, though heaven knows what sort of a meal she’s going to bring us.”

They hadn’t been long alone before there appeared a response to that wise command, “Wait and see!” This response took the form of the entrance of four little children, through the same door at the end of the dark firelit room through which the lady of the house had departed. They were holding one another’s hands, and were evidently full of intense excitement and an exultant mixture of interest and fear. It was hard for the twins to distinguish their sex, but discussing it later, they decided that the ones at the extremity of the line were boys and the two in the middle were girls. They came straight up to where the twins sat on the black sofa, and all four of them saluted their visitors with a grave little bow. Then to the twins’ absolute amazement, they all very solemnly began reciting what was obviously a lesson. Their punctuation was certainly peculiar. John o’ Dreams said to himself, “It must be like the accent of the Long-Ears of Easter Island”; while Jilly Tewky said to herself: “It must be like the accent of the natives on the top of the Andes.” The sentence the children uttered — and they repeated it twice — struck both their listeners as having been learnt by heart some time ago.

“Our Father who lives with us knows one of the languages they talk on the planet Earth.”

Hearing this, the twins knew they must show their pleasure. So first Jilly Tewky, and then John o’ Dreams, and then both of them together, clapped their hands and repeated the words, “Well done! Well done!” Both visitors cried independently when they heard what the four little boys and girls did next, “Wonderful!”

“Hurrah!” For the children let go one another’s hands, and seizing the tubes which hung over their shoulders and pressing them into their mouths, they all four blew their horns in an exultant and rhythmical unison.

They went on blowing their horns in the same entrancing harmony as, one by one, a boy leading and a boy following, the four of them returned from the firelit darkness of that black room into the unknown regions behind the door through which their mother had gone.

Once more alone with him, Jilly said to John: “I wonder whether mother is worried about us? It is extraordinary how little she does worry when we don’t come home. Daddy’s much more likely to make a fuss; but he’s got all that weeding for the Gog-Magogs to get through these days. And you know what he is. When once he’s really tired, he doesn’t care if the world comes to an end and we’re all tossed into space, so long as there’s a bed in which he can go to sleep!”

"I bet Auntie Oh is dying to send somebody to fetch the Rector," commented John o' Dreams, "but there's nobody to send. I warrant our Grand-Grumble is more annoyed at losing that book he threw at me than at any tales about our being both dead."

"What I really think—" began Jilly Tewky; but she was interrupted by the appearance of the lady of the house, carrying an enormous tray bearing a pile of buttered toast and a big jug of steaming hot drink. She pulled a stool out of the corner of the room, and put down the tray on it in front of the fire. On the tray were two plates and two cups and saucers; and the good lady went behind the sofa, after the twins had risen to their feet, and pushed it forward nearer the stool that held the tray and the fire that was warming everything.

"Is this coffee or tea, my lady?" enquired John o' Dreams, as he lifted one of the cups to his lips.

It was clear to the towering female, however obscure his words were, that he was mentioning earthly drinks, so she replied at once: "Borrabug, borrabug, borrabug!" and then tapped her stomach, as much as to say, "a much better refreshment than any of those drugs you've mentioned." She evidently was now aware that her family were on the way to join them; so she hurried to the further side of the hearth and dragged from thence an extraordinary-looking receptacle for a relaxed body, whether of man or beast, which she placed by the side of the stool that held the tray. And then it was that the Lord of the House of Galligathol entered with all his four children clinging to him, and moving straight to the chair his lady had brought, stretched himself out upon it.

"Welcome to you, master!" he said, addressing John. "And to you too, mistress!" he added, turning to Jilly. "You both may be surprised that I can speak your tongue; but if you don't mind my talking about myself, I'll tell you how it happened. I soon learnt from our Druids or from their Perosian rivals — I really forget from which, as I am not very partial to either of them — that the largest occupied countries in your Earth were North America and Australia; and when I enquired what language they spoke they replied, ‘English.’ It was clear to me then that, if I wished to strengthen my opposition to both the damned Druids and their still more damnable rivals the Perosians, I must learn English. You will be surprised, master, you will be astonished, mistress. But I beg you to forgive my egoism, if I tell you how I learnt your language. I had long practised — from my boyhood in fact, and I expect that is why my children are so good at horning in — the art of repeating on my horn, all the various cries of birds and the various growls of beasts that can be heard here. But it suddenly occurred to me that it would be a much more exciting exploit, if I could copy the sounds of the words spoken in another world. It was, of course, for me a most happy accident that your Druids had come to stay in our world, for I learnt from them the position in the universe of your world, and of its rotations in regard to your sun, and of your moon’s rotations in regard to you. But my desire would not have been satisfied by just taking lessons from some particular Druid in the language spoken in Britain and in New Zealand and in North America and in Australia. I was more ambitious. I wanted to learn your language independently of your Druids. So I began to use my horn — knowing exactly which of the pinpricks of light in your solar system was your world, I managed to direct the intake of my horn to the precise part of this minute star which was the isle of Britain and the continent of North America and Australia. For you must understand, my dear guests, that in my pursuit of the sounds of birds and of the appearances connected with those sounds, I had invented a telescopic and microscopic power for my horn parallel with its audible power. My supreme discovery was this power of intake in my horn parallel with its outrush. I reached this discovery by pondering for days and nights, when I was a boy, on the mystery of music. What I came to feel was that there was a double energy in music, in fact in all sound, whether musical or unmusical, one of these energies flying outwards and the other diving inwards."

Both the twins, seated on their black sofa in the heart of their black room, gazed with awe at this tremendous being who was lecturing them on his discoveries: and although his two little sons and his two little daughters, all four of them resting on his knees and upon the elbows of his chair, made it difficult to take in the full force of his personality, they quickly realised that he was the most imposing personage they had ever beheld. Not only he, but his four children, were most politely and most hospitably eager to see their guests partaking of the contents of that spacious tray upon the stool, but the lady was also now standing beside them, filling their plates and their cups, and encouraging them to eat and drink. This they both hastily did, and they found the food delicious and the drink just what they needed.

"I like Borrabug very much," said John, "don't you, Jilly?"

"I certainly do," cried Jilly, as loudly as she could. "It's more like coffee than tea," she added enthusiastically; while their hostess filled their cups again.

"Do please tell us the name of this manor-house of yours," broke out John eagerly. "I do want to remember it exactly, so as to tell my Daddy and Mummy when I get home. Is it Galligathol?" and he put the accent strongly on the syllable ig, "or is it Galligathol?" and he laid the stress on gath.

All the four children chanted at once: "Galligathol, Galligathol, Galligathol, Galligathol!" And both the twins together repeated the word, emphasizing ig.

There was an impressive pause. Then John o' Dreams boldly enquired, "You will not, I trust, think me impertinent, Sir, if I ask you your name and the name of your honoured lady?"

"Heaven and Earth, no!" chuckled the enormous figure in the chair. "I always like being asked personal questions. My name is Ro, Ro the Horner, and my lady's name is Lo, Lo the Horner's wife. As for these little ones, our four children, I'll soon tell you their names. The eldest is Tom and the youngest is Rom, both boys, and of the girls who come between them, the eldest is Flin and the younger is Yin; and, of course, as you can see, we are all Horners."

It was not long before the great Ro the Horner, followed by Tom and Yin, began to grow drowsy. So indeed did the twins themselves; for they had had a substantial meal and hot Borrabug was evidently conducive to sleep. The lady of the house, in spite of the horn above her dignified countenance, was clearly unwilling to allow this drowsy mood to carry husband, children, and guest, out of Galligathol, wherever you put the stress, into the kingdom of dreams before they were safely in bed. It was not, therefore, very long before she had conveyed her mate and all their four children into that unknown part of the house reached through the door at the far end of this black paradise of Morpheus. She had already moved the sofa further away from the dying fire, and she now brought each of them a soft woollen blanket and wished them goodnight.

XV

THEIR WISE HOSTESS had thoughtfully provided them with two chamber-pots when she brought their blankets, so that the twins slept soundly on the black sofa, John o' Dreams's head just touching the soles of Jilly Tewky's feet, which still wore stockings but no shoes. They woke with strange simultaneousness, just as the first light of dawn was visible beneath the great oak door at which they had knocked the previous night. They had removed very few of their clothes; so they only had to pull on their boots, pick up their satchel, which John hung over his left shoulder, and quietly unbar the great oak door, closing it behind them as softly as they could.

But they had scarcely descended to the foot of the steps outside, before they were confronted by as queer a couple of creatures as any of the Horners from whom they were escaping. These creatures had evidently been awaiting them, for they lifted themselves up from their recumbent positions on a flat stone near the lowest of the flight of steps and began at once to speak to them in English. They spoke very slowly and gravely, first one and then the other; both of them were using extremely pedantic words. To hear them was like hearing a couple of very learned professors giving their hearers important but very complicated information about life several million years ago, and every now and then expressing differences of opinion between themselves with a mixture of irritability and irony. John o' Dreams turned to his sister.

"Do you know what these two are, Jilly? I do. They may chatter to us as they like, and they may dress themselves up in lichen leaves of this queer world as they like. But I know them."

Jilly Tewky moved a step nearer the two queer creatures, one of whom was shaped like a sea-serpent, and the other like a walrus or small whale.

“Have they come out of the Sea?” she enquired of her brother, half turning her head.

“We don’t know yet whether they’ve got a sea in this weird world,” replied John o’ Dreams. “Perhaps their sea is somewhere underground, like those great caverns Mummy Plangy told us about, beneath their city.”

“But you said just now,” protested Jilly, “that you know what these two are.”

John o’ Dreams pulled her head towards his own, and whispered something in her ear.

“You don’t mean it,” she cried aloud, and gazed once more at their two interlocutors. “Yes,” she murmured, turning back to him and shivering a little, “yes, I do see what you mean!”

But the creatures had evidently had quite enough of this not very polite conversation carried on so shamelessly in front of them.

“For the sake of Adam and Eve,” burst out the serpentshaped one, rising up on its tail, “not to speak of Gain and Abel or of Noah and his Ark or Moses and his burning bush, can’t you two, visitors here from Foghorn in Britain, confronted by us who have also come from Britain, ask us a plain question in English? Can’t you say simply and directly: Who are you two, and how did you get here? But as you evidently think it is grander and more genteel to talk about us before our faces, instead of asking us a plain question, I will tell you who we are in plain blunt terms. I am a Worm and my lady-friend here is a Slug. We happened by chance in our search for food to attach ourselves to the clothes of the Arch-Druid who brought you here. Well! He brought us too. Being less obsessed with our own ideas than you two seem to be, we naturally took our colouring and a good deal of our appearance from the Vindex world. And naturally enough, since it was upon the clothing of the Arch-Druid we got here, it is the ideas of the Arch-Druid that we have lived upon."

The Worm paused for a second; then he went on: "The Arch-Druid knew your language, so we know your language. The Arch-Druid stands up straight. So we stand up straight. The Arch-Druid has an imposing costume. So we have imposing costumes. The Arch-Druid endeavours to embrace life's Two extremes, so I embrace One extreme and my friend the Slug embraces the Other extreme."

"Heaven!" cried John impatiently, "what the hell do you mean by life's Two extremes?"

"Tell him, comrade!" bawled the Worm.

The Slug stood up straight. She did not look quite so straight as the Worm, because her body was so much thicker, but she looked like a whale who had decided to fly.

"Life's Two extremes, let me tell you, are those which you have just mentioned," explained the Slug. "They are Heaven and Hell. But psychologists, such as we are, go further into this mystery, and explain to ignorant men and women like you that Heaven means a universe filled entirely with life-producing material, and Hell means a universe of completely empty space, a world in fact of nothingness."

"What you stupid people of Foghorn don't realise," concluded the Worm, settling himself down on the stone-ledge by the side of his friend, "is that every living thing in the universe spontaneously, instinctively, naturally, inevitably, irresistibly, automatically, unconsciously decides, as it is born or as it comes into existence, whether it wants All or Nothing." Jilly Tewky took John by his wrist to draw him away, with a gesture that clearly intimated that she didn’t at all agree with any of this “All or Nothing” business; but John, on the contrary, burst out excitedly:

“Yes! my good sires, you’re right! You’re right! You’re right! You’re right! Haven’t I been every day of my life, since I could walk so far, to the Fountain of Bubble and Squeak? And haven’t I listened there to the wisdom of the Skull? And haven’t I followed the wild mad rushes of the Bubble? Haven’t I sometimes been under the influence of the one and sometimes under the influence of the other? Haven’t I travelled to the Heart of the Sun under their antipodal influences? Haven’t I — forgive me if I speak with criminal recklessness — even murdered a man under the clash of their opposite pulls?”

Jilly now whispered to her brother: “For Mummy’s sake, do stop talking to them — you can’t tell what they may not do.”

Neither Master Worm nor Mistress Slug seemed inclined to do anything at this particular moment; for something was happening to them that they found extremely interesting, something that when John o’ Dreams saw it he murmured to his sister: “What they’re doing is growing. They’ll be as tall as we are very soon!”

But though the Worm and the Slug were each of them over four feet high when they stopped growing, they weren’t up to the shoulder of Jilly Tewky, and her brother towered above them. The thing, however, that arrested the twins’ attention the most, more even than their height, was the fact that both the creatures, after this growing, had human faces, the Worm a boy’s face and the Slug a girl’s face. Their bodies, however, were in no way changed, except that they did now possess both arms and legs, though with grotesquely clumsy hands and feet. The skin of their faces was of the same colour and the same texture as their bodies, the Worm’s greyish, the Slug’s blackish, but the eyes of both were piercingly dark, like the demoniacal eyes of the sort of spectre that children see when they've done something wrong and have just been listening to the hymn, "Now the day is over, night is drawing nigh," and seen the door close as Mummy leaves them.

"We had a good meal last night," John o' Dreams said to them, "before we went to sleep. I hope you two aren't terribly hungry?"

The Worm shook his head and rubbed his mouth with the back of his shapeless hand, as if dismissing some demon of devilish hunger. The Slug spat on her knuckles and then licked them.

"No," said the former, "we're neither breakfasters nor buccaneers. One meal a day is all we require, and it suits us best in the evening, but if we are to accompany you, we'll be quite ready to have it whenever you have yours."

The twins were so bewildered by the presence of these two weird creatures, that it only occurred to them after they'd been walking for several hours to wonder where the devil they were going. Taking it all together, this laborious walk across one of the flattest, dullest, and most unvaried of all the plains in the centre of Vindex was about the most unpleasing experience that Jilly Nu and John Nu had ever had. The effect upon John was to make him think of the daughter of the man he had killed, Urk's daughter Ting. He recalled so well that wistful, heartbroken voice of little Jessie when, in that small alder-copse half-way up the hill above Bubble and Squeak, she had begged him to take her.

Finding John so hopelessly unable to start any sort of conversation to enliven this dreary walk across a flat expanse of whiteish gravel, Jilly finally determined to ask a bold, rude question of Mr. Worm and Mrs. Slug. They were walking four abreast in a straight row, the twins on the outside. She was next to the Slug, or to the dwarfish woman who had recently been a slug, and so it was to her she addressed her questions.

“May I ask you,” she enquired, “by what names you two address each other? Our names are Jilly Tewky and John o’ Dreams; and our surname is Nu. Our parents are Mr. Nezzar Nu and Mrs. Maria Nu.”

The Worm and the Slug, who now were a quaint-looking dwarfish man and woman, looked smilingly on the twins.

“Tell them our names in rhyme,” said the Slug-woman to the Worm-man. “Tell them in that rhyme you made up that day, Wug, when the Druid asked what we were!”

The Worm smiled back at her. “Sure I will!” And with the gestures of a great actor playing Hamlet, he said his say:

“I am the Worm that feeds on the World!
Wug!
When you ask me why, I can only shrug!
Ug!
When you talk of God I do not squirm, For the Devil’s a different kind of Worm, And my friend’s not a Lady with a Perm:
She’s Zug!”

“Bravo!” cried John o’ Dreams.

“Well done!” cried Jilly Tewky.

There was a pause. Then John said, “On we go then, all four of us. I fancy that together, considering everything, we’ll be a fair match for anybody we may meet, even for one of those Horner-eating crocodiles!”

They went on contentedly together, crossing calmly and resolutely what appeared to be an endless plain.

XVI

As they walked the personal thoughts of each one of them rose up from their heads and played invisible pranks in the air. These thoughts — as all thoughts are apt to do, the longer they are dwelt upon by living minds — tended to follow their own devices. The four persons went steadily on side by side across the plain, leading apparently to a circular horizon that stretched away like the rounded curve of an orb suspended in fathomless space. How little people realise the fantastic embodiments of their own thoughts! Here were four persons walking side by side over a plain of whitish gravel, and not one of them realised that above their heads four thoughts were playing queer games.

"I want to have Ting the daughter of Urk up here with me," was what John was thinking; and this thought was like a white eel that kept twisting round the thought of Jilly, which was like a spirited little minnow that kept diving upwards into the air, then turning round with the flash of moonbeam and diving down over the rim of the world. By the side of the movements of the thoughts of the twins, the thought of Wug the Worm-man was turning head over heels on the head of Zug the Slug-woman, who did nothing but sway very slowly and solemnly backwards and forwards, as if it were chanting a mystic chant to the tune of the motion of Vindex itself along the rim of the universe.

But the longing in the mind of John o' Dreams to have Ting with him on the surface of Vindex grew and grew as they walked. At last this longing within him burst out in a wild and desperate appeal to Wug and Zug.

"Could you possibly, my friends, in spite of all the difficulties and dangers, for I need not tell you how it would bind me to you in gratitude forever if you could, nor how I would give you, if you did, all the most precious treasures I possess in the world, could you, would you, fly back to the Earth and bring out here from that old planet of the Sun a certain young man and a certain young woman."

"But John, but John!" cried Jilly.

"Don't you interrupt," her brother retorted, "till they've answered."

There was a short exchange of broken, indistinct words between the Worm-man and the Slug-woman. Then Master Wug answered "loud and bold," like Chapman's Homer to Keats.

"Yes, my friend, we will fly there and bring this couple here. What are their names, and where do they live?"

Jilly was evidently seriously troubled; for she began to walk a little ahead of them with her eyes not on the horizon, but on the ground. But her brother went on relentlessly.

"Their names are Master Ring and Miss Ting, and their father Lord Urk has recently disappeared, and they are left alone in his castle at Foghorn with the housekeeper Laura and the cook Jessica. There will be no need to wait till night to show you the planet Earth, with her satellite the Moon, or the Sun round which they both revolve, for you know it well, having been there so often with — indeed, as you confess to me — on — the Arch-Druid!"

And John o' Dreams laughed with that rather gross and rather silly laugh, with which he used to accompany his narrations to his family of his dreams the previous night as they sat down to breakfast.

Once more there was a hurried, indistinct conversation between Wug and Zug. Then the former said to John:

“Do you see that mound over there with a big square stone on the top?”

“That one there?” enquired John, pointing with his hand to the right of where they were standing.

“Yes,” replied Wug, “but we’d better go there, to make quite sure; and then you can wait there and get some food too, until we return.”

“Come on, Jilly,” cried John. “We are going to that mound!”

Jilly evidently would have liked to shrug her shoulders and tell them it was no concern of hers. But her momentary pique had ebbed away, and she felt it would have been disloyal to her brother not to help him at a pinch like this. So she followed them to the mound.

“It’s the grave of the King of the Horners. The Druid told us when we got here, for this is where we first arrived, and he told us the grave is a million years old.”

“There certainly is,” added Zug the Slug, “a massive stone on the summit of the mound and engraved upon it the words: Larong-Tarong, and below them the single word Rakragor.”

“Now look there,” cried Wug the Worm-man. And when John and Jilly too, for she was with them now, looked where he pointed, there was visible a quite considerable building with two chimneys. “You’ll get beds and food and drink there to satisfy all your needs. And now” — and the Worm-man exchanged a nod with the Slug-woman— “and now we’re off!”

The twins stood completely still side by side, watching them till they reached the horizon and disappeared over it. Then Jilly Tewky flung her arms round her brother’s neck and kissed him.

“Sorry I was so cross,” she cried, “but I do so love being alone with you.”

When she relinquished her hold and let her arms fall, John o’ Dreams looked gravely at her flushed face.

“You must understand, sweetheart,” he said, “that it would be quite different if we could marry.”

“We are what we are,” said Jilly Tewky in a low voice, “and life is what it is. Come on, my dear. Let’s see what sort of people live beneath those two chimneys.”

As they approached the building, they were disturbed by the sight of terrific footprints on the white gravel, footsteps that resembled human feet, but were much larger than those of any possible or conceivable giant. They climbed the large low mound which was covered with purplish lichen, and to their great surprise, found that the front door was half open. Emboldened by this, they opened it wide and stepped inside. What they entered was a large room, a room so large that they saw at once that it filled the entire space of the building from floor to ceiling, while below each of the chimneys was a big fire, not blazing but warmly smouldering, and giving the impression that it had been lit thousands of years ago and thus had warmed all the half of the room that had not been warmed by the other, so that the stone floor and the wooden ceiling and the four stone pillars were all comfortably and pleasantly warm. In the middle of this vast chamber were many chairs and tables, tables that were covered with cups and saucers and plates and mugs and jugs, and all along beneath the four walls were soft mattresses upon which persons could sleep; and behind these mattresses, close up against the four walls, were long narrow shelves, upon which loaves and biscuits and cheeses and cakes were arranged, together with nuts and fruits and plants and berries, such as are ready to be eaten without being cooked. Jilly Tewky and John o’ Dreams walked boldly into the middle of this room and looked about on all sides to try to detect the owners of, or the dealer in, all this desirable provision for rest and nourishment.

And it was then that they suddenly saw him. He had pushed back a sliding door in the wall behind them; and as, hearing the sound of this, they swung round, there he was! He projected his head and neck and arms and shoulders into the room, but the rest of him was concealed below the floor and must have been of gigantic size. His arms, however, were long and shapely, and indeed more like those of a woman than of a man; as for his hands and fingers, they were exquisitely delicate and slender.

"Welcome, my dear children," he said softly, and shook first Jilly and then John by the hand. "You no doubt are surprised to hear your own language in a strange world; but, as you know, we have had many rulers in Vindex since the Romans gave us that name, and it was long before the Romans called our world Vindex that we were ruled by the Druids. I confess to having learned your language from the Druids, a little group of whom — they are all dead now — started a school in this building, to which Horners and Perosians alike used to come, not I think, as a rule, to learn anything, but solely to get the gifts which this Druidic group bestowed. These were a much more liberal and sceptical set than most of them, and I've sometimes thought that the last couple of them, a pair of darling old gentlemen, very good to me, were deliberately put to death by the recent ArchDruid, whose own death, as you may have heard, was welcomed by everybody in our world."

At this point he paused; and then, speaking as politely as the poet makes Solomon speak to the Queen of Sheba, he asked them for their names. When he learnt they were the children of Nezzar Nu and Maria Nu, he expressed great interest, and told them that he had even tried when he was young, but without success, to introduce their grand-father's Gog-Magogs into Vindex.

"Of course, my dears, it's not your old Umbilicus, it's my wife Omphale who cooks these things and buys them in Asteropetes. But at least I carry her over there on my back, and I dispose of them to the visitors who stop here, of whom there are more than you would imagine, considering that you two are the only ones I've had today."

"How do your visitors pay for them?" enquired John, putting his hand into his pocket to make sure his purse was still there. "Isn't it difficult to calculate with strange money?" The enormous countenance of the great Umbilicus broke into a radiant smile.

"It's all pretence with me, my dear Master Nu and Miss Nu. I don't earn my living by this amusing house of entertainment. I do it for fun, and I get a lot of fun out of it when customers come! Shall I tell you something? I collect foreign coins. Vindex, as you know, is not the only star in this portion of the universe, nor, let me tell you, is Perosia the only nearby star that has sent visitors to us by some sort of 'fiery saucer' or 'air-destroyer' or 'space-ship'."

"Well," said John o' Dreams boldly, "I shall be delighted to give you half-a-crown for each of us. That will be two silver half-crowns with the royal arms of our country printed on both of them. I expect you know what we mean in the language of heraldry by arms?"

John o' Dreams emptied the contents of his purse into the palm of his hand, took out his two half-crowns and offered them to Umbilicus, whose delicate fingers closed over them with a little quiver of satisfaction.

"We shall be expecting tomorrow," Jilly Tewky announced with a rather forced little laugh, "two friends of ours from Foghorn, accompanied by our recent companions, Wug the Worm-man and Zug the Slug-woman, who have gone to fetch them from the planet Earth. It was by the magic power of the Arch-Druid's clothes upon which they had crawled that the Worm and the Slug were transformed into human dwarfs. That’s the truth, isn’t it, John?”

John o’ Dreams hurriedly emphasised her words by describing to the fingers of Umbilicus, whose face by this time had practically disappeared, how they had actually beheld the Worm and the Slug being transformed into a dwarf man and a dwarf woman.

“It was wonderful, mister,” he cried to the fingers, “to be present at this transformation! How do you suppose the lively point of the Worm’s head and the blunt encroaching knob of the Slug’s head acquired human features? It was beyond my comprehension.”

They saw no more of Umbilicus that night; nor did they catch the faintest glimpse of Omphale, his lady. They woke up early and dressed hurriedly, and sat waiting for more than an hour on the bed where they had slept. At last they saw the smallest of the floorboards, between where they sat and one of the smouldering fires, move upward, and a most beautiful lady emerged from below.

“I have despatched my husband to do our weekly shopping in Asteropetes,” she said quietly, looking first at Jilly and then at John, “because I thought that his unusual appearance might disturb your friends from the planet Earth. But they will have had such an unusual experience in being brought here by your strange messengers, the Worm-man Wug and the Slug-woman Zug, that I doubt if anything they see here will upset them much more. I’ll bring you your first cups of tea at once, and then you can have your proper breakfast together, when they all appear.”

“You don’t mean, lady,” said Jilly Tewky in her most wistful voice, “that you actually are ready to give us all breakfast, including the Worm-man and Slug-woman?”

“Certainly I mean that,” said Omphale, smiling and standing in front of them. “I’ll bring you some water and soap and a towel, with which to wash and dry, and then I’ll bring you your first cup of tea.”

Omphale was true to her word, and it was a great comfort to the twins, especially to Jilly Tewky, when a basin of warm water with soap and a towel appeared and an elegant little sponge. After washing their faces and hands, they found their cups of tea more comforting than they could remember ever having found such simple refreshment before in all their lives, and both expressed their ardent thanks to Omphale, whose face, and the way she had done her fair hair, made them both think of pictures their Grand-dad Grumble used to show them of the ancient Greek goddesses.

The twins were indeed made so happy by the hospitality and kindness of this beautiful Being that even John did not feel at all impatient for the appearance of Ring and Ting and their unusual escort.

All was changed, however, when they did come. Very sagaciously Wug and Zug remained hushed and still, and in this way induced Ring and Ting to remain hushed and still too; so that it was not until John o’ Dreams said something about its being a pity they didn’t see them approaching the Mound from the same distance as they had seen them leaving it that, with cries of delight, they rushed into the chamber. Changed, indeed, everything was then. Drawn together, just as they had been on the hill above the Bubble and Squeak, John o’ Dreams and Ting found themselves embracing each other, as if they had been alone in an alder-swamp. Before this exciting moment, Jilly Tewky had never felt the faintest interest in Ring. But now when he impulsively knelt down on one knee before her and held her hand to his lips, all sorts of wild ideas rushed through her mind.

As with many other wise and competent maidens, Jilly had acquired the habit of accepting her life, just as it was, as something that she herself, with the approval and support of her whole being, had created for herself. Jilly Tewky's conscience was not a thing apart from herself, that was always telling her what to do and what not to do. Her conscience, that is to say her sense of good and evil, had, as far back as she could remember, never been applied to herself; nor indeed had it very often been applied to others. If John o' Dreams had worried her with questions about good and evil, she would have only felt in her mind that he was behaving as all male creatures behaved, and were compelled by their nature to behave; and she would have felt that this was the sort of thing that women have to put up with and had better treat like the tantrums of a toddler. Life was something to be accepted, not to be analysed or criticised. Nothing annoyed Jilly more than to be told that So-and-So was a selfish person. Whenever she heard anyone say that she always felt as if they were blaming a tree for having leaves or scolding the sea for having waves. What Jilly felt was that every person was like a blackbird or a rabbit or a fox or a badger or a viper or a sheep or an ox or a cow. They were what they were. Sometimes one had to use a stick to them. Sometimes one had to give them a biscuit or a piece of chocolate. It was silly to get angry; but everyone was silly sometimes, and if it took that form there it was.

What she now felt as Ring Cad knelt on one knee before her was a wild, strange emotion such as she had never felt before. As he rose and released her, she felt exactly as if she had fallen into a river. She had a vague urge to run away at top speed, to climb up a flight of steps somewhere, anywhere, to take off her clothes, and get into bed. By degrees, however, she became aware of a desire to send John o' Dreams and Ting for a long walk together, a walk that would tire them both very much indeed, tire them so much that she would be compelled to spend the time before they returned preparing a nice warm bed for Ting at the other end of the room, and after helping Omphale to cook the sort of meal John o' Dreams liked, to prepare a basin and soap and sponge and towel, so that she could wash his hands and his feet and his neck and then carry one tray to Ting's bed and another to a table at John's side. The great thing was that they should walk till both were exhausted, and that she should be prepared to look after them both, but separately, as they already had had so much of each other.

Glad enough to have Jilly Tewky to help her, Omphale now occupied herself with finding out just what the man Wug and the woman Zug wanted most to eat, and establishing them on a big sofa together in the centre of the room at about equal distance from Ting's bed and John's table. Omphale, as Jilly Tewky guessed she would be, was immensely pleased to be able to concentrate on the wants of Ring, who had that sort of remote, detached, withdrawn, reserved manner that active ladies find especially alluring. Ring's table was near Ting's bed, so that as Jilly Tewky soaped and sponged John o' Dreams, she had the deep satisfaction of being aware that Ting had Ring's presence, the most familiar presence of her life, to prevent her attention wandering too much to the wash basin of John o' Dreams.

XVII

TING AND RING had been sleeping happily within reach of each other, till one of those dreams which are liable to disturb us all made Ring scramble out of bed at five in the morning. He looked around him. Wug and Zug were sprawlingly fast asleep; and so at the other end of the room were Jilly Tewky and John o' Dreams.

"I like that Jilly girl," thought Ring to himself; "but why on earth they added 'Tewky' to her name, I can't understand. A whim of that dotty old grand-dad, I suppose! O how teasing these whimsies and caprices of silly old men can be! Well now, what am I going to do?"

He dressed hurriedly, tiptoed quickly between them all, made his way to the front door, and let himself out. The sight that met him surprised him by its resemblance to what he would have seen, had he been at Foghorn.

Yes! There was the same pre-dawn twilight; there were the same specks of glittering light in the sky; there was the same heavenly breath of cool air, a breath so sweet that it felt as if it had been down to the bottom of the sea and up again, and then round the whole circular rim of the horizon! "It's a different world from ours all the same," he thought, as he noticed the whiteness of the gravel and the darkness — for it was too early to see their purple tint — of the lichen on the ground, that took the place of the grass to which he was accustomed. "Nobody will awake till six," he told himself, "so I have a whole hour in which to explore this unknown world!"

He left the Mound behind and strode off in the direction that the compass, which he always carried on the same wrist as his watch, told him was due east.

"I wonder why I keep thinking of our old Bubble and Squeak Fountain," he said gravely to himself, after walking a couple of miles and then standing very still and looking back at the Mound. And then quite suddenly, as he stared at the Mound, he said to himself, "I wonder if old Bubble and Squeak will keep up their difference until something happens to destroy them both? All the days we've been at Cad Castle, they've kept it up; Bubble struggling to reduce the Universe to Nothing, and Squeak struggling to fill every inch of empty space with living matter. Can't the two of them see that, if either of them succeeded in its mad purpose, every interest in life for us all would come to an end? Can't they see that, if all space were filled, there'd be nothing to struggle for, and if all matter were destroyed and all space left empty, there'd be nothing for any of us to want or to wish or to hope or to fear; and we should all be as if we'd never been alive at all?"

Having reached the well-balanced, cautious, measured and rational conclusion that, if you aimed at reducing the universe to nothingness, you would be trying to take every interest out of human life, and if you aimed at filling the whole of space with a carefully organised, science-dominated Utopia of matter, life would become so indescribably dull, and so utterly lacking in all elements of chance and mystery and wonder, that simple and natural and spontaneous people would feel that the heart had been taken out of the whole world, Ring started to return to the Mound.

"What is that?" he asked himself, as his steps quickened. "It seems to hover like a wavering cloud over the Mound. And it has every colour that exists in it. Yes! It has every colour I can think of! Are there, I wonder, colours in this Milky Way star, quite different from any we know on earth? Heavens! I think there must be! What else is that colour which hovers below all the others, quite close to the building, yes! just above its roof. I am sure it is a colour! Yes, it's a colour; and yet it isn't rose, or purple, or green, or yellow, or grey, or brown, or violet, or blue, or any colour we have on earth!"

Ring's thoughts grew wilder and wilder, the faster he hurried back towards the Mound. "How easily," he told himself, "could morning and evening and day and night be different from the way they are at home. Just think if it were necessary here to dominate Time itself, to rule Time by our will-power. To will Time to advance, to will Time to retreat, to handle Time, as on earth we handle our own wandering thoughts, saying to ourselves, 'Stop now! you mustn't think of that! You must put that out of your mind!'"

Some while before he reached the Mound, after these desperate reflections about the troubling phenomena of Time, Ring became aware of the rapid approach to the Mound from the opposite direction of a man who looked as excited as he did himself. Yes! Ring was right. The other man was as excited as he was. The other man was John o' Dreams.

"Well, well!" was Ring's greeting. "So two of us got tired of sleeping in company! Is your sister up and about? I don't believe mine is! But she may be. She's a funny girl, Ting is. You never know what she'll be up to next."

"We're awfully alike in sisters, aren't we?" gasped John o' Dreams who, like Ring, had been walking fast to get back. "Only my sister and I are twins; and you are a bit older than Ting."

"Not much older!" pronounced Ring, rather irritably. "I wish I were a lot older. She bosses me too much."

John o' Dreams paused for a moment. He had forgotten the problem of attractive sisters, and was repeating to himself the name of the King of the Horners, Larong-Tarong, and the name of the hospitable Mound, Rakragor. Finally he said, "Well, when we've had breakfast, let us go with our sisters — whatever we feel about them and whether they are younger or older than we want them to be — O yes! let us go with them, Ring, on a long adventurous walk, and see if we can’t find something that neither these Perosians, nor our Druids from the Earth, have ever yet discovered.”

Ring was evidently struck pretty deeply by this idea of John o’ Dreams, but he did not utter a word till they reached the steps of the Mound. Then, as they began to ascend, with the immemorial sarcophagus of the King of the Horners awaiting them at the top, he broke silence.

“Yes, I agree. We’ll do that. Only don’t let’s hurry off too quickly. My bowels tend to move rather slowly, and it must be the same with our sisters. It wouldn’t be nice if we all had to run off for the evacuation of our bowels, when we’d hardly got under way. Besides, it’s so flat round here, and so empty of bushes or trees or rocks, that we should all be in sight of one another as we did our little job.”

“I agree,” said John o’ Dreams. “I’ll tell them after breakfast that we can’t start for an hour, as I’ve got to finish a chapter of the diary I’m writing about this place, to take home to my parents.”

Ring laughed. “You’re a real diplomatist, you are. Explorers in foreign worlds need someone like you. All the same we’ve got to obey nature, even if we are in the Milky Way.”

XVIII

In the direction towards which our friends now moved dwelt two giants. One was a giant with colossal ears, who had made a slave of the Cerne Giant, whose image with his club and penis is familiar to all Wessex folk. The master-giant's name was Bog, and he now spoke to his only companion, once the Cerne Giant, who still is pictured in chalk and grass above Cerne Abbas in Dorset.

"I expect even you, yes! even short-sighted you, can see those six little creatures walking in our direction. If you aren't too desperately keen to swallow them, I'd like to play with them for a while."

"O no," replied the Cerne Giant, "you can do what you like with them, great King of the Milky Way, I won't interfere."

"Sit down then at my side, on our second step down, so that only the tips of my ears can be seen."

His ears were the life-long centre of Bog. They were his soul. His eyes, mouth, nose, forehead, neck, were nothing to him, and the tip of his organ of generation, though as large as that of his captive from Cerne Abbas, was decently slung over his left shoulder.

Bog was indeed quite an ordinary giant in everything but his ears. He was like Atlas, or Samson, or Goliath. But his ears were different. By them, through them, in them, he lived, moved, and had his being. They were of enormous size and of the most complicated structure. He was really just an ordinary simple giant, though a trifle larger than any other ever born in any other world, who happened to be attached to a pair of ears that were absolutely unique. With these ears he had been able since he was born, which was a million years ago, to hear every intelligible sound in the universe. He had soon learnt to distinguish intelligible from unintelligible sounds, such as those made by earth, air, fire and water, and by rocks and stones and trees under their influence. His parents had lived in a vast hollow place at the centre of Vindex, into which steps had descended from time immemorial, but his parents had long been dead, and Bog was their only offspring. All his life he had studied sounds; and as he had devoted a million years to this study, it can be understood that he was now familiar with every language spoken by every race in every world in the universe. His favourite languages were ancient Greek and Latin, and among modern languages Italian, and also a queer language called Litteratitteraflitteraflam, which used to be spoken on a star that has long disappeared forever.

Bog never boggled at talking frankly about himself to anyone who would listen. But these were very few. Nor were the causes of their scarcity hard to divine. The bravest Space-travellers were uneasy in the presence of a flight of steps descending into the heart of a star. The fact that his parents had immersed him, as if it had been water, into the substance of rock, had given to his bones and flesh something of the quality of rocks, something that could endure like a rock. But the first and last cause of the scarcity of listeners to the interminable talk about himself, in which Bog loved to indulge, was the fact of the absolutely terrifying appearance which those vast complicated ears of his gave to his countenance. Human faces endowed with horns always make us earth-folk think of the devil. Of course all the Horners of Vindex had horns on their heads, but that was different, because they had human faces in the middle of their manly chests and of their feminine breasts, and this undevilled, so to speak, the professional horns of a Horner.

John o’ Dreams and Jilly Tewky had seen too little of Umbilicus really to grasp what he looked like, and the fact that he was such a submissive husband to Omphale had made it impossible to be really scared of him. What would they feel, however, when in their wanderings they came upon Bog? And still more if they found him when he was playing a game of astragala, or “Jack-stones,” with his captive, the Cerne Giant? Thus thought the wandering white clouds, who were so frequently made the airy recipients of the reckless plunges of the grotesquely elongated organs of generation of both giants.

Bog’s unending soliloquy to which his unlucky captive, the Cerne Giant, had to listen patiently whenever his lord and master was not sound asleep, was hateful to this latter. At such periods the Cerne Giant was sorely tempted to cut his master’s throat.

“But what would it be like,” he had the intelligence to ask himself, “to be absolutely alone in this god-damned orb? How would I like it to have nothing to do, but to go clump, clump, clump down those accursed stairs to my master’s Hall of Silence, where those preposterous ears would have nothing to hear, and where the purple juice of his veins would look as if it would trickle, trickle, trickle, trickle, trickle forever like those awful bubbles in Foghorn! No! No! To be alone in that hell invented to torture his enemies by the God of Love would be worse than for those victims never allowed to perish; for that loving deity wanted to gloat over their torments for ever and ever, whereas if I cut the throat of old Bog, I should have to sit on the top step of these infernal stairs without a soul to play Jack-Stones with, and nothing to look at but the circular rim of an interminable horizon. O Space! O Time! O All! O Nothing! How cruel it is to be alive! I wouldn’t even say, ‘only the dead are happy’ for they have known the suffering of being conscious in this universe of writhing and twisting nerves. The really lucky ones cannot be named, for they were not, are not, will not be. They are Might Have Beens, and as such we really have no right to use the word they about them."

With his head full of ideas of this kind, very quaint thoughts came into the Cerne Giant's mind as, seated by Bog's side on the top step of their descent, he listened for the hundred-thousandth time to Bog's account of his earliest memories.

"They weren't a bit like me, my father and mother," Bog was saying. "But without them I shouldn't have been what I am, for they simply invented me. She said, 'He must know everything,' but he said 'He must hear everything.' For there are many things that never can be known, but there's nothing that cannot be heard if you have the ears for it. You can hear it, and, if you want to, you can give it a name, without knowing anything about it. It is it. You are you. You say 'you' to it. It says 'you' to you. And there you are both! There are plenty of chances, however, that tremendous planetary upheavals and terrific cosmic revolutions are impending beneath what it calls 'you' and beneath this other that you call 'it'."

For a moment Bog was silent. And it was at that moment that the Cerne Giant put the rather surprising question to him that had come into his own simpler head.

"It seems to me," he said, "a rather funny thing that I shouldn't know my own name. Of course I know I'm the Cerne Giant. But that isn't my name. You always just say, 'Listen you,' or, 'Do you get me, my friend?' But you yourself aren't only 'you' or 'my friend' to me. Quite apart from being my lord and master, you have your own name, Bog. Well! Please do tell me, if you can, what my name is."

Bog's eyes and nose and mouth, between his enormous ears, broke into a broad smile.

"It's rather a long name, my dear friend, but I can tell you what it is, for before I bullied you that day into submission, I had come to know it very well."

Of all the intense and dramatic moments in the life of the Cerne Giant, this was by far the most intense and the most dramatic. It was more so than when he first saw the ears of Bog appearing above the ridge of the downs between Chesil Beach and Durnovaria. It was far more intense than when, in much earlier days, he himself decided to leave his dying parents at Portland Bill; and strode on one dark night in winter to Bull Barrow. His name? Actually to know his name!

"It is Bally togerottero," announced Bog: "and with their last breath, for they perished simultaneously, your parents themselves told me they had come to Foghorn from the depths of the Atlantic Ocean."

"Bally togerottero! So that's who I am!" gasped the Cerne Giant, with a wondering awe at being the person he was.

"Ballytogerottero!"

He longed to be quite alone for an hour or two; so as to be able to go on murmuring to himself those exciting syllables without disturbing the interminable soliloquy of his companion.

But John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky and Ring and Ting and Wug and Zug were now approaching them.

"I reckon those half a dozen little people take us for a couple of trees," said Bog. "Shall we wait till they're quite close and enjoy them raw, three for me and three for you, or shall I make some hot white sand and cook them all together in a dainty little pie?"

The voice, with which the Cerne Giant replied to this, was so thundering that all the twists and turns and curves and contours and lobes and gatea and grooves of his conqueror's cosmogonic ears quivered from root to rim. But not for long. Snatching up a piece of white flint, the Cerne Giant shouted "Bally togerottero!", and in the power of his own name and rising to his full height, he struck Bog on the head with such force that the stricken head was splintered in two, and first the half of it that bore the heaviest hearing, and then the half of it that bore the delicatest hearing, went rotating down that terrible staircase, and after them, with the neck spouting blood so dark as to be almost black, went, with the legs sprawling, the headless trunk of the great Bog.

It can be imagined with what astonishment John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky, together with Ring and Ting, not to mention Wug and Zug, stared at the sight of the Cerne Giant banging furiously at what looked like a mass of entangled seaweed, for no living soul but such as had set eyes on Bog would ever have believed that that extraordinary tangle was a pair of ears.

Nor was their surprise much lessened when the Cerne Giant threw away his piece of Vindician flint, and sinking down on his knees, apparently with the intention of diminishing his height so as to avoid scaring them, beckoned to them to approach. This they boldly did, led by John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky, though it required all the courage they possessed to do so. But once the effort had been made, it must be confessed that, when the giant began speaking to them in an almost pleading tone, John o' Dreams felt there was no danger to be feared from him at all.

The Cerne Giant was now sitting, clasping his knees with his long arms, on the top of that terrible flight of steps, steps that were still stained with the black blood of his dead master. All six of them, John and Jilly, and Ring and Ting, and Wug and Zug, stood in a circle round him.

"I suppose," the Cerne Giant said to them in an appealing voice, "you children wouldn't consider taking me back with you to your planet Earth. He who brought me here no longer lives, and I have myself no genius for space travel. I came, however, though it was a million years ago, from your own corner of the country of Foghorn. Like my dead master, I have been penetrating and permeating my mortal body with sand and shingle and rock-dust, else I would have had to die and be buried as you children of the earth have to do. But I make no claim, little ones, you must understand, to anything like immortality, still less to any life after death. When I die, I die. And I know enough of these things to know from what I feel that I have not more than a couple of hundred years before I shall be stone dead. But it would be, I can't tell you, how much of a comfort to me, if I could live these last couple of hundred years in my native land of Foghorn on the planet Earth and die there and be buried there. You children must be so experienced in space travel that you could easily fly back straight to Foghorn, and if you were willing to do so, could carry me, heavy as I am, along with you. Do say you will! O do say you will!"

"We must discuss it for a few minutes among ourselves, Mr. Giant," said John o' Dreams gravely. "For myself I would certainly be in favour of taking you. But, as you see, there are six of us, and I am not a person of authority, though I am a person for expressing opinions."

As John well knew would be the case, he and Jilly and Ring were the only ones of the party to vote decisively and definitely in favour of doing what the giant wanted. But none of them, nor Ting either, had the power to fly, so the whole decision rested on Wug and Zug, who, by contact with the Arch-Druid's clothes, had acquired, without exercising any particular effort, his weird power of flying through space.

It was only by the power of their instinctive, and on earth universally accepted, superiority — indeed by what you might call their planetary-conventional superiority to a worm-man and a slug-woman — that in the end Wug and Zug were persuaded to fly back to the Earth and carry them all, including the Cerne Giant, along with them.

Their start was, as can be well imagined, one of the great moments of John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky's life. Nor was it without its excitement for Ring and Ting. It was more than, or worse than, exciting for the birds they collided with, as they left the atmosphere of Vindex for interstellar space.

Wug and Zug were naturally too occupied in steering their way, a task that nothing but the Arch-Druid's cosmogonic magic could have rendered possible, to notice anything but the minute, far-off, planetary speck of light towards which they were heading. But to the four less occupied friends, especially to John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky, it was a matter of absorbing interest to see how many of the stars and planets they were able to name as they approached the earth. But none of them felt anything like the emotion that the Cerne Giant felt as, lying back upon the air with Jilly Tewky holding one of his hands and Ting holding the other, he approached the land of his birth.

"As for my name," he kept saying to himself, "let that go down the stairs with him who told me of it. On the strength of my name I killed him. By telling me of it to fool me with it, he killed himself. Let him and it go down the stairs together! My home is Foghorn upon Earth, not a Mound of Murder upon Vindex!"

XIX

THEY LANDED UPON the top of the hill above the Fountain that realised its identity in the personalities of Bubble and Squeak. The Cerne Giant stretched himself out upon the grass, but not before John o’ Dreams had carefully warned him against eating, or even touching, the fatal white grass below which lay the cleft or chasm that descended to the centre of the Earth, very much as those steps in Vindex descended to the centre of that star. The Cerne Giant gazed apprehensively at that white grass.

“Will you,” he asked, looking anxiously from face to face of the six small people who surrounded him, “take me somewhere where I shall be in no danger of falling down any sort of precipice or any sort of chasm, even if I walk or eat grass in my sleep?”

“Shall we take him to Cad Castle?” asked Ting, who, as she held his hand during their descent, had begun to feel a certain fondness for him, possibly because, though much bigger than her father, he reminded her of the dead Urk.

“I agree, my dear,” cried Ring at once, “and I think, though different from our Dad and you, I will be able to make him feel at home.”

“What will Laura and Jessica say?” asked Jilly Tewky quickly. “They’ve been waiting for you anxiously. Haven’t they, John o’ Dreams?”

“O they won’t mind,” commented John airily, though the name of Jessica brought to his memory that voice among the alders, whose tops he could see from where he now stood, crying out with such pathetic wistfulness: “Take me! Take me!”

‘‘Well, come along then, master,” said Ting, resuming her hold on the Giant’s hand, while John o’ Dreams became conscious of quite a sharp stab of jealousy.

“So be it,” said Ring, as he possessed himself of the Cerne Giant’s other hand. “Well, good night to you all. And our best love to your folk in Mort House. Tell them we’ll bring our friend round to visit them tomorrow, and we’ll take him down to see Bubble and Squeak too, you may be sure!”

“Good night, Ting!” cried John o’ Dreams.

“Good night, Ring!” cried Jilly Tewky.

When they were out of sight, which soon happened, as it was now nearly dark, Jilly Tewky turned to Wug and Zug.

“You two must come with us, mustn’t they, John? Mother will want to give you supper, and Father will find somewhere for you to sleep.”

“Any old shed will do for us, won’t it, Zug?” said Wug. “Any corner of any old place!”

Thus it happened that Mummy Maria Nu had no sooner hugged her twins to her heart with exquisite delight, till her heart almost burst with gratitude to Jehovah and to Jesus and to the Holy Dove, than it became necessary to get a nice supper for Wug and Zug, before the said twins would eat a morsel or drink a drop. But, being their mother, she knew too well how resolute they were, most of all when they were acting in concert with each other. So she obeyed them, in spite of Nezzar’s indignant protests, for luckily old Grand-pa Grum had already retired to his attic. What she did encourage Nezzar to do was to take these two queer-looking dwarf-men to the outhouses, and find a comfortable bed of hay in the loft, where they might sleep off their excitement and the effect of this hurried gobbled meal. Nezzar Nu was delighted by the polite gratitude the two little dwarfs displayed so peacefully in the far corner of the big hay-loft, as they lay down to sleep. Auntie Oh had helped Maria to prepare a much bigger meal than was really necessary for the twins; but John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky were in such high spirits that it was like a banquet of triumph to them, and Auntie Oh's idea of giving them Scotch whisky to drink, instead of tea, prolonged the meal till they had talked of everything, especially of how appropriate it was that their neighbours Ring and Ting should have a Giant to put up at Cad Castle. "What will Laura and Jessica make of it all?" enquired Auntie Oh, after the whisky had made the twins so happy and so proud of themselves that, from the way they talked, it might have been supposed that they had managed the whole flight from Vindex themselves, and that Wug and Zug were just a fortunate pair of passengers.

"O they'll enjoy it!" cried John o' Dreams; while Jilly Tewky more carefully added, "It seems he was born in Foghorn, thousands of years ago; so he's coming back to his native land."

"Don't you think, Mummy," said John o' Dreams gravely, "that one of us ought to go upstairs and tell Grand-dad about all this?"

"I'm not sure," said Nezzar Nu, "whether that would be wise. You never know with him. He might be annoyed that he wasn't brought down the moment they came, to give us all his advice about everything."

"Well my dear," said Nezzar's wife. "He's your dad and not mine, so you know best; but I fear he may be angry, if nobody tells him till tomorrow, what's happened. He won't be coming down, you know, till tea-time tomorrow."

"I'll go right up!" cried John o' Dreams, rushing impulsively to the door and out of the room.

There was a general hush as they all listened to his ascending footsteps.

"I pray God he won't come down the moment he hears!" burst out Nezzar Nu.

And again there was silence among them all. John o’ Dreams had closed the door. But Jilly Tewky ran to it now, and opened it, and stood there listening.

“You can’t even hear them talking!” she murmured, as she returned to her seat. “You always used to,” she added, “didn’t you, Mummy? I pray grand-dad hasn’t had a fit in the surprise of seeing John.”

“O no, my dear! Don’t say such silly things!”

Mrs. Nu looked at her husband enquiringly.

“We’ll wait for a bit,” said Nezzar Nu, “and see if he comes down. Yes,” he added, after a moment’s thought, during which he tilted his chair back and stretched out his hands with both his thumbs over the edge of the big diningroom table, and stared at the opposite wall, where hung a little engraving of Lord Shaftesbury the philanthropist, “yes, it’s always best to give fate a chance to do what it has in its mind to do.”

How far this faith in the benevolent intentions of fate had to do with the fact that he had fixed his eyes upon Lord Shaftesbury, it is impossible to say. To a simple-minded person it might well have seemed that a man, when absorbed in thought, couldn’t stare at Lord Shaftesbury, without a wise decision entering his head. But whether the decision that entered the head of Nezzar Nu was a wise one or not remained to be seen. For his sister-in-law, Auntie Oh, suddenly cried out, “Oh! wish the Rector would come!” Hearing this cry at that critical moment, showing that her sister’s faithful mind had flown to its clerical idol, the Rector of their church, Mrs. Nu gasped. Her sister would have indignantly denied that the coincidence was anything but pure chance; but though she wouldn’t have confessed it, Mrs. Nu couldn’t help attributing this flight of thought to a fact of which they were all soon to be made very definitely aware, namely a ring at the front door bell, followed by the appearance, as Nezzar Nu opened it, of the Rector himself.

“Yes,” thought Mrs. Nu, “we’ve heard about a thing called ‘telepathy’. There must be a telepathic link between Sister and Rector! What would Miss Posh say?”

The Rector had never in his life displayed more interest in meeting the inmates of Mort House than he did now. He told them at once that he had never seen more lights in Cad Castle than there were tonight.

“How he must so watch what’s going on round him,” thought Nezzar Nu, “that he couldn’t resist the temptation to come round and ask for news!”

John o’ Dreams must have been doing for his grandfather what now Jilly Tewky was called upon to do for the excited Rector, for there was no sign of her brother’s descent from the ancestral attic until she had finished her absorbing narrative. When at last he did appear, it was with the surprising news that grandfather had heard the whole story very quietly and calmly.

“Quietly and calmly, did you say?” enquired the Rector, with bland surprise. “I should have thought that the tale of such goings on would have upset Mr. Grumble Nu very considerably.”

“No, Rector, it didn’t at all,” replied John o’ Dreams, taking a seat at the table next to his sister, and feeling in his heart a throb of delight to be able to be proud of his eccentric grand-dad with this man. “No, on the contrary, he showed me certain books he had — I think they were very ancient books — that narrated things very similar to what we witnessed out there. The beings we encountered appeared in the books he showed me. There were even pictures of them, you know. And he translated to me certain Latin commentaries upon the Old Testament referring to enormous giants, who were quite friendly to the people of Judah and Benjamin. He showed me various modern books, too, recently translated into English from German and French and Italian, which were concerned with the same sort of thing. O no! Granddad was not at all upset by what I told him. It coincided, he said, with what he had long suspected to exist in those far-off stars.”

XX

"I HOPE," SAID Maria Nu to the Rector, when he was seated by the side of her husband and had partaken of a cup of coffee, "that it won't be upsetting and disturbing to you and Miss Posh to have another giant, bigger even than the last one, so near to the church."

"No, my dear lady," replied the Rector, "I have at last learnt, and I think Miss Posh has learnt too, that the things that happen to each of us in this difficult life of ours pile up towards a tendency, as some poet has said — or, let me put it simpler than that — amount by degrees to a tendency to righteousness."

"Oh!" exclaimed Maria's sister with special fervour.

"But," went on the Rector, "this tendency is not always exactly what we have expected. Indeed it is sometimes the last thing we expected. But yet, for all that, and in spite of all that, this unexpected tendency, in a direction completely different to what we expected, goes and mounts up."

"Oh," exclaimed Maria's sister, with no less fervour.

"The truth is," went on the Rector, holding out his cup for a second drink of coffee, "we must always remember that the Lord of the Universe is watching at every moment every movement of every atom in the Universe. Not a sparrow falls without his attention. Not a blade of grass grows taller without his attention. Not a leaf curls, not a fly flutters, not a grain of sand shifts, not a speck of dust stirs, not a drop of sweat gathers, not a ripple of water rises or sinks, not an echo of sound dies away, but the Lord of all is there, with his eyes and ears fixed upon this occurrence. Is He responsible for it? He is! Does he know of it — know what is happening to it? He does! Has it got its own special place in his cosmic intention for all? It has!”

“Oh!” sighed the sister of Maria Nu.

But Nezzar Nu spoke out, boldly, firmly, defiantly.

“How do we know,” said Nezzar Nu, “that the Universe is not ruled by a Mistress rather than a Master? Why do we have to say, ‘He knows about it all, He knows, He knows!’ instead of ‘She knows about it all, She knows, She knows!’”

There was such deep silence round that big mahogany table that their old Grand-dad could be heard moving his books about at the top of the house.

“How,” thought John o’ Dreams, “would the old man answer this question? He would know all about that piece of jagged flint that Thea gave her son Chronos to cut out the testicles and penis of Ouranos, who kept begetting monsters upon her. He would know all about Demeter, the mother of Persephone. He would know all about the Styx, and about that tomb outside Troy of the Queen of the Amazons. My own idea,” he said to himself, “is that the greatest wisdom in all the human race lurks in women, who, like Jilly Tewky, have never been ravished. I think that the Roman Empire wasn’t founded by Romulus and Remus, but by Egeria, the nymph in the cave, who was the friend of King Numa. I think that the loss of virginity and the bearing of children destroys a certain almost supernatural wisdom that old maids like Auntie Oh have!”

And he turned to look at his aunt, whose recent “ohs” had evidently not entirely satisfied her as to the Rector’s preference for a Master rather than a Mistress of the Universe. “She is wondering,” John o’ Dreams thought, “whether what we call Nature is not a wiser ruler of the world than what we call God.”

In spite of John o’ Dreams’s almost frantic attempt to escape such a contingency, the Rector was so eager to meet the Giant, and to discover what were the chief reactions of Ring and Ting to the star in the Milky Way, that he had forced them to agree to call for him at the church, when they went to fetch Ring and Ting and their gigantic guest, and take them to see the Fountain.

“What will the Giant make of Bubble and Squeak,” John o’ Dreams thought, “and what will they make of him?”

John o’ Dreams spent an agitating night when at last, after a protracted exchange of intentions with Jilly Tewky, he found himself in his own room alone. He kept having the same dream, a dream that for years after he would recall, but never with any revealing understanding. It was about a tower, an exceedingly tall and extremely slender tower, which he had, somehow or other, succeeded in causing to arise. Whether his own hands had any share in this exploit, he could never discover; but in some way or other he conjured it up, and it was a rare and delicate and very beautiful apparition that kept appearing and disappearing in the background of every landscape through which he moved that night.

He had been given this room for his very own, ever since the day arrived when it was proper for him and Jilly Tewky to sleep in separate beds; and everything about this room was peculiarly his own private possession, and had steadily become more and more so. There was a picture on the wall of the Duke of Wellington, and another one of a dead girl in a boat on a river, lying with her arms crossed and her face upturned to a dark sky, in which the constellation of King Arthur’s Wain could be distinguished among weird, large, and totally unrecognisable stars.

There were in this room several of the sort of things that all families possess, and secretly in their hearts aren’t very fond of, or very proud of and would be glad to get rid of; and which inevitably find their way into a room which is not the visitors' spare room, nor the parents' or grandparents' room, nor their Aunt's room, nor, you may be sure, the room of their growing girl. It is usually called "the dressing room" as a survival, perhaps, from the days where the father of the family did his dressing and shaving and so forth in a different room from the one where he slept with his wife. And it was of this room, at an early stage of its becoming a bedroom, that John o' Dreams had, by one of the mysterious psychic laws of every family, come to be regarded as the possessor. Gravely he looked about him now, and having removed his coat and shoes and waistcoat and braces and tie, he threw himself down on the bed, and stared at an engraving of Cad Castle as it was before he was born.

"Does Ting," he thought, "love me in the way I love her? Would she agree to marry me at once if I asked her? And when we were married, would we be shy of each other the first night? Would she let me undress her, which is what I should want to do, and help her to put on her nightdress? Would she mind my 'making love to her,' as we call it, without ravishing her, our first night? Would she sympathize with my nervousness about ravishing her, and let me go on enjoying her naked body night after night for several days without attempting to take her virginity?"

As he asked himself these questions, the various curves and contours and rondures and juxtapositions of the engraving of Cad Castle diffused themselves through the images he was calling up in his mind; or rather the images floated and hovered round these architectural details. When he came to the thought of the night when he would actually ravish her, every detail of the imaginary scene began to assume the lines and curves of the engraving he was looking at. Did that excitable little girl Jessica have the slightest idea of what it was like to be raped by a man, when she cried out to him in that heart-breaking cry: “Take me! Take me!”? What a confused and crazy dream the critical events in our life make when we really consider them! What would happen, he wondered, if he remained always too frightened of taking her virginity? Would the maternal longing in her to bear children be so strong that she would, if he were too much of a coward to do it, beguile some other man to rape her? O yes! And then the grand question assaulted his mind, would he find himself able to talk freely to her of all these delicate and dangerous matters? Or would there be a shyness between them like the shyness between a reindeer and a sea-gull, the sort of shyness that naturally, inevitably, inscrutably arises sometimes between the most devoted brothers and sisters.

“Could I,” he asked himself, as he looked at a little engraving over the door, in a richly moulded, foliated, convoluted gilt frame, of King Charles the First, “could I talk to her of these things quite frankly? Could I tell her that, much as I longed to give her a child, the idea of the physical shock of raping her, the shedding of her blood, the breaking with my generative weapon of that sacred barrier that was so perilously psychic and yet so piteously physical, that barrier the breaking of which turned her from a virgin into a prospective mother, was something that simply terrified me?”

It was then that the mind of John o’ Dreams instinctively turned to Jilly Tewky.

“O if it were only her I had to tell of all my shrinkings and shudderings, which I am sure are much worse than any terror a girl feels! How else could little Jessica have cried out to me in that alder-swamp ‘Take me! Take me!’ Jilly Tewky would understand all, would imagine all, would accept all.

O! and how wonderful it would be if Jilly Tewky and I were the parents of a child! What is it then that makes my feeling for Ting so different from my feeling for Jilly Tewky? They are both girls. They are both lovely examples of those mysterious beings that we men are so attracted to. But I know Jilly so well, whereas Ting is a complete stranger. Jilly, if it were decided between us that we must have a child, and I were brave enough to confess to her my horror of ravishing her to gain this desirable end — Jilly, I say, is so wise and so calm and confident of her own power, that she would at once take the whole business, including her own pain and bleeding, and my nervous terror, into her hands. She would tell me what I must, and must not, feel; and she would evoke the precisely suitable feelings in herself. She would make herself shiver and shake with a deliciously created masochistic yielding; and she would stir up in me an equally delicious sadistic frenzy."

What did, his thoughts ran on, the mysterious difference between his natural attitude to Ting and his natural attitude to Jilly Tewky, consist of? He knew for a certainty it didn't have anything to do with the moral conventional tradition he had been brought up in, that while it was very right for brother and sister to love each other, it was very wrong for them to be sexually attracted to each other. No, the difference between his feeling for Jilly Tewky and his feeling for Ting had nothing to do with right and wrong or good and evil, nothing to do with the dark wickedness of what people called incest. It had something about it, this difference, that resembled the difference between those far-away glimpses of a sea-horizon just visible between rocks and trees and beyond the far-flowing estuary of a mighty river, and the outlines of a forest and lakes and towering crags and a ruined castle rising up in the immediate foreground. Magnificently imposing though that castle and lake and forest might be there was something infinitely more strange and poetical in that faraway horizon beyond the mouth of the wandering river. And if Jilly Tewky was the exciting, massive castle reflected in the deep lake with its romantic lights and shadows and its overhanging battlements, Ting was that far-off glimpse of an horizon retreating and retreating into the mystery of forgotten memories, and even into a half-conscious sense of lives lived long, long ago, before our mother gave us birth into this present world.

Before he went to sleep that night John o’ Dreams remembered a curiously jealous pang which had darted through him at the way Jilly Tewky had touched the hand of Ring when they separated. Ring was leading the Cerne Giant, so it could be only a touch, but it struck him that something had passed from one to the other. “O let me forget that touch,” he prayed in his heart. And sleep answered him, at least for that one night.

What John o’ Dreams had no idea of as he lay, breathing quietly, in the arms of sleep, was that their home, Morty House, was haunted by a particular dream. Dreams are funny things. And this particular dream had escaped from the Land of Nod. Yes, had escaped from that ghostly, overshadowing land, where the natural and normal dreams of men, women and children, mingle with the natural and normal dreams of dogs and cats and horses and cattle and rats and mice and birds and fishes and plants and trees and butterflies and moths. The dream, whose name was Lorm, had no back; but it had two fronts, one the front of a man and one the front of a woman; and each front possessed the sexual peculiarities to which that front belonged. But it was not only its double sex that made Lorm the most unusual dream that Foghorn had ever known; it was also its age. Lorm was very old. If it had met the conqueror and master of the Cerne Giant, it would have treated him as a youngster. Bubble and Squeak of the Fountain were the only ones in that part of the country, who would have felt equal to talking to Lorm about his memories of the days that were no more. He had haunted Morty since it was first built, and he had haunted the ground on which Cad Castle stood before the Castle was built.

What made Lorm unique among dreams was its power of entering with ease into the particular group of dreams that obsessed the sleep of each separate person in Foghorn. Lorm was a familiar visitor to the pillow of Miss Posh. The Rector's sleep was more than a night's excursion to him. Poor old Grand-dad Grumble knew Lorm so well that, when he instinctively felt it was on the rampage, he would force himself to stay awake even to the point of getting out of bed and walking up and down the room. The unfortunate thing was that age had no effect upon Lorm, so that the oldest monument in the church would say to its neighbour: "Oh, there's that awful Lorm on the prowl again!" When Edward the Sixth designed that tomb over there for the Old Man of the Mountain, Lorm made that ugly crack across its neck that stopped it from ever being finished. They even say that that bawdy word in the epitaph upon the statue of Sir John Coldliver Cad was the work of Lorm, when the carver was sleepy. It was, therefore, entirely in accordance with his character that just as the "wolf-light," as they still called at Morty House the light that comes just before dawn, was beginning to lift the darkness, John o' Dreams woke up with a curse.

"Damn and blast you, you crazy milestone!"

For what Lorm had done was to take the form of the oldest milestone on the road, and to hop along the path on the high grass bank beside the road, chanting as it went the funereal words:

"No more Cads at Castle Cad
And no more Nus at Morty,
For all their boys have gone quite mad
And all their girls got naughty!"

Lorm, the Dream of dreams, was delighted with the effect of his bit of sport. "I must," it said to itself, "remember to turn myself more often into a milestone or a post or a broken wall or a tree-stump or a stile or a rock or a ledge or a broken signpost or a lonely bush or a large heavy stone or a pylon. For, if in the form of a stationary object I go go Humping about, I shall be the worst possible kind of dream to an elderly dreamer. If this boy John o’ Dreams is so scared of me now, what will he be when he is grown up? What will he be when he is an old man?”

XXI

EVEN LORM ITSELF, the most athletic, active, lively, inventive, adventurous, dangerous, daring, unpredictable, inexplicable, indescribable, incorrigible of all dreams, felt uneasy when, just before dawn, John o' Dreams slipped out of the hall-door of Morty and ran, like a mischievous boy up to some fancy trick of his own, to the Bubble and Squeak Fountain.

Lorm followed him. But when John o' Dreams stopped and stood stock-still and gazed into the depths of the Fountain, Lorm felt completely baffled.

"I cannot take the shape of a Fountain," he said to himself. "Even the King of dreams, whose name was Stupex, and who was the son of Adam and Lilith before Gain and Abel were born of Adam and Eve, and who was my ancestor, could not have assumed the disguise of a Fountain."

John o' Dreams glanced at Bubble. "O how intensely you long," he thought, "for all to be resolved into nothing!" And then he glanced at Squeak. "O how intensely you long," he thought, "for all empty space to be filled with living matter and with innumerable lives!"

And then once again he stared at the Fountain. And this time John o' Dreams became aware of something that seemed to be on the point of emerging from the Fountain. It resembled a lizard only was much smaller. "It's a newt!" he thought. And he watched its head at the top of the water, making movements as if in the next moment it might decide to crawl up the stalk of a tall reed.

"Is it amphibious?" John o' Dreams asked himself. "It lives in water, but it certainly doesn't die in air! Are there, perhaps, creatures like it who can live in fire? Think of being able to live in air and water and fire! Gould it survive if you put it in a pot and poured mould on its head? Could it live in air and in water and in earth? Would it burn up or would it flourish if you put it in the fire? Is it a water-cousin or a Salamander?"

As John o' Dreams in the "wolf-light" of that rainless predawn stared at the newt in the Fountain, Lorm, the descendant of Stupex, the ancestor of the whole family of the most haunting of all dreams, thought to itself:

"There's something about that newt he's watching that rather disturbs me. It doesn't seem quite like other newts. I know newts well; just as I know minnows and sticklebacks and tadpoles. I have had fine sport, giving each of them exactly the sort of shock they dread the most. There isn't one of them who hasn't awakened with a terrified leap from a happy dream, when I've moved into the circle of its slumber. But this newt that this silly boy is staring at gives me a very odd feeling. I wouldn't confess it to another descendant from Stupex, but the truth is, it makes me feel small. Yes, it makes me feel as if I weren't a dream at all, but just one of those ideas that these damnable vivisectors get hold of, such as if you prick enough holes in the bowels of a beaver, it will bring forth a badger, or if you lure a he-hedgehog into raping a female squirrel, she will bring forth a polecat with the head of an otter. In fact, delicious though my experiments on the sleep of living creatures are, when I think of the delight vivisectors take in torturing animals, I seem to myself like a sanctified philanthropist in the feeble satisfaction I get from meddling with their dreams. No, my good John o' Dreams, I must bid you good-night; there's something about this newt of yours that gives me the jitters."

With this parting sally Lorm sought the retreat of a water-rat to give his brood of little water-rats a few well-selected vivisectionary squeezes.

Quite alone now, John o' Dreams and the newt, whose head would emerge at sufficient intervals from the Fountain to keep up the conversation, were at liberty to explain their philosophy of life to each other in undisturbed peace.

But Lorm's influence still remained; for, before departing to disturb the sleep of the little water-rats, it had dared the newt to talk English to John, defied him to do it, challenged him to do it, threatened him with bad nights for a week if he didn't do it; and thus inspired the newt spoke up.

"You aren't perfectly correct," the newt said, "in treating me as an ordinary newt. I am not that."

"What the hell are you then," enquired John o' Dreams, with eager innocence.

"I am a lot more."

"What the devil," cried John o' Dreams, "do you mean by being a lot more? You can't be more than you are, and I can see, and anybody can see at first glance what you are."

"Not altogether," replied the newt. "No, you can't see altogether what I am, and you will be rather surprised when I tell you."

"Do you mean," suggested John, "that you have the blood of some other animal in you?"

"O dear no," replied the newt. "I would never boast of that! In fact I would be terribly ashamed of that. Whew! Whew!" And the newt indulged in a dramatic shiver. "I couldn't bear to think of that! O no. I am myself. I am the Newt in the Fountain of Bubble and Squeak and that is enough to be, for anyone in the world."

"Which of the two, Bubble or Squeak, do you side with in your private thoughts?"

“I am glad you said private, for that makes it much easier for me to explain. For in my private thoughts I agree with Bubble, but in the thought I want to have and feel I ought to have and try to have, I agree with Squeak.”

John o’ Dreams pondered for a moment. Then he said, “I suppose you mean that privately you’re sick of everything, and would be damned pleased to see the whole bloody business lost in the nothingness of empty space? But something in your ‘conscience,’ or in what Kant calls your ‘categorical imperative,’ tells you that it’s wrong to want the world to dissolve into nothing, and that you ought to help the life force in its noble task of filling space with conscious existences of every kind.”

The Newt, with its eyes and mouth just out of the water, was clearly smiling, smiling just as John o’ Dreams’s old Grand-dad Grumble used to smile at him as a child when, though sent up to the attic by his mother to get her some half-crowns wherewith to go shopping, he showed signs of wanting to explore certain shelves, where were books with pictures of Red Indians.

“I must tell you something that will surprise you a good deal, Master John o’ Dreams Nu. Though in appearance at this moment I am a Newt, and though you and I are both vividly aware of the periodic bursting of the Bubbles and squeakings of the Skull, in reality I am a good deal more than a Newt, and a good deal more than a little water lizard talking to an adventurous young man who has visited the Milky Way. It may surprise you to hear it, but in reality I am God. By this I mean that it has pleased me, the God worshipped by Christians as the Trinity, by Islam as Allah, by the Buddhists as Brahma, and among the ancient Greeks as Zeus, and among the ancient Romans as Jupiter or Jove, and who am, as all pantheists believe, the living soul of all the material substance of the material universe, to incarnate myself in this Newt.”

John o’ Dreams had learnt from his childhood, taught by his grand-dad and his father and his mother and Auntie Oh, always to go down on his knees at the name of God, or at the words of God quoted by any pastor or priest. And he, therefore, the moment our Newt paused, sank on his knees before him at the edge of the Fountain. Observing him behaving so properly, the Newt raised one paw or hand or leg or finger, and made a ripple in the water. Then it spoke in a gentler voice.

“I am still the same Newt who is neither changed nor different, Master John. I’ve only allowed my associate God to speak.”

Hearing that the Newt was only God’s associate, John o’ Dreams scrambled up to his feet again. But the Newt now went on in his gentle, less endearing, tone.

“Yes, I am God,” it said. “In other words I am the whole Universe. Empty space is my dwelling. In all directions from where you and I are talking, empty space used to stretch. In fact there was no Universe at all. The Universe didn’t exist. There were no Stars, no Sun, no Moon, no Earth, nothing but empty space, nothing but nothing. It was only when I came that there was anything at all. I am the Universe. Yes, I am giving you a false impression, if I said that I was the soul of the universe. I am its body, as well as its soul. I am mind. I am matter. I am everything. But, as you see, I have the power of concentrating myself upon one spot, upon one creature, upon one fish or worm or man or insect. What is life?”

At this point God, or his present incarnation, the Newt, looked up into the face of John o’ Dreams, which was bent over the Fountain.

“Have you ever asked yourself that question, young master? You people talk of Heaven and earth and of Being and Not-Being, but imagine what it would be like, if all this suddenly vanished completely away. Yes, try and imagine, my good man, what it would feel like to be absolutely alone in space; or rather, not so much in space as in blank nothingness — yes, in truly mathematical nothingness. What you forget, my good sir, is that this universe of matter and mind, so full, as it seems to you, of living things, has come into existence out of complete Nothingness. What made it come? What brought it into existence? Tell me that, my good man." John o' Dreams, now erect on his feet, made no reply. God, incarnated in the Newt, had certainly asked him an unanswerable question. It was like asking him, why is life life, and why is death death, and why are the elements, air, water, fire, earth, what they are. Nothingness was Nothingness, but it was obvious that it couldn't say to itself, "I am Nothingness. Please God turn me into Something?" For the nature of Nothingness was to have nothing wherewith to think or to pray. If we could no longer say, "I am I and you are you, and that is that and those are those," existence as we know it now would be gone; and, if gone, what would there be instead? God, or whatever this voluble life-force that we call "God," and the Germans "Gott," and the French "Dieu," may be, now that he is, or it is, here, can play at creating as much as he likes, but he or it can't explain, any more than his or its created creatures can, how he or it suddenly arrived in the middle of empty space all alone.

"Had this Being he was now talking to," thought John o' Dreams, "been an unseen aspect of Nothingness and Empty Space all along? What they call," and he pondered for a few seconds, "another Dimension?"

"Would it be of any interest to you to know," God now began again, through the upraised head of the Newt, "to learn in what creature I intend to incarnate myself when I leave my present incarnation?"

"It would indeed, O Almighty One," replied John o' Dreams at once. "It would indeed!"

“Well,” said God, “I have decided to incarnate myself in a Cockroach, a very large Cockroach, who lives under the mat at the entrance, though the mat is always inside, to your home Morty. You can tell your parents and your sister this. But if I were you, I would refrain from telling your grandfather, because these old gentlemen” — and the mouth of the Newt twitched a little, whether from jealousy of the Cockroach under the mat, or from the fact that God was smiling, John o’ Dreams couldn’t tell— “are apt to burst out into unexpected tempers and behave in a manner to cause discomfort to their relatives.”

“I will obey you, God,” replied John o’ Dreams respectfully, “and I will say nothing to Grand-dad, and I will tell the others to say nothing.”

Feeling full of unusual righteousness John o’ Dreams, who also felt a little hungry, for it was by now breakfast-time, hurried home. Before he left the Fountain, however, he gave a little nod to Bubble and a little nod to Squeak, each nod having something in it rather like the shrewd yet pious glance that the clergyman at Holy Communion gives to the Squire and his family, when they approach the Holy Table before the little group of religious-minded villagers are permitted to partake of the Sacrament.

But, as can well be imagined, Lorm — the direct descendant of the dream that made Lilith, the first wife of Adam, leap out of her lodge of lilies and skedaddle across the Garden of Eden screaming: “I felt the breath of a serpent! I felt the breath of a serpent!” — hadn’t forgotten that, though it was nearly breakfast-time, there might well be some heads still on their pillows. And indeed there were! The enormous Cerne Giant, dreaming that Bog, his master, had come to life again and was hunting for him in Foghorn, was Lorm’s first victim. His howl of abject terror rang through the whole of Cad Castle, and was heard as far as the custom house at the docks. The Rector himself was caught sleeping by Lorm, and the cry of panic with which he awoke, thinking that he saw Miss Posh being dragged out of her bed by a dragon and carried towards the Fountain, nearly gave Auntie Oh the horrors as she heard it across the fields.

If John o' Dreams, after his conversation with God, hadn't felt so hungry for his breakfast, he wouldn't have been in time to save Jilly Tewky from the activity of Lorm the dream, but he knocked at her door just in time; and Lorm was well ensconced within the rather thick skull of Nezzar Nu, their father, causing him to utter a yell so penetrating that it brought their mother running back from the bath-room, fearing that he'd been bitten by a rat.

When John o' Dreams finally paused half-way down the stairs, there suddenly came into his head what he had heard at the Fountain about the Cockroach under the mat near the hall-door. But his instinctive reaction to this thought was the natural and familiar one that it would be wise to tell Jilly Tewky about it before he did anything. The hand-bell, which always stood, alongside of the silver tray for callers' cards, upon the table in the hall, was now rung by Mummy Nu, who was, as usual, the first to be down. When she had rung the bell, which she did so that it could be heard all over the house, she retired into the kitchen to prepare breakfast for them all; and if she didn't find Auntie Oh already heating the oven, making the toast, boiling the water, and preparing hot bacon or a couple of omelettes, she knew that that lady would be down at any moment.

John o' Dreams did at once what his inner voice now told him was the right thing to do. He rushed upstairs to his sister's room, knocked at the door, and when she opened it with her hair down and her comb in her hand, he hurriedly told her the story of his talk with the Newt, whose personality God had, pro tern, absorbed in his own. And he told her how God was now going to incarnate himself into the body of a Cockroach under the hall-mat.

“Let me come with you,” cried Jilly Tewky excitedly, “let me come with you!”

“If you come at once,” he answered.

She obeyed him, and fastening her hair up with the nearest available hair-pins, she hurried down after him.

It can be imagined how she took good care to remain on the last step of the stairs with her hand on the banisters, as he rushed to the door-mat and lifted it up with a quick jerk. Yes! There was the Cockroach! It was motionless, but quite close to the side of the front door, where the door’s hinges were, so that when the door was opened, it would be completely unobservable.

“Listen!” murmured John o’ Dreams to his sister, “while I talk to it, as I did to the Newt.”

XXII

JILLY TEWKY FIRMLY held on to her position on the last step of the stairs, listening to the sound of her mother and aunt carrying into the breakfast-room — which was visible through the half-open door — the plates and the cups and saucers, and the knives, forks and spoons.

“What will mother think,” she said to herself, “when she hears John o’ Dreams talking to a cockroach and calling it God?”

That indeed was exactly what her brother was beginning to do. The Cockroach had made no attempt to hide itself. Cockroaches are not attracted to gardens or drives or avenues or rows of tall trees, so that it had no wish, even at this hour of eight in the morning, to leave the house. It did have parents and brothers and sisters, however, in the kitchen; and it would have made a rush through the breakfast-room, where the table was being laid, to join these relatives, if that hadn’t meant a bolt in front of the aggressive boy, who was clearly up to mischief and out to kill any fellow inhabitant of Morty too small to hit back.

“Well, Master Cockroach,” cried John o’ Dreams, “and what may your attitude be to the Lord of the Universe whom Christians call God, and Muslims call Allah, and Buddhists call Brahma? Has this mysterious Ruler of the world identified himself with you, or, as we say, incarnated himself in you, as he has done in the case of the Newt in the Fountain?”

The Cockroach moved to a patch of sunlight that had come through the door of the dining-room, and in this patch of sun it mounted upon a small bit of toasted crust that some gust of wind must have blown along the floor.

“The Ruler of the Universe,” said the Cockroach from this chance-bestowed rostrum, “selects different living creatures, one by one, in whom it can incarnate itself. When it wanted a man, it selected Jesus, because the Jews are the wisest of men, and Jesus the wisest of the Jews. There will come a time when God will select a woman. And then it will probably be an Italian, for they are the most womanly of women. As I speak to you now, I am both a Cockroach speaking to you and God speaking to you. Just as in the case of the Newt, I was at once God talking to you, and the Newt in the Fountain talking to you.”

“Why,” enquired John o’ Dreams, “did God choose you among all the other cockroaches?”

“For a very simple reason,” replied the Insect. “The young of our tribe are always being swallowed by a certain species of rat, who hold them in their mouths till they are poisoned by rat-breath, and then swallow them. But if any cockroach allows such little ones to play on its back, it acquires a smell that attracts this kind of rat, who devours it whole, while the little ones have time to scramble off its back and escape. It is only the grown-up cockroach that rats eat. It is called a baby-saviour, and this kind of rat eats it up with special savagery. The other cockroaches won’t go near this one, who makes a holocaust of itself, so that it is compelled to live alone like a hermit with no companions but the babies playing on its back, till it is devoured and they escape. Our tribe would soon disappear, if it were not for its baby-saviours, of which I happen to be one. Our life is not very pleasant, for the babies tickle our backs, as you can imagine, and our death is a violent and painful one; but all the same we have a feeling—”

At this point Jilly Tewky, still on the last of the steps and still holding tight to the banister, intervened.

“Will you let a girl speak to you, Cockroach-God?”

“Of course,” replied the deified Insect. “Ask anything you wish.”

“I don’t want to ask much,” said Jilly Tewky in a very low voice, clearly anxious not to be heard by her mother or by Auntie Oh, as they laid the table, “but what I do want to know is which of the two deities, or supernatural beings, who dominate our Bubble and Squeak Fountain — that is to say, whether Bubble, who wants to turn everything into thin air, or Squeak, who wants to enlarge the material substance of the Universe in defiance of empty space — is the more likely to triumph?”

The Cockroach gathered all his legs together upon his little pulpit of bread-crust, and stretched out his head.

“If either your brother or I, my good girl, knew which of those ideals would win—” It was at this exact moment, just as the Cockroach had begun to be eloquent, and was about to associate itself more closely with the universal Deity, Who had so miraculously united Himself with it, that there was a cry from Auntie Oh of, “A black beetle! a black beetle!” followed by a clatter of knives and forks, and the voice of Mummy Nu calling, “There! I saw it! Stamp on it, my dear! Stamp on it! Quick, quick!”

Before John o’ Dreams and his sister had time to move, they saw a second cockroach scurry from the breakfast-room towards the first one, who, leaving his vantage ground in a second, met it and led it with a wild scramble over the upturned mat, past John o’ Dreams’s muddy left foot, and into the little passage on the other side of the stairs, that led to the scullery. Both the ladies now emerged from the breakfast-room, and the moment they saw how clotted with wet mud John o’ Dreams’s boots were, their attention was diverted from beetles to concern for well-brushed carpets; and the young man was hurried off to the rear by the same route that had been taken by the escaping insects.

The conversation at breakfast was, as may well be imagined, unusually animated. Jilly Tewky was full of their adventures and brimming over with her zest for relating them, while John o’ Dreams, after the fashion of his boyhood, described what they had seen and heard upon Vindex, just as if they had been his last night’s dreams.

Lorm, well aware that the excitement of this first breakfast together would rob him of his usual dream-hunt, concentrated upon the old gentleman upstairs, who naturally had gone to bed rather later than usual after the shock of their arrival. Lorm devised for him a perfect disturbance, adopted with devilish insight to the old gentleman’s nature. He caused him to imagine all the Gog-Magogs in his fields rising up, each of them with heads resembling those of the two-headed Janus, and all of them together invading his bedroom with the intention of taking him out of his bed, and carrying him out into the fields, and planting him there up to his neck in the earth. Badly scared by this prospect, the old gentleman found himself out of bed when he awoke, and on his hands and knees on the floor. It was from this position that he lifted up his voice in a deep-throated howl that brought his son Nezzar, two steps at a time, to his side. But the indignant old man refused to return to bed, and all Nezzar could do was to escort him to the bathroom and leave him there.

Finding everybody else in Morty fully awake, all Lorm could do now was to visit the Rectory in hope of being able to give the Rector the worst shock of his life. Lorm was descended from the worst dream ever dreamed upon this earth, the dream that obsessed Lilith herself. This was the dream of being made pregnant by a spider, who had eaten so many flies that their round black heads and staring eyes burst out of his offspring’s body in every direction. In Lilith’s dream the spider-father of her fly-swollen infant had been devoured by a dragon-fly, and when she screamed in terror during its birth, it was because she thought she saw this monstrous insect returning to her bedside to swallow its victorious progeny.

In his determination to give the Rector a shock such as he would never forget, our friend Lorm forgot to take into account Miss Posh. To reach the Rector's pillow, it was necessary to pass the door of the bedroom of Miss Posh. Now nobody has more dreams than an unravished virginal spinster; but these dreams, if she isn't a demi-goddess like King Numa's Egeria, who taught him how to conquer the world, are delicate, filmy-floating, foam-flying, airy-fairy fantasies; and when the group of them who were hovering about Miss Posh's bedroom-door, ready to slip in at any moment, saw Lorm approaching, there was a feverish flutter, and their fairy-like leader, the dream whose name was Flim-flam, called on them to drive Lorm out of the house. Formidable as Lorm was when alone with a mortal brain of normal nerves and natural sensitivity, he was out of his element altogether when forced to cope with a group like this. So off he fled, and rushing through a corridor, up a little passage, and down three small flights of stairs, he found himself finally alone in the empty church.

XXIII

IT MUST HAVE been a fortnight after Lorm's dismissal from the beds of both the Rector and Miss Posh, that the brother and sister at Cad Castle, as well as the brother and sister at Morty, became aware that it was impossible to approach the Fountain of Bubble and Squeak without finding the Cerne Giant there, talking with absorbed intensity to the Skull, while he glanced every now and then at the Bubbles bursting, as if he dreaded some attack, without the faintest knowledge of the form it was likely to take, from this opponent of all optimistic plans.

At last, when another week had passed, the Morty twins went boldly over to Cad Castle, and asked whether they could assist the Cerne Giant in any way. They met not only Ring and Ting there, but also Laura and little Jessica the cook. They learnt great news, indeed staggering news in every sense of that word.

They learnt that, after profoundly wise advice from Squeak and in bold defiance of Bubble, and also after secret visits, unknown to anybody at Morty, to the hidden retreat of Wug and Zug in the Morty apple-loft, it had been decided among them all that, along with the Cerne Giant, and flown by Wug and Zug on the strength of what that pair had learnt from contact with the Arch-Druid, they would set out, accompanied they hoped by the Morty twins, and fly so far into outer Space that, from where they stopped, not one single star would be visible in any direction. Once arrived at this remote spot, they explained to the twins, they intended to build or mould or erect or form an entirely new Star of their very own, which they had resolved to call “Cerne,” because the material for its erection would have been carried there on the body of the Cerne Giant.

The whole thing had been worked out between the Giant and the Skull named Squeak. The Cerne Giant had got the idea completely, for it was he who had first thought of it, and he had acquired it from Bog, his lord and master, who confessed to him how his monstrous body had been so plastered by his parents with earth-mould, and sand-shingle, and every sort of mud, that his flesh had become like the flesh of a rocky island capable of lasting for a million years. The idea, therefore, which the Cerne Giant had suggested, was that he should so pad himself out with earth-mould that there would be at least a foot-deep mass of it round his whole naked body. Thus he would be carrying upon him far more solid earth than they could possibly carry into space in bales and baskets. And so, with Wug and Zug to convey them all, by means of the magic they had sucked up from the Arch-Druid’s garments, they would fly, all four of them, John o’ Dreams, Jilly Tewky, and Ring and Ting, till they were out of sight of every star in the universe. Then, and not till then, they would stop, and with all the substance scooped from off the body of the Cerne Giant, they would start their work.

The Cerne Giant had also acquired from the Skull, whose name was Squeak, a certain creative sand which existed in the rock beside Squeak’s head. This, he had explained to the Giant, if sprinkled amid the earth out of which they would form their star, would have the power considerably to increase its size and strengthen its consistency, and also enable it to remain stationary in its solitary position in empty space. The creation of a lonely star, far out of reach of any gravitation from the orbit of any star in any constellation, was entirely the idea of the Cerne Giant, but arrived at only after long and deep consultation with the Skull of Squeak at the Fountain.

It was a distressing moment for poor Maria Nu, the mother of the twins, when she learnt that they were off again on what sounded to her like something worse than any "wild goose chase," but she knew them too well, and she knew life too well to make any desperate attempt to stop them from this crazy flight. Their father, for some queer reason, could not resist taking a certain surprising interest in what they were doing, an interest which puzzled himself as much as it puzzled them. Was it, perhaps, a resurgence within the depths of him of the childish interest he must have first taken in his father's Gog-Magogs, before they became the burden of his life? As to Auntie Oh, what she, of course, wanted to know was what the Rector would say; but so far neither Morty nor Cad Castle had revealed anything to either the Rector or Miss Posh.

The mother of the twins had the wise and practical thought of telling the twins, as she hugged them goodbye, that they'd better insist on their giant taking with them a suit of clothes, including warm under-clothes, so that he'd have something to put on when he'd stripped himself of the matter which he carried on his body for forming their new star.

Thus finally, at five o'clock in the afternoon, they set off. Wug held the Cerne Giant's right hand, and Zug his left hand. Ring held Wug's right hand, and Ting held Zug's left hand. Jilly Tewky held Ring's right hand, and John o' Dreams held Ting's left hand. So they advanced through Space in a long straight line, whereof any creature meeting them would have found itself encountering John o' Dreams on its extreme right, and Jilly Tewky on its extreme left. As can be well imagined, both our twins experienced very queer sensations as they whirled through space, thus separated from each other. They could both, however, as they had neither of them done in their lives before, give themselves up to a hand-clasp that had nothing incestuous about its warmth. The magnetic current through the body of Jilly Tewky was perpetually crying out to Ring: “O let’s do it as soon as we’re there!” And the magnetic current in John o’ Dreams was perpetually crying out to Ting: “I want to have you! I want to have you! I want to have you!”

Wug and Zug, who had been having each other to more than their heart’s content in the Morty apple-loft, were feeling a strange and new exultation far beyond mere sexual pleasure. They were feeling, as with their small fingers they clutched the great hands of the Giant, that they had now got a prisoner belonging to, and yet towering above, the human race, this race of self-satisfied tyrants, to suck whose lifeblood they generally had to wait till after death had given them into their hands, and even then it was by no means always easy to scramble into their coffins.

“I am glad,” thought the Cerne Giant, as they flew past the moon and the sun, and were at last aware in the far distance of the star at the furthest reach of the Milky Way, which they knew as Vindex, “that I didn’t tell them a word about Bog, or start asking them questions about Bubble and Squeak. If they are all going to help me build a completely new world in empty space and call it after my birth-place in Foghorn, I must show my gratitude by keeping myself in the background and not jawing them forever on the history of my life.”

When John o’ Dreams saw Vindex he thought: “Little did I expect ever to come back in this direction. Is Mummy Plangy, I wonder, still plotting with the Horners to kill off every single Druid in the place? How quaint to think that every star in the Universe contains fiercely disputing continents of angry nations plotting and fighting against each other! Suppose if we did have a final destruction of all the inhabitants of all the worlds, and there was nothing left but the stars in which they had lived, no men, no animals, no birds, no fishes, nothing but the rocks and stones and trees, would the whole business have to begin all over again? And if so, how would it begin?

If there were no living creatures in the oceans and seas and rivers of these worlds left to come out of the water upon the land, and if there were no birds left in the air surrounding these depopulated worlds, how would the whole thing start again?"

Jilly Tewky said to herself, as all the stars grew fainter and fainter and smaller and smaller in the distance around them: "Shall we two girls have to bear children to be the first inhabitants of our world of Cerne — mine, I suppose, with Ring as their father, and John o' Dreams, I suppose, with Ting as their mother?"

Both Jilly Tewky at her end of the flying line of young people, and John o' Dreams at his end, carried a basket containing an enormous load of earth-mould, and as her mother had warned her to do, Jilly carried, neatly folded at the top of her basket of earth, the Cerne Giant's clothes. On, on, and on they flew until not a single star was visible in any direction. Then, to make quite sure that they were beyond all worlds, they still flew on for nearly an hour more, when at last they stopped. Wug and Zug released the Cerne Giant's hands, and along with Ring and Ting and John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky, they formed a circle round him.

From his naked body and his arms and legs he scraped the earth with which he was plastered, from head to foot, half a foot deep. Then Jilly helped him to put on the clothes she had brought, both she and her brother being amazed, as she did so, by the enormous size of his penis.

They were all, including the giant himself, surprised at the size of the star they had now created. That mysterious dust — or was it some superstellar substance that space itself contained, and that only profound sages like the Skull of the Fountain, who uttered a squeak at every bursting bubble, were aware of? — had so enlarged under their eyes, and now under their feet, the land on which they stood, and indeed was still enlarging it, that when at last they all broke up their circle around the Giant, and looked north, south, east and west, they were astonished to find that the star Cerne on which they stood had an horizon losing itself in the sky in every direction, just as horizons in flat country do at home.

Then it was that John o' Dreams asked the Giant, as they stood gazing around, whether, if they walked steadily in one direction, the horizon would just move before them, as it would if they were upon the earth, until finally, if they kept on without any deviation, they would find themselves returning to the exact spot from which they started, a point they could make plain by tying a handkerchief to a stick and planting it in the ground? Or would they, John o' Dreams went on, when they got as far as they could, simply come to the edge of what would then feel like a dirty mattress, spread flat on the air, where you could only stop and look over the edge, or throw yourself over the edge and sink down into empty space?

XXIV

"You would certainly be able," the Giant responded to John o' Dreams's question, "to walk completely round our new-built world, and if you could keep straight, come back to the exact spot where you started."

Then it was that Jilly Tewky asked the Giant a question.

"Suppose," she enquired, "that we dug a hole into our world, a hole so deep that it came out on the other side, would we still find ourselves standing firmly on our new world, if we went down that hole and came up out of it?"

"Certainly we would," answered the Giant, "for our new world has the same gravitational pull as the old earth from which we came. This pull might not be as strong as larger worlds, but it certainly would be strong enough to keep us firmly on our feet."

After these reassuring words from their leader, they all lay down, using their coats and cloaks as blankets, and fell fast asleep.

When they awoke in the morning, pretty well simultaneously, they were not surprised to find their Giant in the midst of them, his arms round his knees, absorbed in deep thought. No sooner awake they all naturally turned their eyes on him, and he smiled rather mischievously at them.

"My dear friends," he said. "We have got our world; but we have forgotten the most important thing that all worlds must give their inhabitants. Here we are; but we have nothing to eat!"

So great was the shock of this that, with wide-open eyes, they simply, like half-a-dozen bewildered children, stared at him utterly confounded. John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky didn't even glance at each other; and though Wug and Zug did exchange a quick look, they also continued to gaze helplessly at their giant-leader. No one reading about this deplorable occasion in empty space, and trying to imagine the expression in the faces of those six creatures, could exaggerate the tension they endured. The Giant in their midst looked from one to another, but not a word did he speak; and though the mischief in his expression had completely vanished, no flicker of hope or comfort had taken its place. Complete silence, stultification, and stupefaction held them all. The emptiness round them on every side must have asked itself: "How long are these infants going to wait for the appearance of their mummy?"

The Giant, staring at them all as he hugged his knees, might have given any gulf of space the impression of some gigantic begetter of them all, who had become as helpless as they were without his wife. What were they all to do? They couldn't live without eating, and they couldn't live without food. Where was the food to come from?"

Very slowly and rather stiffly the Giant rose to his feet and looked all round their horizon. As he gravely turned to follow their sky curve in its complete rondure, they all watched him in motionless suspense, themselves in a circle. Suddenly he stopped, his eyes fixed, his attention absorbed, his tall body bent a little towards some particular point in the sky. They all saw this and waited in breathless suspense. Then he spoke up.

"There is an air-plane," he announced, "coming straight towards us. They must have seen our tiny world, like a star in the sky, and decided to visit it. I think we had better consider how to deal with them. They will, no doubt, have plenty of food, and they will probably have endless things that we could plant and sow here, so as to provide ourselves as time goes on with enough to eat. I think what we had better do is to take prisoner at once every person on board, and use them as useful slaves, as the Perosians on Vindex used, or tried to use, the Horners. If you people agree with me, I think it would be a good thing if I could increase my formidable appearance by brandishing a club. Perhaps you could let me use your baskets, Mr. Nu and Miss Nu? And perhaps you, Mr. Ring Cad, could let me have that stick you keep stuck in your belt like a long sword?"

Both baskets and stick were in his possession in a moment: and by breaking up the two baskets and twisting the mass of little pieces of wood round the top of the stick, the semblance did certainly appear of a huge terrifying club. Thus prepared, the Cerne Giant rose to his full height with his club in his hand, while his six companions gathered round him.

The air-plane landed skilfully and gently about a quarter of a mile from where they awaited it. Led by the Cerne Giant, all six of them advanced upon it at a run. There soon turned out to be only four men on board, but there was also a powerful and competent Captain, together with the Captain's lady, who was even more commanding in appearance, than he was himself.

The Cerne Giant, brandishing his club, began addressing this Captain and this lady at once.

"You are, all of you, our prisoners, of course," announced the Giant, "and the first thing you must do is to pile all your weapons in a heap here and now at our feet."

The Captain exchanged a word with his lady and replied in English.

"I am glad," he said, "that we speak the same language. We come," he went on, "from a far corner of Australia, which has for its name the ancient Greek word, signifying the last letter of the alphabet, which as you know is Omega. Few Europeans and fewer Americans are aware of our small state, but into that there is no necessity to go just now, but I will proceed to direct our crew to obey you and heap up our weapons."

While the Captain and his distinguished-looking lady stood on one side of this heap of weapons, which began to mount up into quite a large pile as the crew obeyed their instructions, the Cerne Giant, with his huge club now quiescent under his arm, entered into a lively discussion with the Morty Twins and the Cad brother and sister, a discussion that was interrupted at intervals by spirited exclamations from Wug and Zug. There must have been something quite noticeable in the difference between the dictatorial authority of the two rulers from Omega and the democratic easy-going fraternity of the dwellers in Cerne, for when the pile of surrendered arms was complete, the distinguished lady, who carried a parasol which she held by the middle as if it were itself a weapon, addressed herself to Jilly Tewky in the following words.

"I observe, my girl, that you are all supporting and even assisting and advising this grotesque Giant of yours, whose purpose seems to be to drive us out of this little world altogether or to force us to serve him. How can a civilised maid like you take such a monster's side against my husband and me? Perhaps you realise that my husband is Major-General Lord Stripthelot, and that before we went to Australia, we lived in Fivewives Manor in Little Scrabbleton. You look a sensible girl. Indeed you remind me of a very nice housemaid I had once in Little Scrabbleton. Perhaps she was a relation of yours. Her name was Lil. What is your name, if I may ask, and which of these daring lads is your boy-friend?"

The woman's insolence so infuriated Jilly Tewky that the only reply she made was to move a step or two nearer to where the Cerne Giant was brandishing his club. But John o' Dreams spoke up.

"We shall consider very carefully, madam," he said, "whether to make use of your muscular ability in scrubbing the deck of your air-plane or of your skill with figures in keeping accounts in the office. But in either case we shall, I am sure, find plenty of use for you. But you must please, my good lady, however important your husband's military position may have been, get into your head that when people enter a foreign country, they must respect that country's government and way of life, and not start laying down the law, as if they were conquerors of the world."

The manor-house lady from Little Scrabbleton went back to join her husband, who was superintending the erection of a tent, under which the more vulnerable things in the airplane could be released from their present over-crowded state. Ring and Ting were engaged in an intense discussion together.

"But don't you see, my dear," Ting was saying, "this is a crucial and ticklish moment. Apart from our Giant, the chances are that with the arms they've got in their plane, and with their military commander to direct them, for it's plain the man's no fool, our side would have no chance. But if our Giant were now to rush upon them, and if the shots they fired at him, for I'm sure they've got fire-arms, had no effect, we might possibly win by giving them a wild panic."

It was at this moment that an inspiration came to John o' Dreams.

"What we must do," he whispered to Jilly Tewky, "is to find out what arms they have got. I'm going to ask Wug and Zug to approach their leader, for whoever he may be, he's a fellow who knows what he's up to, and offer their help. That would give him the idea that he could, as the phrase is, 'divide and rule,' and then, after a time, let's tell Wug and Zug to make the excuse of trying to obtain more help, and when they come, we can learn from them all we most want to know."

Jilly Tewky made no attempt to dissuade him from this plan. She refrained from making any comment; and John o' Dreams hurried over to where the Worm-man and the Slug-woman were talking to each other a little aside from Ring and Ting, and suggested to them his idea. They obeyed with alacrity, evidently well pleased by the suggestion. The twins watched them make the offer, and watched the Captain nod his head, and waited in silence till Wug and Zug came across to them.

“Well, old friend,” enquired John o’ Dreams eagerly, “what’s the news?”

XXV

"They have no fire-arms in the plane," said Wug, "nor explosives of any kind. But they've got an enormous collection of knives, swords, spears, axes, choppers, tridents, rakes, hoes, forks, spades, trowels, bows-and-arrows, saws, brooms and javelins. They've got bales of roots and potatoes and cabbages and onions and beans and seeds-for-sowing of every sort and kind. They've got every species of corn you can imagine. They've also got casks of oil and strongly-barred cages with lots of little colts and calves and pigs and geese and turkeys and chickens. If we took possession of them body and soul," added Wug finally, "we should have enough farm-yard provisions to make Cerne a prosperous estate, capable of supporting a considerable population for an indefinite period. They've got beds and cradles and chairs and tables and hammers and nails and blankets and sheets and well-constructed little grates with iron bars and a lot of excellent mattresses and thick carpets. It's clear," concluded Wug, "that they came here with the intention of cultivating and populating a desert."

Jilly Tewky now came close up to them with one of her usual direct and practical questions.

"Where did they come from?" she enquired.

"From some remote corner of Australia," Wug answered, and then, obviously feeling that to answer one woman's question, it was important to have another woman, he called Zug to come to them. This was clearly extremely annoying to the Major-General, for the little dwarf-lady was evidently proving of great use to him in the business of making their plane disgorge its voluminous contents, and arranging the contents under the large tent composed of ship-sails which they had caused to be erected. Arrived on the scene, the Slug-Lady soon made everything clear.

"The General," she exclaimed, "came with his wife originally from a big manor-house in the West of England, but after the war he settled with his lady in a far-away corner of Australia, because he wanted a more exciting life than he could get at home. He was something of an astronomer and was also interested in devilry" — Zug hesitated for a second— "I mean — what is the thing they call it? Astrology and the signs of the Zodiac — and was always searching the sky with an enormous telescope. So that when he saw what looked like the tiny speck of a new star in an out-of-the-way part of the heavens, he at once thought of flying there and making it his land of heart's desire."

"Had he thought of a name to give it?" enquired Jilly Tewky.

"Oh no," replied Zug. "But their plane has a name. It is called Omega, which they tell me is the Greek word for the end. Whether the General had suicidal thoughts when he chose it, I don't know. But they tell me his wife can't bear it. She wanted it, they tell me, to be called Vita Nuova, which in Latin means 'New Life.' So you see my lord's all for Greek, and my lady's all for Latin. So what can we do?"

"Call it Gibberish, and let it go!" cried Wug the Worm.

Thus speaking, as Homer would say, and followed unwillingly by his wife, as Dante would add, and unmoved, as Horace would sum up, though the whole business crashed in ruins, Wug departed to help in undoing the "corded bales" under the sail-tent.

It was then that one of John o' Dreams's recklessly caught-up inspirations — one of those wild ideas that had come to him at particular moments all through his life — drove him to rush to Ring and Ting, dragging Jilly Tewky after him by a flap of her skirt, crying aloud so that everybody within hearing could hear — and everybody, whether brought to that spot by Omega or brought by the magic of the Arch-Druid absorbed by Wug and Zug, was close enough to hear— "Now let us all agree to make our noble Giant the absolute, the responsible, the arbitrary, the omnipotent Ruler of the new world we have created! Let's dispense with crownings and with anointings. Let us simply proclaim with our united voice that he is King and Emperor, and the one and only Lord of the Land of Cerne!"

The Giant must have been alive-o, after the manner of the being he had slain upon Vindex, though devoid of his ears, for no sooner had John o' Dreams's voice rung out bold and clear, than brandishing his club and with his colossal sexual organ exposed to the sight of all, the Cerne Giant strode forward, stooped down, dropped his club for a moment, seized the General by his ankle, seized the General's wife by her ankle, and waved them both round his head — yes! several times round his head, and then laid them carefully down side by side under the tent-pole of the tent.

There John o' Dreams would have let them lie, but Jilly Tewky, uneasy as she always was when any human being was suffering, ran to their side; and John o' Dreams, as well as Ring and Ting, followed her. Jilly Tewky knelt on the ground beside them, and bending over them, touched their foreheads with her fingers, pushing back their hair, which was easy to do in both cases, as neither of them indulged in curly locks. She soon realised that they both would soon recover from the shock of their swing in the air, and that even now they were conscious, and that their breathing and heart-beating were on the way to become normal.

The crew of the Omega, as they seemed all bent on calling their plane, consisted only of four men, and as our friends from Foghorn, when you included their pair of Druid-inspired dwarfs, amounted to six persons, now that the Giant had given the General and his lady the sort of shock that would keep them in their place and render them quiescent, the only claim that these four men could make to be, if the Giant was counted out, the dominating party in their new world, would be that whereas they were four males, John o' Dreams and Ring and Wug were the only males on the side against them, since Jilly and Ting and Zug were all feminine.

But after all, for everybody spoke the same language, it was some while before the peculiar half-light, which was what the creatures of the star Cerne now found to be the only darkness they were destined to enjoy as their night, fell upon them, that everything was peacefully arranged, and that everybody, counting out the General and his wife and the Giant, should have their vote when any vital dispute arose as to what particular measures were to be taken. Thus when the weird half-light, which was all the darkness Nature gave them when the time came for them to sleep, finally arrived, not only the chastened General and his lady, but all four men of the Omega and all the creators of the star Cerne settled down to a beatific sleep.

Day and Night, if they could be called by these familiar names, followed each other in this friendly manner for quite a long time. The General and his arrogant lady had had their lesson, and they now fell into unison, without giving themselves any more airs, with the Foghorn folk and the four men of the Omega crew.

Among our special group of friends, the children of Urk Cad and the children of Maria Nu, there was, as they themselves had anticipated, the inevitable disturbance of human hearts when the two sexes are involved.

John o' Dreams and Ring did their utmost to control the outbursts of emotional disturbance, of which they kept growing more and more conscious in their nerves, as John o' Dreams's attraction to Ting, and Ring's attraction to Jilly Tewky, became more and more accentuated.

It was not, however, till two whole months had passed that something happened to reduce these emotional and sexual and occupational activities to their proper place in the Universe. All the six Foghorners led by their Giant, and all the six Omegans led by their General and his lady, set out one by one to see how long it would take them to walk clean round their world. They resolved to take no food; and before setting out, they made all the preparations they could for a memorable feast, which they decided to call the birthday party of the new Star, Cerne, and each of them who possessed a watch wound it up carefully, and set it at one and the same time as all the other watches.

They started at eight in the morning, according to what their idea of morning, as compared with night, consisted of in their new world. It certainly consisted of a beautiful expanse of uninterrupted sky, not perhaps as bright as the Homeric Aether between Olympus and Ouranos, but certainly as bright as the ordinary morning-light, both in Australia and Foghorn. They walked in sections, the Cerne Giant leading, and John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky following close behind. Then there came Ring and Ting, along with two of the Omega men. And finally, bringing up the rear with the remaining two men of the Omega plane, came the General and his formidable lady. Not one of them, whether from Foghorn or from Australia, had the faintest premonition of what was going to happen. But very few things, however extraordinary and unexpected, happen in the Universe without a warning of some kind or other.

The whole company of these Cerne-dwellers, led by a Giant and followed by a General, became suddenly aware that two enormous sea-gulls were circling round them as they walked, each of them crying a cry which apparently was a cry in the English language.

"It is coming!" cried one. And it was at once answered by its companion. "It is coming!" cried the other.

Then there was a moment of alarming silence among the whole party of a dozen walkers, before John o' Dreams murmured, "Who is it?"

And the General growled, "What in heaven's name is coming?"

And Ting cried. "It must be something awful!"

And Ring, in his most serious and philosophical tone, said calmly, "It must be a living creature or those sea-gulls wouldn't know anything about it. But what living creature can it possibly be? Some prehistoric monster, whose dwelling has always been in empty space? O why won't those birds, whose beaks bring them news in English, tell us who this 'It' is? That's what we want to know, isn't it, Jilly? Isn't it, Ting? Who is this 'It'?"

"What nonsense you are all talking," roared the General from the rear. "Listening to a pair of birds! Have none of you any sense? What do sea-gulls, however big they may be, know about what can happen in empty space? Whatever this creature is, we're not going to run away! To the devil with it!"

And then once more there came upon every living ear in those twelve men and women an appalling silence. In every heart among all the twelve of them beat and thumped the syllable, "It — It — It — It — It — It." And in the living soul of each of them, as they gazed forth upon the unspeakable immensity of empty space, there was the knowledge that "It" was coming.

And then "It" came.

XXVI

THEY WERE ALL too far from their starting-point to be able, however much they strained their eyes, to see the great tent there, which the General had erected with the Foghorn flag flying above it. They were a dozen human beings, half of them from Australia and half from Foghorn, some of them women and some of them men, and they were surrounded on all sides by empty space.

But “It” had come; and the impression they all had in their minds was that “It” had appeared between them and the tent erected by the General. The General had cried out, “Let ‘It’ go to the devil!” and it is perhaps characteristic of the rank and file of our race who obey generals, whether from Foghorn or from a far corner of Australia, that no sooner was the word “devil” uttered than the men thought of the serpent in the Garden of Eden, and the women, including the General’s lady, thought of God. The Cerne Giant, however, thought neither of God nor of the devil; he actually prepared, and he was the only one of the lot to do so, to enter into conversation with “It”.

And what was “It”? It was, as far as anyone knew who had ever seen it, a being unassociated with anything that lives in water or earth or fire. It lives in air, and in air alone is it ever seen. It ought to be emphasised that when we speak of air we are referring to the air of Empty Space. If, therefore, you, whoever you are, prefer to call it just Empty Space rather than to bring in the word air, since you feel that air, like water or fire, is one of the elements, you are at liberty to do so.

"It" is the only living creature we know who inhabits Empty Space. Its body is completely round and is covered by a thin, wiry, flexible, impenetrable, indestructible skin. It has only one eye, which along with its mouth, protrudes some distance from its body at the end of a tube-like erection. Its mouth is divided from its eye by several inches of a scaly substance, a substance that appears again on opposite sides of its globular body supporting its curious wings, which, although they spread out far on both sides, are not made of feathers, but of a stuff so closely resembling a fish's fins that certain naturalists have invented the word "whiffins." The projecting tube, that bears on the summit of its erection both the eye and the mouth of this singular being, has the power of turning and twisting as the creature moves, so as to discern in a second any unusual object hovering or drifting about in space. It is indeed from a miscellaneous haphazard drift of casual objects, carried on the motions of chance from every galaxy of inhabited worlds in the Multiverse, that this Space-Monster derives its nourishment.

The appearance of this Space-Monster created, as you can guess, no small disturbance among the founders of the star Cerne. The four men of the Omega crew felt sure, when they first saw it, that its searching eye was upon them, and that its colossal mouth, at the end of what looked like an outstretched serpent's neck, was already open to swallow them up; and with this so clearly before them, they were seized with a panic, and clasping one another's hands, fled desperately away. Obviously feeling that their duty was with their crew, the General and his lady followed after them as fast as they could, the General asserting his authority by shaking his fist at the sky out of which the Space-Monster had come, while all that his dignified lady could do was to give the brim of her hat a pull forward as she ran and her waist-band a few little tightening jerks.

The four — or perhaps it would be better to say, since so much depended on the Worm-man and the Slug-woman, the six natives of Foghorn — gathered together in a group round their protector the Giant, evidently waiting to see how he would defend them. The Giant selected an interesting, but extremely startling, line of defence. He sat down on the top of the heap of things that had been piled up under the extempore tent. Before doing this, he rendered his throne more eminent by taking down the poles and the sail-flaps. There was thus no tent any more. There was only a mighty heap, and on the top of this heap sat the Cerne Giant, hugging his knees.

But he had his club by his side; and if, when he heard the queer sound of the "whiffins" of the Space-Monster coming quite near, he was to jump to his feet and use his club, such a blow might be deadly. It was soon clear to John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky, as well as to Ring and to Ting, that if that twisting and writhing excrescence, which contained both the eye and the mouth of the Space-Monster, came within reach of the Giant's club and he were to strike it, that one blow would be the end. But the Giant showed no tendency to use his club. He seemed to realise that the Monster had seen it, and had fully comprehended what it could do. So with the club at his side, he still sat thoughtfully and quietly, but not dreamily. It might even be said that he sat there expectantly, and that what happened was to be expected.

For the Space-Monster actually came down out of space with its round and impervious body resting on the ground, and its visual and absorbing member neither spouting nor staring, but waving quietly to and fro; just as if, for once in its life, it had decided to enjoy a rest and a conversation, a rest where it was relieved from the effort of swallowing and from the effort of hunting for something to swallow.

“I can see,” said the Monster to the Giant, “that you have plenty of lively little edible slaves in this new star of yours.”

“They don’t all come from the same portion of their home star,” replied the Giant, “nor do I expect, when I get round to gobbling them up, that they will all taste alike. But I am not one for monotony in taste. I like variety. I sometimes even like a little fun with the pygmies I swallow, before they go down where they belong. Do you ever drive them off a star like this and fly after them through space?”

“Oh, no,” answered the Monster. “I’d catch them so quick that I’d get no fun at all out of that. What I like doing is pretending that I don’t know anybody’s near me; and as they move about near my belly, I sweat a little, so that my sweat makes this ridiculous little star so sticky that they get stuck, and then I turn first my eye on them, which makes them shiver and shake, and then very slowly I swallow them up, but while they are still alive inside me, I spit them up and catch them again. I get really a lot of amusement from that little game. I call it ‘Spit and Catch,’ and I enjoy it so much that sometimes I play it in my sleep.”

So content and satisfied was the Space-Monster, as he rested by the side of the Giant, that our Foghorn friends, who could see, quite far away in the distance by this time, the crew of the Omega and the General and his lady hastening out of sight, decided in their minds that they would listen to this conversation till the fugitives had actually disappeared in the distance. “The Cerne Giant,” thought John o’ Dreams and Jilly Tewky, and Ring and Ting, “will certainly refuse to let the Monster swallow any of us.” What the Worm-dwarf and the Slug-dwarf were thinking it was difficult to say, but John o’ Dreams noticed that they had both approached very near to the Giant’s pair of knees, as he sat hugging them with his arms. He further noticed, after the fugitives had entirely vanished, that Wug and Zug were talking eagerly together; and all four of the Foghorn natives, though they didn’t utter their thoughts to one another, wondered whether some exciting scheme might not have entered the heads of the Worm-man and the Slug-woman.

“What are your earliest recollections?” the Giant now enquired of the Monster. “I myself,” he went on, “was hardly grown up before I was brow-beaten into slavery by one of the most extraordinary beings that ever existed. This creature’s name was Bog, and he had extraordinary ears, ears that had the power of hearing everything that was uttered in every language in the multiverse.”

“O, my earliest recollections,” replied the Space-Monster, “O, my earliest recollections” — here he paused a moment, “would take a very long time to describe, even though I described them in less than a millionth part of the languages known to that being who enslaved you, and who called himself Bog. You see, words in any language — even in the language of the British Commonwealth, from Land’s End in Cornwall to Omega Rock in Australia — are rather awkward expressions of the sensations that newly-born living creatures experience. But my difficulty is a unique one. I am, as far as I know, the only living creature ever born in Empty Space. How I was born, what father, what mother I had, are questions not only unanswerable by me, but weird, strange, queer, fantastic, grotesque, monstrous, outrageous, for me even to put to myself. How far back does my memory carry me? Well! That is a sensible question. That is a question I am always asking myself. That is a question I get intense pleasure from trying to answer.”

At this point the Space-Monster settled itself more comfortably still by a small turn of its round body, all of which, the Cerne Giant could now clearly see, was covered by small greyish-white hairs. The Giant wondered to himself what those hairs would feel like, if he had the courage to stroke them with his hand. He even let his hands release his knees from the clutch with which he was hugging them against his stomach. He let them slide down to the ground on each side of his knees, so that they helped to support him in the sitting position.

“What I remember earliest of all,” went on the Space-Monster, swaying his long tubular neck, with its single eye and enormous mouth so close together, backwards and forwards above the seated giant’s head, “was my impression of the difference between me and the empty space surrounding me. Space was so empty and airy, and so absolutely nothing at all; whereas I was so thick and stodgy and stout and solid! Of course, compared with yours” — and the creature made a second slight movement with its rotund, though anything but solid, body— “my body is flimsy and hollow, but as I felt it and saw it floating there in space, it struck me as being extremely material. And what, I was always asking myself, does it really mean? That I am I? Yes, what is it that makes me feel myself to be me? What is it that in me thinks and says to myself, I am I? Around me, on every side of me, and under and above me is air — yes, space full of nothing but air. Well, how is it that I am so absolutely certain that my mind, my thinking self, the consciousness in me that says, ‘I am I,’ has no connection with this air, and has nothing to do with this infinite space? Why don’t I say to myself, ‘I am the consciousness of Space. I am Space thinking to itself. I am the mind, I am the soul, I am the inner self, of Space?’ I will tell you, most worthy Giant, why I don’t. I don’t, because I feel a great gap, a deep chasm, a terrific gulf, between myself and the air around me. I am I, and it is it. And yet I enjoy breathing the air, feeling the air, floating in the air. And I enjoy thinking that the air goes on and on and on forever, goes on into infinity. O my worthy Giant, what is this ‘I,’ that is me? What is this ‘I,’ that is you?

And — O do tell me this! — has this endless empty space, which surrounds this little world of yours, got an ‘I’ in it like the ‘I’ we’ve got? Yes, that’s what I want to know more than anything else! I suppose when you think of these matters you ask yourself this very question, most worthy Giant, just as I ask it of myself? Here we are in this tiny little star made, as I know well, by you and your friends from Foghorn in Britain and from Omega in Australia. But what I want to know is, what this infinite Space, that surrounds us here in this little manufactured star of yours, says to itself about its life and being and inmost self? Does it feel afraid of itself when it thinks of the infinite extension of its being? Does it say to itself: how can it be that I stretch out in all directions to infinity? How can it be that I, without head or neck or hands or wings or feet or chest or waist or belly or bowels, can stretch out without end in all directions? What is there, my dear Giant, that you and I could reply to the infinity of Space, when we imagine it confronting us with a question like that?”

Moving towards his questioner on his buttocks, his hands, and his heels, the Cerne Giant answered at once.

“We could say, and I do say to you, my dear Space-Monster — yes! I say it here and now, and I shall go on saying it as long as I am I and you are you — Your great mistake, O infinity of Space, lies in your way of isolating yourself from all other beings in our bewildering multiverse. You may be an infinity of space, you may contain an infinity of empty air: but you must not forget that you cannot help also containing more than you know, more than any person or creature or angel or devil or monster can ever know, of other things! You are making a great philosophical mistake, my good Space-Monster, when you try to isolate yourself, when you are in yourself nothing but space and air, from everything else in the multiverse. Because you, the Space-Monster, and I, the Cerne Giant, are at this particular moment resting in a lonely little artificial world, made by myself and these Foghorn friends of mine, and because we see round us, from where we are at this moment, nothing but empty space, we have no right to isolate this empty space from what we know must be joined with it at other points of its extension. We know the number of star-galaxies that crowd into it all about the earth from which we come, and what right have we to assume that, because we cannot — you, the Space-Monster, and I, the Cerne Giant — see anything, from just where we are here, but empty space, that there are not, just out of our power of vision, great masses of star-galaxies of which our earthly astronomers have never heard? That some masses of material substance, whether divided into separate starry entities or not, thicken out and solidify the immensity of space in the ethereal regions as yet unvisited by our power of vision, seems so natural and so likely to be true that we should be narrow-minded fanatics if we refused to consider its possibility. Besides, there are, we must remember, other and far more staggering possibilities. There is for instance — and at this moment when nothing is visible we ought to give it special and serious attention — there is, I say, a possibility that, if this air-plane called Omega, from some little outpost in Australia set off again on its space travels, it might find itself up against a vast mass of land which, whether inhabited or uninhabited, fills all the expanse formerly occupied by Space."

"Oh, I can't bear to think of such a thin?!" cried the Space-Monster hoarsely.

"The Universe doesn't exist for our pleasure," murmured the Cerne Giant.

XXVII

THE SPACE-MONSTER WAS still very eager to continue their philosophical conversation. Although it had swallowed people and animals and birds and fishes, drifting, flying, floating, swimming, discarded, abandoned, thrown away as refuse and rubbish, from all the worlds where living things exist, this was the first time in its life that it had exchanged ideas about life with another living creature. Hitherto all other living creatures, together with all the garbage that life engenders, had been either its prey or its provender. Because of its powerful jaws, it had not as yet encountered any rival, or indeed any creature against whom it could measure its strength. Whales and sharks and sword-fish and sea-serpents never take to the air of their own free will. Nor do lions and tigers. In early times the Space-Monster could have found huge creatures as formidable as itself, such as the ichthyosaurus, if it had descended from the air near some sea-coast of the planet Earth; but mankind, armed with weapons of stone or bronze, had proved itself capable of waging a successful war against these creatures.

“The question I would like to ask you,” the Space-Monster now enquired of the Cerne Giant, “is this. Has the whole expanse of empty space got a consciousness of its own? Does it say to itself, I am I?”

The Cerne Giant straightened himself out on his back on the ground and clasped his hands behind his head.

“I would reply to that question,” he said cheerfully, but quite seriously, “that it most certainly has a self of its own, a self that says, ‘I am I,’ and to whom everything else in the entire universe is either a ‘you’ or an ‘it’. Yes, the happiness and unhappiness," the Giant continued, "of every being, fish, flesh or fowl, from frog, toad, reptile or insect, in the whole universe, to man and woman, depends upon how far its inner self, feeling everything and suffering through its senses, through its hope and its fear, encounters good luck or bad luck. We all have had experience of what I am now saying, and it depends upon our good or evil luck. This is what makes us all, from elephants or butterflies, the worshippers of fate and chance. Fate puts us into a certain position, the child or the parents of so and so or so and so; and chance decides what good luck or bad luck we shall encounter."

"But there is another question," said the Monster, "I must ask you. Do you believe that the inner self of all this empty space knows how far space extends? When it is thinking to itself with this 'I am I', of which we speak, does it feel the precise limits of its body, as human beings do from head to feet?"

It was impossible for the Cerne Giant to remain prostrate on his back while he answered this question. He sat up, and once more, as at the beginning of their conversation, clasped his knees with his hands.

"Oh yes!" he replied. "I am certain that Empty Space knows very well every limit of its extension. What I sometimes wonder to myself is this. Can it be that the enormous expanse of empty space corresponds with the circular rotundity of every one of the starry world's? I mean, if anyone could follow the whole extent of empty space, might it not be discovered that it was circular in its expansion, just as our starry worlds are circular, and just as this tiny world upon which we are now conversing is circular? And then, my good sir, if we agree to this, are we not," the Cerne Giant continued, "driven to face a further and much more difficult question, namely the question as to what lies behind the expanse of empty space considered in all its endlessness, north, south, east, west, up, down and all round?”

The long tapering tube, much longer than those which hung down from every Horner’s head, the tube that carried the ravenous eye and the insatiable mouth of the Space-Monster, had now begun to swing ominously backwards and forwards above the Cerne Giant, but the Cerne Giant regarded this alarming phenomenon with calm amusement.

“My old master,” he remarked quietly, “whose name was Bog, and who had ears for everything that went on in the whole universe, used to say that what we saw with our eyes and heard with our ears and felt with our sense of touch, is only one aspect of what exists. He used to utter the words: ‘remember there are other Dimensions,’ and I take it that, what he meant was, that there is more than one level or plane or face or presentation or representation of what surrounds us in this particular dimension of the universe. The word Dimension seems to imply that we are living in one world, while another world parallel to it exists side by side with it — another world, or a dimension wherein we would be surrounded by a totally different aspect of the whole of life. According to what Bog taught me, it would seem that life is much more complicated than in our childish minds we think it is. In the matter of sex, Bog taught me that what in the English language is called masturbation — that is to say, the excited emission of semen by the use of our imagination — is a much more important and creative act than ordinary and natural fornication or the raping, if we are male, of our feminine opposite. Bog used to tell me that I always ought to be thinking sufficiently erotic thoughts to keep my penis in a state of erection. This I have frequently tried to do, but I am always being so attracted by other exciting things, things that have no connection whatever with sex, that I find it impossible to do always what he tells me and I just have to be content to wait.”

While the Space-Monster and the Cerne Giant were thus philosophising, John o’ Dreams and Jilly Tewky and Ring and Ting were whispering together, and so were Wug and Zug. But, after looking carefully all round the horizon to make sure the crew of the Omega, led by the General and his lady were completely out of sight, Wug left Zug’s side, and coming close up to John o’ Dreams, pulled at his sleeve to get his full attention. Thus arrested, John o’ Dreams did the same to Jilly Tewky, and both the twins gave their complete attention to what Wug was saying. Wug was telling them that now, while the Space-Monster had fallen into a sort of dreamy trance — mesmerised, it appeared, by the wise words of the Giant, who was once more sitting up straight and hugging his knees — it would be a good minute for them to give the Giant a hint of their intention, and hurriedly clear off back to the earth, taking the Giant with them. The twins heartily agreed, and beckoned Ring and Ting to join their colloquy, who both agreed with equal ardour. Wug accordingly returned to tell Zug.

Thus in less than five minutes — with the Giant at one end of the line brandishing his club in his right hand and John o’ Dreams at the other end, holding Jilly Tewky’s hand in his right hand and their precious satchel in his left, and with Ring holding the Giant’s left hand with his right and Ting’s right hand with his left, and with Ting holding Jilly Tewky’s right in her left, and with Wug and Zug steering them homeward with all the navigating skill of the Arch-Druid who had brought them from Foghorn — to Foghorn they were returning.

Dreamily and drowsily the Space-Monster watched their departure.

“But what about those others,” he asked himself, “who fled away over the horizon? I expect they’ll be sure to come back to this place where they left their plane. So if I don’t fall asleep before they come, I ought to have a good meal. But if I did fall asleep, would they have the spirit to cut off my head?”

XXVIII

WUG AND ZUG'S navigation was so good that they all arrived before breakfast at Foghorn. Laura and Jessica were expecting them at Cad Castle, and Auntie Oh was full of "Ohs" — indeed had never in their memory been fuller of them, when the Rector, having heard of their arrival from a parishioner at the Docks, came to congratulate Maria Nu at Morty.

It can be imagined what a splendid breakfast Mrs. Nu prepared for Wug and Zug in the apple loft, and what additions she and Auntie Oh added to their own breakfast in their dining-room, to share which Grandfather Grump himself would have left his attic, if John o' Dreams hadn't hurried upstairs with all the news, as well as with the old man's tray. John o' Dreams emerged from their back-yard privy, after the largest action of the bowels he had had since they left home, to find Jilly Tewky standing under the clothes-line, lost in thought and with her head hanging down.

"Is she sad to be at home?" he said to himself. "Is she trying to decide whether to marry Ring, or stay a virgin and look after me? Did she fall in love with one of those men from Australia? How queer girls are! How difficult they are to understand!" He decided to interrupt her thoughts whatever they were. "Do you wish we'd stayed in Cerne," he asked her, "and trusted our Giant to finish off that damned Monster?"

She lifted her head. "O I wish people would never ask me what I'm thinking about! Can't you ever get into your head, John, that everybody has thoughts of their own about everything, thoughts they don't want to tell to anybody?"

"Sorry, Jilly," he replied. "I know very well what you mean; but you and I have shared so many thoughts together that I thought..."

"I don't care what you thought, John! There are certain times in all our lives when we want to think alone, feel alone, and be alone!"

"All right, my precious! I'll leave you to your thoughts. I only wanted to tell you that I'm going down to visit Bubble and Squeak, and to see if you wanted to come with me. By the way," he added, noticing that her expression did change a little, "do you think Ring and Ting will be able to find a room in the Castle big enough to contain our Giant?"

"They'll have to put three ordinary mattresses in a row on the floor, if they want him to sleep in such a room!" replied Jilly Tewky; and a smile did cross her face.

"You bet they will, sweetheart," he murmured happily, indescribably relieved. "Well, ta-ta, my dear. I'll soon be back."

He had, however, only just reached the beginning of the path through the wood, where the funny little notice-board said "To the Fountain", when he heard a light step behind him, and there she was. He snatched her hand and held it tight; and together they approached the place, which was as much the centre of their mental life as the dining-room at Morty was of their physical life.

"All into Nothing!" greeted them from one bursting Bubble.

"Nothing into All!" greeted them from the Skull's answering squeak.

"You know, Jilly," burst out John o' Dreams, as they stood hand in hand, listening reverently to both these familiar sounds, "it was the spirit of Bubble who brought the headless body of Urk down to the harbour here, after I'd chopped the brute's head off."

"Yes, you told me you were responsible for his death," murmured Jilly Tewky gravely. "But you needn't give me the details. I don't like those kinds of details."

"But isn't it strange how powerful the souls or 'auras' or spiritual 'identities' of such beings as Bubble and Squeak can be?" he went on, looking steadily, first at one, and then at the other of those singular Powers.

And it was then that Jilly Tewky gave him a look that she had never given him before in all their life since they were children.

"Do you remember," she said, "how we once dreamed the same dream? We must have been three or four, I think; not more than four anyway; and when we woke up, the dream we had had came and talked to us, and it told us it was descended from a dream dreamt by Lilith, the first wife of Adam. Yes, it told us that its name was Lorm, and that its power as a dream was especially strong when used upon very old and very young people. Lorm came to our bed when we both had wakened up in a nightmare, and Lorm told us that he wasn't a grown-up nightmare, but that he had something to do with God. I think he said that he was the nightmare God once had when he'd been reading a book about Hell. No, no! It wasn't that! It was something else. It was something about incarnation and predestination. I've forgotten what it was. But whatever it was, we both kissed Lorm. We took him for a sort of Little Boy-Blue and begged him never to frighten us again, and he promised he never would, unless we had a terrible quarrel, and one of us begged him to be a nightmare going after the other. But we knew we'd never be as horrid as that. So he said goodbye, and opened the window and flew away. Do you remember all that, John o' Dreams?"

John o' Dreams pondered, staring at the skull-like forehead of Squeak. Then he said:

"No, my dear. I've forgotten it entirely."

He remained so long staring at Squeak's skull that the thing had uttered three squeaks, and the Bubble had burst three times into the air, before he suddenly let his fingers clutch Jilly Tewky’s hand very tightly, and without uttering a word, he dragged her close to the Skull.

“Why did you let Bubble bring Urk’s headless body down here into the dock-water?” he enquired of the Skull.

Squeak began hurriedly answering him, but Jilly Tewky couldn’t follow a word he said; for he not only spoke in a low voice, but he spoke very fast. At last John o’ Dreams asked him abruptly, still holding Jilly Tewky’s hand, whether he thought the Giant could be comfortable in Cad Castle. It was clear to Jilly Tewky that the Skull replied in the affirmative, and this was borne out and witnessed to by the indescribable fury with which the next bubble burst into the air and lost itself in space.

“Let’s go and see how they’ve fixed him up there,” cried John o’ Dreams, clutching Jilly Tewky’s hand tighter than ever and dragging her off with him.

When they arrived at the gate of Cad Castle, they found that their approach had been watched by Laura from one of the windows, and they were admitted at once. Nor had they to ask any questions about the Giant, for it was clear to them in a moment how they had arranged for his sleep that night. Breakfast was over now, and the Giant was either striding across the hills inland, or swimming in the sea. But while Jessica was working in the kitchen, and Ring was studying a translation of Don Quixote in the library, Ting was helping Laura to make the Giant’s bed after his night’s rest.

As soon as Laura let the young visitors in, she saw that both of them grasped at once what was being done. A bed had been prepared with its pillows a few feet from the top of the front steps. From there the long line of mattresses stretched clear through the dining-room into the kitchen, and from there into the scullery, where the last one lay only a yard or two from the sink.

The room that was always called the library at Cad Castle contained only one bookcase; and this bookcase only had four not very lengthy shelves. But each shelf was very high, and the only books they contained were quartos and folios, all in massive leather bindings and most of them with heavily gilded edges. There was no desk in the room, but there was a round table with three upright old-fashioned chairs, and plenty of ink, but all the pens were goose-quills, and some of them were of enormous size.

Ring's Don Quixote was translated into very old-fashioned English words, and Ring loved to see the way these large beautifully printed sentences expressed so much of the humour and the sadness and mystery of life on this earth. Every now and then Ring would pause in his reading and ponder on the personality of Jilly Tewky, staring dreamily as he did so at the vast expanse of rolling downland and at the foaming curves of Foghorn Bay. Every single word he read seemed to him full of problems of what he would feel, if he snatched Jilly Tewky from John o' Dreams and persuaded her to marry him. Oddly enough, the kindred problem as to what Jilly Tewky would feel, thus bereft of the company of her fellow twin, never once occurred to him. He stretched out his elbows on the great folio of Don Quixote, and lowered his forehead till it pressed against the knuckles of his tightly clasped fingers.

"What we forget," he said to himself, "is the background or stage of our human drama. We can be brave and defiant like Don Quixote, or we can be humorously earthy and cautious like Sancho. We can fight for the right, or we can yield to the wrong. We can be studious or careless, clever or stupid, learned or ignorant, cruel or kind. But what we forget is the terrific and inconceivable nature of the universe in which we live. What we forget" — and Ring pressed his knuckles against his forehead so hard that it hurt them both— "is the immensity of space. No, I won't say the immensity. For it is much more than that. I'll say the infinity, the unendingness of space. What we forget is — and this is no speculation or metaphysical idea, it is the stark material reality: it is what nobody, whether stupid or clever, can deny — namely, that it is impossible to imagine an end to space, impossible not to think of it as going on for ever. But what a thing to think about that is! To think that we live in the middle of something that stretches out round us into infinity!

We are in this something, and so are more worlds and suns and moons and stars than we can count. But this something is thin air — O! it is thinner than air. This something is nothing. But it isn't nothing in the sense of not being there at all, for it is everywhere. That is its peculiarity. It is over us, behind us, under us, and all round us. And when we stop being there, and when all the stars in the universe stop being there, and when there is no trace, no fragment of a trace of any kind of world left in the space through which our consciousness is travelling, when in fact we are surrounded by empty space on all sides, it is then that we realise what nothingness is. We are what we are: bodily creatures travelling through space; but space is not the body of a living consciousness as each one of us is. It is the body of nothing! Or am I getting the whole thing entirely wrong?"

And at this point Ring rubbed his forehead against the Don Quixote folio with an almost vicious scraping, as if he were punishing himself for his stupidity.

"It is so entirely nothing," he told himself, "that it is impossible for it to have a soul. Nothing is nothing, and obviously it can't have a soul. Only something that is something can have a soul. So the fact remains that we are surrounded by an endless nothing, which, whether in its outward or its inward, can have no soul. If we flew millions of billions of miles and then stopped, we should only find ourselves still in the same infinite space and no nearer to any of it than we were when we started. I can't help feeling" — here Ring lifted his head from the book and stared through one of the library windows at the distant sea— "that there's something in all this that's intentional — I mean something in it that shows a definite purpose to make us mortals small and inconsequential, and even a little ridiculous."

While their children were at Cad Castle, Maria Nu and Nezzar Nu and Auntie Oh were engaged in a very serious conversation round their dining-room table, now entirely cleared of everything and shining beautifully in its majestic mahogany imperviousness.

"I follow your argument, my dear," Nezzar Nu was saying, "but you must realise that, from what we both have seen, John and Jilly are very much in love with each other. People call it incest when brothers and sisters treat each other as lovers, but from what I've seen, and not only in their case, it is dangerous for anyone, whether parent or relation or outsider, to speak of this, because the division between the feeling of lovers and the feeling of brother and sister, especially in a case like this when they are twins, is a thing so delicate and subtle, and a thing so criss-crossed with emotional complications that it requires extremely cautious and careful handling."

"What I think, my dear," said Maria Nu, gently but firmly, "is that the best thing for us to do is to get the Rector to marry John to Ting without further delay, and Jilly to Ring. Ring and Ting are without question in love with our twins, and there is nothing to spoil the harmony of these two marriages, except the shadowy and perilous question as to how far the twins' love for each other has passed the limit, a very twisting and twitching and tricky limit, between natural love and unnatural love. For myself, I even feel a difficulty in calling this incestuous emotion between my children unnatural. Sin it may be from the religious point of view; but there are people who regard all sexual passion as sin, a sin which we have inherited from Adam and Eve — what they call ‘original sin’.”

“Well, if we get the Rector,” began Nezzar Nu again, “to marry John to Ting and Jilly to Ring, the whole confounded responsibility for our children’s future will be lifted from our shoulders. We didn’t ask to have twins. We didn’t ask to have as our neighbours the children of a wicked giant. We didn’t ask to have a good giant capable of making a new star in space and flying to the star the Romans called Vindex, a star inhabited now by Druids. No, we didn’t ask for any of these things; nor pray to the old gods of our race that any of these wonders should occur. And yet they all have occurred! O my precious Maria, the only thing we can do is to accept what comes. Listen to that old clock on the chimney piece. Can’t you hear what it says? What comes — what comes — what comes — what comes — what comes! And the ancient regularity with which, in its old familiar ticking, it repeats those words, is the regularity with which the universe swings on its way, and the regularity with which all its offspring, generation after generation of men and women, have to accept the work and the play, the waking and the sleeping, of our life upon earth.”

“Never mind what the clock says, my dear,” burst out Maria. “Your dad would draw from that old monotone no more inspiration than to make you clean up another furlong of land for his damned Gog-Magogs. I tell you, my dear, that old clock is wrong! The secret of life, and it has been so ever since the first of our race came out of the sea, is not acceptance or submission. It is rebellion! It is adventure! And who have known that in their hearts from the beginning, but the wise women of every generation!”

Feeling that, perhaps, she had gone a little too far, Maria turned to her sister.

"You agree with me, don't you, my dear?"

Auntie Oh moved straight up to her and took her hand.

"Entirely," she said, in a low and intense voice, full of the quivering force of a woman who has never fully expressed herself. "Who," she asked, turning to her brother-in-law with a gleam in her green eyes that was almost ferocious, "who was it who taught the first King of Rome to conquer the world? Wasn't she an old maid, like me, only living by herself in a cave? I don't live in a cave. But I can tell you I often feel as if I did!"

Maria cried, "Hush! Hush! my dear! How can you say such unkind things? You know how fond we all are of you! You know how I and the children depend on you, and rely on what you think and what you say. You know how we all would miss you if you went away, or if anything happened to you!"

"Come on, come on," cried Nezzar impatiently. "The point of all this is simply that we middle-aged folk — with a half-crazy old gent up there in the attic above us, and a couple of reckless kids running in and out of Cad Castle and back and forth to Bubble and Squeak from our own front door — simply don't know the north from the south or the Sun from the Moon. We've got more confused than my old Dad with his Gog-Magogs, or John and Jilly with their Bubbles and Squeaks. What we've got to do is to bring some other sensible middle-aged person into it, and I think that person had best be the Rector."

"Oh, I agree with you, Nezzar. Heart-whole I agree with you!" cried Auntie Oh, whose eyes, though the others hadn't noticed this, had suddenly been fixed on the window. "It's outrageous! It's outrageous! Come, let us take action. Let us do something!"

And then, to the absolute amazement of Maria and Nezzar, the excited lady clambered up upon a chair and began waving her arm towards the open window shouting, “Come in! Come in! Rector. We want you! We want you!”

The truth was the devoted adherent of the Rector had seen her adored man approaching the front door of Morty. It was at that moment that Nezzar Nu said to himself, thinking of quite another time of the year:

“All Hallows, All Saints and All Souls,
Like a tide the wave of them rolls
Their Devils are gone, and we are alone,
All Hallows, All Saints and All Souls!”

Nezzar didn’t wait for a knock at the front door. He rushed out of the room, ran through the hall, and the sisters heard his voice greeting the Rector.

“So you were right,” murmured Maria to Auntie Oh, as Nezzar ushered the Rector into the room.

“Well, ladies, how are you both?” he began, with his usual cheerful good nature. “Miss Posh didn’t want me to come. She is greatly worried by all the news she has heard from relatives of Laura and Jessica in the village. They tell her that a way has been found to make it possible for the Cerne Giant to sleep in Cad Castle. This, as you can imagine, has started up all sorts of wild ideas in my lady’s head. She wakes up in the night after dreaming that the Giant has been stretching himself out on the little bridge between the rectory and the church. And though I tell her that he could only sit on this bridge with his legs hanging down on both sides, the poor old girl has so got the Giant on her brain that she only drops one image of horror about him to call up another.”

“Will you let me make you a cup of coffee, Rector?” enquired Mrs. Nu, as her husband gave their visitor a seat in an armchair.

“No, no, my dear lady, thank you. I don’t feel like coffee, or tea, or anything else. To tell you the honest truth, if you were to ask me what I’d like most at this moment, I would answer — to go to bed and sleep sound till the morning. That’s to say,” he went on, smiling rather wistfully and woefully, as he leaned back in his armchair, “if I had no dreams to remember. By the way, one pair of our youngsters— “and here the Rector sat straight up and clasped his fingers tightly together— “but whether they were yours here, or our friends in Cad Castle, I can’t remember — told me that they’d both had the same dream and both woke up to find the person they’d been dreaming about, who wasn’t a real person at all, sitting on their bed, and they talked excitedly to him till he disappeared into thin air.”

“We’ve got a very serious matter to talk about with you, Rector,” said Mrs. Nu. “Both my husband and I feel that the wisest thing for our young couple to do would be to marry at once their friends at Cad Castle. We’ve heard enough from them about their adventures together, and it has become clear to us that if we could persuade you to carry through a double wedding — that is to say to marry our John to Ting Cad, and to marry our Jilly to Ring Cad — the future of both pairs of youngsters, as well as the future of their Castle and our Morty, would be satisfactorily assured. Both couples, we know, would joyously welcome such a ceremony; but, as young people so often are, they are both timid about suggesting it and thus committing themselves to it.”

The Rector was evidently profoundly pleased by this suggestion. He even stood up for a second. And, though he sat down again at once, it was clear that he had been led to make that movement by an instinctive desire to act in accordance with Mrs. Nu’s suggestion.

"The whole thing is a little complicated," Nezzar Nu now boldly and frankly explained, "by the fact that, since the young people have been over there with their friends of the Castle ever since breakfast, I haven't had an opportunity to take them up to my father's apartment at the top of the house to receive his blessing on the project; and from what I now learn, I gather that he strongly disapproves of it on the ground that from the light way that they talked of their journey into space, and from the various things he overheard them saying to each other about it, the relations between John and Ting, and between Jilly and Ring, were not as guarded and proper as they ought to have been between young people of their status in Foghorn, looking forward to joining their fortunes in holy matrimony.

"What my wife and I feel, therefore," Nezzar Nu went on, "is that to avoid all future gossip and scandal in the neighbourhood, the best thing to be done is for their marriage to be private and expeditious, and for us to avoid the usual parties and wedding breakfasts as much as we can. We would in fact suggest, if you are kind enough to consider such a thing, that you should marry them privately at the altar in the church, and then that we should just simply announce publicly to everybody concerned that they have been married in our church. That will cover everything; and though, of course, nothing on earth can stop people gossiping, all that anyone will be able definitely to say against us will be that the Cad young people and our young people behaved as if they were married before they were married, and that their marriage from the start was strongly opposed by their grandfather."

The Rector was so enthusiastic about the whole idea that it took a very little time to carry it through. It was, in fact, only a couple of weeks later that our four friends were exploring Foghorn in every direction with the reckless and athletic delight of an athletic honeymoon. It was while they were scrambling about the shores of their home in this wild manner that they were permitted by the gods to undergo an experience that no-one in Foghorn had ever undergone before. They not only saw a sea-serpent, but they were actually pursued by one along a cliff path by the edge of the sea on a day when the waves were specially high.

When the two couples had been married for well over two years, each of them had a child. Ring and Jilly Tewky had a boy, and John o' Dreams and Ting had a girl. Then a moment came that might have produced that first serious quarrel of their lives; but luckily the love the twins had for each other was strong enough to overcome this danger. It was indeed incumbent upon it to do so, since it was a danger that their love had itself created. Both pairs were full of energy, and not only so, but their children were full of energy, an energy which was enhanced by their being John o' Dreams's girl-child and Jilly Tewky's boy-child. Ring was mighty proud to have a real live son, and Ting never tried to conceal her delight in being the mother of John o' Dreams's little girl. Both pairs were so thrilled by having these children that they decided, after a long and intimate colloquy between the two mothers, that they would give themselves up to enjoying themselves during the next twelve months and put the idea of further offspring out of their thoughts for a while.

They had chosen the names of their two-year-old toddlers before either of them appeared on the scene. The boy was called Malcolm and the girl was Leonora; Mal and Nora for short.

The most romantic part of Foghorn consisted of a heavily pebbled projection from its west side, stretching out for a considerable distance into the ocean, and ending up in a huge massive rock that looked as if it had once been an island. It never had been anything of the kind; this enormous ridge or bank of pebbles was a phenomenon that has lasted for thousands of years, and had always been possessed of its own unique personality. The pebbles of which it was composed were capable, when held up to the air, of permitting the light of sun or moon to shine through them. This transparency endowed each pebble with a magical quality of its own, a quality which was enhanced by the unquestioned fact that they had all been brought up by the enormous storm-waves of this singular West Bay out of the depths of the ocean. Each individual stone of this colossal promontory seemed to possess all the mystery of the depths of the deepest ocean in the world.

The crazy undertaking which Ring and Jilly Tewky, together with Ting and John o' Dreams, had set themselves to perform, aided by little Mal and little Nora, was nothing less than to surround the base of Cad Castle with a wall or ring or circle of these pebbles about four feet high. They had already got a circle of about a foot high and a foot broad, and the rumour of what they were doing was now — as can easily be believed, thanks to the interest in it of Laura and Jessica — spreading fast through the whole of Foghorn.

The twins, and Ring and Ting as well, were confounded one morning by discovering that the Cerne Giant for several days, instead of visiting his favourite resort on the chalk slope above Cerne Abbas, had the habit of presenting himself at the Fountain of Bubble and Squeak, where he argued obstinately with Bubble and listened with concentrated attention to the wise discourse of Squeak.

Both the twins' mother and the Cad Castle adherents, Laura and Jessica, would have been amazed if they could have listened to what went on at the Fountain between the Giant and those two. The Giant didn't sit hugging his knees, which was his usual attitude when engaged in conversation. No, he lay at full length, prone on his stomach on the right-hand side of the Fountain, facing the Skull of Squeak, but with his chin propped on the palms of his hands and his elbows deep in the wet mud, so that he could turn his eyes whenever he liked to Bubble who, when each moment came for the shining orb of her wrath to burst into this air, seemed able to aim its dissolution at the Giant's head.

"Why," enquired the Giant, "did you bring the headless Trunk of Urk back to the coast of Foghorn? Did you have a sort of fancy that contact with our waters would bring Urk to life again?"

"He wasn't born here," muttered Bubble.

"No, of course he wasn't," retorted the prostrate superman, "but these waters have mysterious powers, which nobody knows better than you! Come, you Bubble, you! Confess! Confess! What you wanted to do was what I had a dream about last night!"

It can well be imagined that this definite allusion to Lorm brought Lorm in person on the scene. And once on the scene he was at work. There was nothing anybody could do to stop him. Nor, indeed, was it possible to drive him away, when the whole nature of the situation lent itself to his peculiar activity.

The Cerne Giant had already allowed his elbows to relax, and his chin to rest upon the knuckles of his two hands. It had also happened that the preceding night had been an agitated one at Cad Castle, owing to the intrusion, after their disturbance by poachers, of a whole family of badgers; with the result that the Giant had been busy for nearly half-an-hour in a sort of domestic badger-hunt. It was natural enough, therefore, that his half-asleep state this next night lent itself to the demonic malignity of Lorm the Dream. Lorm entered the brain of the Cerne Giant with more malignant glee than he had enjoyed for many months between Cad Castle and the twins' house of Morty. The vague dream-landscapes that flitted about in the Giant's brain were exactly to the taste of this devilish newcomer.

"I'll enjoy myself awhile," he thought, "before I make him sit up."

Wicked though he was, Lorm couldn't help a tendency to philosophise now and then, and he now asked himself how it was that, at the beginning of things, individual lives were separated from the life of the whole planet. Lorm remembered very well how, when he was born as the last dream-child in the sleeping heart of the dying Lilith, it had seemed so strange to him that he wasn't the dream of the whole world; strange and weird and monstrous that every beast and bird and fish and reptile and insect should have, each of them, their own individual dreams.

"But I am that I am," he said to himself at last, as he made the Cerne Giant dream of the Space-Monster, with whom he had been talking so quietly when they all fled from the Star which they themselves had created, and returned to Earth.

"And all was as it was, is as it is, and will be as it will be."

XXIX

When Jilly Tewky and Ring, with their boy Malcolm or Mal, together with Ting and John o' Dreams, with their girl Leonora or Nora, had built their wall of Chesil Beach pebbles several feet high round the base of Cad Castle, they were one night considerably disturbed by the sight of the headless trunk of Urk Cad, with a waving trail of blood-coloured smoke issuing from his neck. He was rushing round and round their new circle of pebbles. Curiously enough the little boy and little girl were not scared at all by this. All they did was to keep calling out: "Knock him down, Daddy! Knock him down, Daddy!" while John o' Dreams and Ring Cad could only smile rather weakly at each other.

But of course Jilly and Ting raised their voices also. "Throw on him the Water of Wug," cried Jilly. "Throw on him the Water of Zug," cried Ting. They used these expressions because they had discovered by experience that both the urine of Wug and the urine of Zug had a very deadly effect upon whatever plants they were squirted upon.

It was extraordinary how, during all this time, Jilly Tewky and Ting had been growing closer and closer friends. It was their mutual decision, after many long secret talks together, that they would not have any more children till Malcolm and Leonora were seven or eight years old.

It was a singular coincidence that during these years Lorm the Dream, though quite as wicked as ever, discovered that although he could cause both John o' Dreams and Ring Cad to suffer one nightly terror after another, his appalling power had no effect at all upon either of those two men's wives. Lorm was seized, while the building of this pebble-bank went on so well, with an intense desire to break up this happy association between Cad Castle and Morty. “I must do it through Nezzar Nu,” he thought. “He’s the only one who could make real trouble if I once set him off.”

So on a certain Saturday morning, while the Cerne Giant was following his present habit of spending the hours immediately after breakfast in a long whispered conversation with the Skull at the Bubble and Squeak Fountain, Lorm began moving about in the shifting landscape of Nezzar Nu’s softly pillowed brain with a more definite evil intent than any that had possessed him for a long time. And Nezzar Nu certainly did have an awful dream. He dreamed that Miss Posh, the Rector’s friend, was giving a party to all the women and children she knew. His wife Maria was there, and Auntie Oh was there, together with Ting and Jilly Tewky, and both little Mal and little Nora; and not only these women and children who were his own relatives, but a lot more from out of the village.

In his dream Nezzar Nu saw them all playing blind man’s buff; and to his surprise the blind man was none other than the Rector himself. Then he suddenly became aware that the Rector’s head was changing its shape. It was getting larger and larger every moment! Nezzar Nu watched this appalling sight with terror. What on earth was going to happen to their friend and pastor? Yes! The Rector’s head soon became so enormous that he seemed no longer the man they knew at all. He had become a monstrous being, with the head of an ogre and the rest of him like a skinny dwarf. The next event in this startling and shocking dream was incredible. The ogre-headed Rector, walking on legs as thin as those of a baby-antelope, called upon every woman and every child in the room to come with him, and walked slowly from the rectory into the church, with Miss Posh following him at the head of the procession. Once within the church, this disturbing dream of poor Nezzar’s became still more shocking.

“I’ll larn you to be clergyman,” muttered Lorm with devilish glee, clapping his hands together and skipping and pirouetting like a demon-doll in a puppet show, as he caused this monstrous parody of a dignified cleric to climb up into the pulpit.

At this point in Nezzar Nu’s dream, all the women and children gathered round the pulpit, and stared up at the figure sermonizing them from its height. Nezzar Nu, who was himself among them, soon found himself standing on the top of the first two steps leading up to the preacher above him, and from this point looking down on the upturned faces below. In his dream Nezzar derived a peculiar satisfaction from repeating over and over again the words, “women and children”: for by doing this, he was able to magnify to himself the superiority of all masculine persons. His dream ended in a manner he didn’t altogether like; for the Rector proceeded to remove his now absolutely monstrous head from his shoulders, and deliberately flung it like a football into the hands of his dreamer, who promptly returned it in the same manner, until this little game of head-throwing became so monotonous to Miss Posh that she bundled all the congregation out of the church with such finality that Lorm himself had to leave with them. This, of course, ended the whole dream, of which Lorm had been the fabricator. Miss Posh, however, had become in her later years such an Egeria, or nymph-in-antro, that she hesitated not to address Lorm as she saw him skidaddling.

“What are you?” she asked him.

“I am the maker of dreams,” answered Lorm. “Adam told me I was a son of his first wife Lilith; and I have always wondered, ever since, whether that implied that Lilith was a dream. What do you think?”

“I?” replied Miss Posh sharply. “What do I think? I think you’re the Devil!”

Later, when Laura asked her what Lorm was like, she told her he was a dwarf made of chimney smoke with a head made of smoky candle-flame. Laura, at that, protested vehemently that she'd never seen a smoky candle-flame, but Miss Posh waved this objection aside with a motion of her hand.

"If you haven't," she said, "other people may have," and these words demolished Laura's objection in just the way Miss Posh had often done before; for there was a certain emphasis with which Miss Posh pronounced the familiar words "other people", that always made her interlocutor feel as if he or she had been caught in an outburst of vulgar boasting.

But whatever boasting and whatever horrors this whole scene contained, would have remained unheard, unseen, unfelt, undisplayed, unexplained in the dreaming head of Nezzar Nu, if Lorm had not stirred it up into the man's consciousness. But that was Lorm's life, and whether a dream-hunter or dream-maker or dream-elf like Lorm is an immortal, or whether his destiny is at a certain epoch to be killed or to die a natural death, nobody knows. What is, is, but how long it is what it is, remains one of those insoluble mysteries, which Shakespeare says "are rounded with a sleep."

XXX

The boy Mal, the son of Jilly Tewky, and the girl Nora, the daughter of John o' Dreams, were both six years old when they went along with John and Jilly, and along with Ring and Ting, to try to discover what secret it was that the Cerne Giant was always trying to persuade the Skull, whose Squeak responded so automatically to the bursting of each one of its neighbour's bubbles, to reveal.

"See if you can't get it out of him, children," said John o' Dreams.

"Yes, try, little ones, try!" said Ring. "It can't do any harm for you to try."

"Daddy wants to know," enquired Nora boldly, going up quite close to the Skull and looking it straight in the eyes, for she had so often scrambled about the Fountain that she knew both its inmates better than either of her parents did, "what secret it is that the Cerne Giant is trying to get out of you."

"But, my dear child," replied the Skull gently, "how can I know what's in the Giant's mind? This rock behind my head is full of secrets, secrets that go back to the time when the Druids ruled the land. How can I know which of all the secrets that surround us this Giant of yours wants?"

Malcolm then took his place by the girl's side. "I would know!" he ejaculated proudly. "Yes, I would know!"

"Well, if you know, tell us all!" cried Bubble, as she made one of her most reckless bursts into the air.

Mal thought in silence for a moment. Then he calmly and boldly said: "The Cerne Giant wants to know if it is true that if he went, taking us all with him, to the Tower of London, he would find Queen Boadicea still there?”

“How on earth do you know that, sonny?” enquired Ring in astonishment.

“He told me himself this morning when I took him his early cup of tea.”

“What! Can you carry a tray?” enquired Jilly Tewky, the boy’s mother.

“Certainly I can,” announced her son proudly. “Jessie taught me.”

“Did you tell the Cerne Giant,” enquired John o’ Dreams in a voice trembling with excitement, and appealing directly to the Skull, “whether we should find Boadicea in the Tower of London if he took us all there?”

“Yes,” murmured the Skull quietly, “I told him he would find her there, and I told him it would be much happier for him, as well as for the Queen, if he took you all with him. The Queen has always been fond of young people; and since you will be bringing two children, your visit will delight her. You know where she was born — far up the Icen Way, hundreds and hundreds of miles north of Foghorn. Children very seldom leave their parents, nor do husbands and wives leave theirs, unless there are enemies invading our country. Thus it will be a great occasion for Queen Boadicea to receive this visit from you all. She has no way of learning, locked up as she is by the rulers of this country in the strongest Castle in our land, what is happening between the good and bad inhabitants of this earth, or between the good masses turned to evil or the wicked masses turned to good. Human beings are apt to become wild, mad, desperate hordes of ferocious animals, and the rulers of human beings are apt to become merciless and cruel despots. All this you young people, and your Giant who leads you, must remember as you approach the Tower of London; but you must also remember that, when a great Queen like Boadicea has been imprisoned in a fortress like the Tower for something like a thousand years, and has been separated from the place of her birth by something like a thousand miles, it is impossible to tell what sort of a being she may not have become; perhaps a very ghostly being."

At this point John o' Dreams, wrought up to a pitch of excitement such as he had never known in his life before, cried out in a vibrant voice: "Heaven and Earth! Sun and Moon! Let us go, let us go! Let us go!" And Jilly Tewky cried aloud in a voice more drenched in tears than the waves of the Atlantic breaking on Chesil Beach: "Let us go! Let us go!" Nor did Ring and Ting draw back from joining with their voices the quivering cry: "Let us go! Let us go!"

It may be imagined how the wild excitement of this desperate little group of living creatures was increased by the approach of the Cerne Giant himself.

"Well, children," chuckled the Cerne Giant, "I bet I know to a nicety what you've all decided to do after listening to Master Know-All at this Fountain. So come along! Off we go! Just wait one moment while I tell Laura to tell them at Morty!"

The Giant had such a big stride that it actually was only a minute and three-quarters before he was with them again. "On with us then!" he cried. "I'll carry the two kids!" Nor did either Mal or Nora mind in the least, when the former found himself carried under his right arm, and the latter found herself carried under his left arm. With the Giant carrying the two children, it was sooner than anyone would have considered possible that they all six — John o' Dreams and Jilly Tewky, and Ring and Ting, and Mal and Nora — arrived at the front gate of the Tower.

XXXI

THE GIANT HAD bought a bright green horn as a present for Mal as they passed a town on the way. He also had bought a doll called Bo-Peep for Nora; and now, as they waited at the gate, Bo-Peep was held on Nora's shoulder and Mal blew an echoing blast on his hunting horn. For about three minutes they waited. Then the great gate opened wide, and a couple of tall soldiers, dressed in the uniform of five hundred years ago, ushered them all in and closed the gate behind them.

Neither the children nor Jilly Tewky and Ting seemed in the least alarmed; for when mothers and their children are together, a particular kind of strength and security seems to reach them both from the heart of life itself. Up a narrow winding flight of stone steps they were led, one soldier in front of them and one soldier behind them, with Mal and Nora following Jilly Tewky and preceding Ting. They had to ascend one by one, for the stairs were very narrow, but they were not high, so the children could climb them without having to clamber up on hands and knees.

Finally, they all reached a wide platform with a door at one end of it, and another flight of steps going up still higher at the other end of it.

The soldiers in their imposing uniforms waited till they had all reached the platform. Then one of them stood at the top of the descending stairs, and the other gave three loud knocks with the handle of his sword upon the closed door. As he did this, it was clear to them all that he was measuring with no little apprehension the difference between the size of the door and the size of the Cerne Giant. The door opened at once, and the Giant led them, without too much squeezing of his body, into the room. Then there appeared before them all a very stately room, although with a very low ceiling. Before them was an enormous four-poster bed, and an equally large commode, made of a rare wood that none of them had ever seen before, and adorned with richly gilded ornamentation. At each side of the bed were two beautiful and quite young ladies-in-waiting, and at the foot of the bed was a handsome, intelligent-looking boy, dressed in black from head to foot. With great interest Mal looked at a trumpet the boy held in his hand, and with which he kept going to a window, in a wall clearly about five feet thick, obviously to be ready to blow his trumpet in warning to the guard below in case of any danger to the Queen.

Resting on the bed, her head propped up by a pile of exquisitely coloured pillows, was Queen Boadicea herself. Her features were so handsome and royal, and her dark hair so abundant, that the wrinkles across her forehead and the lines around her hollow cheeks were the only indication that her beauty had lost something of its world-famous youthfulness. Seeing her like this, it was impossible for John o' Dreams, who had a fondness amounting to a mania for the goddesses of ancient Greece, not to think of Hera, the wife of Zeus, whom the Romans called Juno.

All six of them instinctively sank down on their knees, including the Cerne Giant, who had managed, not without difficulty, to squeeze himself through the door of this palatial prison; and they could all see that the sudden appearance of a Giant in her palatial bedroom had considerably impressed the royal prisoner; the Cerne Giant gave expression to the feelings of them all.

"We have come, great Queen," he said, "from the county of Foghorn, through which Icen Way passes in its passage to the North; simply and solely because we have learnt from a being, who lives near a magic Fountain in our neighbourhood called Bubble and Squeak, that no Roman Caesar or Roman Consul or Roman General will ever rule as widely as your descendants are destined to rule. The government of this island of Britain may feel itself justified in imprisoning you, O great Queen, in their fear lest you should supersede them and rule over us in your solitary majesty, but our little group living so near to the Chesil Beach and not far from the grave of King Arthur at Glastonbury, still worship you, great Queen. Our Government may find its justification for its abominable treatment of you in one simple and obvious fact — that while you are alive upon earth, no Roman Caesar, no Roman General, can live without trembling beneath his pontifical and imperial toga, as he thinks how much more worthy you are to rule these British Isles, yes! and to carry the name of them and the voice of them and the manners of them and the laws of them round the whole circle of our planet Earth. My friends, here, O great Queen of us all, have just returned from a voyage through space beyond the furthest visible star, and do you know, O Queen of Queens, what they did there? They were led by an Arch-Druid; and well do you know, great Queen, that none of these modern bishops and pastors and archbishops and cardinals possess a fragment of the spiritual and magical power that one of our Arch-Druids possesses. And what did they do in that far-away Space, great Queen? They made a star out of the soil of this land of yours which they took with them, the very soil from the banks of the Icen Way, as I know well, for I helped them to carry it there; and when, in honour of my help — for my home is called Cerne — they named their new star in outer space Cerne, do you know, great Queen of all of us with the old British blood, what I did, unknown to them, unknown to anyone? I secretly, in my heart, consecrated that furthest star in the universe, dedicated that furthest star in the universe, to thee thyself. Yes, great Queen, imprisoned in the Tower of London, there is one place in the Universe, one star in the universe, that will be known till both the human race and their tossed-about planet, the Earth, have vanished for ever, known by the name that out of the most secret sanctuary of my heart, I bestowed upon it, known by the name of Boadicea!"

The recumbent Queen rose to her feet. Both the young girls held her up. The boy in black with the trumpet rushed to the window. Boadicea had a dagger in her hand; and with the dagger she cut tresses from her dark hair, and beckoning each of her visitors from Foghorn to her feet, gave to each of them a tendril of what she had cut off.

"Now you can go, children" she said quietly, "and this includes you, O my Giant, big child that you are. But remember when you hear those two disputing — for I have more than once stopped on the Icen Way to listen to your Bubble and Squeak — that All is not Nothing, neither is Nothing All, but both of them have one home-star, where they can sink to eternal quiescence, or mount to everlasting activity, and that home-star, my children, is the heart in every one of us. So goodbye, my dears."

After My Fashion (1980)

After My Fashion was first published in 1980 in London by Picador Books, seventeen years after the author's death in 1963. Powys had written the book in either 1919 or 1920, early in his literary career when he was still working as a lecturer. It was his third novel after Wood and Stone (1915) and Rodmoor (1916), both of which had been modestly well-received by critics, but had sold poorly. He sent After My Fashion to American publishers, but they showed no interest and declined to release it. After this initial rejection, Powys appeared to be indifferent to the fate of the novel and made no other attempts at the time or later in his life to have it published.

The plot takes place in rural Sussex in the southeast of England and in Greenwich Village, New York. The protagonist is the poet and literary-critic Richard Storm, who at the beginning of the novel is returning from Paris to his boyhood home in Sussex, after an absence of twenty years. While he was in living in France, Richard had a long-term, tumultuous relationship with a famous and celebrated dancer, Elise Angel. Powys based her character on the renowned pioneer of modern dance, Isadora Duncan, with whom he had a close relationship in the 1910's. The author's depiction of Elise's dancing demonstrates the great admiration and respect he felt towards Duncan's talent and vision and the high regard in which he held dance as an art.

By the time he left the train at Selshurst, and bag and stick in hand started resolutely upon his five mile walk to the village of Littlegate where his family associations lay, Richard had succeeded in thrusting Elise Angel into temporary oblivion. He concentrated his mind, as he followed the little by-street towards the centre of the cathedral city, upon those aspects of his life which were independent of the beautiful dancer.

He had not seen England for some twenty years and the last four out of that twenty had held him captive in a small French town doing unheroic but necessary work at a certain military base. His war record, as he looked back on it now, had been neither especially noble nor especially mean. He had paid the penalty of his lack of heroic impulse by his lack of any particularly dramatic memories.

What he felt now, in regard to so many of his French friends, who were lying dead in their crowded graves, was a deep desire to justify the accident of his own escape by some really adequate contribution to the bitter-sweet cup of the world's hard-wrung wisdom.

Such a contribution in his case could only be in the form wherein he was already a tolerable adept and with a fair reputation. It must in fact be some species of what we call Literature, and his prayer to the gods was that it might prove to be poetry – poetry different altogether, and far more human and original, than the easy charming verses, with a faint fragrance of morbidity, which had so far contented him.

Such reputation as he had already won was rather of the critical than of the creative order and was mostly due to his 'appreciations' of the more modern poets of France; among whom he still numbered the only intimate friends he had, and in whose society he had almost continuously lived through a vividly crowded youth.

Though he had seen comparatively little of its real horror, the war had profoundly affected him; and one of its most noticeable effects was a sudden strange restlessness and a curious dissatisfaction with his Paris life and with his poet-friends.

They had behaved heroically in the deadly struggle, much more heroically than he had himself. And yet, now the thing was over and he was free, he found himself, for some deep reason he could only very crudely analyse, out of touch with them and out of sympathy with them. He had changed, he had most drastically changed; and they – those of them who were left alive – seemed to have become more violently, more dogmatically than ever, their old, fierce, hard, fantastic, hedonistic selves.

What he, Richard Storm, was really ‘after’ now, what he was in search of, what he actually wanted to express, in this new poetry he intended to write, he himself could hardly have said. But whatever it was, it was something that, even in its cloudy and embryonic fumblings after a living identity, was strong enough to break up and shatter to bits his contentment with his previous existence.

The hard, clear-cut, artificial fragilities of his French friends seemed only to fret and tease him now. A certain craving for air, for space, for large and flowing movements, for unbounded horizons, had suddenly come upon him and had ruined the peace of his days as he returned to his old haunts. He found himself weary of his old critical subtleties. Some queer unexpected stirring in his soul seemed driving him forth into a world larger and more onward-looking, if less clear cut and complete, than the one he had dwelt in contentedly for so long.

He found himself trying to visualize Russia and the exciting world-shaking experiments there; and it was as if he were gazing into some turbulent cosmic workshop where the world-gods, in heat and sweat and dust and smoke, were hammering out a new groove for the great wheel.

Elise had certainly upset his old life – the war and Elise! Those two together had taken him by the hair of his head and pulled him up by the very roots out of his old pastures.

He had run away from Paris without a single day of farewells. Never before in his life had he fled from an adventure. Well! he must not think of that any more; not any more; lest he curse himself as a cowardly fool. Ah, those eyes, those hands, that unequalled woman's body! Was it really some actual Socratic demon that had snatched him away from her and hurled him into the train for Havre just when his chances with her were at their hopefullest?

As he made his way now through the leafy purlieus of Selshurst Cathedral that tantalizing figure hovered maddeningly before him. It mingled with the green moss and with the ancient ivy of the episcopal garden wall; and it interfered with his delight in those pleasant places and with the thrill of remembering that it was here that Keats must have composed his fragmentary 'Eve of St Mark'.

It was strange that he had not a living relative in England; nor any friend beyond mere acquaintanceship. All his emotional as well as all his professional entanglements had been associated with Paris; and Paris at this moment, with the weight of memories it contained, was reduced to the dimensions of one solitary figure, dancing on an empty stage against black curtains!

His own parents had been long dead; dead years before the war; and it was only the knowledge that his father's parents – the old Benjamin and the old Susanna – lay buried at Littlegate, that had induced him in his craving for some foothold in his native land, to make his way into these Sussex fields.

He did not enter the cathedral, though he saw one of. its cool cavernous doors wide open. He felt the need of rapid movement and the need of a completer solitude.

He hesitated for a moment between two rival tea shops which faced one another across the narrow street. But there were cheerful citizens of Selshurst drinking tea in both of them, and he continued on his way. Finally he obtained a glass of milk in a tiny dairy shop in the outskirts of the town, upon the polished counter of which stood an enormous china cow and a glass full of buttercups.

Directed by a voluble signpost at the first crossroads to the north of the little city, a signpost that seemed to have room for every village on the sea-side of the Downs, he found his road speedily narrowing into a most agreeable country lane between high hedges white with hawthorn.

For two miles he followed this lane, getting constant glimpses of light-foliaged woods in front of him, of upward-sloping parklands and, above these, of the naked crest of the Downs, mistily blue through the mid-May haze.

At last, a little tired and heated by rapid walking, he climbed over a gate into a small field shadowed by oaks and put up for hay and, sinking down among buttercups and clover, he set himself to take stock of his surroundings.

The spire of the cathedral rose nobly out of the pasture lands, the vaguely outlined roofs of the city beneath it mingling with trees and hedgerows so as almost to efface themselves. The broad meadows stretched away, flat and monotonous, in one unbroken level of living greenness until they reached the edge of the sea. Storm was not high enough up yet to get a glimpse of the water. The sea's edge from where he lay was dimly marked by a sudden arrest of that flowing stream of leafiness, an arrest which took place before the natural horizon could have been reached; the sea-banks being further indicated by the isolated look of individual objects, such as windmills, gates and solitary trees, presenting that peculiar suggestion of an unbounded expanse behind them which dwellers by that particular portion of the English Channel come to know so well.

As Storm stretched himself out on the cool grass, with the constant scent of the clover in his nostrils and the far-blown gusts of bitter-sweet fragrance from the May-bushes coming and going on the light wind, he felt a deep thrill of pure delight to be once more in the land of his own people.

He found himself instinctively offering up a votive prayer to the souls of the dead, and the souls of the maimed and blighted, who had thrown their breathing, vibrating, passionate youthful bodies between the cruel engines of the invader and this fair country.

As a philosopher he was well aware of the sinister ambiguities of most patriotic moods, but something subconscious and very deep in him drove philosophy away at that moment. Whatever might be the responsibilities of rulers and governments, he felt a thrill of plain gratitude in that hour to those who had suffered so incredibly that these fields might remain as they had remained since the waves of the sea receded from the face of the land.

Philosophy might whisper that it was not the tillers of these pastures who got the good of them or who gained most from this great escape; but into that matter our returned wanderer had no intention of entering on this pleasant afternoon. English labourers, English farmers, English squires, English shopkeepers, English tramps, he was prepared to rejoice with them all, that they could renew their private and particular controversies in profound peace! Might the fathomless Unknown be propitious, that those who had endured so much for the sake of the future should not be altogether forgotten and betrayed by those who lived on!

The sweetness of his mid-May afternoon in these incomparable fields sank so deeply into Storm's soul that he never afterwards quite forgot that walk to Littlegate.

It returned upon him with all its strangely mingled impressions, again and again in later days; and it always returned with a kind of symbolic value.

The remaining three miles of his road were taken more leisurely. He stopped frequently to listen to the birds. He lingered over the fast fading hedge plants of the earlier spring, such as celandines and cuckoo-flowers. He clambered down a steep bank to the margin of a slimy pond to touch with his fingers the cold wet roots of the water ranunculus. He waited long for the reappearance of two swift-winged butterflies, marvellous specimens of the Red Admiral species, who floated over the hedge making love to each other.

Advancing thus slowly it was after six o'clock when he arrived at the hamlet of Littlegate and made his way to the churchyard.

Littlegate church was one of those typical smaller Sussex churches, looking as if it had been made out of the fabric of some huge barn, with the little squat erection, half-tower, half-spire, like an extinguisher upon an extinguished candle, plumped down upon its. west end.

In place of yew trees there were two tall ilexes on each side of the graveyard; and, in the field adjoining it, stood four or five enormous sycamores which added as much perhaps to the monumental dignity of the scene as did the roof of the church. It was certainly the roof of the church, high-tilted and sweeping down almost to the ground, that gave the building its character. It was covered with brilliant orange lichen, and Richard thought he had never seen so imposing a roof except upon certain great barns in the north of France.

He was surprised at the smallness of the village and found himself regretting that he had not secured a room for the night in some Selshurst inn. There was evidently no inn of any kind in the hamlet of Littlegate. There was nothing that he could see from where he stood at the church porch except a rambling old farmhouse, a row of ancient cottages facing a still more ancient-looking pond, and a small, neat, nondescript dwelling, which he assumed to be the old parsonage of the place adapted to modern ideas of cleanliness and light.

He promptly made up his mind that it was in that particular house, behind the churchyard wall, that his father had been born and had spent his childhood.

It looked a charming place now but, for all Richard knew, it might have been altered out of all recognition. It might be a completely new vicarage. He found himself without rhyme or reason suddenly prejudiced against the present incumbent of his grandfather's living, and he gazed at the top of that wall, over which a spray of red roses was waving in the wind, with something bordering upon hostility.

He moved hastily around the church, surveying it from every quarter, and then began searching among the graves for Benjamin and Susanna.

He soon found the place. The old people's headstone was still legible enough after its fifty years of Sussex rains and frosts and Richard, mechanically removing his hat, as he had got into the habit of doing among the too crowded cemeteries of Catholic France, read without any cynical afterthought the unquestioning assurance of the pious epitaph. Over his head, as he bent above the grave, the long shadow of the little squat tower fell upon the uncut grass and upon the oblong mounds new and old. Above the tower rose the golden weathervane, pointing now towards the east; and above the weathercock darted the great swifts on their clean-cutting, sharply curved wings, as they had done since the day in King Stephen's reign when the place had been consecrated.

All at once Richard Storm became aware that he was not alone. His pious vigil was being shrewdly and shamelessly observed from a sunny nook under the mossy wall between two upright tombstones. Richard hastily put on his hat and shot an angry glance at the intruder.

A rubicund, quizzical eyed young man he appeared to be, the sleeve of his right arm hanging empty, his left hand holding a paint brush. By his side was a small easel; and on the grass at his feet a cup of water and a palette. He was evidently sketching the church.

Instead of looking away when Richard frowned at him, the young man laid down his brush, threw back his head till it rested upon the surface of the wall, gave a queer little jerk with his shoulder to the stump of his missing arm, and stared at the wayfarer with a fixed and rather supercilious smile.

Confound the fellow! thought Richard. Why the devil can't he go on with his silly picture? Does he want me to go over there and admire it? To indicate how little interest he took in this arrogant young man's proceedings he turned sharply on his heel and entered the church. When he had carefully closed the heavy door behind him, he obeyed an irresistible impulse and shot the gigantic iron bolt, barring himself in. The coolness of the interior was quite a shock after the hot sunshine; and for a moment the place seemed dark and tomb-like.

As with regard to the outside of the building the great sloping orange-coloured roof was the dominant feature, so with regard to the interior of it what held a stranger's attention, to the exclusion of all other interest, was the ponderous Norman arch dividing the small nave from the diminutive chancel.

Apart from this arch, huge, elaborately carved, weighty with historic sećrets, the rest of the church seemed meaningless and without character. The arch dwarfed the pillars, took all dignity away from the windows, and seemed to be endeavouring to draw to itself the natural human piety that would pass it by and press forward towards the simply furnished altar.

The arch seemed to be upholding the barn-like roof above it with a kind of stolid confederacy, as if between these two half-heathen things there existed a dumb conspiracy to substitute some other, earlier worship, for the one that had raised that quiet silver cross and had set in order those unlit candles.

Richard Storm vaguely recalled the fact that out of all England the land of the South Saxons was the last to be converted to Christ.

Half-oblivious to what he did and under the influence of French customs he looked about for some small observance, some slight offering of respect, that remained to be paid to the quiet souls of his dead.

Half-atheist, half-superstitious as his mind had become, among those passionately pagan and passionately medieval friends of his, it seemed to him a bad omen to leave the place his father's father had served as priest without some act of filial devotion. To kneel, to pray – anyone might do that! He felt a desire for some more objective, more symbolic act. He hesitated for a moment, leaning against the great arch. Then with a glance backwards at the bolted door and a hurried genuflexion he advanced boldly up to the altar, and, striking a match, lit the two candles on either side of the cross.

It took a little time for the two small flames to burn upwards, clear and unflickering, above their pedestals of wax, but when they were well alight, he moved away down the aisle without any further obeisance and ensconced himself in a remote seat under the tower. A single bell-rope hung down above him through a hole in the roof and a long quivering shaft of sunlight, heavy with golden motes, fell upon the floor in front of him.

Between the candles on the altar and this heathen finger of the setting sun obtruded from beyond the planet's edge, the Norman arch in the centre of the church gathered darkness round it and became itself a thing of darkness.

Richard Storm stretched his legs out in front of him, clasped his hands behind his head and sat motionless, staring at the shaft of light and at the candles.

Suddenly the light faded. The darkness about the arch moved instantly to where he sat and embraced him. The candles on the altar were no longer little pyramids of palpable colour. They became flickering points of flame. The wanderer's thoughts concentrated themselves on the old dead people from the accident of whose remote encounter – Benjamin Storm with Susanna Talbot – his own appearance in the world at all, the son of his father who was the son of his father, so absolutely depended!

A strange sense came over him of the continuity of the generations and their fatal sequence; and under the power of that feeling he felt the unrolling of the long scroll of his days upon earth as he had never felt it before. Things that had been of primary importance to him, vivid passions, fierce infatuations, savage quarrels, seemed now to fade into complete insignificance, even as the sunset shaft had faded, and to leave him in the presence of deeper, older, more earth-rooted things.

A craving stirred within him to find expression, expression that he and others, bewildered and chance-driven as himself, might hold to and live by, for this mysterious undertone of the earth's gathered experience, moving through generation after generation of human subconsciousness and binding the ages together.

Those little flickering candle flames at which he stared seemed a signal to him that he in his turn had to wrestle with the Figure made of darkness and the shadow of death, until he or It cried ‘hold, enough!’ And what he felt most clearly just then was that the secret the clue, the sign – whatever it might be – of the thing which lay hidden under the phantasmagoria of life was something that was less involved, less connected, less fatally mixed up, with the evil and the good and the sweet and the bitter, than in the pell-mell of existence one was apt to hold.

What he felt at that moment was a profound craving to put into such magical words that nothing could destroy them the idea that there was some ultimate vision of things that could be reached by humanity, from the ground of which one was saved both from fear and remorse and from the fret and the fever of this perpetual choice and rejection.

He was startled out of his meditations by a sudden unexpected creaking of woodwork somewhere in the church. At first he fancied it was just that automatic relaxing of some old bench or board which one often may hear in a hollow-echoing place where the slightest sound is distinct. It ceased as suddenly as it had come. But a second afterwards it recommenced. This time he leapt to his feet and realized what it must be. It must be the secretive steps of some light-footed person trying to descend unnoticed from the organ loft. His entrance into the building had evidently surprised and caught some organ player who being reluctant to play to an unknown auditor was endeavouring to slip out of the church unobserved.

Richard moved hurriedly up the aisle, went to the altar and blew out the two candles. Then returning to the shelter of the great chancel arch he paused and waited, in as indifferent and negligent a pose as he could assume, for the emergence of this shy prisoner.

He could not help smiling to himself rather mischievously when he remembered the enormously stiff and heavy bolt he had drawn across the door. But perhaps this embarrassed organ-player possessed the key to some other exit. He seemed to have alarmed the invisible one into petrified stillness by his expectant attitude. Evidently the idea in the prisoner’s mind was that this lighter of candles would leave the church at once now that his little ceremony was concluded. It gave Richard quite a quaint and pleasing sensation to think that he had bolted himself in with a mysterious unknown who was now too shy to appear. ‘It must be a girl,’ he said to himself.

The footsteps became suddenly impetuous and daring. The final stages of the descent were accomplished in something resembling a precipitous rush to escape; and a slender feminine figure emerged into view. With the quickest possible glance at Richard as he stood motionless under the arch, she slipped away down the aisle. She’ll never move that bar, he thought, remembering the violent force with which he had run it through its rusty groove.

He was quite right. She was unable to make the thing stir an inch.

He recognized that it was incumbent upon him to open it for her and he moved down the aisle feeling as if he were going to let loose a bird or a butterfly that might hurt itself by its blind beatings against the obstacle.

She heard his steps behind her and turned round. ‘Allow me to do it,’ he said and moved to her side. But before he had touched the bolt there came a violent rattling and shaking of the door from the outside.

With an irresistible movement of contrariness he drew back, and the girl and he stared at one another in a sort of confederacy of hesitation. Then she smiled with the frank amusement of youth at the incongruity of the situation. ‘Someone wants to get in,’ remarked the girl. He looked into her eyes and realized how full of mischievous amusement she had become. It was clear too that she liked the look of her unwitting captor. She suddenly became grave and moved a few paces away from the bolted door. They stared at one another with renewed interest. Then, with a quick nervous little gesture she rested her bare hand on the edge of the font. ‘I saw you light those candles,’ she whispered. ‘I wanted you to do something.’ He now found his voice. He thought to himself, If she had said nothing about the candles it would have been better. Why must women always say something about things like that? But aloud he said, ‘I thought I was quite alone. How did you know I wanted to do something?’

Then she smiled at him from under her broad-brimmed hat so sweetly and so sadly that he changed his mind in a moment and was glad she had spoken. ‘I knew,’ she murmured. ‘I knew you were thinking of the war.’ He hadn’t of course been thinking of the war at all; and yet, in a very profound sense, he had been. The whole thing was ‘the war’ and the peace after ‘the war’ again! Like the shooting of a shuttle or like the darting of a fish his mind moved up and down all the vistas of confusion and misery that filled the world. Something in this girl’s gravity as she looked at him brought vividly to his mind many things he had forgotten. ‘The war can never really end,’ he found himself muttering.

His companion frowned a little, in an obvious youthful effort to say something that did not sound silly.

‘Well! This is beautiful weather anyhow,’ she remarked, ‘and on days like this one oughtn’t to think too sadly of things. It seems an insult to the happiness that is left. I mean to the happy people that are left.’ And she coloured a little as if aware that her remark lacked weight.

Richard's mind once more became critical of her. Why do women mince their words so? he thought; and why are they so devilishly self-conscious?

'You're a stranger to Littlegate?' she said. 'It really is a lovely village, quite worth seeing.'

She knows I thought her a little prig just now, Richard's critical demon whispered. How sharp they are, the minxes!

But the girl had caught sight of his travelling-bag covered with foreign labels. 'Have you far to go tonight?' she asked, speaking with a direct almost maternal concern and in a new tone.

'I really don't know,' he muttered rather awkwardly.

'Because,' she went on, 'you strike me as the kind of person who wants looking after.'

'Do I?' he answered quietly. 'Well, perhaps I do,' he added smiling at her; but his secret thoughts ransacked that remark of hers and combed it out. They can only be natural when they are fussing over you or being fussed over – everything else is 'showing off'.

They were standing opposite each other now, she waiting for him to say goodbye, and he scrutinizing her with an intent concentration. Suddenly an unaccountable wave of tenderness towards all these self-conscious, secretive, evasive, fragile, tenacious beings, who were so invariably 'up to some game' and yet were so inevitably betrayed by something or other – by Nature perhaps – that was 'up' to some still deeper game with them, took possession of him and disarmed him. The curious awkwardness and embarrassment which they both seemed aware of in the presence of that bolted door became a sort of palpable 'third presence' linking them together. At that moment the door was once more violently shaken from outside.

The girl instinctively drew away from him; and an odd sense of having been caught in some humorous predicament passed in a quick wave from one to the other.

Then she smiled mischievously and gaily. ‘I’ve half a mind not to open it, she whispered.’ ‘How silly of him to make that noise!’ Richard laid his hand on the bolt but did not draw it. ‘Is it your brother?’ he asked abruptly. The question seemed to change her in a moment from a discreet self-contained young woman into a naughty little girl.

Storm got a faint impression that she actually put out her tongue. She certainly suppressed an inclination to burst into peals of laughter.

‘My brother? Good Heavens, no! It’s Robert. It’s Mr Canyot. He’s so fussy and funny. He probably thinks you are murdering me in here. Oh, I would love to give him a tremendous fright! Do you think it would be too wicked if I were to scream or something?’

There was enough light left in the church for the violent protest on Richard’s face at this suggestion to throw her into a fit of convulsive merriment. She shook with suppressed laughter and leaned against the font to recover her breath. She finally gasped, ‘I’m not often as silly as this. It’s so funny though. You don’t know how funny it is. You don’t know Mr Canyot!’

Richard under his breath gave Mr Canyot to the devil. ‘But I think I do,’ he said. ‘Wasn’t he sketching out there? He frightened me into the church. He didn’t seem a very friendly youth.’

She had recovered herself now – ‘Oh he’s all right!’ she said, ‘with a slight annoyance in her tone at having revealed too much to a stranger. Open the door, will you, please.’ And then before he could obey her she held out her hand. ‘I am Nelly Moreton,’ she explained gravely. ‘My father’s the vicar here.’ Storm was pleased with her for this explanation and still more pleased by something trusting and confiding in the way she gave him her hand, the whole of her hand, not just the clammy tips of lethargic fingers. Indeed he was so pleased with this gesture of hers, and the frank look that accompanied it, that he found himself pushing back the bolt and opening the door before it occurred to him to return her courtesy by revealing to her his name. They were met on the threshold of the porch by the indignant Mr Canyot. ‘It’s too bad of you to give a person such shocks,’ he began severely. Then he looked Richard up and down. ‘Excuse me, sir,’ he said, ‘but how was I to know that you knew – ah! – the ropes, as one might say.’ He paused again as if to emphasize his displeasure. ‘I mean Miss Moreton,’ he added sternly.

‘Really Mr Canyot,’ protested the lady, ‘you mustn’t mean me when you talk about “ropes”. This gentleman hadn’t till a moment ago the least notion who I was.’ She glanced whimsically at Storm. ‘I don’t know your name yet – this is Mr Robert Canyot, our Sussex Painter.’

Richard muttered the syllable ‘Storm’ and bowed to the young man. ‘I must be making my way back to Selshurst, I expect, if I am to find a room. I had a vague notion that there might be an inn here. That’s why I brought this with me.’ He indicated his bag.

‘Oh I’m sure you’ll find a room all right – in Selshurst,’ Mr Canyot earnestly remarked. ‘There’s the White Hart and the Blue Pig and the King George and the George and Dragon. The one I’d try first, though, is the Richmond Arms. But it would be well to get in before eight, anyhow; or you might have difficulty about your dinner.’ Saying this, Mr Canyot considerately pulled out his watch.

‘What is the time?’ inquired the vicar’s daughter putting her hand on the artist’s wrist and looking at the watch he had produced. ‘Why it’s twenty minutes to nine! Father must be awfully late or he’d have come to fetch me.

I'm afraid we must say goodbye, Mr Storm. And you too, Robert, I'm sure it's past Mrs Winsome's suppertime.' She turned quickly to the wayfarer from France. 'Mr Canyot is stopping at the farm,' she said, 'but I'm afraid there is no inn in Littlegate. So do try the Richmond Arms; and be sure you make them give you something decent to eat.'

Again she tendered him that frank confiding handshake. 'If you stay longer you must come and call on my father. He can tell you everything there is to be told about this part of the country.'

'I don't quite know what I am going to do,' Richard replied cautiously. 'It depends upon – many things.' He nodded to Mr Canyot and turned slowly away, not however without receiving a look from the girl's eyes which a little startled him.

What was it? he thought as he made his way slowly back towards Selshurst through the long twilight, the evening sounds and scents stirring old memories in him that drifted away over the fields and were lost too quickly. What was it that her look meant?

He was too far-sunken in the faint sweetness of the place and the hour to laugh at himself – he, the runaway from the world-famed dancer – for his sentimental interest in this young person. Not one sardonic leer from the deadly critic within him rose to the surface to spoil his orgy of delicate dreams. He let his mind wander at large and as it pleased over the strangeness of the quick mysterious rapport which had risen between them.

What was it that that parting look meant? It seemed to have something in it of a definite appeal, of a definite call for help. But the girl's life appeared serene enough, all that he had seen of it. Was there something odd about the Reverend Moreton? Was that insolent young coxcomb of an artist teasing her, persecuting her – and the father, perhaps half-crazy or a drunkard, aiding and abetting him?

He leaned over a gate and stared at the thousands of sleeping buttercups and at the white hedge parsley. What absurd nonsense it was, to turn an accident like that, a mere chance encounter, into something worthy of serious analysis! What did it matter to him if the girl was unhappy? He had not escaped from Elise Angel to act the Don Quixote through the villages of Sussex. Let her play her organ to stray visitors! Let her marry the great Canyot!

He pursued his road at a quicker pace and before long came to a footpath which evidently led straight into the city. There were one or two town lights already visible; and with the deepening of the twilight the great meadows which surrounded the place were already covered by a filmy sea of thin whitish mist.

Drinking in, as he made his way through the wet grass, a hundred subtle fragrances, each one of which carried his mind back to the remote past, the wanderer felt that, however England might have changed, something essential in it, something that belonged both to the earth and the race, remained unchangeable and secure. The home of one's people! There must, he began to think, be some sort of intangible emanation proceeding from that which, more than any ritual, had the power to call one's mind back to its lost rhythm, to its broken balance. Too long, he decided, had he occupied himself with questions of technique, with problems of style. The work which he would do now, the poetry he would write, should primarily concern itselt with some definite vision of things that should be left to evoke its own method of expression, its own music, in accordance with the intensity of its accumulative purpose. And to some such vision of things he began to feel himself distinctly led, as the warm May night poured its magic through him.

Yes! he must bury fathoms deep, the dangerous lure of that perfect skin, ‘like cruel white satin’ as one of his poet friends had written of her. He must bury ‘deeper than did ever plummet sound’ the memory of that entrancing figure ‘as of a bassarid in the woods of Thessaly’.

One thing at least, he thought to himself, as he made his way along the edge of an ancient wall covered with a tangle of early yellow roses that brushed, cool and wet, against his face and showed ghost-white in the dusk, one thing Elise Angel had done for him; she had blotted out and obliterated all his earlier complications. How faint and dim she had made them – as dim as these shadowy roses – those Mathildes and Maries of his earlier Paris life!

He shuddered with fearful relief when he thought how nearly he had come to the point of actually marrying La Petite Charmille because Raymond de la Tailhede told him he had treated her badly! Well! he was clear of all that now, clear and free, and he had no intention of permitting the weakness of remorse to poison the good blood of his new intention.

The streets of Selshurst were all lit up when he finally stood before the entrance of the hostelry he fancied the most. It was neither the George and Dragon nor the Richmond Arms but a quiet and clean little place, in the city’s main thoroughfare, laconically entitled the Crown.

It appeared he had chosen with a wise instinct. He was allotted a charming and beautifully neat room looking out upon a well-kept kitchen garden, the scent of whose aromatic herbs floated deliciously in as soon as he opened the window.

A filmy mist, wavering and undulating as it moved up from the sea-ward meadows, rolled, like some aerial phantom river, round the old walls and the high garden trees; and through the fluctuations of this mist Richard could discern as he leaned out of his window, hushed and still in the scented night, the shadowy bulk of the cathedral and its majestic spire.

The landlady of the Crown and her buxom barmaid seemed prepared to contendwith each other in making their visitor comfortable; and it was not long before he was seated in the private back parlour before an admirable supper heartened by as large a quantity of before-the-war wine as he cared to consume.

Wine immoderately imbibed may become, as Panurge informs us, a powerful sedative to the erotic madness. But wine moderately enjoyed – and Richard was habitually temperate in these things – has a different effect. Thus it turned out that in spite of his ascetic resolutions it was difficult, when once more at his open window he smoked cigarette after cigarette into the quiet night, to keep that fatal image 'like a Bacchanal on a Grecian urn' drowned in the oblivion he had laid upon her.

She rose out of the white mists of the aromatic garden beneath him. She stretched out her arms towards him. She came nearer and nearer to the window. With a face more haggard and much older than his face had been all that day, he struggled to bury her again and to recover the new purpose of his life; but the struggle was not an easy one; and he smiled grimly to himself, as stretched in bed he inhaled the garden smells and listened to the chiming of some nearby clock tower, to think what simple prayers, for his escape from the wiles of Satan, the old Benjamin and the old Susanna would have raised at that juncture.

After all, he thought, the more complicated pattern of our modern days has not liberated us from the old accursed duality. Will the balance, the rhythm, the lovely poise of things, never be obtained by luckless humanity, torn and divided between the two natures?

In his case, that May night, it was the hand of sleep, not of philosophy, that closed the debate; and though the soft eyes that followed him through his dreams were the eyes of Nelly Moreton, the form that drew him towards itself through the entangling ways of a land whose mountaintops were covered with meadow flowers was not the modest form of the daughter of the Vicar of Littlegate.

Chapter 2

AS HE SAT at breakfast in the front room of the Crown, watching, between a great bowl of cowslips and a tall vase of bluebells, the pleasant sun-bathed traffic of the main Selshurst street, it presented itself rather forcibly to his mind that he had not made the remotest kind of plan for his future. He had just run away; and that summed the whole thing up. Had he, in the treacherous way the human mind works, secretly avoided making any plans, with a subconscious hope that no plans would be necessary; but that Satan, with the lure of that skin 'softer than sleep', would draw him back again?

Well! It shouldn't draw him back! He was resolved firmly upon that. The freshness of the morning, the vase of bluebells, with two ungainly stalks of pink-campion evidently thrust in by childish hands, the pleasant rustic voices of loiterers outside the door, and all the cheerful stir of the placid town, helped him to hold tight to his renewed purpose.

He would 'dig himself in' in English soil and write such poetry as would really satisfy the stern Arbiter whose hidden purpose, whatever it was, had kept him alive while so many better men had fallen.

He had not even left an address behind in France. The lean concierge from Auvergne who looked after the rooms in the Rue de Vaugirard had orders to retain his correspondence till he sent for it.

The question immediately to be decided, then, was where should he settle so to be sure of tolerably harmonious surroundings wherein to work?

It would be quite pleasant to remain precisely where he was, ensconced at the Crown Inn, Selshurst. And yet for some secret reason he didn't feel altogether satisfied with this project. Superficially he explained to himself this reluctance, to interview the landlady at once on the matter, on grounds quite remote from the real one which lay all the while hidden in the depths of his consciousness. He explained it to himself as a scruple of economic prudence, lest the woman should persuade him into some hasty agreement which second thoughts might wish to revoke; but, in reality, lurking in that remote portion of the mind where actual decisions are made, was a sort of shadowy signpost pointing to the hamlet of Littlegate.

Moved as much by an instinctive tendency to put off such decisions as long as possible as by a traveller’s natural curiosity he spent a leisurely golden morning wandering about the streets and passages of the old town. He wandered in and out of the cathedral. He loitered in the cloisters. He leaned against the mossy posts of the old iron railings behind which the smooth-cut grass of the close showed green as a velvet altar cloth, covering the ashes of a thousand years. He listened to the cawing of rooks in the dark tops of immense elm trees. He surveyed with delight the impenetrable quietude, exhaling an atmosphere of refined serenity comparable to certain passages in the English Prayer Book, of the great red-brick Georgian houses, with their polished door-knockers and high- walled gardens, mellow and rare like the fragrance of old wine.

Fortunate people, he thought, those aged ecclesiastics who brooded on choice Latinity and high divinity behind those rose- tangled windows! Theirs was a life, he supposed, in which the sting of mortal trouble was reduced to the minimum point, consistent with the calamity of being alive at all on this harassed earth!

Instead of returning to his inn he lunched luxuriously in a little tea shop close to the cathedral gates; and here, as he drank cup after cup of beautifully made tea, and watched the indolent unhurried people chatting together in the sunshine and going in and out of the trim shops, he felt that there was, after all, a certain genius for sheer contentment in the race that had its place, say what one might, in any wise scheme of existence.

For it was not that all this material well-being was a superficial thing. It had endured, with its exclusive neatness and trimness and cleanliness, many strange blows and shocks from the hand of fate – this final ‘great war’ only the latest of such disasters – and had endured them cheerfully. There was a look, especially in the eyes of the elder women, even when they were lightly chatting to each other, that suggested that this refined-upon maturity, like time’s own polish upon very old and very solid furniture, was not a thing obtained without sacrifice and cost.

He had noted and relished deeply the passionate feeling for intellectualized beauty, for lucid and lovely organization, in his adopted French home, but that could exist – he had found often to his wondering surprise – side by side with curious lapses from instinctive daintiness and delicacy.

Here, in this English country-town there was a meticulous cleanliness and neatness showing itself in a thousand charming ways, from the aprons of the little girls to the wheels of the farmers wagons.

And it was all so deep-rooted and instinctive, so unconscious and taken-for-granted! It was not, it seemed to him, as he drank his fifth cup of tea and nibbled his fifth ‘halfpenny’ bun, any sort of conscious art-impulse that had produced it in those simple, self-centred, humorously wily men and those cheerful, secretive, patient women. It was a kind of immemorial moral code, touched here and there with a faint tincture of religious unction, like the half-mechanical performance of some very old ritual.

He went out into the street in extraordinarily good spirits. The shiny-faced young woman to whom he tendered payment had looked at him with that quick indescribable look, full of innocent subtleties, with which the simplest maiden can enchant and disarm a philosopher.

He stepped into one of those small tobacconist shops that display among their glossy pipes and smoking-materials such a vast assortment of dignified walking sticks as would supply all the elderly beaux of England with the insignia of retired leisure.

Emerging, still more well-pleased from this repository of epicurism, fortified with an immense number of cigarettes and a second entrancing smile, Richard seated himself upon a comfortable bench, just within the precincts, and gave himself up to meditation.

A queer mood of languid and drowsy indifference came upon him, as the hot sun warmed his limbs and the voices of children ebbed and flowed. It seemed to him as though nothing in the world greatly mattered so long as quiet harmless people could go about their affairs, undisturbed by official arrogance and unvexed by words of command.

The very secret of English life, a thing not of politics or economics, but of the obstinate right of every Englishman to meditate upon his own sensations in reserved isolation, took possession of him and gave to the brooding voices of the doves, hidden away among the trees of the dean’s garden, a symbolic significance.

By slow degrees, as he sat there, the encroaching spell of sheer physical well-being, emanating from every object within sight, covered him with a kind of pleasant cloud of leafy vegetable contentment.

He smoked and nodded. He nodded and dreamed. And over his head the rooks went by and the elm trees faintly stirred in the warm wind and a hidden clock from somewhere, with a voice that might have been the voice of generations of dead bishops, chimed the slowly moving quarters.

His relaxed and drowsed nerves, freed from the feverish tension of his Paris life, responded to some profound atavistic appeal in that soil, that air, that sun-bathed masonry, those silent tree trunks.

He dimly regretted the fierce passion of his struggles to articulate and intellectualize his life. Why should he articulate anything, or analyse anything, when it was possible to let his soul sink peacefully into the being of these old calm eternal things, until it became a portion of them and lived their life, large-flowing, placid, deep- ruminating, unruffled, content?

In the process of these thoughts, Richard’s eyes found themselves negligently fixed upon a remote untraversed grass-plot, surrounded by smaller houses, lying a little back of the main cathedral close. Little by little he became aware that the stream of his meditation was flowing over some hard, resistant and hostile object that disturbed its smooth current like a sharp rock.

At last there came to him the sudden jerking consciousness that he was looking at a familiar figure seated before an easel. Yes! even at that distance the empty sleeve was visible. But what brought his mind into a different focus with a yet more violent jerk was the sight of a slim flexible figure in a thin summer dress bending over the artist’s shoulder and watching every stroke of his brush.

The observing demon in Richard’s brain did not fail to prod him into recording the fact that the sight of his little new acquaintance completely destroyed the drowsy trance of the preceding hour.

He got up and began walking slowly, and with all the negligence he could assume, towards the pair.

As he moved, his heart beating a little more quickly than usual, and his head turned rather ostentatiously towards the cathedral, that same mocking demon in his brain kept whispering to him the sardonic comment that the only cure for the mania for one woman was another woman. ‘You are making the most of this organ maid,’ whispered the voice, ‘because you know well that with all your fine resolutions your heart is still in the Théâtre des Arts.’

But even below this demon voice yet another interior commentator made itself audible. This second mental imp challenged the sincerity of the first one and protested that what Richard was really trying to evade was the shameful confession that he was just simply a fickle philanderer who, while more dangerous sport was renounced, made the best of safer pleasures.

Richard himself found it difficult enough as he rather nervously ‘stalked’, so to speak, the ‘position’ of his acquaintances to give an adequate answer to either of these voices. What he actually achieved, before he greeted her, was a rapid association of this friendly child with his vaguely outlined poetic impulse.

She seemed, in the quietness of her conscious reserve and the steadiness of her look, to be in some secret ‘rapport’ with the vision of things towards which he was groping.

There was an unpleasant moment of embarrassed approach across that secluded grass-plot while the girl hurriedly pointed him out to her artist companion. But she came with a quick eager step to meet him and he felt sure there was no dissimulation in her unconcealed friendliness.

Robert Canyot rose to his feet, removed his hat with his left hand and sat down again.

Nelly lifted her eyebrows with an imperceptible little grimace and a faint shrug of her shoulders, as though to indicate that the hopeless naïveté of men passed the limit of comprehension.

‘Are you interested in painting?’ she said, turning to Storm with an unmistakable appeal to him to be sensible and tactful.

‘He won’t be interested in my painting,’ remarked Mr Canyot, ‘if he’s been long in France.’

There lurked in this speech a double implication; that the French in general were crazy fanatics and that Storm in particular was a priggish dilettante primed with the latest aesthetic pose.

Having thrown out this remark Mr Canyot went on applying colour to his canvas with the sort of self-satisfied indifference with which a competent builder might regard an amateur architect.

Richard longed to give the fellow’s complacency some kind of a shock; but when he looked at the picture on the easel he was startled to observe that there were real signs there of a noticeable originality. The style of the thing appealed to him. He knew enough of the studios to know that this was not ordinary work. The man was clearly no fool at his job.

‘I like the way you’ve gone straight to the atmosphere of the place,’ he found himself saying. ‘It isn’t the cathedral or the trees or the houses; it’s something much more important. It’s the happiness of England that you’re after.’

Nelly Moreton looked as if she could have kissed him for his words. Her face lightened up as though the flesh of it had become transparent. ‘Yes! that’s just what I’ve been telling him. Look at that branch against the buttress! They seem to melt into each other. And you can actually see the warm air flowing round them both, caressing them both!’

They contemplated Mr Canyot’s quick decisive movements in silence for a while. Then the girl laid her hand on the artist’s shoulder. ‘We won’t disturb you any more, Robert. I’ll take Mr Storm to see Canon Ireton’s garden. They’re all away; but I’m allowed to take anyone. He’ll be pleased with it. The peonies are wonderful.’

The artist lifted his head, laid down his brush, and placed his hat beside it on the grass. Richard received from him a long scrutinizing look and was rather pleased to note that his expression became perceptibly puzzled.

The conformation of Mr Canyot's skull, covered with thick tow- like bleached hair, struck him as remarkable; but the contours of the man's face were arrogant, his mouth morose, his eyes jeering.

'Certainly, by all means. But let's have tea fairly early, so that you won't have to rush back and tire yourself out.'

The girl patted his shoulder affectionately. 'All right,' she laughed, 'we'll be here in good time. I'm not going to kidnap Mr Storm.'

Her tone apparently gave satisfaction to the painter, for he bestowed upon them an amiable nod of dismissal and resumed his work.

Miss Moreton led her companion past the west door of the cathedral, down a little avenue of limes, between nursery-maids holding gargantuan infants, and aged nondescript philosophers, the smoke of whose placid pipes ascended to heaven.

On the further side of the close she led him down a narrow brick alley, over one wall of which hung wistaria and over the other white and blue clematis.

At last they came to a little brightly painted green door which she opened with a small key taken from her purse. 'Mrs Ireton was a friend of mother's,' she said, and they passed through. 'I can pick anything I like here, as long as Mr Tip doesn't see me. They're all terribly afraid of Mr Tip. He's the dean's man really; but he works for them all since the war.'

How much of England and its incurable charm lay, for Richard, at that moment, in that insignificant sentence! The obstinate importance of personal character, or personal peculiarity; the relaxed, easy-going, unofficial casualness of the old traditional methods which lent to Mr Tip – who doubtless tyrannized mercilessly over the dean – a more carefully respected authority than was vouchsafed to any chief of police, how profoundly national it all was!

Richard could see Mr Tip among his own private roses, in his own trim villa, reading The Times through his spectacles to his good lady who in her day had doubtless ruled over more difficult personages than deans.

‘Well! what do you think of it?’ sounded the youthful voice at his side. ‘Isn’t it a sweet place? Do you wonder I wanted you to see it?’

Richard was indeed so overcome by the beauty of it all, by the charm of Nelly herself, by the delicious symbolic figure of Mr Tip – who fortunately was elsewhere just then – that this wonderful garden seemed to him the last drop in the cup of mortal happiness.

It was the sort of garden that one cannot conceive of as existing outside England. It was not large, and the high walls that surrounded it – for the house against which it lifted its waves of fragrant fertility was itself, it seemed, no more than a great buttressed monastic wall with massive-mullioned windows – made it look smaller than it really was.

The lawn across which the girl led her new friend was so velvet- soft to the touch and so incredibly smooth that it seemed to reject as sacrilege the idea of any sportive usage except perhaps the ancient and venerable game of bowls.

Richard thought to himself that he would feel as indignant as Mr Tip if anyone suggested playing croquet or lawn tennis here. It was hieratic grass, suitable to be trodden by the most learned of all canons, as he read his Greek Testament before Matins. It was not grass from which tennis balls should be allowed to bounce.

‘How many years has it taken, do you suppose,’ he asked his little friend, ‘to get this lawn as smooth as this?’

‘That tree,’ she pointed to a tremendous cedar of Lebanon, ’is supposed to have been planted by Henry the Third. And they always planted cedars on lawns; so I suppose it was there then.’

They stepped off the grass upon a long brick path, on both sides of which was a high herbaceous border from whose carefully weeded brown earth rose in luxuriant green profusion the promise of every sort of summer perennial. Many of the plants, canterbury bells, London pride, pinks and stocks and sweet william were scarcely in bud; but ‘the wealth of the globèd peonies ‘was in full glory and the delphinium flowers were already appearing, some purple, some light blue, like delicately poised butterflies, on their tapering stalks of pale fresh green.

The brick path ended in a terrace at both its northern and southern extremity, and each terrace was overhung with white and red and yellow roses. On one of these terraces, under the massive stonework of the old monastic house, Nelly and her companion sat down upon a wooden bench.

Richard removed his hat; and with a charming blush of girlish self-consciousness, for which this time no critical demon in him found a mocking jibe, the girl did the same. –

Moved by a simultaneous impulse they then proceeded quite openly and without shame to survey one another from head to foot, smiling happily as they did so as if well pleased with the result of their scrutiny.

They made indeed a charming contrast as they sat together, the man’s grizzled hair, swarthy unbearded face, and hawk-like profile, pedestalled in the manner of some old imperial statue against a cluster of white roses, while a neighbouring spray of heavy damask ones, deep red as a wood-god’s blood, overhung the girl’s fair head, fair face, and bare slender neck. She might have been, but for her English dress, some early Forentine’s conception of Psyche waiting for her invisible lover.

‘We seem to be making friends extremely quickly,’ Nelly shyly observed, withdrawing her eyes from his face and following the sweep of the great cedar’s shadow as it turned the sun-warmed grass into cool velvety blackness.

There was a faint recrudescence of the imp of criticism in him at this. Was she, after all, just an ordinary little flirt? And then some other, subtler, deeper devil reminded him that all these pathetic, frail, wilful beings were driven by the eternal necessity of things to be something of that sort, if life was to proceed. How else could anything at all, in this chaotic world, begin to happen?

‘It was certainly fate,’ he remarked stupidly, his thoughts more occupied with the general situation than with anything he actually said, ‘that brought us together like this.’

‘I hope,’ she responded quickly, ‘not the fate whose name is also Sorrow.’

Richard felt slightly annoyed with her for this. He wanted her to be receptive, silent and dreamy. He didn’t want her to indulge in neat quotations from authors which he might possibly have forgotten!

‘It’s odd,’ she continued, ‘how little we know of each other except that we are getting on so well. What was it that brought you back to England?’

One of his troublesome demons prompted him to answer quick as a shot, ‘The white skin of Elise Angel,’ but what he said was quite different. ‘I’m a writer, you know – what I suppose you might call a professional critic. What I’ve done so far is to write about poetry, mostly about the French. Now what I want to do is to say something for myself, something that’s come into my mind lately, something that can’t be said in any other way except in the form of poetry.’

Nelly looked at him with deep interest. Her instinct made her aware that he was less certain of his ‘line’, less confident of his power, much more receptive to influence, than was Robert Canyot. The profound feminine passion for offering ‘help’, any sort of ‘help’, to an artist, a thinker, a person with ideas, thrilled her young blood with a thrill like the answer to a caress.

‘And you came to England because you thought you could express your real self better here than in a foreign country?’

He loved the eager girlish tone with which she said this; but the too familiar expression ‘your real self’ made him jib like a touchy horse. He seemed to remember that every woman who had ever got him into her power had used the expression ‘real self’ when the sharp claws came out from below the velvet pads.

‘Yes,’ he replied, ‘I felt I must hide away from everybody. And everybody for me means France nowadays. Why are you smiling? Was that a rude thing to say? Of course I couldn’t know I should meet Miss Nelly Moreton?’

It was the twinge of anger at being discovered in something approaching a faux pas that made him give her that little stab; but she did not hold it against him.

‘And Sussex?’ she inquired. ‘Why Sussex?’

‘Oh, that’s another story,’ he responded, gratified to her for letting him off, ‘that’s a matter of duty. I wanted to see the graves of my people who’re in your churchyard. My grandfather was the Vicar of Littlegate.’

The girl jumped to her feet at this, so pleased she was. To a well-brought- up young Englishwoman such clerical ancestry was a kind of hallmark of security. It meant a social equality between them which was a decided point to the good. She felt immensely reassured. Now, at any rate, no one could say she had acted in an unladylike manner in making friends with a stranger.

‘How silly of me!’ she cried in radiant spirits. ‘Of course your name is Storm; and there’s a monument in the church to the Reverend Benjamin Storm, D.D. I see it from my pew. I’d have shown it to you if I’d known. I will show it to you when you come out again!’

He also had risen to his feet and they stood surveying that unequalled garden with the peculiar thrill of inter-conscious pleasure which comes at the first stage of any rapport between the sexes and is never quite reproduced again. It is the discovery of the fact, which the solitary soul in us can hardly believe to be really true, that another person can feel, at the same moment and under the same influence, exactly what we feel. It is the stirring of the waters by the divine Eros, before the appearance of desire, jealousy, responsibility and suspicion mar and spoil it all.

The girl’s ‘I will show it to you when you come out again’ had been accepted by them both as natural and inevitable. The mocking demon in Richard seemed to have been exorcized by the spirit of a garden seven centuries old.

With a movement that was tenderly possessive in its gentleness he handed her her broad-brimmed hat and watched her thrust the long hat-pin into her soft hair. He resumed his own hat and picked up his stick as soon as she was ready, and there swept over both of them a delicious sense of intimacy as they moved away; as if the bench beneath the red and white roses had been some sort of a shrine that had initiated them into a sacred conspiracy.

Their silence was at that moment more voluble than any words. Their silence moved at their side as they moved, and whispered to them things sweet and strange, things older than that ancient garden. Life however turns only too quickly its terrible hourglass. Before they had even crossed the lawn their hour was gone.

They were near the little green door into the lane when an odious discord rose from just behind it. A cruel rustic laugh was followed by a chorus of gross merriment and a rush of stampeding footsteps. Then there was the noise of a shower of stones and then a bloodcurdling hush. This hush was immediately broken by a horrible cry which made them stand for a moment as if petrified. It was the cry like that of a hurt animal and yet it was sickeningly human. It had in it something weird and unnatural, something that seemed to proceed from a level of existence obscure, tragic, dark, different and alien.

The indestructible pain which like an underground stream of poison flows round the roots of all the roses in the world had burst its barriers once more. The war was not over.

They flung themselves together upon the little green gate, pulled it open and plunged into the alley.

They caught sight of a group of boys fleeing helterskelter round the corner, two hulking rapscallions among them, half-boys, half- men.

Squatting on the ground, his face streaming with blood, was a wretched hydrocephalic child beating on the earth with his clenched fists and uttering a horrible wailing cry. Even at that moment the callous observer in Richard’s brain noted two facts. That in one of the boy’s clenched fists was a stick of dust-covered sugar candy; and that the cry he uttered when they approached him was like the scream of a frightened plover.

Nelly Moreton was on her knees in a moment by the child’s side, staunching the blood with her handkerchief and lifting up his hands to see if they were hurt.

It was this movement that made the child think that she intended to take away his candy and with blind fury he struck at her heart. ‘That’ll do! That’ll do!’ cried Richard, bending down from above them and lifting the boy upon his feet The child staggered against the wall, hiding the hand that held the candy behind his back. ‘He didn’t mean it. He didn’t hurt me. They’ve driven him mad, the brutes! Give me your handkerchief will you? He’ll be better soon’ And she put her arm tenderly around him and pressed him tightly to her, kissing his tear-stained cheek.

The blood on the child’s forehead was soon staunched. The skin was only slightly scratched; but there appeared a great bruise where a stone had struck him.

‘I won’t take your candy away. Nice candy! Give the lady a little taste.’ The great abnormal head began to droop now against her neck and long quiet sobs took the place of his former anger.

Suddenly he became quite still, leaning against her, his face buried.

‘He seems all right now,’ said Richard; thinking in his heart – shall I have to get this child to his home? Shall I have to call upon the police or some terrible society? Shall I have to take him to a sweet shop? Have I displayed sufficient sympathy?

The girl did not speak. She seemed to derive a strange pleasure from hugging this idiot to her heart and feeling his head nestle down against her in some obscure baby-instinct.

The situation was – for Richard at least – relieved by the appearance of a red-faced panting female of about forty who, with many exclamations of ‘Thank you Mum! He be the trouble of my life Mum! Much obliged to you Mum!’ slapped the child severely, threw his squeezed-up piece of candy over the wall and dragged him off by the hand.

‘The wretch!’ cried Richard Storm when the two had gone a little way. But Nelly was watching them intently.

‘She’s not a cruel woman,’ she remarked at last. ‘She’s probably fonder of that child than of all her other children. Look!’

And Richard saw to his surprise that the woman had picked the idiot up in her arms. ‘Listen!’ murmured the girl; and a strange crooning chant made itself audible. ‘She’s singing to him,’ she said with a queer smile.

‘But she slapped him,’ remarked Richard staring after them, ‘and she threw his candy away.’

‘You all have to be slapped sometimes,’ said Nelly Moreton. ‘I wouldn’t have let him eat that filthy thing!’

They made their way slowly back to where they had left Mr Canyot. The girl was silent and abstracted, as if she still felt against her breast the head of the idiot.

Richard in his heart was making plans for the future. ‘Is there,’ he asked at last, as they came out into the open space by the cathedral, ‘any least chance of finding a room in Littlegate? I believe if I settled down there I really should be able to write.’

They were passing close to the open door of the cathedral as he made this inquiry. In the distance, just where they had left him, they could see the painter still absorbed in his work.

‘Let’s go in here for a minute,’ said Nelly. ‘I want to tell you something.’

Her tone was strained and tense. Richard was completely puzzled. Nothing, after all, had passed between them of sufficient seriousness to warrant her making confessions to him or elucidating difficult situations. She was a sweet creature, but he was by no means sure that he would ever be more than mildly attracted to her. He was still a little irritated by the flippant way she had said, ‘You all have to be slapped sometimes.’ That remark did not harmonize, he thought, with her mood in the garden. She ought to remember that, after all, he wasn’t a lad of her own age. There was a certain respect due to his – well! not grey hairs, but experience of the world!

Nelly Moreton, as she looked about for a convenient place in the great dim building, had not the remotest idea of what was going on in his mind. One of the most touching forms that a young girl’s innocence takes is her ignorance of the labyrinthine vanity of men. Respect for one’s father, quite a childish feeling, made one very considerate with old men. But a man in the prime of life, like her new friend – she took it for granted that she could say things to him, anything that came into her head, as she would have hesitated to say them to a younger person.

She found a suitable place at last for their colloquy, in a little altar-less side chapel surrounded by monuments to extinct Sussex worthies.

Richard was still too puzzled and startled, too engaged in frantically wondering what on earth she was going to say to him, to take much notice of the noble pillars and beautiful carved mouldings of the spacious antiquity about him.

As he sat down by her side, however, his eyes fixed themselves upon the recumbent image of a dead crusader lying with his mailed feet upon a crouching dog and his sword pressed close against his thigh. The hands of the figure were clasped in an eternal gesture of prayer and his whole pose suggested such absolute quiescence of patient expectation that it seemed as if nothing short of the final catastrophe could ever disturb him.

The girl seemed unwilling to break the silence that fell between them then, a silence not like that which had whispered to them in the garden, but a sad human silence, through which the gulf that divided their ages seemed to tick out the moments like a clock in a drowned ship.

Thoughts, swift as bits of wreckage on an inrushing tide, whirled one after another through Richard's brain; and, as they came, the demon observer within him noted them one by one.

Queer – what thoughts can follow one another without conscious incongruity! Her phrase 'You all have to be slapped sometimes,' associating him, Richard Storm, with a hydrocephalic idiot, jostled in his mind with those eternally lifted marble hands of the silent crusader. Had some daring maiden slapped, in her time, those solemn and courtly cheeks? Well! with that cross-handled sword on his armoured hip, he seemed able to lie quiet enough now, without any blush of tingling memory.

But what was he, Richard Storm, doing – that was the next thought that drifted by – seated here with this young girl? Vanity whispered to him that he had already made an emotional impression on her – where would that impression lead them both to, if it deepened and increased? Where did he desire it to lead them to? Hurriedly he moved out of the track of this final thought! She was a sweet child; but what was she to him? His business was with something deeper, more serious, more worthy of his age, than flirtations with little girls.

He became suddenly aware that Nelly Moreton was speaking to him.

'What I wanted to ask you, Mr Storm,' her voice caught in her throat just then, with a queer little sound like the gurgle of a nightingale in late summer; but she made a gallant effort and continued firmly; 'was whether you think it right for a person to go on being engaged to someone when you've come to the conclusion that you're really not suited? I know you have to be good and submit to your fate when you're married,' she went on, with another little gasp in her throat, this time more like the bursting of some dry seed-pod, ‘but it doesn’t seem as though being engaged were the same thing as being married – except that one ought to keep one’s word, I suppose, else what does one give one’s word for?’

She stopped dead at that and turned, quite unexpectedly, right full upon him, searching him with anxious candid-questioning eyes.

While she was speaking Richard’s demons had kept up such a clamour of caustic commentary that when she had finished he was glad enough to be able to smile nervously and mutter, ‘You must give me time to think.’

The trusting candour of the look she had given him left his thoughts hopelessly confused.

They came fast, the impish suggestions – such as, ‘she is angling for you’; ‘she is bored with her life at Littlegate’; ‘she has been driven by her father to accept that ass Canyot’; ‘she’s trying to excite your pity’; ‘she’s betraying some honest fellow’s affection to the first newcomer’; ‘she’s infatuated with the idea of one’s literary reputation’ – and with it all his mind became so wretchedly entangled, that the long stare he proceeded to give to the crusader’s tomb brought him nothing but the most obvious and simple answer.

‘My dear child,’ he said, turning his gaze upon the grey gloves lying so quietly in her lap while with her firm sun-warmed fingers she hugged her knees, ‘in these things you must follow your own instinct. Certainly it would be very wrong to plunge into marriage with someone you had ceased to love. No one can bind love down, or command it to remain fixed, when it wants to fly away. Much more harm is done in this world by marrying unsuitable people than by breaking promises.

‘Promises are things that oughtn’t to be brought into these matters at all. Promises ought to be confined to business and war and material affairs. You have no right to promise away the freedom of your heart. It’s like selling your soul. Your heart is not your own to promise here or there. Your heart belongs to the Great Spirit of life which gave it you. Engagement promises are only a sort of play-acting promises. If you are religious and have taken marriage vows it's quite a different matter. That's what engagements are for – to give girls like you, who've seen little of the world, a chance of changing their minds.'

The obviousness and even naïveté of his eloquence, considering his own sudden interest in her, seemed to him genuinely justified. If it were that arrogant young painter, with his bleached mop and jeering mouth, to whom the child had promised herself, the rebuff would do him good. Richard contemplated with pleasure his receiving it. It would be a shame to tie her up with a self- satisfied rascal like that, who was probably persona grata with half the petticoats of Bloomsbury.

He was a little surprised at the silence with which his words were received and at the unembarrassed way she fixed him with a pondering puzzled unconvinced look.

'But if breaking your word made a person very unhappy, perhaps spoilt their life?'

'Men's lives are not spoilt as easily as all that.'

'Don't you think all human lives are very easily spoilt?'

'By themselves – not by others.'

'Don't you think we ought – sometimes – to sacrifice our personal moods to larger, more important things, to things that will go on after we are dead?'

'I don't understand you. What things do you mean?'

The girl did, this time, look away from him, down the long vista of the receding pillars and arches.

‘Things of art,’ she said, and then, with heightened colour, ‘and of literature of course, too.’ She paused and gave a little sigh. ‘Things that do something,’ she added wistfully, ‘to help the struggle of the beaten ones.’

Richard’s demons were abominably active at that moment. He permitted them to whisper terrible things. One of them accused the girl of sickening sentimentality, another of odious priggishness, a third of a pedantic arrogance that was unpardonable.

What does a chit of a thing like that think she can do for a man’s serious work? Young women with what they call ‘ideals’ ought to marry carpenters or bricklayers!

His mind took a long fantastic leap. Suppose I was fool enough to cut out this precious Canyot and carry her off. How should I like her sympathy? How should I like to feel her with her eye on me, helping me to be ‘my real self’? How should I like to be reminded of ‘humanity’s struggle’ when I was in my evil mood and loathed the whole farce? How should I like to have the ‘beaten ones’ called to my attention just when I was, for one lucky moment, able to forget that men had more nerves than animals? Nom de Dieu! she makes me feel as if my whole purpose, my great secret purpose, my very poetry, were some thin tender fragile thing that had to be pressed to a virgin’s breast – that had to be mothered! Bah! Let her go. Let her marry her jeering Canyot!

The accumulated howl of all his interior demons might have gone on still longer in this manner – for his fair-haired companion had fallen into a frowning disputation with herself – if his eyes had not chanced to be arrested once more by the lifted hands of the sleeping crusader.

It happened that a shaft of the bright afternoon sun, in its flickering passage across the aisles, had fallen upon these eternally praying hands, while it left the rest of the recumbent figure in shadow. It was the merest accident, the most casual chance; yet to Richard's superstitious mind it seemed one of those omens of ambiguous decision, one of those auguries of warning, which he found himself always looking for as his life advanced; just as if he really did possess some 'tutelary genius', whose only permitted intercourse with him was through the dubious medium of such things as these.

A cloud passed across some distant window, and the light faded away; but an immense shame flooded the man's whole being, and something awoke within him that made him look at her with a changed expression.

'It is harder for me than you can believe,' she began again, raising troubled eyes to his, as if conscious of his softening. 'I can't bear to make life more difficult for another person. It's like pushing a child into the nettles instead of moving them out of the way. And I know I'm much more able to stand things going wrong than most people are. I'm awfully detached from my body, I think. It's not any credit to me. I don't seem really to mind what happens in that way.'

The poignancy of this, from a young creature at the threshold of life's deepest revelation, struck Richard, in his new receptivity, as a heartbreaking thing.

The exquisite innocent! What did she know of the ache of mortal flesh? With a virginal body like hers, 'detachment' might indeed be easy! Between faint distaste for an intimacy she had no conception of and ideal respect for 'art' and 'artists' the struggle might very well be a light one.

Richard suddenly became conscious that there really were grave possibilities of tragedy here, such as, in his preoccupation with himself, he had not focused. Suppose she were to idealize him as she was evidently idealizing Canyot, would it be right for him – granting he cared for her more than just enormously – to carry her off and marry her?

The ‘eternally praying hands’ gave him no light upon this. He was left at the mercy of the now reawakening voices of the ‘eternally denying’ demons in his own heart: ‘Girls have to find out what life is like just as anyone else has’; ‘she gets her pleasure out of these self-sacrificing movements’; ‘she likes offering herself up on an altar’.

As these voices subsided, and the more normal Richard thought his own thoughts again, the temporary conclusion he came to was that it all depended upon whether she was really ‘in love’ or not. If she were not, it was an outrage, unjustifiable by any sophistry. If she were – well! it became quite a different matter.

One obstinate demon in him insisted, however, upon having the final word; ‘girls can mechanically become “in love” with the man they marry out of respect and admiration. The erotic automatism of the system of things drives them to that,’

‘I’m afraid we must go now,’ said Nelly Moreton, rising with a little shiver. She wanted at that moment to relieve both her muscles and her mind by a terrific stretch and yawn, but as respectable young women do not yawn and stretch in the aisles of cathedrals she could only give a jerk to her frock and a touch to the back of her head.

They took one last comprehensive glance round the great, cool, hushed place, in which they seemed at that moment isolated from all the world, and then emerged into outer sunshine.

Robert Canyot welcomed them with quite boisterous alacrity. He was tired of painting and anxious for tea and conversation.

He packed up his things and left them in the care of a friendly lodge-keeper at the gates of the close and together they wandered down the old narrow street enjoying the epicurean pleasure of a carefully considered discussion as to where they should have tea.

They passed by several attractive places as too crowded and decided at last upon a little modest confectioner's which offered them a table in a bow window right against the street. Here they proceeded to make themselves thoroughly comfortable. The first cup and the first taste of thin bread and butter put them all into excellent spirits. Nelly, either in reaction from her troubled soliloquy, or out of some deep-buried feminine discovery, was as radiant and gay as a child; nor did the latent hostility of her companions cloud their response to her cheerfulness. They laughed and chatted and ate and drank hungrily, the men demanding boiled eggs in addition to the bread and butter, and the girl insisting upon the famous local honey.

It was not till quite the close of the meal that the smouldering antagonism between the painter and the writer began to reassert itself.

'I suppose you get quite a lot of royalties from those books of yours? I seem to remember having seen them on bookstalls in town. They're all about absinthe drinkers and cognac fiends, aren't they – with illustrations of night life in the boulevards – the sort of thing Oscar Wilde used to tell us to read?'

'They're about the literature of France,' answered Richard, keeping his temper with difficulty, 'and my Life of Verlaine is certainly illustrated; but not all my authors have the weaknesses you speak of. Two very interesting ones are priests.'

'They may be nuns, for all I should know,' threw out Mr Canyot. 'I daresay nuns, in France, compose literature like the rest. What puzzles me is how a sensible Englishman like yourself can waste time over such affected frippery. Come now – between ourselves – when it isn't a matter of selling, don't you think all this modern stuff – vers litre and so forth – is just tommy-rot?'

Richard was certain that he caught a direct appeal from Nelly that he should behave well under this attack. On the strength of an understanding with her he felt ready to be quite magnanimous. 'I'm not prepared to defend anything en masse,' he said calmly. 'But I think we're bound to take a critical interest in every new experiment.'

'Rats!' responded the other, his great corrugated youthful countenance getting red with anger as he caught a sympathetic look pass between Richard and Nelly. 'Rats! you know perfectly well that any genuine production is the result of three factors – skill, insight and inspiration. These people just flop and wallow around, and call their damned impertinence "genius". We're not by any means bound to take a critical interest in things which we know, by the smell, before we touch them, are thoroughly worthless!'

Nelly burst out laughing at this. 'Mr Storm doesn't judge literature by the smell,' she said. 'Everyone hasn't got such terrible second-sight as you have, Robert. Most of us have to read a thing before we know what it's like.'

But Mr Canyot could not be stopped. The consciousness that he was making a fool of himself drove him on.

'Experiments! You talk of experiments. What we want nowadays is knowledge and serious hard work.

'It's just the same with everything. I have no doubt Mr Storm is a Sinn Feiner and a pro-Bolshevik, and believes in Egypt for the Egyptians and India for the Indians. Some people are interested in nothing else but experiments; and they'll go on experimenting till everything bursts up. I tell you, what we want in these times is carefully tested first-hand knowledge – not pretty theories; and hard steady work, not ramping around being “original”!’

Nelly’s social anxiety to keep the peace was rapidly breaking down now under an extreme schoolgirl longing to burst into an uncontrollable fit of giggling.

The forced smile assumed by Richard and his weary air of abysmal superiority struck her fancy as quite as comic as the excited rudeness of Canyot. She thought within herself, these poor dears! – how they do go on! And it suddenly struck her how complicated life is made for women by the mania men have for asserting their intellectual prejudices and losing all interest in the actual details before them. She herself was the ‘actual detail’ before them now, and here they were, glutting their respective mental vanities on what she knew was a perfectly irrelevant discussion, betraying that as a matter of fact they were really more interested in one another’s pompous ‘attitudes’ than in any possible opinion she might profess.

She had once seen, in Arundel Park, two homed stags fighting over a deer. Those animals also seemed to forget the cause of their conflict in the sheer joy of battle.

It certainly did make things more difficult when the very persons who hated one another because one liked them both displayed so much more anxiety as to just how they impressed each other than how they impressed oneself.

That part of the business they both seemed to take for granted!

She found herself wishing that there was a third man in this tea party.

‘Surely you will not deny,’ she heard Richard saying when her wandering attention returned, ‘that the least new ripple of a new point of view, of a new impression of things, of a new tone or rhythm in our reaction to things, has a profound psychological interest, even if, from the highest standard, it remains tentative and formless?'

'I do, I do deny it,' cried the young painter, striking the honey- pot a severe blow with the end of his knife. 'These "new ripples", as you call them, are not the real forward movement of the great tradition. That, when it appears, dominates us all, conservatives and modernists alike, by its universal human power. In my art you have a Cézanne or a Renoir. In yours you have a William Blake or a Paul Verlaine. You will notice that Cézanne and Renoir carry on the tradition of the subtlest of the great masters, just as the lyrics of Blake and Verlaine remind you of Shakespeare's—'

Richard's voice violently interrupted him. 'No! No! No! you traditionists are always so unfair to us. You treat us just as the Church treats its visionaries. Blake isn't in the least like Shakespeare, nor is Verlaine in the least like Villon, as you were probably going to remark. And how are you to know, may I ask, when to look for the new Renoirs and Verlaines if you take no interest in the experiments of the new people?'

Richard positively scowled at Nelly at that point because he caught her looking with interest at a dog fight in the street. Robert Canyot struck the honey-pot a terrific blow.

'Experiments,' he cried, 'are not achievements! When your new people work hard enough, and study the great men deeply enough, and stop putting down every confounded thing that comes into their heads, they'll force me to respect them. They'll be artists then. Meanwhile they're just amateur triflers, like the people who fuss over them!'

Richard's face grew dark and his fingers clenched. Was this young puppy actually daring to tell him that his monographs upon René Ghil, Gustave Kahn, Jules Laforgue, Grégoire Le Roy, and so forth, were wasted labour, unworthy of a first-class intellect?

‘I suppose you’d class Rémy de Gourmont among your experimenters,’ he snarled sarcastically, making a naïvely unconscious movement with his hand, as if to retain the attention of Miss Moreton who had risen from her seat to watch the dogs being separated. But his antagonist was too wary to be caught. ‘I know nothing of the person you speak of. No doubt from your tone I ought to, and perhaps I ought. If I ought, some day no doubt I shall; for in the end one always does come across the real achievements.’

‘Perhaps that’s what these “fussy amateurs” you scoff at are for,’ flung back the older man; ‘in order that these deserving ones shall not have to wait till they’re dead for the honour of being appreciated by Mr Robert Canyot!’

At this point – was it with the intention of letting her new friend have the last word? – Nelly Moreton resolutely broke in. ‘Sorry to change the conversation,’ she said, ‘but if we’re to get back in time for supper we must really make a start.’

Less shamefaced than they deserved, and avoiding one another’s eyes so obviously that the girl couldn’t help comparing them to the two dogs who were now being dragged away by their respective masters, the men rose to their feet, and Canyot went to the little desk to pay for their meal.

They moved off together back again up the street which was now golden and mellow with the slanting sunshine.

Richard felt tempted, when the artist had secured his belongings at the close-gate, to suggest that he should accompany them some portion of their way, for the fact of his having, as he felt, put the young man into his place gave him a feeling of magnanimity.

But Nelly Moreton bade him goodbye at that point in so very definite a manner that his project was nipped in the bud. Canyot, pleased at the thought of having his friend to himself for that pleasant walk through the buttercups, shook hands with him graciously, almost apologetically. And Richard himself turned away not unpleased, since her final word to him was emphatic. ‘You must come over and see my father.’

It was not till much later in the day, when recalling every incident of that afternoon, that he remembered a sharp piercing look that Canyot had turned upon him and Nelly at one moment during their conversation. That fellow can’t be easily fooled, he thought.

Chapter 3

IT WAS ALWAYS a luxurious and pleasant moment for Nelly, when after a knock as gentle as her round knuckles could administer, the all-competent Grace brought her hot water and tea. It was delicious to lie with closed eyes, still half-wrapped in the filmy cloud of sleep, while the sweet airs floated in through the open windows, mingled with the crooning of the dove and the reedy call of the blackbird.

Generally she let Grace put down the tray and the bright-polished can, and carry off her outdoor shoes, without movement or sign. But on the morning after her day in Selshurst she sat up in bed with wide-open eyes.

‘I likes to see ‘ee with all that pretty hair, Miss Nelly. Mercy, ’tis a shame a lovely young lady like you should have to fasten ‘un up. None do know,’ cept those as sees ‘ee like this and They Above, how winsome a body ‘ee be grown into.’

Nelly pushed back her hair with both hands. ‘Where’s my ribbon?’ she said. Grace stooped, picked it up from the floor, lifted the hair carefully from the slender neck and tied it back, giving it a final caress with her great hand as if it belonged to a favourite doll.

‘How’s Mr Moreton this morning, Grace?’

The maid’s countenance became grave. ‘He ‘ave worked in’s study since afore I was up, Miss, I do fear it; working and thinking, thinking and muttering to ‘isself. Not that it’s my place to sy anything, Miss Nelly; but us remembers what us do remember, and how ’twas like this afore ‘ee wrote that letter to them great ones wot worrited ‘ee so dreadful. I didn’t mean like to trouble ‘ee with what ‘ee do know as well as I, Miss. But I ‘eard the Master with my own ears telling Mr Lintot only yesterday that there ‘baint no God in Heaven.’ Twas terrible to listen to ‘un, strike me blind, if it weren’t; for ‘a did carry on so about one thing and another that Mr Lintot he up and said he couldn’t listen to any more on’t.’ Tweren’t right nor natural that he should listen to such things, spoke by one of Master’s holy profession. There, Miss Nelly,’ ee mustn’t take on. What must be must be; what’s writ to come’ll surely come; and them as calls down Tuesday’s rain on Monday’s roses will never see the gates of Jerusalem.’

Saying this with a consolatory leer, as if it were a piece of the most cynical worldly wisdom, Grace picked up her mistress’s shoes, still all covered with gold-dust from the walk through the buttercups, and left the room.

Nelly jumped hastily out of bed and pulled the curtains across the open windows. She bathed and dressed rapidly today, cutting short the long leisurely peeps she was accustomed to take in intervals of her dressing at the familiar face of the distant Downs.

The little house they lived in had quite recently been ‘done over’, and as the girl ran down and entered the breakfast room she felt proud of the effect of the labour she and Grace had bestowed upon it. Everything looked so peculiarly cheerful with fresh-painted wood and whitewashed walls and clean chintz covers and curtains.

She had got rid of a drawing room altogether and she and her father had their meals in a lightly furnished south-aspected room which she used during the rest of the day as her own resort.

But the nicest room in the house was her father’s study, a large airy place with a low ceiling and french windows opening on the garden.

Here her father kept his natural history collections – cabinets of birds’ eggs and bureau drawers full of butterflies and moths – and here he read an endless sequence of scientific volumes.

The Vicar of Littlegate was a lean Don Quixote-looking old man with a long narrow face and melancholy blue eyes. He was very tall and his knotted fingers, as he stooped over his food, touching, the bread as if it were a botanical specimen laid out to be examined, hung from his thin arms like the fantastic hands of a withered ash tree.

On this particular morning Mr Moreton seemed to have no appetite for anything but bread, which he ate in large mouthfuls, washing it down with enormous cups of sugarless, milkless tea. He kept rising from his chair when his daughter needed anything from the sideboard, and was always putting things on her plate and encouraging her to eat, with little friendly exclamations as if she were some pet animal rather than the mistress of the house.

‘Some more furniture came yesterday for that little place of Canyot’s,’ he remarked with a glance at the window. ‘He ought to be able to move in in a day or two. It’ll be nice for him after the farm. I hope Betsy-Anne’s Rose will look after him all right. She’ll be able to be there most of the days. She’s a funny rough girl; but a good girl I daresay. She comes to the Sacrament.’ And he sighed heavily.

‘Yes, it’ll certainly be much nicer for Robert up there than down at the farm,’ responded Nelly, looking anxiously at the old man’s troubled face.

‘It’s what he’s been aiming at ever since you and he were engaged,’ continued Mr Moreton. ‘He’s good to me, is Rob Canyot. He understands my difficulty. He agrees with me that I can’t go on as I’m going on now. It was because he saw how I love this place for the sake of the plants and the birds and the insects that he first thought of taking it, I believe. It was a good kind thought of his, my dear, and I hope you’ll make a good wife to him.’

Nelly’s delicate transparent cheeks lost every drop of colour. ‘But, dear Father, you don’t mean to say that Robert wants us to be married quite soon? I thought – oh, I thought – that it wasn’t to be for several years! I didn’t dream that he intended me to live in Hill Cottage.’

The old man fidgeted a little and looked uneasy. ‘Well, I ought to tell you, perhaps,’ he said, ‘that I did discuss things with Rob Canyot quite openly the other night. I told him frankly that if I resigned my living I should be totally without an income. He agreed with me that at my age and with my book on Sussex flora unfinished it would be wrong for me to try my hand at any other work. And so – to cut it short – he was very kind and said that of course I could live with you at the cottage. He said that his pictures had begun to sell well and that in addition to what he made that way he had a generous allowance from his mother. In fact he told me not to worry about the matter any further, but to consider it settled. He put it in such a way as to make me feel quite happy about living with you – as if my being with him, you know, and our conversations about science and the local flora and the insects and everything, were a real help to him in his work.’

As Nelly looked at her father uttering these words, the old man’s fanatical head, with the furrowed forehead and the noticeable wart on the high-bridged nose, took to itself the appearance of some ancient remorseless idol upon whose mechanical decision, entirely divorced from all reason and pity, her whole future depended. Her delicately moulded white face stiffened into a rigid mask of nervous tension and little twitching wrinkles appeared between her eyebrows.

The low-voiced crooning of the doves, in the sycamore outside, teased her as something ill-timed, and the flowers on the table, picked by herself the day before, assumed the curious look which flowers have when they attend on some mortal disaster.

The more she contemplated the fatal cul-de-sac, into which an evil focusing of apparently malleable circumstances had pushed her, the more devastating the prospect looked.

The trap she had so innocently, step by step, walked into, narrowed upon her at that moment with what seemed like iron bands. She felt almost afraid of making the least movement of resistance lest the thing's remorseless teeth should close with a snap. And yet, resist she must! A way of escape in some direction there must be. Life couldn't intend to crush her with a stone before she had even begun to live.

'I suppose, Father,' she began, in a voice that sounded like someone else's voice, some voice of a harassed young woman in some unreal story. 'I suppose there's no chance of the bishop being willing to let you keep your work, in spite of your change of views?'

The old man looked fiercely at her. 'Haven't I told you, child? It's not our bishop. It's the authority in London. But it's not really that either. It's my own conscience and self-respect. How can I go on reading the services here when I have ceased to believe a word of it? My plain duty, as an honest man, is to resign.'

The corners of Nelly's mouth drooped piteously. Tears came into her eyes. She bit her lip. 'I don't believe it would have happened – any of it – if mother had lived.'

'Your mother would have completely understood me,' said the old man severely. 'She always did understand me. However, if you're determined to make it harder for me—'

With a brave effort she swallowed her tears and spoke more calmly. 'But, Father dear, I know you still believe in Christ. You couldn't not believe in

Him and consecrate the Sacrament every morning as you do. It is only some theological difficulty you have, quite separate from what is really important. You know what the bishop said when you went to see him.'

The old man rose to his feet before her, a quavering tower of inarticulate passion. His long fingers twisted and trembled as they hung by his side. His hands jerked at the end of his long thin arms. The fleshy portion of his face seemed to draw itself tightly in, over the bony substructure, and his eyes glared as if from a cavernous pit.

'How dare you quote that man to me! Didn't I tell you? He treated me like a silly woman with some ridiculous mania that meant nothing. He wouldn't even hear what I had to say. He just talked and talked, pretty conventional nothings, and then took me into his garden and showed me his sweet-peas! And I had come to let him know, as my spiritual superior, the deepest thoughts of my soul. His sweet-peas! His episcopal sweet-peas!' and the old man sank down again into his chair, exhausted with his outburst. His face quickly changed from that queer drawn look and assumed his normal expression but Nelly noted a weary world-tired droop about him that startled her. Yes, it was clear that something must be done. His mind was troubled to its very foundations.

She moved over to his side. 'Dearest Father!' she said gently – 'I think I do understand you.' She bent down and kissed his high grizzled forehead, upon which the hair grew rough and stubbly, as one sees it in portraits of the philosopher Schopenhauer.

But after that, she left the sitting room and went out hatless into the garden, and beyond the garden into a cornfield behind the churchyard, where the early rye was already up to her waist. She walked slowly along a little path with the green rye on both sides of her, the ground at her feet tangled with red pimpernel and rose-coloured fumitory and tiny wild pansies. But she had no heart just then for these things. The very song of the skylark above her seemed to harden itself into a cruel screen of mockery, separating her from the heavens and the healing of their remote peace.

Never had her mind been so shaken from its normal quietness. She had known vaguely that her feeling for Canyot was not what she expected from ‘being in love’. But like so many others before her, she had, in her ignorance of what that real feeling meant, taken the romance and the passionate idealism of her own heart and woven them around her respect, her admiration, her girlish hero-worship.

And now this sudden coming of Richard on the scene, this mysterious poet from Paris, had revealed to her the limits, the bare, hard, clear limits, of what she felt for her betrothed. It was not that she dared yet to give any name to the obscure attraction she was aware of towards the older man. It was only that his appearance upon the stage at all altered her perspective and revealed the outlines of the trap she had innocently walked into.

And the teeth of the trap, the iron clutch against which she had not yet the courage to press her weight, lest she could not move it, was this new development with regard to her father. Here was indeed a trick, a cunning device, a malevolent ambush of fate, such as she had never expected life was capable of!

It was quite clear that they couldn’t be left adrift, without a roof and without a penny. Her father was of course far too old to do anything for himself, except this business with plants and insects which after all was only an old man’s hobby. She supposed that in these days of women’s freedom she could find something for herself. But she had no experience. She had not even done any serious ‘war work’. And how could she support both herself and her father?

They had no relations to whom she could appeal, her father's eccentricity and pride having completely estranged his own connections, whereas her aunts, her dead mother's sisters, were far too poor themselves to be of any help.

Weary and sick in soul the girl turned back to the house to assist Grace in her various household tasks. One tiny faint stream of sweetness, like the up-flow of an inland spring underneath a weight of brackish water, filtered through to her troubled brain through all the bitterness. This exciting newcomer into the circle of her life, this Parisian descendant of old Dr Storm, did undoubtedly seem to want her sympathy.

She knew well enough, by an instinct as direct and sure as that by which the birds build their nests, that the man had grievous need of such as she was, and she knew by the same instinct how angrily he was reacting against his need of her.

Those cynical conclusions of dispassionate scrutiny he called his 'demons' were not by any means so hidden from her as the good man dreamed in his vain masculine aloofness that they were.

Indeed, what really attracted her to him was not the power in him but the weakness in him; or to put it quite precisely the peculiar mingling of power and weakness which made up that troubled essence he named his soul.

That was where the difference lay between him and Robert. Robert was always something to lean upon, something to look up to, something to rely upon and be sure of. But Robert never made any attempt to drag her into the circle of his deepest thoughts. He treated her tenderly but he never confided in her. To him she was a child to be protected.

This man from Paris, for all his heavier weight of years and certainly in spite of himself and to his evident annoyance, could not, it seemed, do anything else than lay bare his deepest soul before her – and in doing this he could not prevent himself, in spite of his immense vanity, from appealing to her maternal instinct. Her betrothed was always the strong elder brother, though his years were so near her own; whereas this man, twice her own age, began to look like that grown-up child which, once in every woman's life, becomes her most fatal attraction when, among all the other appeals, he at last takes to himself a palpable embodiment.

Nelly saw nothing more of her father till half the morning was over, and nothing of Robert Canyot. This hardly surprised her, as they had had a serious misunderstanding – if it was a misunderstanding – on their way home the night before; and she guessed he had gone off, to punish her, upon some long solitary excursion.

This is what he invariably did when anything clouded their intercourse; and his returns from these excursions had hitherto been marked by their happiest rapprochements.

It was in a strangely mingled mood that Nelly busied herself with her various domestic labours that morning. The sense of being most evilly hemmed in remained with her – a feeling as if she were an unsheared sheep pushed from behind down a narrow lane of hurdles towards the fatal jump into the sheep wash – but with it all there moved within her a new delicious thrill, vague and indistinct as the scent of an unknown flower, causing her every now and then to stop in the midst of her work and stand dreaming, seeing nothing, hearing nothing, oblivious to Grace's chatter. Grace came from the West Country and was more voluble and less civilized than the local Sussex maidens. But on this particular occasion she found her young mistress singularly distraite. When the morning was well advanced she left the servant to prepare their mid-day meal and went out into the garden. In an old straw hat and a still older apron she set herself to weed one of the flower borders, the one which adjoined the churchyard wall.

The wall was not a low one, but by clambering up on a little ledge created by the collapse of some ancient cement she was just able to peep over it. She found it difficult to prevent herself from repeating this manoeuvre more than once. And every time she did it she had a vague hope that she might catch sight of Richard Storm standing by his grandfather's headstone.

It was somewhere about her seventh peep – she would always henceforth associate that visionary figure with the pungent smell of ivy and its queer bitterness against her mouth – that she became aware, as she rested her chin against the tiny succulent wall plants that grew in the loose mould and moss, that her father had appeared on the scene and was doing something to her mother's grave.

Cecily Moreton had not had a particularly happy life. She had been too hard-worked. But neither had she been unhappy. And Nelly had a clear recollection of a gentle soft-eyed creature bending over her pillow. She associated her mother with the Evening Hymn of Bishop Kern, the courtier-saint of King Charles the Second, and also (such is memory!) with one rare moment of passion in which the lady had flung the big hand-bell, which stood on the hall table, full against the door through which her husband had just passed! The dent in the door, though painted over, still remained. The hand that had thrown it was less distinguishable.

What was her father doing to the grave? He seemed to be prodding at it with a trowel or spud.

She ran round to the gate and hurried anxiously to the old man's side. What he was doing was inoffensive and natural enough. He was planting a somewhat rare wild orchid, of the kind known as 'maculata', in the grass by the side of the monument. He was indeed 'botanizing' on his wife's grave; but with no intent except to do her honour.

He patted the earth down with the trowel and pressed it still more firmly round the drooping plant with his aged knuckles. He rose when his daughter approached, holding the trowel in his hand.

‘Come,’ he said, ‘let’s show them that I’m a believer in Christ, whatever I may think about that Eidolon Vulgaris they call God.’

He took her by the hand and led her into the church. She noticed that the other hand, the one which held the trowel, was shaking from old age.

It was not the first time he had insisted on celebrating the Anglican Mass at the noon hour.

He retired into the vestry to robe while the girl sat, sad and thoughtful, in the pew she had known since childhood. She almost expected to see him come out with the trowel still tightly clutched in his fingers; but he was quite quiet and self-possessed when he did emerge, carrying with him the sacred elements. He went through the service in English till he came to the words of consecration. These, as he always did in his solitary celebrations, he pronounced in the traditional Latin.

Nothing could surpass in reverence the passionate faith with which he then knelt down before the substance which he believed he had been permitted to transform into the actual flesh of his Redeemer.

Nelly, with her head buried in her hands, sobbed quietly and softly. Her tears were an immense relief to her. Even as she wept she felt a strange thrill of happiness rise up from some unfathomable depth. She was too feminine to fret very much with regard to the unconventionally of the thing. The rite was a mystery to her, not a doctrine; and no irregularity in its administration could lessen its power over her senses and her soul.

She rose from her knees and left the church before the service was over. She knew her father preferred her to come and go as she had a mind. In these matters he had always been singularly indulgent. She thought as she went out how curious it was that the unruly working of the human heart, its deep dark erratic plunges into the unknown, its incurable and obstinate fantasy, could be quelled and soothed as though by some simplicity of natural healing, in the presence of this ritual.

But an idea had come to her as she had knelt there, an idea that she could not help regarding as something put into her mind by what Grace always described as They Above. She would take the opportunity of Canyot's absence to walk over to West Horthing.

She ran into the house full of recovered courage and energy, changed her dress, put on her best hat, and made haste to prepare lunch.

During the meal her father was very silent, evidently brooding upon something. He had recovered his appetite however and looked more resolute and obstinate than unhappy. Nelly could not help thinking how strange it was that such a passionate act of faith in the very secret of love itself, as that service of the Mass amounted to, should leave a person just as little able to enter into the feelings of another person as before!

The old man seemed conscious of no kind of inconsistency, of no sort of betrayal of his high office. Fierce fanatical pride made him prepared to go through anything and remain as he chose to remain.

She looked shrewdly at his face across the table; and she knew that even if she said to him, 'I don't want to marry Robert,' it would not alter his purpose one jot. And yet he had only just changed a morsel of bread into the very body of the Lord! Men are queer creatures!

When the meal was over – he had taken not the least notice of her dress and hat – the old man retired to sleep for a while upon the horse-hair sofa in his own study. Nelly had never presumed to improve upon that sofa. It was all she ever dared to do, just to dust his books and shelves and cabinets.

He stretched himself out at full length, a queer and disconcerting figure of inflexible assurance, his feet, with their great square-toed boots, protruding from beneath an old shawl of his wife’s. In repose his face assumed the expression of a very old peasant, worn out with labouring in the fields.

Nelly took a quick glance at him through the french window as she passed down the garden. Poor old man! If only he could analyse her heart as scrupulously as he analysed his Sussex flora!

Quietly and resolutely she opened the garden gate and set out towards the Downs. West Horthing was a village poised high above the great seigniorial park, at the point where the more luxuriant foliage of the lower slopes merges into the sheep-browsed turf of the bare upper Downs.

In less than an hour after leaving her home Nelly found herself seated at the familiar dark-oak tea table, in the dainty drawing room of her friend Mrs Shotover. The old lady was alone and in just the humour to give her whole attention to the troubles of her youthful protégée.

In earlier days, before her engagement to Robert, she had been accustomed to confide all her girlish whims, caprices, hopes and ambitions to the sympathetic ears of the mistress of Furze Lodge. But during the last six months, since she had definitely accepted Mr Canyot, her visits had become fewer and fewer. For Mrs Shotover had from the very first strongly disapproved of the engagement. Nelly had tried to dispel her prejudice. Twice or even three times she had brought Mr Canyot to see her. But it was no use. The painter had refused to be what Nelly called his ‘real nice self. He had shown himself taciturn and reserved, brusque and awkward. He had refused to respond to Mrs Shotover’s friendly little jests. He had even on one occasion been positively rude. And the old lady’s initial prejudice against him, a thing based upon nothing more tangible than that he wasn’t Altogether the gentleman', had grown into something uncommonly like hostility. The issue of it had been that Nelly had gradually dropped the habit of confiding in her old friend.

But on this occasion, long before she had satisfied her hunger on the tea-cakes and raspberry jam which Mrs Shotover produced for her especial benefit, she had poured into her ears all her troubles.

She had even, after a momentary hesitation which made the old woman want to hug her to her heart, told her the whole story of her meeting with Richard Storm.

'Number two eh?' laughed the ancient creature. 'Oh, that's nothing. Don't you worry about that, sweetheart. Why, at your age, my dear, it was number five with me. You were too quick to proclaim things. That was all. No harm done. In my time we weren't allowed to make fools of ourselves till Papa and Mamma had studied half the genealogies of the county. You young people are so hasty. On today, off tomorrow – bit like Henry the Eighth, wasn't it? You all want to have religious services performed over your least flirtations. It's the influence of that domestic immoralist Robert Browning. Never marry a man called Robert, my dear. All Roberts are descended from Robert the Devil.'

Nelly interrupted her with a laughing sigh.

'Poor old Robert!' she murmured. 'He'll be really hurt, I'm afraid.' The accumulated stirrings of revolt that betrayed her into this very definite bulletin of the state of her heart frightened her as she uttered it. She had really begun to put her weight, then, against the teeth of the trap? And it seemed as if they yielded a little. Or was it just a passing response to the perilous irresponsibility of her hostess?

'Don't you worry yourself ill over any Robert. They're none of them worth it. Nor any Richard either, for the matter of that! But you may bring number two to see me if you like. I've read something of his in the Mercure de France. It pleased me; if I'm not confusing him with that clever Belgian – you know who I mean?'

Nelly hadn't the least idea who she meant, but she begged earnestly to be allowed to see the article in question.

'Not I!' laughed the old woman mischievously. 'I'm not going to corrupt your mind. Does your Richard write in his native tongue as well?'

'Oh yes! He wrote that Life of – of – who was it now?' And Nelly felt a vivid pang of humiliation because at that moment, when she especially wanted to do so, she could not recall the Life of Someone, to which reference had been made during their silly quarrel in the tea shop. 'It was those two dogs,' she muttered, blushing.

The old woman looked at her whimsically. 'Dogs?' she cried, getting up from the table. 'You don't mean to say that number two writes Lives of Dogs? Well, that is interesting.' She stooped, as they both moved towards the sofa, and addressed a great complacent tabby-cat that lay curled up in the corner of it.

'Do you hear that, Tabbyskins? He writes Lives of Dogs. Perhaps if you're very nice to him and don't show your claws, but only purr, when he strokes your fur the wrong way, he will write your life – the Life of Mrs Tabbyskins Shotover, the great Sussex Thinker. You'll like to have your life written by a real poet, wouldn't you my treasure? Well, my dear– 'and turning to her young guest she pulled her affectionately down by her side and patted her on the knee'–now tell me a little more about this Mr Storm of yours. He's a gentleman, I suppose?'

Nelly smiled. "Yes, I should certainly say he is that,' she answered. 'When you don't notice that they're not, they generally are, aren't they, Granny?'

In earlier days Mrs Shotover had encouraged her to use this endearment; and it was a sign of reconciliation that she used it now.

‘His grandfather was a D.D. and is buried in our churchyard,’ the girl added with solemnity.

Mrs Shotover smiled. ‘My dear!’ she cried, ‘I hope you don’t think that D.D. is a mark of gentility. They used to make ’em D.D.s when they dedicated their sermons to Queen Anne. Parson Adams was a D.D. and they used to give him his meals in kitchens and places. What was your beau’s grandfather’s name?’

‘Storm,’ murmured Nelly, frowning a little. Then her face brightened. ‘But it says on the tombstone that Susanna was the daughter of John Molyneux Talbot.’

Mrs Shotover chuckled. ‘You’ve certainly got hostages for his good behaviour in your churchyard! Susanna’s a good name. Though if I remember right, one of them found it difficult once to keep herself to herself! But Susanna Talbot is a good sound name for anybody’s grandmamma. Well, my sweet child, you must bring your Stormy Petrel over here for me to scrutinize. I’ll ferret him out, depend on it! I’ll show him up if he’s a blackguardly villain. I’ll storm his defences. What did he do in the war? Did he fight? Was he in the Legion? Of course he’s in love with you, my dear! Who wouldn’t be? But we must be careful. We must take our time. Who knows? He may have the most obstinate little ménage hidden away somewhere! We mustn’t have our sweet Nell made unhappy. We must go very slow. Very slow and very carefully.’ And the old lady proceeded to put her caution into practice by kissing her companion as mischievously and slyly as if it were the girl’s wedding morning.

Nelly replied as freely as she could to all her friend’s questions. One thing, however, instinct told her to keep unrevealed; and that was the fact of Mr Richard Storm being so much older than herself. Let her, she thought, find that out after she sees how nice and young and unspoilt he is in his mind!

It was a little later in the afternoon, while they were looking at Mrs Shotover's fine roses, that Nelly ventured upon the topic of the writer's desire to secure some quiet lodging in that neighbourhood so as to work undisturbed at some new enterprise.

The old lady laughed uproariously. 'My dear girl you have indeed got on! Lodgings in the neighbourhood? What next? Why in my time they used to be satisfied if they came down from town for very short weekends. You're surely not such a dear stupid as to think he'd land himself out here for the summer if there wasn't someone he was after. Of course it may not be you. He may have an inamorata in Selshurst – though that's not likely. Much more possible he's got some little French friend down at Fogmore. But don't you fool your innocent little heart into believing that bosh about his having to write some great work. They all have to write great works when they want to enjoy themselves!'

Nelly made no reply for some minutes to this tirade. Then, with her hand on the stem of a great cluster of red roses into which she was prepared to plunge her face if what she said became too embarrassing, she uttered a faint protest.

'But Granny, I can't quite understand you. You don't mean that if a man were really immoral, and really had – people – like you speak of – dependent upon him – whether in Fogmore or anywhere else – that it would be right for him to marry?'

The old lady promptly defeated the girl's intention of burying her face in the rosebush after this outbreak, by pulling her back into the path. 'Little goose!' she cried with severe emphasis. 'Get this into your pretty head.

There are no such things as moral men in these days – except such dear stick-in-the-muds as neither you nor I could stand for a fortnight! Well! perhaps that's going a little far, considering that my dear old George was faithful to me for forty years. But you would probably have been bored with George. What you girls have to do is to draw the line between honest naughtiness and sheer ill-bred blackguardism. If you're looking for a Sir Galahad, my dear baby, you'd better give up the thought of marrying anybody. What you have to do is to choose some well-bred gentleman who knows the world and make him fall in love with you. He'll deal with his past life for himself. That'll be his affair – your affair will be to keep him interested and to bear him children. Men with any sensitiveness are faithful to their children, even if they're not faithful to their wives. The sooner you get over this Sir Galahad business the sooner you'll be a sensible little girl.

'It's a choice between boredom, my sweet, and uncertainty. If the fellow's a gentleman and not a fool, you'll never have anything worse than uncertainty. And the woman who can't live with uncertainty had better go into a nunnery or die an old maid. The wives who go about looking, as they say, "unhappy" are either selfish creatures who're as bad as the men they condemn, in their fussiness over their, precious little selves, or they are unlucky innocents who've never had any Granny to tell them what this world is like. Don't look so wild and scared, child. Things aren't as bad as all that. If your Stormy Petrel has had his little pleasures, as no doubt he has, it's quite likely that he'll make a most quiet companion. The worst ones often do. For my part I'd sooner see you married to a man of the world – that's to say if he were a gentleman – than to some hot-headed boy who'd clear off bag and baggage directly he got tired of you and found some other scatter-brain.'

It was at this point that Nelly was encouraged to reveal what she had hitherto held back. ‘He is a lot older than me, Granny. His hair is just a little tiny bit grey, at the sides!’

The old woman patted her on the back and chuckled mischievously. ‘It’ll soon be grey at the top as well,’ she threw out, ‘if you’re as naïve with him as you’ve been sometimes with me.’

She escorted her visitor as far as the end of the drive, between the old beeches.

‘Old Nancy there,’ she said, pointing to a little cottage that stood just at the corner where the drive left the road, ‘takes lodgers sometimes. But no hurry, my dear, no hurry. Bring him up to see me as soon as you like. And don’t let your thoughts run too quickly ahead!’ This final word seemed to her advisable, considering the radiant expression that came into Nelly’s face when she mentioned the possibility of Nancy’s cottage.

‘Oh youth! youth!’ sighed the old lady as she returned alone to her house, ‘but I always knew she was never properly in love with that ruffian Canyot. I wonder if number two does care at all? Oh youth! Oh youth!’

Chapter 4

AT THE VERY moment when, in the house of his enemy, his betrothed was drinking tea, the ‘ruffian Canyot’, as that same enemy had styled him, was seated with his sketchbook on the bank of an old moat-like pond only five or six miles away.

This pond fronted a ruined priory now converted into a farmhouse and was a place of rare imaginative possibilities.

By his side stood a child of about eleven, ugly and untidy, but with large intelligent eyes, eyes that surveyed the young man’s face with intent concentrated sympathy.

‘We’re friends, eh?’ said Robert Canyot.

The little girl nodded furiously and frowned a little.

‘And you can’t tease me and order me about, as most friends do, because you can’t speak, eh, Sally-Maria?’ Once more the child nodded.

‘Because, you know, I found out last night that a grown-up person who I thought loved me best of all didn’t really and truly love me; not in her deep-down heart; not as you will love, I hope, someone some day, Sally-Maria.’

The child made a quick sudden movement with her hands as if in protest. Then she stooped down and kissed his sleeve. Canyot patted her gently on the head. ‘Yes, when they’re grown up they’re not faithful and true like you kiddy. Better let them go. Don’t you think so, Sally-Maria? No use trying to hold them when they want to go.’ He continued for a while sketching in silence, the child watching every movement of his pencil in fascinated absorption. ‘How many times have I been here, Sally-Maria?’

The little girl smiled at him at last and held up four fingers. ‘As many as that? You’ve watched with me four times – four long afternoons; and you’re not tired of me yet!. You can't be a real girl, Sally-Maria. You must be a bird or a cat or a squirrel. Perhaps you're a goblin. But you can't be a girl. If you were I should be looking about for you everywhere today. I should be saying to myself, "Where's Sally-Maria gone?" And you'd be off with some nice new friend! And then if you did come back, just out of pity, you'd look at me sideways, wondering to yourself how you ever could have cared for such a stupid fellow. Wouldn't you, Sally-Maria?'

The dumb child shook her head violently at this and even made a strange inarticulate sound with her mouth – a sound that resembled the whistling rattle of a missel thrush.

'I tell you what I must do. I must come up here tomorrow if it's a fine day, and bring my painting things and try and paint all this. I've sketched it often enough so I ought to make a good thing out of it, don't you think so, little water rat? Ah! that's what you are, a faithful little water rat.' The scene before him was certainly one of remarkable, if somewhat melancholy, significance. Dark laurel bushes were reflected in sombre greenish-black water, and a group of scotch-firs, looking strange and exotic in that Sussex landscape, stood out against the mossy buttressed wall of the farm building. Where the buildings ended there arose another wall, composed not of masonry but of clipped ilex, solid and impenetrable, a living fortress of perennial darkness, at this time of the year lightened just a little by the sprouting of new evergreen leaves.

Between both these walls, the animate one and the inanimate one, and the edge of the pond, there grew in rank profusion a mass of succulent umbelliferae, their transparent stalks and greenish-white flowers looking as if they were plants of darkness and moonlight enduring for a while the unnatural rays of the sun, while they waited for the diurnal return of their native obscurity.

'That's what you are, a faithful little water rat!' repeated the painter, looking jeeringly into the great eyes of the ugly dumb child. 'And what's more, I'm afraid you won't have a very happy life unless you learn to betray and change and flatter and tell huge howling lies.'

The child made ghastly movements with its throat and palate and emitted a sound like the noise made by the corn-crake.

'What's that, Sally-Maria; what's that you're saying? You don't want to live a happy life unless you can be faithful and keep promises and not deceive? Go and eat hemlock roots then, little water rat, like the great Socrates, and leave this world of human beings to lie and lie and lie and be pretty and happy! Socrates wasn't a beauty, Sally-Maria. He was very very ugly. He was the ugliest person ever born. But he couldn't bear to deceive people. He spoke right out what he thought. Perhaps that's why they turned him into an owl. You hear owls at night, don't you Sally-Maria? Do you remember when we saw that great white one over there? I told you what it was then; I told you not to be afraid. Whenever you hear that old fellow now, when you lie in bed, you must say to yourself: he's a kind one, he's an honest one, he never eats little faithful water rats. He just hoots and hoots and hoots because human beings are so false!'

Two men came round the hedge corner at that moment and stopped by their side. 'You'm talking to our little Sal, mister, I see, same's usual,' said one of them, the simple-headed foreman of the place. 'Yes, sure enough. I most always sees 'un talkin' wi' the maidy when 'ee comes hereabouts,' remarked the other, a frail wraith of a man but heavily bearded, as though a human beard should grow upon a ghost-face and be more palpable and real than the countenance to which it belonged.

'Making a picture there I see, mister?' continued the foreman – 'I'd had the old place cleaned a bit for 'ee and polished up like if I'd a' known you was goin’ to do it. ’Tis a queer old place like to live in, day in, day out. But, lord alive, we’ve got to live as well as we may somewheres, so’s to die comfortable and as late as us may. That’s what I sez to Passon Moreton, I sez.’

‘Ho! Ho! Ho!’ laughed the wraith-like carter, while his goat-beard wagged and shook. ‘That’s what a’ sez – nothing short o’ that. A terrible old hole, a’ sez, and his Reverence had to take it from ‘un.’

‘Live as well, day in, day out, as the belly allows for, in these up-down times, so’s to die as late as the Lord be willing,’ repeated the foreman, planting his feet wide apart and leering at the universe through little screwed-up eyes. Once more the carter’s frail form shook with merriment, at this daring piece of wit. That’s just what ‘ee sez and Passon Moreton ‘eed a got to take it from ‘un, ‘ee ‘ad, meek as a lamb.’

The young artist made as though he would resume his work, but the two men seemed disinclined for some reason to leave his side, Behind his back, as he sat hunched up upon a fallen log, they were now making mute signs to each other, while the little dumb girl stared in amazement at them.

‘Tell ’im plain out,’ whispered the bearded shadow to the burly confounder of parsons, ‘it mayn’t be as us thinks it is, anyway knowing is knowing and the written word’s the written word.’

The burly man fumbled in his pocket and produced a dirty scrap of newspaper.

The preoccupied painter, glancing up at the child in front of him, caught such a look of alarm upon her face that he turned his head sharply. ‘Anything the matter?’ he inquired.

The foreman walked slowly round and stood in front of him, while the carter, shuffling uneasily after his superior, peered round at the hedge, the bushes, the pond and the hemlocks, as if expecting a sudden onrush of interested spectators hurrying to witness this dramatic occurrence.

‘Us seed ‘ee from the yard, us did, mister,’ murmured the second man, giving his stammering companion a little dig in the side, ‘an us thought the sooner we’d ‘a told ‘ee what ’twas ‘as been and got itself brought to light in them newspapers, the sooner ‘ee’d be acquainted with the injured party, like.’

‘‘Tweren’t I and’twern’t Charley as read about this terrible thing,’ murmured the lusty foreman in a tone of profound apology, evidently fearing, as some ancient slave of the house of Oedipus might once have feared, lest the bearer of evil news should himself meet with disaster.

‘No! ‘tweren’t Mr Priddle and ‘tweren’t I what discovered that your mother had been runned over by a railway train.’ Twas old Miss Stone what lives over the hill ‘as told us.’

Robert Canyot leapt to his feet and snatched the bit of paper out of the man’s hand. It was a brief statement that a lady who gave a London address had been knocked down by a shunted track at Selshurst Station and had been carried to the hospital. Her name was given as Mrs Canyot of Maida Vale. A horrible cold shiver ran down the spine of the young man and for a moment he felt dizzy. His poor sweet darling mother! She must have wanted to pay him a surprise visit. But why? It was hardly credible that she should do such a thing at her age and with her methodical habits. It couldn’t be true! He looked at the notice again, holding it with a hand that trembled. Maida Vale? There could hardly be another Mrs Canyot who lived in that district. It must be his mother. And yet – to come like that – without telling him. It was utterly and entirely unlike her. He stood gazing helplessly at the paper in his hand calculating remote chances.

Robert Canyot was an only son. His father had been a wine merchant, a man of the same type as John Ruskin’s father, combining shrewdness, puritanism, and a certain queer turn or twist for what he regarded as ‘art’.

The little lady of Maida Vale had done all she could to give her boy everything in this mad world that youth could desire. She had let him run wild. She had sent him to school and removed him from school; sent him to Oxford and removed him from Oxford. Finally she had made over to him half of her income and let him follow the delight of his eyes and the fancies of his heart unrestrained by any responsibility. The result was that the sharp contrast, between his mother’s unbounded infatuation and the rough shocks of the world that cared nothing what became of him, made out of quite sound material a sort of cynical misanthropic queer one.

It was not however a very cynical Robert who gazed now, agitated and startled, into the narrow eyes of Silas Priddle and the great watery eyes of Charley Budge.

‘Hoping there’s no offence, mister, in us having taken the liberty of showing ‘ee that there bit ‘o news. It may be as it’s your poor dear Mother what’s runned into a railway train, and it may be as ’tisn’t. If ’tis, ’tis God’s will. If ’tisn’t I reckons ’tis somebody else’s mother; but seeing how it’s upset ‘ee like I be afeerd it is as ’tis there writ’ down.’

Saying these words the foreman of Toat Farm planted his feet firmly in the long grass, screwed up his eyes, scratched his head, and whistled a few notes of the particular call with which he was accustomed to summon his wife’s ducks at the hour of sunset.

‘Charley,’ he remarked after a long pause, during which the young man read and re-read the bit of newspaper, ‘us must be getting on with the beasts, us must.’

‘Aye, aye, Mr Priddle,’ agreed the other. ‘Beasts must be served funeral days same as wedding days, as old Farmer Patchem used to tell us every time ’is missus ‘ad a still-born. “Life is as ’tis, Charley,” ‘ee used to say, “and them as takes it quiet’ll last longest and their children’s children’ll call ’em blessed.”’

Having uttered these words of wisdom the two sages moved away. ‘The poor lad be dazed-like,’ said the foreman. ‘Did ‘ee mark, Charley, how ‘ee squinnied with the eyes o’n, when ‘ee got tellin of funerals? A reckon ‘ee might o’ bashed it out, ‘ee did, too point, Charley, than ‘ee was. Sort o’ bashed it out, ‘ee did, too plumb and positive. Maybe the old woman isn’t broken up complete. Some of them elderly females is wonderful hard to kill; same as cats I reckon.’

Well! no use standing here, thought Canyot. I must off to Sets-hurst. If it is the poor darling, I shall stay the night there. It may be nothing more than a nervous shock, after all. These papers exaggerate so. And it may not be her at all. But if it isn’t, it’s certainly an odd coincidence.

He felt a small hand softly and timidly pulling at the sleeve that hung empty. Robert had lost his arm in Flanders and possessed two medals for courage in the field. He looked down and patted the child’s head, ashamed of having forgotten her. The little dumb girl was making pitiful sounds with her poor mouth.

‘Poor little water rat!’ he murmured. ‘Poor little Sally-Maria! This is a bad day for us, isn’t it? But never mind! Say your prayers for your friend’s Mummy. Let’s hope that when we meet again all will be well.’

The child put her arms around him holding his sleeve tightly and hiding her face.

‘There – there – my little one,’ he said, extricating himself from her clinging arms. ‘Don’t worry any more about it. Run home to Auntie and be a good little kind faithful water rat. We’ll see each other again. Goodbye and God bless you!’ And he broke from her and started off at a run in the direction of Littlegate. I’ll just tell them where I’m going, he said to himself, so if I’m away for the night they won’t be scared. Even to his own heart he used the pronoun ‘they’, but his thoughts circled round Nelly and the sad walk he had had with her the night before. I’ve go to face it, he said to himself as he followed the pack-horse track along the lower slopes of the Downs. If she has never really cared for me as she thought she did, I suppose I can’t blame her. But if she’s simply fickle, and just flattered by that cunning old Frenchy’s blarney – well then, to the devil with her! She’s no better than a flirtatious little cat!

The path Canyot followed through the late afternoon sunshine lay through the open country. Its height above the valley gave him a clear view of many outstretched white roads and lanes. As he approached the widespread park-like slopes that rose up from West Horthing to the crest of the hills he obtained an unimpeded survey over the whole winding length of the narrow chalk track which led from Furze Lodge to Littlegate.

‘Hullo!’ he cried suddenly and came to a dead stop, breathing hard. ‘I seem to know that figure! Am I going dotty with all this fuss, or is it really her? It’s certainly a girl. How absurd I am! It’s probably Betsy-Anne’s Rose taking the washing home for her mother. No! It can’t be Rose. That girl’s walking just the way she walks.’ He ran at top speed for almost five hundred yards. Then he stopped again. ‘She’s picking flowers,’ he cried. ‘It’s Nelly! and he set off at a tremendous pace across the remaining piece of parkland. Through the patches of newly budded bracken-fern he sped furiously, tripping and stumbling over the rabbit holes and taking the smaller juniper bushes in a series of flying leaps. ‘How mad I am!’ he said to himself at last, when bursting through a thicket of hazel bushes and skirting a huge clump of gorse that barred his way, he scrambled down a bank into the white sheep-track he had seen from above. ‘How mad I am!’ She’s probably made up her mind to give me the chuck. She’s as likely as not dead nuts on that ‘free verse’ fellow. Curse his blood, coming here and turning her head! And yet here I am running after her as if she were as fond of me as ever! Running after her to tell her all about mother, as if she would post off to Selshurst with me! I wonder if she will be a little bit shocked and sorry. Maybe she will. Maybe a real shock, and having to sympathize a bit, will do her good. And the young man suppressed one of those funny inhuman impious thoughts that come to the best of us at certain junctures and crises.

He had as a matter of fact no difficulty at all in overtaking the girl. She was so preoccupied with all the queer opinions recentlyflung at her head that she walked along in a careless absorbed manner, stopping mechanically to pick a wild-flower here and there but twisting her thoughts and her anxieties round every new plant she added to her nosegay. She was resting on a sloping bank, yellow with bird’s foot trefoil and cistus when he finally approached her. He lessened his pace so as to recover his breath, and she waved at him the little stick she carried, which he had himself cut from the hedge some months before.

‘I knew it was you,’ he began when he came up to her. ‘I saw you from above West Horthing. I knew you by your walk.’ He wavered and hesitated in front of her for a flickering moment. Then he stooped down and took her gently by the wrist.

‘Take care!’ she said, smiling, as with her free hand she laid down her nosegay; but she allowed herself to be pulled up on to her feet and to be pressed close to him in the old fierce way, at which she used to laugh so gaily, calling it ‘the one-armed bear’s hug’.

He kissed her cool soft cheeks and her gentle unresisting mouth. He kissed her closed eyelids.

‘That’ll do, Robert!’ she cried at last, making a struggle to release herself.

He gave a sigh and let her go. He had not failed to notice that with the least little movement of her head, in spite of her passivity, she had, before he released her, moved her lips away from his. And even while she had yielded her face to him she had not once kissed him in return.

‘Oh Nelly!’ he cried. ‘My little Nelly! You do care for me just a tiny bit? You haven’t got quite tired of me?’

They sat down together on the bank and she let him keep tight hold of her hand. Her forehead was puckered into a miserable helpless frown and her eyes, dry and clear and sad, gazed far away from him over the receding Downs.

‘You do love me still, Nelly darling?’ he kept repeating in a dull useless chant, as one might go on reading from a book to a hearer who listened no longer. ‘You do love me a little bit still, sweetheart?’

She felt absolutely unable to say a word to him. It was one of those moments when women are driven back to grope after some language that is older than the language of words; older, deeper, sadder, gentler; to call upon it, and peradventure not to find it.

‘If only you love me, still,’ he went on, ‘I don’t care what you do. We needn’t be married, Nelly– not for years and years. We needn’t be engaged any more. You can go quite free of me; absolutely free. If only I can feel that it isn’t your love that has changed I can bear anything!’

Her lips moved. She drew her head away. She picked up the flowers from the grass and began mechanically sorting them in her lap.

Then, stricken by a sharp pang of remorse, he leapt to his feet. ‘Nelly,’ he said, taking the piece of newspaper from his pocket and throwing it on to her knees, ‘read that!’

She frowned for a moment as she smoothed out the printed scrap. Then, when she had read it, she too jumped up, staring at him with wide horrified eyes.

‘Goodbye old girl,’ he said, forcing himself to smile, ‘it’s a bit frightening though, isn’t it? I’m off to Selshurst anyway. Of course it may be nothing at all. I mean it may be someone else’s mother. But I’m off anyway. Goodbye dear. If it isn’t mother I’ll let you know tonight, if I’m not back too late. If it is, of course I shall stay with her. Somehow the more I think of it the less I can believe it’s really her. There might easily be, you know, some other people of our name in Maida Vale. You see it only says Maida Vale; and mother’s address is seven Cannerby Place.’

‘But Robert, but Robert—’ the girl gasped. ‘This is dreadful for you. Poor dear, poor dear!’ And this time she did herself kiss him tenderly, though only on the cheek.

He tore himself away from her, and started off, without another word, running at full pace. When he was about a hundred yards away, he stopped and threw his sketchbook into the hedge, making a signal to her to pick it up for him. She waved her bunch of flowers; and then with a quick irrepressible movement she kissed her hand.

He soon was concealed by a great thicket of furze bushes and she got no further sight of him. But as he ran, he could not help wondering to himself whether, if it were his mother and if she were really hurt, this sudden disaster to one person he loved wouldn’t turn again towards him, with a deeper understanding, the wavering heart of the other person he loved. Thus did the movements of those little silvery fish of impious thought that rise from the purest soul shock the mind of this youth with their queer leapings.

His anxiety, his suspension of mind, his growing fear, stretching forward towards the prostrate form of the woman in the hospital, blent as he ran with the image of the young girl standing in the path kissing her hand and waving her bunch of flowers.

And what of Nelly's own feelings? The very bitterness of the cruel comedy of things was in her heart. Why had she, oh! why had she, let him kiss her like that, in the old manner, with the old freedom? And why must she needs have given way to an impulse like that and have waved him so natural, so spontaneous, so loving a farewell? He would naturally think, how could he help thinking – poor dear! – that all her vague flutterings to escape during their walk of misunderstanding amounted to nothing at all, were a mere feminine mood, a mere girlish caprice.

Why couldn't she have drawn back honestly from him, and emphatically and plainly made it clear to him that the whole thing had been a mistake, her mistake, her unpardonable, inconsiderate, blind mistake?

But the poor boy, harassed and terrified over this accident, how could she do anything else but pity him and be sympathetic? But she could have been sympathetic, without – without kissing her hand to him! But she wanted to kiss her hand to him. She wanted, at that moment – he looked so wretched, poor darling! – to give him a very nice kiss. Was she a bad girl? Was she an unnatural horrid creature, able to love two men at the same time?

Nelly pondered long and deeply as she walked slowly home. So many contrary emotions had seized her and shaken her during the last twenty-four hours that her young brain was in a whirl. This unexpected hesitation in herself, in her own heart, in the very depths of her soul, was a quite new element in the situation. What had happened? Had she got out of her trap, broken its iron teeth, tossed it away from her, only to find herself regretting her freedom? The more she tried to analyse her feelings the more puzzled she became. She had never suspected that any appeal from Robert could move and stir her as she had been stirred. She had imagined him getting angry, calling her evil names, abusing her, and going off in a rage. She had called up all her pride, in advance, to meet the onslaught of his pride.

But it had not been like that at all. He had shown no pride, no anger. He had only shown a pitiful gentleness, a puzzled unhappiness. And it was nice, it was soothing and sweet, to be hugged so tight by him and to feel his poor dear unlost arm so strong and firm about her.

What an ironic thing it would be, she thought, if the pity she felt for him as soon as she had made up her mind to jilt him brought her at last, for the first time, really to love him!

She did love him, in a way. She knew that well enough. But it wasn't the 'in-love' way. It was different perhaps from his being a brother – but not very different. Was it, after all, a horrid and unnatural thing to love a young man one wasn't 'in love' with? Ought one to have hated being touched by him, being hugged and kissed by him? She certainly hadn't hated it. She had liked it. But that was only as long as she could stop it just when she liked! But when you were married to a person you couldn't stop these things just when you liked. Therefore it was not right to marry someone you only loved, but weren't in love with – because of not being able to arrange these things! Nelly reached home thoroughly confused, a little ashamed of herself, and very remorseful because she had talked so freely to Mrs Shotover. That had certainly been a mistake! If, as the old adage says, 'it is better to be off with the old love before you are on with the new' it is certainly a very unsafe thing to talk about 'the new one' before you have made up your own mind! She wished most heartily that she had waited a little before going to West Horthing. As a matter of honest fact, if Nelly's guardian angel could have been induced to reveal to us what the girl hid scrupulously even from her own heart, it would have been shown that the cynical assumptions poured into her ears by Mrs Shotover had in an imperceptible manner dropped a tiny drop of poison into her vague delicious dreamings about Richard Storm. She seemed to know where she was so well with Robert, and to know so little where she was with the more shadowy figure of the visitor from Paris!

Chapter 5

An aeroplane traveller armed with a good telescope would have been able to observe from his airy watchtower during the midafternoon hours of that eventful day three separate groups of human beings linked together by thoughtwaves but completely ignorant of each other's movements. He would have seen Nelly among the roses of her friend's garden. He would have seen Canyot talking to the farm men by the edge of Toat Great Pond. And finally he would have seen, seated in absorbed conversation under the churchyard wall, the Reverend John Mbreton and Mr Richard Storm.

His telescope would have revealed these various persons and he would have regarded them with the Olympian indifference of the high careless gods of the Epicurean hierarchy.

What he would not have seen – unless he had been a god himself – were those quivering invisible magnetic waves, which it is difficult not to believe must pass backwards and forwards, fast as thought itself, between persons who are linked together by some impending dramatic crisis.

Storm had arrived at Littlegate not long after Nelly's departure for West Horthing and he had boldly presented himself at the vicarage door. Grace, issuing forth, in her young mistress's absence, on an emotional errand of her own, had been reluctantly compelled to turn back into the house and convey the visitor into her master's study. This she hurriedly did with no anterior warning, flinging open the door and announcing in stentorian tones, 'Mr Worm to see you, sir!'

Richard, hearing the door closed with a bang behind him and becoming immediately conscious of a vague zoological garden odour caused by the innumerable stuffed birds and beasts with which the room was crowded, felt for the moment as if he had been pushed into the den of some sort of formidable animal. His consciousness of something odd about it all and a little disturbing was not diminished when he remarked the grizzled scalp of the old man and his wrinkled forehead emerging from beyond the edge of a littered table very much as some horrific ‘manifestation’ might materialize at a successful seance.

John Moreton did not get up from his knees to greet his visitor. He just blinked at him and frowned, placing one large hand, like a great paw, upon an open sheet of botanical specimens and the other upon a bottle of glue as if he were apprehensive lest the intruder should pounce upon them and clear them away or carry them off.

He looked so exactly like a medieval miser caught in the act of counting his treasure that Richard was tempted to open the conversation by assuring his host that he was not a thief.

Instead of doing this, however, a happy instinct led him to remove from his buttonhole and display to the old man a little flower, quite unknown to him, which he had picked by the edge of a muddy ditch.

This well-omened plant turned out to be a stray specimen of water avens which the old man assured him must have been carried there, in its embryonic state, by some migratory bird out of a neighbouring county.

To investigate the water avens the Reverend Moreton did get up from behind the table and was induced to give a certain portion of the attention demanded by the flower to the guest who held it in his hand.

To retain his hold upon the naturalist’s attention, thus with difficulty won, Richard hurriedly began putting questions to him, more imaginative than scientific, about the various stuffed birds hanging on the wall. He began, as a matter of fact, to display a genuine curiosity about some of the less usual among these, and in admiring their beauty made a few allusions to such of their kind as he had seen, or fancied he had seen, in his travels through France.

One naturalistic topic led to another, and it was not long before Storm was examining, this time with actual enthusiasm, the vicar's fine collection of British birds' eggs. It was delightful to ransack the recesses of childish memories in regard to these beautiful little microcosms of the mysterious maternal forces. He suppressed a mischievous desire to ask the old fanatic some wild Sir Thomas Browne question as to the mother of Apollo or the offspring of the phoenix, and he reverently held up to the light, one by one, the strangely scrawled eggs of buntings, the beautiful blue eggs of redstarts, the olive-green eggs of nightingales and that incredibly small rondure, like an ivory-coloured pellet, out of which, if science had not interfered, should have emerged a tiny golden-crested wren!

He made himself so agreeable to the old man by his sincere delight in the beauty of these things, and his modest relish for the pedantic pleasure of 'calling them all by name', that John Moreton did what he very rarely did for any human being – his own daughter not excepted – and invited him to come out into the churchyard that he might show him an inviolate specimen of the nest of a meadow pipit.

Having enjoyed the spectacle of the snug security of the wise pipit's retreat – for the old collector had his full compliment of this species – Richard found no difficulty in cajoling the vicar to sit down with him for a while under the high sunny wall and engage in philosophical conversation.

The writer was indeed quite captivated by the old gentleman's originality and scientific passion. It puzzled him a good deal that his young friend had not told him more about her father, had not made clear to him what a remarkable and unusual man he was. I bet, he thought to himself, that ass of a Canyot has no idea what a treasure this old fellow is! I hope my little girl is kind to him. If she isn't I shall give her a very serious scolding. Scolding? I shall whistle her down the wind, for an undiscerning little impious baggage!

From general philosophic topics of a semi-scientific character, in handling which Richard found Mr Moreton to be quite as imaginative and daring in his speculations as the boldest modern thinker, they passed by insensible degrees to the great 'sphinx problem' of the unknown reality lying behind it all.

'It would interest me to hear,' Storm at length ventured to say, 'how a man of science like yourself reconciles your priestly functions with what we've been talking about. I've known several scientific priests in France and they do it by keeping the two realms rigidly and inflexibly apart. But I never quite feel as if that were a satisfactory solution. Both views of life are so entirely natural and human; and both, it seems to me, spring from the same fundamental passion in the human soul – the passion to grasp life in its inmost secret.'

The old man looked at him from under his shaggy eyebrows with a look of slow interrogative caution; the caution of an old peasant who hesitates to reveal some piece of instructive local knowledge which to him has a deep inexplicable value.

Richard's direct candid gaze in answer to this peering scrutiny seemed to satisfy the man; for, prodding the ground with his heavy cane, he searched for the exact words in which to sum up his position.

'What I've come to feel,' he said, 'and I speak as an ordinary secular layman in the eyes of the world, for I intend to resign my living (though to myself, as you will doubtless understand, I shall always be a priest), is that there are two entirely separate conceptions – the conception of God round which have gathered all the tyrannies, superstitions, persecutions, cruelties, wars, which have wounded the world; and the conception of Christ round which has gathered all the pity and sympathy and healing and freedom which has saved the world.

'The conception of Satan has been torn asunder between these two. As Lucifer the Light-Bearer, as the Eternal Rebel, he is an aspect of Christ. As the Infernal Power of malice and opposition to life, he is an aspect of God.

'To my mind the world is an arena of perpetual conflict between these two forces, one of which I renounce and defy; the other I worship in the Mass.'

'Pee-wit! pee-wit!' cried the plovers over the old man's head as he concluded this strange statement of heresy; and Richard thought to himself – On which side would he put the cry of that bird?

But he answered aloud: 'Your view is not a new one, sir. William Blake seems to have felt something of what you say – and there are modern French poets, too, who have—'

The old man waved his hand in the air with a proud gesture. 'What I've told you, young man, I've learnt from beetles and mosses, from shrikes and redshanks, from newts and slow-worms. It is not a poetical fancy with me. It is my discovery. It is what I've been thinking out for myself, for sixty-odd years. And what I've got to do now is what all discoverers have to do, I've got to pay the price!'

'Pee-wit! pee-wit!' cried the agitated plovers, wheeling in circles round the field behind them.

'It seeems to me,' remarked Richard after a moment's hesitation; for his habitual desire to propitiate rather than to contradict made opposition difficult to him – ‘it seems to me that you have avoided the chief problem. Surely the human instinct which has in all ages groped after something it calls God is really seeking a reconciliation between your two forces? Surely, sir, you will admit, constituted as we are, we cannot escape from the notion of some fundamental unity in things? And isn’t it a desperate pathetic desire in us that this unity should be essentially good rather than evil, that has led to the theological conception of a Father of the Universe?’

The old man started up to his feet with an angry leap. ‘Theological!’ he cried beating the top of the mossy wall with his fists. ‘That’s just what it is – theological!’

‘It might just as well,’ muttered Richard, losing his propitiatory manner, for something bitter and personal in the old man’s tone irritated and incensed him, ‘be called human. For not to want the universe to be good at bottom is surely an inhuman feeling.’

‘Pee-wit! pee-wit!’ cried the plovers in the field behind them.

To their intelligence, the appearance of the old naturalist’s grizzled pate, across the familiar saxifrages and pennyworts and kiss-me-quicklys of that old wall, must have been very menacing.

‘You will hardly deny, sir,’ went on Richard, though a secret monitor in his heart kept whispering to him You’re a fool to annoy him; you’re a fool to argue with him, ‘that our Lord himself believed in what we usually mean when we use the expression God?’

The Reverend John Moreton stared down at his visitor with a look of infinite contempt.

‘The Christ I celebrate in the sacrament,’ he said, ‘has nothing to do with ignorant repetitions of badly reported misunderstandings. The few great authentic logia which I adhere to make no mention of the Eidolon Vulgaris of which you speak!’

Richard had really lost his temper now. ‘You are a very good example, sir,’ he flung out, ‘of what happens when a Church separates itself from the traditions of Christendom!’

‘It is reason, it is science, it is common sense!’ roared the old man. ‘It is a confounded exhibition of obstinate private judgement!’ shouted the writer back to him.

‘Pee-wit! pee-wit!’ cried the birds behind the wall.

At that moment a faded specimen of the butterfly called a painted lady fluttered rapidly across the graves.

Richard’s outburst had left him with a sense of shamefaced remorse. He certainly had behaved like an arrant fool in contradicting the old gentleman.

He moved forward towards the dilapidated insect that kept wheeling backwards and forwards over the orchis maculata, newly planted on Cecily Moreton’s mound.

‘What’s that, sir? What ever kind of butterfly is that? I have never seen anything like that before!’

He removed his hat and made as though he would pursue the swift-winged creature.

‘A painted lady!’ muttered the old man sulkily. But the naturalist’s vanity was stronger in him than the theologian’s rancour. ‘You’ve never seen one? You young men are very unobservant! Painted ladies are well known in France.’ ‘Not that kind, sir, surely?’ cried the cunning biographer of the poet of the demimonde. Ours in France are lighter on the wing’; and he pursued the faded wanton with more discretion than success.

The old man was completely won over by this boyish display. He stumbled after his antagonist and laid his hand on his arm. ‘Let it go!’ he said chuckling grimly. ‘She’s one too many for you. Many a time have I hunted them for miles over the Downs. In some seasons they’re very rare.

They're interesting little things! Very prettily marked when you get a good specimen.

'The North American kind is just a little different. Come in, my boy, come in, and I'll show you how they differ. It must be a case of adaptation. Their woods are thicker, they say – more undergrowth.' And the two men returned towards the house in perfect unanimity. The painted lady had found the secret.

'Yes,' said John Moreton as they sat down together after an exhaustive investigation of marble whites, chalk-hill blues, purple emperors, clouded yellows, green hair-streaks, red admirals; 'Yes, I shall resign my living. But thanks to the young man to whom my daughter is engaged – I have a daughter, sir; she's away somewhere – I don't know where'; and he waved his hand vaguely – 'it will not be necessary for me to leave this village. My daughter and this young man – he's considerate to me; he knows the value of my work – have taken a cottage nearby, north of where we are now, and they propose that I shall live with them. It's a good plan. The young man will have the advantage of my scientific knowledge. He's a painter. And I shall … I shall be indebted to him for my humble wants.'

Richard Storm was reduced to a depressed silence by his host's words. He stared out of the french window at the lawn and the trees. He felt miserably tired, all the spirit gone from him and a vague ennui turning everything to emptiness. Of course that was it! He might have known it. He had known it. Of course she was engaged to this aggressive youth; and of course her marriage was necessary to her father's happiness!

The point was: did she, in spite of appearances, love the fellow? If so – and it seemed likely enough – there was nothing for him to do but clear off elsewhere. The idea of settling down to write poetry in the neighbourhood of this happy domestic arrangement didn't appeal to him. His attraction to Nelly had gone a little too far for that Confound it all! What a thing life was. The day before yesterday – even yesterday – he had felt that his great new idea, that high mystical doctrine which had gathered in his mind, was the one important thing in existence. Nelly's white fragile face and fair silken hair were only traceries upon the tapestry, no more really essential to him than were the green hieroglyphs at the back of the hair-streak's wings.

But since he had last seen her, at the lodge gate of the close, 'the perfume and suppliance' of her personality had been growing steadily upon him, gathering importance, insinuating themselves into his deeper consciousness.

A horrid thought, black for him as the sooty wings of the rooks he now saw crossing the skyline, flapped down into his mind, trying to find lodgement; the thought, namely, that it might be the fair thing, the honest thing, the kind thing, just to clear off and leave the field quite free for Canyot 'to bustle in'. Are there any men, he asked himself, really so noble and unselfish that when they see that their presence has caused trouble to any human circle, and is likely to cause more, they just move off, say goodbye, clear out? Yes! he supposed there were such people. He sighed heavily. And how often do such heroic renunciations only cause greater unhappiness in the end? What a world!

His meditations were interrupted by the old naturalist's giving vent to a tremendous snore, loud as the snort of a slumbrous buffalo.

Exhausted with his ardent cicerone work among the dead forms of those filmy winged people of the air, the vicar had fallen asleep.

A desperate desire for tea awoke in the heart of Richard Storm. It occurred to him very strongly that a considerable portion of his present depression arose from the absence of this beverage. He looked at his watch. It was a quarter past five. Tea I must and will have, 'he said firmly to himself,' but heaven knows how I'm going to get it! I can't quite shake the old fellow by the shoulder and bawl in his ears, "Get me some tea!" and I know by instinct there isn't a female in the house.' He stared at the sleeper. The great Schopenhauer-like head looked very noble in its weary passivity.

No! No, he thought, I can't disturb an old man's dreams to satisfy my incorrigible tea-lust. I'll try the farm. If they can put up with Canyot, they can put up with me. I'll try anyhow.

With these intentions he went very softly to the door, opened it, let himself out, passed through the hallway on tiptoe, and emerged into the garden.

Storm strode quickly across the intervening village green and knocked at the door of the farm. It was a tumbledown, ramshackle old place, with pigs and fowls and ducks and geese wandering about, where beds of trim flowers might well have been.

But Mrs Winsome, the farmer's wife, although the grimmest of women, seemed quite pleased to welcome him.

'Tea? Certainly, sir! Friend of Mr Canyot's? There's been a telegram for him since early this morning. The boy brought it from Selshurst. Please to come in and excuse everything! Please to sit down. Kettle's on the boil. Won't keep you long.'

The hard-featured woman did not keep him long. Indeed, before five minutes had elapsed from his entering her parlour, he was seated before a charming tea tray pouring out for himself cup after cup of the divine nectar.

After the first three cups and the first three pieces of home-made bread and butter, Mr Richard Storm regarded the universe in quite a different manner. He no longer felt the least inclination to be unselfish and leave the field to his rival. He felt inspirited and adventurous, ready to deal with many Mr Canyots. He felt that if he could see Nelly Moreton once more, have her to himself for one long afternoon in these enchanting lanes and fields, he would be able to snatch her out of all her past.

As for the 'what next?' which naturally must follow this soul snatching, he did not at that hour, so irresponsible were the pleasant fumes of Mrs Winsome's tea, give a thought to the matter.

It was so lovely just to feel oneself growing young again, to feel all those vague sweet delicious tremors one feared were quite irrecoverable, once more thrilling one's nerves, that any cold-blooded virtuous interrogations as to 'what would come of it all' seemed most singularly irrelevant.

He found himself, in place of any serious thought, just building up fantastic childish castles in the air. Why shouldn't he, just as well as this sulky young painter, take a house in this charming spot, marry Nell out of hand, and support the old man for his remaining days?

Having liberally compensated the grim lady of Wind Shuttle Farm for her excellent entertainment and watched her shaking the tablecloth to the ducks and the geese and the chickens, Richard, after a hurried glance towards church and vicarage, started to make his way back to Selshurst.

'Never rush things!' he said to himself. 'Women don't like to be greeted by their male friends when they come back tired to their domestic hearths. They prefer the position of defence, of being prepared on their own ground. Above all never take women by surprise – except when a traitor within the gates beckons to you over the wall!'

Fortifying himself with these maxims, for Richard was a veritable Rochefoucauld, as far as theory was concerned, he swung along the road to the old city in high and boyish spirits.

He was about two miles from Selshurst when he heard behind the sound of one running.

At first he thought it might be a runaway horse or cow, but before the runner came in sight he recognized the steps of a man and of a man in athletic condition.

Funny! he thought to himself. It can't be the old gentleman? Who can it be?

His suspense was not very pleasantly ended by the appearance of Robert Canyot.

The young painter pulled up breathless, and saluted him with a couple of gasped-out words of greeting.

'Going to Selshurst?' he panted, wiping his forehead. 'That's where I'm going.'

'So I see,' said Richard drily, 'and going at a good pace.'

'To the hospital,' added the runner.

Storm clutched his arm. 'Nothing wrong at Littlegate, I hope?'

'Nothing that I know of. It's my mother – an accident – at least I'm afraid so. Shall know soon.'

Somehow it gave Richard a most curious feeling to think of this troublesome youth possessed of a mother – and a mother who'd had an accident.

From being an irritating automaton to be kicked out of the way, he suddenly became a human person with a skin that could be pricked, with flesh that could bleed.

'Oh I am so very sorry!' he murmured sympathetically. 'I hope it's nothing serious – but of course, as you say, you don't know. Have you only just heard by wire or something?'

'Walk a little faster, do you mind?' was the youth's response.

Richard quickened his pace. 'I can run with you for a bit if you like,' he said.

‘No! No! Get my breath. Can’t go it like that all the way. Make no difference.’

‘Does your mother live in this neighbourhood?’ inquired the older man as they strode along side by side.

‘Here?’ Oh no! London. Maida Vale. That’s what the paper said. That’s what’s made me afraid it is her.’

And the youth explained briefly to his companion by what chance he had learned of the accident.

Richard insisted upon falling into a dog-trot with him; and thus they soon arrived at the outskirts of the town. ‘May I come with you to the hospital?’ he asked panting, when they had secured directions as to its whereabouts. ‘I don’t want to be a nuisance or to intrude – but I might be of service – one never can tell.’

Canyot expressed himself as grateful for the offer; and a little later they mounted side by side the steps of the quiet, unprofessional-looking building where Selshurst tended its sick.

A short hurried interview at the office in the hallway satisfied the young man that it really was his mother who had met with the injury.

‘I’ll wait for you here,’ said Richard, noticing with sympathetic alarm that the boy’s face had grown suddenly white when he had finished his interview and obtained permission to see the patient.

Canyot nodded to him in a dazed sort of way, and accompanied by a stolid attendant disappeared in the lift.

The writer sank down on a bench in the lobby and fell into nervous and troubled thought.

From the interior of the newly painted lift, as it carried the youth out of his sight, had been wafted that well-known smell of ether, reminding him painfully of old wartime tragedies.

The coming and going of uniformed nurses, scared white-faced visitors, silent impassive officials, deepened his sense of depression and gloom.

All his recent irresponsibility left him, like something shallow and out of place, and the time-old weight of humanity’s bitter lot upon earth laid its burden upon him.

He realized then clearly enough where it was that he had failed hitherto in his attempts after a more enduring poetic method. He had contented himself with isolated ‘occasional’ poems; forgetting that it is only in a certain accumulated weight of human vision, carried steadily on in a premeditated direction, that any value beyond mere nuances of technique is attained.

And as he sat waiting, full of genuine anxiety as to what the young man might be finding up there in some bare cabin of that great ship of human wreckage, it came vividly upon him that he could never fight quite freely, quite unscrupulously for his own hand and his own pleasure, in a world where all men are bitten by the same adder’s tooth.

He made no vow, he registered no purpose, but he made a note of the fact that in a place like this those were lucky, both among such as suffered and such as served, who had hands tolerably clean of their fellows’ blood; blood that needed no outward sign of its shedding!

He kept his eye on that fatal lift as it went up and down, the very look of its white paint suggestive of the smell of disaster; and his heart beat a little each time it discharged any person not in hospital dress.

He could not help being thankful that he himself had neither parent nor child – those all too fragile links in the great chain of the world’s suffering!

At last the figure Storm looked for did actually appear.

He knew at once from the way the boy approached him that his mother was dead. Two great strands of his tow-coloured hair hung limp over his forehead. His cheeks were tear-stained. His mouth twitched.

He sat down on the bench by Richard's side without a word and stared straight in front of him, his solitary hand resting upon his knee.

Richard in the helplessness of an outsider touched this great fist and closed his fingers over it.

'I am sorry,' he said. 'I'm afraid things are bad.'

'She's gone,' the boy muttered without moving a muscle.

'Did she know you?' asked Richard.

The young man choked and bit his lip to keep down his sobs. With a fierce effort, shaking his heavy head like a bewildered animal, he turned and looked at the writer, great globular tears running down his cheeks and falling upon the collar of his coat.

Yes! she knew me. They say it was a miracle. She wouldn't let herself go till I'd come to her. She came down to bring me something; she thought it was fame for me at last; an exhibition in New York – a silly invitation. It was just like her to want to bring it to me herself. But what's the damned thing to me now?'

He made an effort to smile and the contortion of his queer corrugated countenance was piteous. 'Oh mother!' he cried stretching his one arm straight out in front of him with the fingers clenched. Then he pulled himself gallantly together and looked quietly and directly into his companion's face. 'You must excuse me,' he said. She was awfully fond of me. She had no one else.'

A hospital nurse with a kind nun-like face approached them. 'We're ready for you,' she said with a sort of wan smile that seemed to Richard as if it were the final indictment of a grief-exhausted planet, addressed to the Unknown.

The youth moved away with her and then suddenly turned and came back.

‘Thank you very much,’ he said, holding out his hand.

Chapter 6

THE SUDDEN CATASTROPHE that had overtaken Mr Canyot produced many drastic effects upon the lives of those whom destiny had entangled with his life.

Soon after his departure to London to superintend his mother's funeral and to settle his business matters and the disposal of the poor lady's small possessions, Richard received a surprising letter from him, addressed to the Crown Inn.

'Dear Mr Storm,' the letter ran. 'It may seem to you a laughable thing that I should write like this, but I want you to feel quite free as far as I am concerned. You well know what I mean by free. I've written to Miss Moreton, sending back certain little things she'd given me, and have asked her to do the same. It is not your fault that you've come between us. It has just happened so. I am writing to you like this because Miss Moreton seems for some reason reluctant to return me what I asked for and I attribute her reluctance to pity. She pities me. This I cannot endure. I will not be the person to take advantage of a great loss to soften a girl's heart where it really belongs to someone else. I shall come down and say goodbye before I start for America; by which time she will have to choose definitely between us. But I did not wish, especially after your kindness to me at the hospital to leave you with the feeling that you also, out of pity, must leave things as they were. I don't want pity from anybody. I don't want to bind anybody. I've lived till now for my work; and I can continue to do so. If however, by any chance in which I cannot believe, you are trifling with Nelly, you may count on it you will have me to deal with. She has no mother and you have seen what her father is like. But I won't have our engagement kept on out of pity. I won't have it! Yours, with gratitude for your kindness, Robert Canyot.'

There was a postscript appended to this letter which read as follows:

'You'd better use my rooms at Mrs Winsome's. I've paid in advance up to August. Board included.'

This singular epistle, and especially the postscript to it, gave Richard Storm an extremely uncomfortable day. He had well understood Nelly's shyness about going up to Mrs Canyot's funeral and was not surprised when in the end she had not gone. But since that decision of hers he had made few efforts to see her, and moreover when they had met, both of them had been so nervous and ill at ease that it had been impossible to talk with any kind of intimacy.

Richard took Canyot's letter with him into the cathedral close and pondered long and wretchedly over it.

The situation was certainly an awkward one. What an extraordinary letter! No – he wasn't conscious of 'trifling' with Nelly Moreton. What the devil was this 'trifling'? But on the other hand he certainly did not feel committed, or as if he were involved with her in any irrevocable way. What a blundering, clumsy, roughshod fellow this Robert was! He felt a very decided anger against him. It was so childish – so ridiculous. Was the boy entirely ignorant of the ways of the world? Or was he, Richard, out of touch with the habits and manners of the middle classes in England?

He fumbled in his memory among his early impressions and ran over hurriedly the English novels he had read since. Did they do this kind of thing in this provincial island? Or had the war produced a new England with queer new customs? The boy wrote to him as if he were his superior officer warning him not to seduce some maiden of a conquered country! It seemed an incredible letter from one artist to another artist, from one nomadic Bohemian to another nomadic Bohemian.

Wasn’t one free to strike up a casual friendship with a charming girl without bringing down upon one the wrath of a furious fiancé?

Return her little gifts to her? Confound the fellow! If he were as touchy and jealous as all that, the child was indeed well rid of him.

But had they quarrelled? That was the point he wanted enlightenment upon. And if they had, had they quarrelled about him? But if they had quarrelled, because the girl had talked to him and seemed to like him, how did he know that she wished to have her engagement broken off on such ridiculous grounds?

She might be thoroughly in love with Canyot still and just hurt in her pride by his hot-headed silly violence. She might even be putting it all down to his upset nerves, to his grief for his mother. It looked as if she cared for him still – her reluctance to send back his ring. But it might also be a very natural refusal to be jostled and hurried and bullied at a moment’s notice.

Choose definitely between us! the fellow said. Never had such rough, boorish, crude, impolite usage been applied to a young woman! They would be lucky if she didn’t whistle them both down the wind!

The whole thing was particularly annoying. Little had he expected that before he had been in England a fortnight he would receive a threatening letter handing over into his keeping an unprotected female!

This letter of Canyot’s putting the matter so bluntly and grossly broke up like a bombshell the delicate sentimental dreamings he had begun to weave around the girl. It drove him to drastic issues and decisions; and he wasn’t at all ready for drastic issues and decisions. Nor was Miss Moreton ready for such things; he felt sure of that. The more he thought of it all the more angry he became with Canyot. Hot-headed conceited young prig! Because he had lost his mother did he think he could dictate their behaviour to half the world? It was extraordinarily annoying. It put both himself and Miss Moreton into such an absurd position. It made the girl look ridiculous and it made himself seem an ill-bred lunatic who had paid court to another man's sweetheart before he had been two hours in her company.

For, after all, what had Canyot to go upon? Nothing at all. Absolutely nothing. He had not been alone with Nelly for a minute except those hours in the canon's garden and the cathedral – except their encounter in the little church.

Was England so queer a place that one couldn't talk to a girl for three-quarters of an hour without having her flung at one's head?

She must have had an awful quarrel with the boy; there could be no mistake about that! But surely, surely, she couldn't have told Canyot that she had ceased to care for him and had begun to care for him – a man she'd only just seen for the second time! It was unthinkable that she should have forgotten all modesty and decency to an extent as fantastic as that. The whole thing was Canyot's damned hot-headed blundering jealousy. If he'd been a Frenchman he would no doubt have challenged him to a duel. The stupid ass! And then this postscript about the room at the farm … It was all so extremely laughable that it was difficult to take it seriously. That girl, who was a thoroughly sensible girl, showed clearly enough that she didn't take it seriously by refusing to send him back his gifts.

She must be furiously angry with him though, if he had written to her in the style he had used to him!

Thus, with the surface of his mind, as if before a jury of people of the world, did Richard pour righteous oil upon his embarrassment.

In that deeper, subtler portion of his being, the part of him that did not condescend to use reason or logic, he was less sure, far less sure, of his position. Down in those depths, without any words, some honest cynical demon told him that Canyot was fatally near the truth. Of course there had been, directly he and Nelly met, and every second they were together, a thrilling vivid undercurrent of sympathy, of understanding. Canyot would have been a very insensitive lover if he hadn't sensed that. He would have been a fool if he hadn't seen it. No doubt he saw things in her expressions, in her tones, in her gestures, that made him know, with the breath of fate itself, that his hour was ended.

No doubt he had challenged her – and, poor innocent inexperienced thing as she was, she had not been able convincingly to meet his challenge. Without meaning to do so, teased and persecuted in his bullying, she had betrayed herself to him. This subtler voice, among Richard's interior demons, was supported in its conclusions by his vanity.

It was as agreeable as it was touching: to think of a sweet young creature like this being driven into a corner till she admitted being more than a little interested in Mr Richard Storm!

Finally, as he rose from his seat under the lime trees, crushing Canyot's letter into his pocket the better, more normal Richard in him decided that the young man had recognized more quickly than either Nelly or himself which way the wind was blowing, and apart from the least admission on her side and simply from devotion to her interests, had brought matters to a head in this erratic manner.

All that day and a good deal of the next was spent by Richard in meditating what he should do in this curious imbroglio. The end of it was that he decided to do nothing at all, except to leave Nelly Moreton alone for a while.

To leave the neighbourhood was out of the question. It would be like running away for the second time.

He replied in a friendly but quite non-committal manner to Canyot's letter and said he would be very glad to see something more of him before he sailed for America. He avoided any mention of Miss Moreton's name. His policy of remaining in retreat for the present and leaving the girl alone was made easier for him by a certain rush of energy in the sphere of his writing.

He wrote steadily for several long uninterrupted mornings and afternoons making a conscious effort to keep the image of Nelly, as well as that other image, far back in the recesses of his consciousness.

What, he thought fantastically to himself on one of these calm days, do these insidious phantoms of people, that for the time being we don't want to think about, these bodiless haunters of our suppressed world, do with one another in that queer twilight? Do they gibber and squeak at one another – these Elises and Nellys – or are they, like the Queen of Carthage in the Elysian fields, silent and disdainful?

He found, as he wrote, that it was possible to reduce all these human entanglements to a vague far-off world that hardly infringed upon the world he visioned in his present humour. This world, of his mystical consciousness, was a world in which the immediate pain of things and the immediate thrill of things were both held back to a certain distance. It was a world in which his immediate pain and his immediate pleasure were taken up and absorbed in the great stream of all the pleasures and pains of the human race.

What he sought to give an enduring expression to, as he took his available words and squeezed out their subtler meanings and tried to make his thought clothe itself, rhythm within rhythm, with these delicate essences, was the large flowing tide of human experience as it gathered in great reiterated waves, under the old pressure of the old dilemmas, and rolled forward and drew back along the sea banks of necessity.

What he groped after was an entrance into some larger consciousness, not remote from this earthly world, but carrying forward, generation after generation, the faint surmises, the dim guesses, the broken half-glimpses, of men and women and, with all these gathered up within it, itself growing more and more responsive to deeper vibrations from the Unknown, more and more aware of itself as the true Son of Man, as the true logos, into whose being had been poured all the thwarted and baffled aspirations of all souls.

It was not that he wished to find some mere mystical sensation, inchoate and indistinct, and try to express the feeling of just that, in lulled and monotonous rhythms. It was that he wished to take the many poignant 'little things', bitter and sweet, tragic and grotesque, common and fantastic, such as the earth affords us all in our confused wayfaring, and to associate these, as each generation is aware of them before it passes away, as he himself was aware of them in his own hour, with some dimly conceived immortal consciousness that gave them all an enduring value and dropped none of them by the way.

It was, so to speak, some tentative, hesitant, as yet only half-conscious soul of the earth, to which he sought to feel his way, a kind of half-human, half-elemental logos, nearer the Goat-foot Pass than any vague dream of the old Gnostics, and yet with a music in its being, beyond the breath of any reed of the marshes.

It was comparatively easy to let the faint magic of his view of things ebb and flow before his mental vision in these long golden mornings in Selshurst, where the very streets were full of the fragrances of the fields. It was a very different matter when he came to attempt the task of putting all this into poetic form. How, in that little bedroom of his, opening on the light breaths of rosemary and balsam and newly budding lavender, where every now and then came lively voices from the back parlour, he wrestled with the obstinate mystery of words!

Why not put these thoughts of his into the simpler cadences of prose? Because there are certain things that refuse to be expressed in prose, that demand the austerer rhythms, the more oracular gestures, the more broken, fragmentary, evasive hints, of poetry.

But ‘Oh Prince, what labour, oh Prince, what pain!’ For the rhythms of poetry, expecially of the vers libre he was working in, are of such a kind that not only the general swing of the verse had to leap forth as the very exhalation of his own especial soul, but each separate line, nay! every word he uses, must fall into its place, not ‘by taking thought’, but by an indefinable movement of the energy of music in himself. The syllables have to form an essence compounded of strange subtleties; and as for the thoughts, they must be bitter and sweet, full of the mysterious saps and juices of the blood of life, cool-breathing, redolent of undying mornings and evenings, sprinkled with eternal dews.

Day followed day without any interruption to these mental and psychic labours. ‘I have not run away a second time,’ he kept saying to himself; but that was the very thing, as he well knew in his secret heart, that he had done! To fall suddenly after those vibrant and thrilling first meetings with her, into dead silence, was nothing less than to abscond, to quit the field, to bolt.

He did not attempt to bring into honest daylight the queer shadowy motives that tumbled over one another, like shifty humpbacked weasels in a rabbit hole, down there in the darkness of his hidden mind. But somehow by not actually clearing off, by not leaving Selshurst altogether, he satisfied the scruples of one part of his nature, while by offering the girl nothing but this profound silence he made a definite break with what had begun to occur between them, and in a queer sort of indirect way hit back at the meddling Canyot.

It was all the more easy to hide himself like this just because that ‘threatening letter’, as he called it, of the impulsive painter had quite definitely broken up the special kind of sentimental attraction he had begun to feel for the young girl. In those first days he never thought of her without thinking of buttercups, and celandines; but now whenever he thought of her he thought of that ‘choosing definitely between us’; until the fair face of the maiden floated, in his mind, above a horrid iron prong, that jerked and prodded him into that lamentable arena of duty where decisions are made!

One morning, however, after more than a week of this recluse existence, his whole line of action was scattered to the winds by a letter from the girl herself.

‘Dear Mr Storm,’ the letter said, in a firm clear round rather childish hand. ‘When are you coming to see us again? – or have you left Selshurst? If you have gone away I hope they won’t forward this because it’s only a dull invitation which it will be a bore to receive in Paris or wherever you may be. It’s to ask you to come over to tea tomorrow, to meet my friend Mrs Shotover. Please try and come if you can, as my father took a great fancy to you; which is rare with him as you can guess. But of course if you have left it’s no use. In that case may I say I’m sorry we didn’t say goodbye?’ And the letter ended with an evident hesitation between ‘Sincerely’ and ‘Very sincerely’, avoided by a manufactured blot and a hurried ‘And with best wishes for the success of your work – from Nelly Moreton.’

It is extraordinary what power a direct personal appeal has, to break up a whole fabric of moral speculation! The look of the letter, the way she had worded it, that blot at the last with the unconventional ending – all these things thrilled Richard as if they had been the very touch of her hand. ‘Ha! Ha! My good friend,’ one of his slyest demons whispered to him, ‘so, after all, the real reason for this retreat of yours was pure jealousy! You thought she did still care for Canyot!’

Tea tomorrow? That means today – this very afternoon. And Richard rushed out of the Crown Inn passage, into the street, sans hat and stick, and made his way to the leafy cathedral close, walking upon air.

He left an admirable lunch, that noon, very imperfectly dispatched, and found himself chatting to barmaids, gardeners, ostlers, boot boys, even to that old insinuating toper, half-beggar, half local-celebrity, who went by the name of Young Bill, with the most eager interest. –

‘I may as well start early,’ he said to himself. ‘It’s so horrid to meet people when one’s hot and rushed.’

He started indeed so extremely early that it was hardly half past two when he arrived within a couple of miles of the place. I can’t appear yet for hours! he thought, and tried to settle himself down in a pleasant corner of a field, taking out of his pocket a little volume of Songs of Innocence and Experience. He got as far as the title on the cover, which struck his fancy as being singularly appropriate; but the words inside the book might have been written in Chinese, for all they conveyed to his mind.

‘Confound this waiting!’ he said to himself. ‘It makes a person nervous. Maybe I’d better take a bit of a detour.’ This diplomatic move had the effect of so entangling him between hedges and ditches, and hayfields where he knew he mustn’t tread down the grass, that it was quite four o’clock before he made his appearance, decidedly hot and very muddy, at the door of Littlegate Vicarage.

Mrs Shotover had arrived, and with John Moreton and Nelly was standing on the lawn outside the vicar's study.

Richard's joining them was the signal for Grace to bring out tea, preparations for which had already been made under the shelter of a wide-spreading sycamore.

Nelly had blushed scarlet on first seeing him and had been so nervous that in introducing him to Mrs Shotover, she said the one thing which she had made up her mind she must on no account say, the one thing that it would be 'perfectly awful' to say. 'Mrs Shotover,' she said, 'has been teasing me about you. She calls you my Stormy Petrel.'

As soon as she had uttered the words she could have bitten off her tongue. Some devil must have said that through my mouth! she thought.

A voice within the man she addressed did certainly not fail to point out that the jest was an ill-timed if not an ill-bred one; and that it was not pleasant to be the subject of 'teasing' between ladies. But this was only one voice among many that were uttering fantastic and carping comments in Richard's brain; and the real Richard was very little affected by them. Indeed the girl looked at him so shyly and so wistfully after this blunder, that she could have said something far worse than that and he would have forgiven her.

'I found a knapweed out this morning,' remarked the vicar, after the first settling in seats and pouring out of tea had subsided. 'I've never found one so early before; not in thirty years. It's a remarkable season.'

'Father always finds the first flower,' said Nelly quickly. 'He seems to know by instinct where to go for them. It's quite queer sometimes. You'd think that no sooner were a new flower out, than it made a special signal to Father, over miles and miles, to come and see it.'

'Mr Storm must come and see my garden,' threw in the lady from West Horthing, 'and I've got a few things in my house that no doubt would interest him still more.'

'What things do you mean?' asked Nelly with genuine curiosity. But her friend shook her head at her. 'It's Mr Storm I'm going to show them to, not you, dear. When you come to see me it's all gossip and scandal, isn't it? We've no time for serious things. Do you think it's really true, Mr Storm, that women are fonder of gossip than men?'

It was the old naturalist who unexpectedly replied to her.

'Women, Betty, gossip out of pure malice; in order to satisfy their spitefulness and spleen. Men gossip out of a philosophical interest in human nature.'

'I would put it rather differently.' said Storm. 'Men gossip about their enemies – women about their friends. Women think themselves privileged to abuse their friends.'

'Mr Storm! That isn't true,' broke in Nelly. 'Don't interrupt him, dear,' said the old lady. 'He was going to say something else. I saw it coming.'

What do you think yourself?' inquired Storm, looking straight into her satiric screwed-up eyes.

'I think we all gossip as fast as we can find subjects for it. Women's subjects are more limited than men's; so they're bound to make more of them.'

'Tell me this then—' began Richard.

'Oh no catechisms, I implore!' cried Mrs Shotover. 'That's where you literary people are so unkind.'

'I hope you don't mean so boring,' said Richard.

‘No, please, Granny dear; let Mr Storm finish his question. I’m sure it was thrilling. Ask me instead of her, won’t you?’ And Nelly smiled at him with a tender quiet little smile that seemed to say, ‘I love your catechisms!’

‘It probably wasn’t a proper question to put to you,’ chuckled Mrs Shotover. ‘Well, go ahead, young man, and be as unkind to the old lady as you like.’

‘I only meant – but there! we’ve driven your father away I’m afraid—’ and he stopped abruptly, as the vicar, nodding benevolently at them all, got up and shuffled across the lawn.
